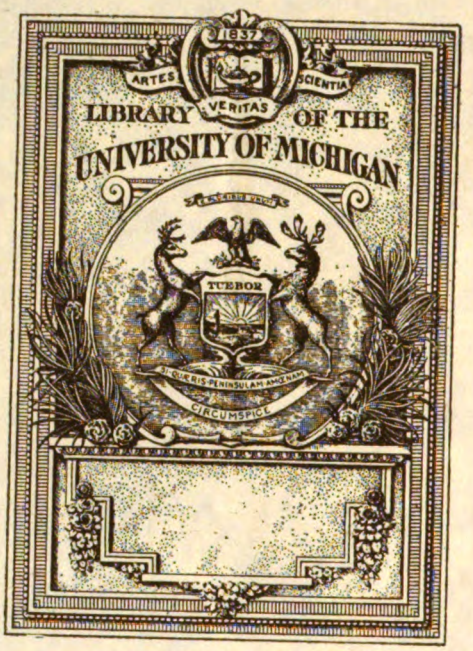
B 402608



1837
ARTES
SCIENTIA
VERITAS
LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
TUEBOR
CIRCUMSPICE

AP
4
.C9

Chambers's Journal

SEVENTH SERIES

VOL. IX

December 1918 to November 1919

LONDON: 38 SOHO SQUARE, W.1

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED

EDINBURGH: 339 HIGH STREET

1919

Edinburgh:
Printed by W. & R. Chambers, Limited.

INDEX.

TALES AND STORIES.

PAGE

AIRY PRINCE, THE. By Arthur Beverley Baxter 545, 572, 590, 612
Allegory of the Alligator, The. By Headon Hill 61
Attempt on Lone Pine Ranch, The. By E. R. Punshon 477
Awkward Predicament, An. By S. W. King . 254
Baptism of Fire. By R. P. Hughes 43
Baptism of Fire, A 350
Before the Battle. By F. O. O. 203
BLACKLISTED. By W. Victor Cook . 7, 26, 45
Blonde Gentleman, The. By Frederick Tilsley 714
BLOWER OF BUBBLES, THE. By Arthur Beverley Baxter . . . 193, 218, 231, 249, 264
BRASSFACE AND SILVERTONGUE. By Ignotus 785, 809
BROWN NABOB'S MONEY, THE. By J. S. Fletcher 753, 772, 791, 804, 820
CHRISTINE LONAVET. A Story of the Franco-Prussian War. By Andrew W. Arnold 337, 363, 376, 391
City of Dreadful Silence, The. By Frederick Tilsley 632
'Coast' Way, The. By Frank H. Shaw . . 637
Courting of Suzette, The. By Ashmore Russan 491
Dark Patch, The. By Bart Kennedy . . 461
Episode of Ravensheugh Toll, The. By Sir James Balfour Paul, C.V.O., LL.D . . 615
Fallacy in Tactics, A. By R. P. Hughes. . 433
'Fashioner of the Gods, The.' By S. H. Reason 329
FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE, A. By Mrs Herbert Martin. 65, 86
Good Luck at 'Poker' 745
His Own Language. By Frederick Tilsley . 108
Jagtap's Finesse. By Arbory Glyndon . . 190
Jock's Terms. A Tale of the Malta Hospitals. By Albert G. Mackinnon 684
JOHN BROWN. Confessions of a New Army Cadet. By R. W. Campbell.
I. The Cadet School 1
II. The Sergeant-Major from the Guards . 3
III. Customs of the Service 20
IV. What We Talked About 41
V. A Canadian Newspaper 56
VI. The Modern Girl 78
VII. Psychology 92
VIII. The Value of Sport 111
IX. John Brown's Letters 139
X. Making up with Adela 156
XI. Blase-Bones from Sandwurse . . 175
XII. The Noise of War 207
XIII. Our Dear Old Commandant . . . 221
XIV. Not Understood 253
XV. Mother Comes to School. . . . 284
XVI. The New Army Officer 312
XVII. Steady Old Adela 346

PAGE

XVIII. General Pom-Pom 378
XIX. 'The Boys' 395
XX. A Jolly Rag 424
XXI. History and Esprit de Corps . . 471
XXII. The Spirit of God 507
XXIII. We Discuss the School . . . 522
XXIV. The Commandant's Farewell . . 537
KAVANAGH'S LUCKY BEAN. By Mary Stuart Boyd 689, 707, 725, 741
LADY HELEN'S NEURALGIA. By Rosaline Masson 129, 152, 172
Link, The. A Tale of Aden. By R. A. Adair 593
Long Trail, The. By L. B. Thoburn Clarke . 409
Lovers' Luck. A Story of the Malta Hospitals. By Albert G. Mackinnon 161
Man 'John Smith,' The. By Frederick Sleath 513
MAN WHO LOVED LONDON, THE. By J. S. Fletcher 481, 505
Mersey Terriers. By Oswald Wildridge . . 767
Miniature, The. By Mary F. Raphael . . 677
Miss Bullen's Lace. By Headon Hill . . 558
MR SWEETBREAD'S SURPLICE. By Pat Sunday 97, 120
One Day. By Innes Logan 29
Pageant of a Private on Guard, The. By C. A. Malcolm, M.A. 225
PEPITA. A Daughter of the Pampas. By H. Hunter 798, 814
PETITE SIMUNDE. By Arthur Beverley Baxter 417, 442, 454
Private Eliot. By Innes Logan 140
Rats of St L——, The. By W. Coats-Bush . 527
Recalcitrant Chief, A. By C. G. Nurse . . 369
Red Seal, The 318
SEARCHERS, THE. By John Foster 33, 53, 70, 83, 104, 117, 135, 149, 168, 181, 198, 213, 227, 245, 261, 279, 292, 309, 325, 343, 359, 372, 387, 405, 421, 436, 452, 469, 487, 500, 519, 533, 553, 566, 579, 596
S.O.S. By F. O. O. 299
STOLEN GUESTS. By Albert G. Mackinnon 561, 586, 599
Story of Lochan-na-Cheaird, The. By C. C. Maconochie 781
Tank B2411. By Jack Spur 157
That Blessed Fog. By John S. Margerison . 397
Twins of Bryan Broadwater, The. By Mrs W. F. Irvine Bell 428
'VERY CHRISTIAN SEÑOR, THE.' By G. Trevor Roller 650, 665
Wanted—A Prisoner 669
WAY HOME, THE. By Patrick Macgill . 353, 380
WINGS OF THE MORNING, THE. By John A. Steuart 273, 296
WITHIN TOUCH. A Story of Cromwellian Times. By G. Appleby Terrill . 625, 644, 660

389592

ARTICLES OF INSTRUCTION AND ENTERTAINMENT.

PAGE

Acoustic Echoes of the Great War . . . 539
Adventures in Turkestan, An English Girl's. By Florence Fuller-Neary . . . 449, 555
Air, The Last Three Months of War in the. By Captain D. R. Maclaren, D.S.O., M.C. and Bar, D.F.C. 305, 327
Antarctic Exploration, The Renewal of. By R. C. Mossman, F.R.S.E. 517
Archæological Researches in Italy, Recent Excavations and. By Ivan Lavretsky . . 170
Argentina, Scotland Comes to. By John Aulay Steele 14
Art, Nature and. 248
Ascension Natural History Notes . . . 110
Ashanti in the Twentieth Century. By David Boyle 525
Asia's Most Famous Treasure-Hoard . . 155
'Balance of Nature,' and the New Entomology, The. By C. A. Ealand, M.A. . . . 549
Baptism of Fire. By R. P. Hughes. . . . 43
Baptism of Fire, A 350
Bartholomew, St—A Little-Known French Possession. By the Rev. Montague L. Foyle. 90
Battle, Before the. By F. O. O. 203
Battle of 1666, The Four Days'. By H. W. Household, M.A. 241
Bee and a Beetle, A 453
Beyonds. By Bart Kennedy 565
Bird-Life in the Canadian Bush and Something of Hunting. By Herbert T. Grant . . 635
Blinded Soldier, St Dunstan's and the. By an Officer-Pupil 182
'Bloody Fall' Murder, The. By George C. Wells 286
Borneo, A Fortnight in 701
Brazil, Diamonds and Carbonado in. By Ashmore Russan 311
Buddhist Monasteries. By David Boyle . . 85
Calcutta or Cape Town, Charing Cross to . 423
Cambridge, The New Teaching at . . . 646
Canadian Bush, Bird-Life in the, and Something of Hunting. By Herbert T. Grant . 635
Cannel Coal 389
Cape Town or Calcutta, Charing Cross to . 423
Carbonado and Diamonds in Brazil. By Ashmore Russan 311
Chapter from a Journalist's Diary. By Sir Henry Lucy. 628
Charing Cross to Calcutta or Cape Town . . 423
Chinese Crew, Doctoring a 76
Closing of Our Hospital, The. By 'Staff Nurse' 335
Coal, Cannel 389
Cocaine Habit in India, The 106
Coincidences, Striking: The War and the Planets. By John J. Ross, M.A., B.A. . 289
Coins, My Old Greek. By Edwin Wooton . 426
Commercial Traveller in War-Time, The. By Peter Rintoul 201
Concrete. By Thomas Potter 235
Congress of Vienna, 1814–1815, The. By Sir Richard Lodge, LL.D. . . . 17, 87

PAGE

Consciousness. By Bart Kennedy 733
Consular Service, Humours of the. By a Retired Consul 730
Cotton-Seed, The Industrial Value of 'Residual Fibres' on 654
Crumpled Rose-Leaves. By Lady Skerrington 705
Curative Agents, Vegetables as 668
Curiosities of the Peerage. By Charles G. Harper 694
Curlews, The Coming of the. By H. Mortimer Batten 734
Customs and Superstitions, Some Rumanian. By R. Carnegie 812
Diamonds and Carbonado in Brazil. By Ashmore Russan 311
Diary, A Chapter from a Journalist's. By Sir Henry Lucy 628
Doctoring a Chinese Crew 76
Drugs, Indian Hemp 718
East Africa, A Holiday in 165
Entomology, The New, and the 'Balance of Nature.' By C. A. Ealand, M.A. . . . 549
Ex Aqua Omnia. By C. E. Benson 132
Fairy-Tales of South Africa. By E. L. M'Pherson 756
Fallacy in Tactics, A. By R. P. Hughes . 433
Far North, On a River of the. By G. Lindesay 484
Fife, Some Curious Corners of the 'Kingdom' of. By W. T. Linskill 494
Fig, The Romance of the Smyrna. By Charles Ray 577
First Leave 64
Fish and Fisheries, The Future of. By W. V. Roberts 277
Fishing with Water-Bombs. By Æsculapius . 470
Four Days' Battle of 1666, The. By H. W. Household, M.A.. 241
Fruit-Growing in Britain and America, Scientific. By Charles Ray 11
Germans and Natives in New Guinea. By Thomas J. M'Mahon 73
German Trade with Latin-America. By M. C. Beverley 724
Gold. By R. Mordaunt 151
Gold, More about the Magic of. By James Beattie 489
Greek Coins, My Old. By Edwin Wooton . 426
Greenland, In North 341
Heart of Things, The. By Henry Leach 49, 113, 177, 257, 321, 401, 465, 529, 609, 673, 737, 817
Heirs, Romances of Missing. By John G. Rowe 366
Hemp Drugs, Indian 718
Honey-Bees Depose Royalty, How. By Canning Williams 502
Hospital, The Closing of Our. By 'Staff Nurse' 335
How the War Came Home. By Lauchlan MacLean Watt 81
Immortal Vagabond, An. By Arthur L. Hayward 825
Indian Hemp Drugs 718

PAGE

Inherited Habit a Factor in Plant-Life . . 345
Internment, Social, Mental, and Moral Effects of. By Tom Govett 457
Italy, Recent Excavations and Archæological Researches in. By Ivan Lavretsky . . 170
Jewel-House, The Keeper of the. By Major-General Sir George Younghusband, K.C.M.G. 657
'Jollies,' The—A Reunited and Happy Family. By Lord Teignmouth 763
Journalist's Diary, A Chapter from a. By Sir Henry Lucy 628
Kassa-Wa-Wa, The Songster. By H. Mortimer Batten 641
Keeper of the Jewel-House, The. By Major-General Sir George Younghusband, K.C.M.G. 657
Laconics. By George F. M. Cocks . . . 589
Ladies' Gallery, The. By W. H. Moyes . . 197
Land of Curious Smells, The 349
Last Trail, The. By F. St Mars . . 209, 238
Latin-America, German Trade with. By M. C. Beverley 724
Lawyer's Papers, More Dust from an English. By G. H. Browning 775
Leave, First 64
Leeches. By Mrs F. A. Douglas . . . 294
Literary Metamorphoses. By Sir George Douglas, Bart. 357
London, Some Odd Things about. By C. G. Harper
I.—The City 807
II.—The West End 823
Magic of Gold, More about the. By James Beattie 489
Maigre, Un Jour—Wireless Messages. By Mrs W. F. Irvine Bell 509
Marché, Un Jour de—Wireless Messages. By Mrs W. F. Irvine Bell 315
Mecca the Mysterious. By Ernest Phillips . 216
Mersey Terriers. By Oswald Wildridge . . 767
Metamorphoses, Literary. By Sir George Douglas, Bart. 357
Missing Heirs, Romances of. By John G. Rowe 366
Monasteries, Buddhist. By David Boyle . 85
Moon, Round about the 521
More about the Magic of Gold. By James Beattie 489
Mosul-Nineveh. By Louise Peralta . . 23
Murder, The 'Bloody Fall.' By George C. Wells 286
Natal, Sugar-Cane Growing in. By James Paterson 459
Natural History Notes, Ascension . . . 110
Nature and Art 248
'Nature, The Balance of,' and the New Entomology. By C. A. Ealand, M.A. . . . 549
Nettles, Nourishment from. By I. I. Brants . 298
New Guinea, Germans and Natives in. By Thomas J. M'Mahon 73
New Teaching at Cambridge, The . . . 646
Nourishment from Nettles. By I. I. Brants . 298
Origins. By Charles G. Harper . . . 5
'Pacific, The Pearl of the.' By W. Scott Lorrie 597

PAGE

Pastoral Reminiscences. By Sir George Douglas, Bart. 764
'Pearl of the Pacific, The.' By W. Scott Lorrie 597
Peat-Moss as an Agricultural Asset . . . 267
Peerage, Curiosities of the. By Charles G. Harper 694
Perse School, The—The New Teaching at Cambridge 646
Planets, The War and the: Striking Coincidences. By John J. Ross, M.A., B.A. 289
Plant-Life, Inherited Habit a Factor in . . 345
Platinum Substitute, A New. By G. Basil Barham, C.E. 595
Princes Street, Edinburgh, Some Memories, Chiefly Literary, of 711
Proverbs of Scottish History, The. By Charles Menmuir, M.A. 497
Quinine Habit, The. 444
Railway Robbers, Modern Methods of. By S. T. James 794
Ravensheugh Toll, The Episode of. By Sir James Balfour Paul, C.V.O., LL.D. . . 615
Recalcitrant Chief, A. By C. G. Nurse . . 369
Redrib. By H. Mortimer Batten . . . 759
Reminiscences, Pastoral. By Sir George Douglas, Bart. 764
'Residual Fibres', on Cotton-Seed, The Industrial Value of 654
Rhodes, Cecil. Some Personal Reminiscences. By Sir Henry Lucy 145
River of the Far North, On a. By G. Lindesay 484
R. L. S. as Playmate. By 'Lantern-Bearer' . 583
Robbers, Railway, Modern Methods of. By S. T. James. 794
Rose-Garden, The World's Biggest . . . 780
Rubbish. By Doxa Foy 118
Rumanian Customs and Superstitions, Some. By R. Carnegie 812
Russian Revolution, A Sidelight on the. By Vladimir Poliakoff 361
Samarkand—An English Girl's Adventures in Turkestan. By Florence Fuller-Neary . 555
Scotland comes to Argentina. By John Aulay Steele 14
Scottish History, The Proverbs of. By Charles Menmuir, M.A. 497
Scottish Street Names, More. By G. M. Fraser 438
Shale-Oil Industry, The 534
Shikari, The Killing of a. By F. C. C. . . 777
Silver. By R. Mordaunt 569
Singapore Mutiny and Other War Experiences, The. By E. D. Ward 801
Smells, The Land of Curious 349
Smyrna Fig, The Romance of the. By Charles Ray 577
Snake-Poison, Spitting-Snakes and. By H. A. Bryden 663
Soho Square, Old. By Francis Steuart . . 374
S.O.S. By F. O. O. 299
South Africa, Fairy-Tales of. By E. L. M'Pherson 756

PAGE

Spitting-Snakes and Snake-Poison. By H. A. Bryden 663
Sports. A Story of the Wild. By F. St Mars 697
St Dunstan's and the Blinded Soldier. By an Officer-Pupil 182
St James's Park. By E. Beresford Chancellor, M.A., F.R.Hist.S. 601
St Martin and St Eustatius—Off the Beaten Track in the West Indies. By the Rev. Montague L. Foyle 281
State Trials, Concerning 789
Street Names, More Scottish. By G. M. Fraser 438
Sugar-Cane Growing in Natal. By James Paterson 459
Superstitions and Customs, Some Rumanian. By R. Carnegie 812
Tactics, A Fallacy in. By R. P. Hughes. . 433
Tana, The—On a River of the Far North. By G. Lindesay 484
Tashkent during Ramazan—An English Girl's Adventures in Turkestan. By Florence Fuller-Neary 449
Teaching, A Scientific Method of. By J. Strachan, M.D. 385, 407
Tiahuanaco Mystery, The. By John Sharp . 302
Titicaca, Lake 138
Togoland, Hitting the Beach at. By Captain Monahan 721, 743
Trade with Latin-America, German. By M. C. Beverley 724
Trafalgar, After. By H. W. Household, M.A. 769
Travel in War and Peace. By A. Russell Walker 68
Treasure-Hoard, Asia's Most Famous . . 155
Trials, Concerning State 789
Trout, The Growth of. By A. T. Johnson . 420

PAGE

Turkestan, An English Girl's Adventures in. By Florence Fuller-Neary.
I.—Tashkent during Ramazan . . 449
II.—Samarkand 555
Two Starts: What they have Taught Me. By a Demobilised Officer 747
United States, The War and the. By Captain H. W. Yoxall 160
Vagabond, An Immortal. By Arthur L. Hayward 825
Vegetables as Curative Agents 665
Vienna, The Congress of, 1814–1815. By Sir Richard Lodge, LL.D. . . . 17, 37
Wanted—A Prisoner 669
War, Acoustic Echoes of the Great . . . 539
War and the Planets, The: Striking Coincidences. By John J. Ross, M.A., B.A. . 287
War and the United States, The. By Captain H. W. Yoxall 100
War-Ball, The. By Bart Kennedy . . . 263
War Came Home, How the. By Lauchlan MacLean Watt 81
War in the Air, The Last Three Months of the. By Captain D. R. Maclaren, D.S.O., M.C. and Bar, D.F.C. 305, 327
War-Time, The Commercial Traveller in. By Peter Rintoul 201
Water-Bombs, Fishing with. By Æsculapius 470
Weeds, Back to the—Nourishment from Nettles. By I. I. Brants 298
West Indies, Off the Beaten Track in the. By the Rev. Montague L. Foyle . . . 281
Wireless Messages. By Mrs W. F. Irvine Bell.
II.—Un Jour de Marché 315
III.—Un Jour Maigre 509
'Yellow Jack.' By John D. Leckie. . . 230

POETRY.

Aftermath, The. By J. M. 768
'Also Rans.' By V. H. F. 144
Apocalypse. By M. Hedderwick Browne . 672
Australia—The Spirit of the Bush . . . 448
'Backsheesh, Sa'b.' By W. J. Harris . . 624
Bogles. By Maria Steuart 800
Dreamer, The. By M. M. Haldane . . . 704
Dusk, At. By Nita H. Padwick . . . 560
Forest Thought, A. By Constance Farmar . 256
Foxglove, To the. By Haslehurst Greaves . 176
Gift, The. By A. T. Corke 544
Gipsy Love. By J. M. Stuart-Young . . 112
'Good-Night.' By Helen Wilkie . . . 224
Hearts Courageous. By Gilbert Rae . . 720
Highland Night: 1715—1815—1915. By Isabel Wescott Harper 16
If Lilac always Lasted. By Pauline W. Roose 240
Lads that Were, The. By Hilda Skae . . 288
Lines Written for a Mother's War Album. By a South African 64
Lines Written in the Indian Ocean. By F. O. B. 432
Love-Light. By Fred. W. Bayliss . . . 48
Martha. By R. B. 416
Message, The. By J. M. Stuart-Young . . 480
Moonlight. By Dora Nicol 272
Nightingale, The 496
Old Church and the New, The. By J. M. H. . 320
Old Yew-Tree, The. By N. L. Wallace . . 128
Orkney, To. By G. W. 384
Parting. By Agnes L. Hillman . . . 304
Red-House Garden, The. By Robert R. Thompson 688
Rondeau. By F. C. L. S. 400
Shadows. By Allan Sanderson . . . 80
Shadows. By A. Milne 784
South-West Breeze in London, A. By Inger A. MacLeod 816
Summer. By Lilian Holmes 368
Tantallon. By W. Roberts 608
Threepenny-Bit, The. By J. K. Turton . . 352
Two Railway Stations By William T. Ellis . 571
Village War-Memorial, The. By James T. Johnston 656
Voyage, The. By Lilian Holmes . . . 528
Waltz of the Leaves, The. By Lorna Keeling Collard 736
Wayfarer, The. By Hilda Skae . . . 512
Western Men, The. By G. E. Merrick . . 640
Youth. By J. D. Hessey 96
Youth and Age. By B. Dunbar Dey . . 160

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS.

	PAGE
Aeroplanes' Performance Predicted by Models	267
Aeroplane, The Largest in the World	541
Aeroplane, Versatility of the	58
Afforestation	190
Agricultural Railways	188
Airships, Non-Inflammable Gas for	333
Alloy, New Heat-Resisting	414
Arched Houses without Roofs	830
Automatic Guide-Book, An	750
Bath from the Copper, A Hot	331
Beech-Nuts as a Source of Food	189
Bicycles, Unpuncturable Tires for	58
Blockhouses for Banks	832
Book-keeping by Correspondence, Instruction in Farm	61
Bread, Stale, caused by Cold	749
Briquette-Maker for the Home, A	334
Buckled Ship, Straightening a	749
Buildings Removed Intact, Large	416
Butterfly's Strange Protective Devices	188
Canal, Mediterranean to Persian Gulf by	333
Canal, The Grand, of China, to be put in Order	189
Carburetter for Motor-Cars, New Paraffin	750
Carnauba Tree of Brazil, The	271
Carpet-Sweeper and Vacuum Cleaner, Combined	623
Channel-Ferry Scheme, Huge	332
Charge-Bags for Heavy Guns, Cotton	58
China, The Grand Canal of, to be put in Order	189
Cinema-Film Factory, A Large	620
Circulars, An Improved Machine for Producing Typewritten	476
Clothes from Peat	270
Coal and Iron in Spitsbergen	125
Coal-Handling Plant, Enormous	476
Coal-Saver for Open Fires, Ingenious	124
Cold Causes Bread to become Stale	749
Concrete for Railway Trucks	683
Concrete Houses, Cheap	681
Concrete Piles, Water-Jets Sink	830
Conscious Insensibility	414
Cooker, A Gas-Saving	269
Cooker, An Easily Made Fireless	126
Cooker, An Electric-Lamp	123
Cooker, Another Fireless	413
Cooking and Heating, Exhaust Gases from Motors for	59
Cooler, Home-Made Food	751
Copper, A Hot Bath from the	331
Cotton Charge-Bags for Heavy Guns	58
Cotton, Machine for Picking	124
Cross-Channel Train-Ferries, The	268
Dew, Water-Supplies from	268
Diary, A Gas-Consumption Recording	60
Diving-Bell for Salvaging, A New	751
Door, A New Form of	57
Double Saucepan, A Novel Form of	477
Dried Meat	542
Dried Vegetables for the United States Army	125
Dust-Bins, Huge Vacuum Cleaner for Emptying	621
Earth to the Moon, From the	189
Economiser, Gas-Ring	624
Electric Currents, Fish Stopped by	188
Electric-Lamp Cooker, An	123
Erosion, Felled Trees Stop River	832
Exhaust Gases from Motors for Cooking and Heating	59
Factory, Eliminating Fatigue in the	541
Farm Book-keeping by Correspondence, Instruction in	61
Farm without Horses, Huge	752
Fatigue in the Factory, Eliminating	541
Ferro-Concrete Flagstaff	830
Ferro-Concrete Shipbuilding	57
Fertiliser, A New—Tetraphosphate	58
Fibre Gramophone-Needles in the Making	683
Film Factory, A Large Cinema	620
Fireless Cooker, An Easily Made	126
Fireless Cooker, Another	413
Fish Stopped by Electric Currents	188
Fish to Exterminate Mosquitoes, Breeding	413
Flagstaff, Ferro-Concrete	830
Flying 'Stunts' on the Ground	543
Food-Cooler, Home-Made	751
Gas-Consumption Recording Diary, A	60
Gases from Motors for Cooking and Heating, Exhaust	59
Gas for Airships, Non-Inflammable	333
Gas-Range, A New	682
Gas Ring Economiser	624
Gas-Saving Cooker, A	269
Germ of Yellow-Fever, The	415
Gramophone, A New Type of	474
Gramophone-Needles in the Making, Fibre	683
Grand Canal of China to be put in Order, The	189
Guide-Book, An Automatic	750
Gun Range of One Hundred and Twenty-one Miles, A	474
Guns, Cotton Charge-Bags for Heavy	58
'Hay-Box' de Luxe, A	269
Heat-Resisting Alloy, New	414
Horses, Huge Farm without	752
Hot Bath from the Copper, A	331
Houses, Cheap Concrete	681
Houses without Roofs, Arched	830
India, Water-Power in	126
Insensibility, Conscious	414
Iron and Coal in Spitsbergen	125
Kitchen-Range, Oil-Fuel for the	125
Knife-Sharpener, A New	413
Liquid Air and the War	270
Locomotives, Gigantic American	59
Log Raft, The World's Biggest	332
Lottery Bond Numbers, Drawing	682
Meat, Dried	542
Mediterranean to Persian Gulf by Canal	333
Microbes Killed by Pressure	622
Micro-Telescope, The	474
Milk Saucepan, A New	414
Mine-Sweeper for every Ship, A	334
Moon, From the Earth to the	189
Mosquitoes, Breeding Fish to Exterminate	413
Motor, A New Push-Bike	830

	PAGE
Motor-Cars, New Paraffin Carburetter for	750
Motor-Cycles, A Pillion-Saddle for	621
Motor-Spirit from Peat	415
Mount Morgan Mine, The Famous	544
Nets for Workmen, Safety	58
Night-Light, A Cheap Paraffin	541
Oil-Fuel for the Kitchen-Range	125
Oil in Sweden, New Source of	60
Oil-Stove, A Clean, Silent, and Efficient	831
Operations without Unconsciousness, Painless	682
Ore-Loading Plant, Huge	830
Paraffin Carburetter for Motor-Cars, New	750
Paraffin Night-Light, A Cheap	541
Peat, Clothes from	270
Peat, Motor-Spirit from	415
Persian Gulf by Canal, Mediterranean to	333
Petrol Storage-Tank, A Safe	622
Piles, Water-Jets Sink Concrete	830
Pillion-Saddle for Motor-Cycles, A	621
Plugs for Plaster Walls, Screw	412
Pressure, Microbes Killed by	622
Protection from Rust, Increased	475
Protective Devices, Butterfly's Strange	188
Push-Bike Motor, A New	830
Raft, The World's Biggest Log	332
Railways, Agricultural	188
Railway Trucks, Concrete for	683
Railway Wheels, Rolling Steel	621
River Erosion, Felled Trees Stop	832
Riveted Joints for Ships, Welded instead of	60
Rust, Increased Protection from	475
Safety-Nets for Workmen	58
Salvaging, A New Diving-Bell for	751
Salved Parts Make One Whole Ship	413
Salving Devices, Novel Ship	831
Saucepan, A New Milk	414
Saucepan, A Novel Form of Double	477
Science in the Great War	750
Screw Plugs for Plaster Walls	412
Shipbuilding, Ferro-Concrete	57
Ship-Salving Devices, Novel	831
Ship, Straightening a Buckled	749
Soap Substitutes in Germany	475
Soil Sterilised with the Aid of Steam	681
Spitsbergen, Coal and Iron in	125
Stale, Cold causes Bread to become	749
Steel Soldiers for Front-Line Trenches	187
Step-Ladder, Safety	60
Sterilising the Soil with the Aid of Steam	681
Stove, A Clean, Silent, Efficient Oil	831
Stretcher, A New Form of	332
Sunlight, Telephoning by	622
Sweden, New Source of Oil in	60
Tank, A Safe Petrol Storage	622
Tank, The 'Baby'	187
Telephoning by Sunlight	622
Tetraphosphate—A New Fertiliser	58
Tin Cans, Utilisation of Old	624
Tires for Bicycles, Unpuncturable	58
Train-Ferries, The Cross-Channel	268
Tree, A Wonderful—The Carnauba Tree of Brazil	271
Trees, Felled, Stop River Erosion	832
Trucks, Concrete for Railway	683
Twenty-six-Thousand-Mile Run without Moving, The Equivalent of a	415
Typewritten Circulars, An Improved Machine for Producing	476
Unconsciousness, Painless Operations without	682
Vacuum Cleaner, A New Hand	623
Vacuum Cleaner, Combined Carpet-Sweeper and	623
Vacuum Cleaner for Emptying Dust-Bins, Huge	621
Vegetables, Dried, for the United States Army	125
Warships, The World's Longest	542
Washing-Machine for the Home, New	680
Water-Jets Sink Concrete Piles	830
Water-Pipes, A New Appliance for Scraping	544
Water-Pipes that do not Freeze	543
Water-Power in India	126
Water-Supplies from Dew	268
Welded instead of Riveted Joints for Ships	60
Wheels, Rolling Steel Railway	621
White-Painted Tanks Economise Petrol	189
Yellow-Fever, The Germ of	415

EXTRA CHRISTMAS NUMBER CONTENTS.

MERRIE GENTLEMEN	By Arthur Beverley Baxter	1
'IMPHM!' SAID MRS KNOX	By Mary Stuart Boyd	23
THE KHAMSIN	By J. A. Nimmo	36
THE FALL TRIUMPHANT	By C. L. M. Brown	37

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

JOHN BROWN.

CONFESSIONS OF A NEW ARMY CADET.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D., and the Doctor; &c

CHAPTER I.—THE CADET SCHOOL.

NO doubt you have seen, in the highways and byways, a lot of youths in khaki with white bands round their caps. These 'boys' are called cadets, and are usually men home from the front to train for commissions. In Sandhurst they are officially styled gentlemen cadets; but apparently we are not supposed to be gentlemen—we 're just cadets. Funny, isn't it? But that 's the way of the army.

Well, my name is John Brown—a very ordinary name—and I 'm one of those fellows. Before the war I evaded toil by becoming a student, and spent a lot of time on 'ologies and 'osophies. Now I 'm learning to be a pukka officer, and the leader of sixty men to the cannon's mouth.

When I left my battalion for the cadet school I shed no tears. We were in the trenches, or, rather, in the mud. And it cost a pair of brand-new boots to get on to the road. However, I survived, and in due time landed at Windmoor. This is a 'blasted heath,' swept by the winds, and isolated from picture-shows, barmaids, and revues; not a petticoat in sight, and at every corner a notice which amounts to: 'England expects that every cadet this day will do his duty.'

'This is no Utopia,' I muttered, falling into the first hut by the way. Ye gods! There was an old colonel, with eyes like a hawk and cheeks like dumplings, and what do you think he was doing? Cutting his corns.

'What the—why the—who the devil are you, sah?'

'John Brown, sir,' I said meekly, for never in my life had I seen such a perfect relic of the Napoleonic wars.

'Get to blazes out of this, John Brown!' he roared, putting his fat feet on the floor and banging the door. I was again alone—on the blasted heath. The old gent inside was Colonel Eat-All, the commandant. Rumour says he devoured two dervishes at Omdurman. I stumbled on once more, and found the orderly-room.

'This way,' said Sergeant-Major Kneesup, introducing me to the adjutant. I clicked my heels in the style of a Guardsman, and saluted like a railway signal.

'Well?' said a blasé-looking gent with three pips, looking up at me from his papers.

'John Brown, sir.'

'Who sent you here?'

'The War Office.'

'Umph! I know nothing about you. You had better go back to your regiment for your papers.'

'But I can't go all the way to France, sir.'

'Well, no—perhaps not. Wait a minute,' he said, ringing a bell. A clerk answered.

'Have you any papers dealing with Cadet John Brown?'

'Yes, sir. Came a fortnight ago.'

'Thank you. That 's all.' The clerk went out.

'Oh, it 's all right, Brown. Just go over to No. 1 Company. You 'll see Sergeant-Major Smartem there. He 'll fix you up. Good luck!' he concluded with a genial smile. I saluted and went out, marvelling at the methods of the British Army.

I dug out the sergeant-major and again announced that I was John Brown.

'That 's a fine name to go to bed with.'

'It 's the one my mother gave me.'

'Oh, well, you can't help it. Here 's your blankets; there 's your bed. You 'll get your equipment to-morrow. Shove this white band on your cap. Tea 's at five o'clock. The lavatory 's down there. That 's the canteen over yonder. And when you want writing-paper, hymns, or free salvation, there 's a Y.M.C.A. down the road. Now, push off—John Brown.'

I was extremely grateful for all this information in tabloid form, but I had a lurking suspicion that my name was going to be a subject of rude jest. However, I am an optimist. I pitched my bag into a corner of the hut, pulled out a little book called The Pleasures of Hope, and commenced to read till tea-time. But I was disturbed. Cadet after cadet came filing in. They were all new and rather green, except one man, called Beefy Jones.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

'What a ruddy place for a cadet school!' he roared.

'My dear chap, it is designed to protect our morality,' muttered a spectacled youth, who looked like an ex-parson.

'Morality! After a year at the front! What a jest!' exclaimed Beefy, banging his kit down.

In half-an-hour we were all good pals. Beefy confided to me that he had a ripping girl five miles away, and she had a jolly sister. If I wanted an intro. it was all right. He would fix it up. While the ex-parson—Billy Greens by name—suggested that I might help him to hand out the hymn-books at Sunday services. I promised to do so. (My father was in the Diplomatic Service.) And so twenty of us settled down to life in our hut at Windmoor Cadet School.

Tea-time proved that the rations were good, and when Lieutenant Blessem (our platoon officer) came round for complaints, we shouted, 'None, sir.'

'That 's a good start,' he said with a smile. 'I want you boys to be happy here. If you 're in trouble, or want to know anything, come down to my hut, and I 'll help you. But remember this, boys'——

'What, sir?' said Beefy.

'This platoon has got to be top-hole at everything.'

'Hear, hear, sir!' we roared, rattling our plates as he went out. Blessem was a sport. After tea we got piles of books thrown at us, as well as the standing orders of the school—a moral code akin to the Koran, insisting on sobriety, sincerity, and big salaams. These orders confirmed that ancient theory that women and wine are the root of all evil.

Beefy grinned, then shoved me on the back of his motor-bike and whirled me over to Sweetville, where I was introduced to Adela, a peach of a girl, who had never been kissed. What luck!

It was 7 P.M. when I met Adela. I kissed her at 9; promised to marry her at 9.15; and at 9.30 (to the minute) Beefy and I were answering roll-call at the camp five miles away. Some hustle—eh, what?

We made our beds down and got in between the blankets. About 'lights out' there was an infernal din outside the hut. Somebody was running round shouting, 'John Brown! Where the 'ell 's John Brown?' Then some fifty huts started a chorus of—

'John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave, As we go marching along,' &c., &c.

Beefy led the chorus in our own hut—much to my annoyance. At last the door opened, and the sergeant-major bawled, 'Silence!' They shut up. He next inquired if John Brown lived there.

'Yes, sergeant-major. Here I am.'

'Telegram for you.'

'Oh, thanks,' I muttered, thinking it was some wonderful effusion from Adela. On opening the brown envelope I read: 'Sending you cough-drops, Keating's powder, and body-belt.—MOTHER.'

As the lights went down I thought of the dear, good soul who was so careful of my welfare. Mothers may be silly, but they always love their boys.

. . . . . .

Next morning we were routed out at reveille and hunted off to tub ourselves in an open-air wash-house. One fellow, 'Ginger Thomson,' objected. We carried him out and flung him into the bath—clothes and all. There was no early parade that day, so we got ready for the commandant's inspection at 10 A.M. This was a real good show. We were formed up in close column of platoons. At 10 A.M. (to the minute) Colonel Eat-All came bouncing on to the parade-ground—like a great Rugby football—dressed in khaki and splashed with ribbons. He had every decoration from the Order of the Blue Nile to a Companionship of Serajobitch (with swords). My word, he looked his part! I trembled.

'Well, gentlemen,' he said, 'I 'm glad to meet you. I hope we 'll get on together, but I 'll have no nonsense, no slacking, and no back-answers. I 've trained lions, burglars, and Gurkhas, and have commanded everything from mule transport to camel corps. You 're here to work—work. And when I 've finished with you, you 'll be fit to scale the Alps, and eat Germans or smelling Bulgars. You won't get strategy out of the Bystander or tactics from the Pink-Un. The infantry drill book is better than Nat Gould, and Needham's Tactics more important than the sexual stuff of Oscar Wilde. Keep out in the open air, and don't hug the stove and the tea-pot. Get your tummies hard, so that you can live on boot-leather, horse-flesh, and cinders. War is to the strong, and you 've got to be super-men—and gentlemen. We produce no jelly-fish in this emporium. We want "white men" and leaders. We 're up against the Hun. He isn't a d—— fool! Get that out of your headpieces. If you are going to beat him, you have got to know the tricks of Boney, the science of Maude, and the dare-devil tactics of Allenby. You can get all this here, if you pay attention and carry out your job. Good-luck to you!' And off he stamped, to the amusement of all. As he passed my platoon he caught sight of me. My mouth was open.

'What 's your name, my lad?'

'John Brown, sir.'

'Well, if you keep your mouth open like that in Mesopotamia, you 'll catch everything from black cholera to cerebro-spinal meningitis. Keep your mouth shut—John Brown!'

From that day every cadet in the battalion took up the gag of, 'Keep your mouth shut—John Brown!'

CHAPTER II.—THE SERGEANT-MAJOR FROM THE GUARDS.

CADET schools are not perfect military academies; nevertheless, they are interesting resorts. This school is not only a fount of learning, but a school for manners and—in a way—a minor university. Although, as I have said, I was a student of 'osophies and 'ologies before the war, the discovery that my knowledge was limited soon came to me. This is a happy condition, and the only basis whereon to achieve future success. For all that, I am no groveller at the feet of lecturers. An officer must form his own opinions, and if I am going to be of any use in this military business, I must riddle the wheat from the chaff, and gather the harvest into my store. To be independent in thought is not uppish. It is personality! Personality is the whole thing in war, but never despise—the other fellow.

Now I have to make a confession. Before the war, when I was blundering around with golf-clubs and feminine charmers, the Brigade of Guards often passed my way. This seemed a wonderful machine, officered by men whom I imagined to be Beau Brummels and Byrons. Well-drilled automatons was all I thought of them. To me they were just fancy soldiers and ornaments of the Court. But who would say that now? Think of Ypres! And remember Cambrai! When the line was broken and the brigade I was in was 'bu'st,' they came up like Trojans. They crossed the lines of trenches almost dressing by the right. Their faces were set, their bayonets shone, and they dived into hell and destruction with a valour that was amazing. They saved the British Army—and fifty men on the General Staff their jobs.

Salute the Guards!

Now, at this school to which I, John Brown, was sent to learn the arts of war, our sergeant-major was from the Scots Guards. He was a wonderful man! When he drilled us I hated him like the Kaiser, but when he had finished with us I felt a smarter man. Beefy Jones and I agreed that Sergeant-Major Kneesup was much too German, and yet, somehow, we wouldn't have given him to the Germans for quids. Oh, he was a big fish on parade. In appearance he was like a well-cut statue. His eyes were of the X-ray kind. He could tell when there was a hole in your socks, or cotton-wool (instead of a heavy greatcoat) in your pack. When he shouted he was like a fog-horn, and every command was finished with a click that gave you the jumps. Before we went on parade we cursed him, and vowed we would see him far enough before we jumped about like automatic toys; but when we got there he simply threw us about like kids. The man was a marvel.

That first parade! Oh, what a nightmare! Some of us were a bit late, for in the army you've got to be standing on parade five minutes before the hour allotted. The S.M. said nothing, but when the hour struck he bellowed 'Shun!' in a way that made half of us drop our rifles with fright.

'Pick 'em up! Pick 'em up! Look sharp!' he shouted.

I gripped my gun with a shiver, and knew the squad were about to enter Dante's Inferno.

'Squad! . . . Shun! . . . As you were!' he roared. 'When I say "Shun!" come up to it. . . . There's cobwebs in your brains, and wax in your ears. . . . Stand still, that man with the egg on his mouth, and hair like Caruso. . . . I can see all of you. . . . I am a blankety octopus, I am.'

'Squad! . . . Shun! . . . Still! . . . Not a move! . . . There's a long-nosed gentleman twiddling his little fingers as if he's got St Vitus Dance. . . . This isn't a home for epileptics or a sanatorium for delirium tremens. . . . It's an officers' school, and I belong to the Brigade of Guards. . . . Twenty-five years' service, five medals, and the D.C.M. . . . I've drilled kings, princes, field-marshals, yokels, and hobos; and, by Gawd! I'll drill you off the face of the earth. . . . By the right—quick march!' And off we stepped.

'He's a bit thick,' mumbled Beefy to me.

Now, Beefy had hardly worked his lips when he made the remark, but the eagle eye of that S.M. had caught the culprit.

'Squad—halt!'

We stopped in terror, and poor old Beefy began to perspire with fright.

'Now, I'll have no talking on the march, and no back-answers. . . . Discipline is discipline! If you can't keep your mouth shut on the square, you'll jabber on a night attack. . . . I'm the gramophone in this business. . . . I can read your thoughts and see your brains. . . . To me you're all as plain as a pikestaff. . . . I've only seen you ten minutes, but I've ticked off the lame, the lazy, the insubordinate, and the mad. . . . I'm Sherlock Holmes, I am. By the right—quick march! . . . A full step now! Shoulders square. . . . Heads erect. . . . March like the Guards. . . . Left—right—left . . . left . . . left—right—left. . . . Right—form! . . . Slowly now—slowly! . . . Swing round like a gate! Get back, that man with the nicotine on his fingers, and the brilliantine running down his neck. . . . Forward—by the right!

'Keep your dressing, there. By Gawd! I could get the Chinese Militia or the Boys' Brigade to beat you at this game. Heads up, or you'll drop your eyeballs. . . . Straighten your legs like sticks, and don't double your backs like bloods in Bond Street. About—turn! . . . By the left. . . . Keep your hands down. . . . Never mind the sweat on the brow. . . . Let the flies lick it off. . . . Keep up. Keep up. . . . You'd never make a show at Buckingham Palace or Hyde Park. . . . If you can't drill, you can't beat the Germans. . . . Keep your dressing, there! . . . When the Brigade of Guards went into action at Ypres, they marched by the right and filled the gaps of the dead to keep a straight line. . . . When I fought at Belmont and Graspan, my company marched into action with whiskers, eyeballs, and tummies all in line. . . . That's the thing to put the fear of God into the enemy. Squad—halt! . . . Not a move! . . . Order—arms! . . . Stand at—ease! As you were! Who said "easy"? . . . None of your infantry dodges here. That's all right for an armed mob—not for me. Squad—stand—easy!'

'He's the ruddy limit,' said Beefy.

'Yes. This isn't a school—it's a bally penitentiary,' I said, wiping the perspiration off my brow. My shirt was sticking to my back, and I felt beastly uncomfortable. At the moment I hated Sergeant-Major Knees-up, but yet in my real heart I admired him. He was a man's man, hard as nails, merciless to the inefficient, but the A and the Z of that wonderful system which has made the Brigade of Guards a terror to every despot in Germany. As we looked at him walking up and down the square he resembled a true-born aristocrat, and yet he was once a ploughman. A wonderful product of a hard, yet marvellous, system.

'Squad—shun! . . . Stand—easy! Now, come round here, boys. I'm going to talk with you.'

The term 'boys' melted our fears, and we gathered about him.

'It's like this! A lot of you imagine when you get knocked about that it's a sort of punishment, for I know your thoughts. I've been through all this. When I joined the Guards we did the old-fashioned slope. They used to stick you close to a wall, and if you were not smart the wall tore all the skin off your fingers when you chucked the rifle up. That has been done away with, but the old-fashioned discipline remains. Some of you may think it brutal, but, believe me, it gets results. It makes men smart. It makes them obey. It turns them into gentlemen. I used to be a ploughman—now I've got a pension, a little pub, and a farm. I wouldn't call the Kaiser my cousin, and I learned everything in the Guards.'

'But don't you think we need more intelligence and less of this Peninsular stuff, sergeant-major?'

'Not a bit less. Men are still the same—very human. Let drill, discipline, and orders slide, and your men will get panicky for the want of it. Now take my tip; all of you boys are going to be officers, so model your drill on mine. Your men will hate you at first, just as you hate me when I'm knocking you about, but when your colonel turns round and says, "Lieutenant John Brown has the smartest-drilled platoon in this battalion," the men will lick your boots for you. Tommy's a funny fellow. He doesn't really admire a slack officer. He likes the officer who knows his job. If you want to get them up to the scratch, drill like the Brigade of Guards.'

'But look here, sergeant-major, aren't other corps as good as the Guards?' I inquired.

'Certainly, my boy. But still I must tell you this, that the Guards are nearly always kept in reserve, not because they are pets, but to save awkward situations. It's not we that should be saying it, but you'll admit that at Cambrai we managed to keep things right, eh?'

'By Jove, you did!' exclaimed a few of the cadets who had been there.

'Whatever regiment you join, you've got to feel and believe that your regiment is It. Every regiment has different traditions. There's the Old Devons, Wilts, Surreys, and all the Highland corps. They're wonderful stuff. And if I dared to talk to them about the Guards they'd bash my head in. And quite right, too! That's esprit de corps. But at the moment you are all cadets. You belong to no regiment, and if I can hand on any of the good ideas I've got from other good men, you will profit by it.'

'But it's ruddy hard to learn from you, sergeant-major,' piped Beefy, who was still steaming with perspiration.

'My dear boy, I'm mild compared to some. When I was a "rookie" I used to come in with my feet bleeding, my heart pumping like an engine, and limbs like lead. You don't really know what drill is. I'm mild—real mild. And when you've finished here we'll all part good friends. Don't worry! A number nine pill will help you through all right. You're too fat. Now, fall in!'

For the next half-hour he knocked us about like ninepins. Every nerve, every muscle, was on the jump. He knew every trick of drill, and turned us inside-out. To an observer it must have been a treat to watch him. But to us it was more or less hell. Yet he quickened our wits and roused our ardour so that every man Jack said, 'Well, it's up to us to knock spots off the Guards.' And that was his real and only aim, for he was a true soldier. He dismissed us with a smile, and said we weren't really a bad lot. We rejoiced.

I was so delighted after the 'Dismiss' that

I commenced to throw my rifle up in the air, and catch it.

'Hi, there!' shouted the S.M.

'Yes, sir.'

'What's your name?'

'John Brown, sir.'

'Carry your arms properly—John Brown.'

(Continued on page 20.)

ORIGINS.

By CHARLES G. HARPER.

THE origins of things is a subject which affords quaint and curious employment for the speculative mind, whether those things are phrases or material objects; for just as there is a reason for everything, so also those reasons, often very obscure, generally prove to be exceedingly interesting and instructive. It was only the other day, for example, that some correspondent of a daily paper was permitted to accuse the dignified upper ranks of the clergy of ostentation in their dress because archbishops, bishops, and archdeacons wear gaiters and aprons, and have strings to their hats. Had he known better, had he possessed any historical knowledge of the development of dress, this correspondent could not have fallen into such an error, and must have been reduced to criticising the hierarchy of the Church of England on some other and more legitimate ground. For why do those clerics wear gaiters and aprons? Because in the old days it was part of their duty to ride on horseback on their visitations in rural districts. Gaiters were necessary for horsemen; and the clerical cassock, an impossible garment on such occasions, was curtailed into the merest remnant of that ecclesiastical garb, and became the 'apron' of to-day, the survival of an era forgotten by most people. To the same cause must be referred the hat-strings, which were originally devised to tie back the broad hat-brims of those days, which in rain and wind would have greatly inconvenienced a horseman. That ecclesiastical personages should still wear these articles is merely one instance of many in all classes in which evolution and that essential conservatism which distinguishes the British character are seen side by side. As well might we criticise the soldier's full-dress uniform, as seen in the red tunics of pre-war days, and declare the scarlet to be ostentatious. It was originally selected because it was the colour of the royal livery; and it is not to be forgotten that the army was (whatever the position may really be now) 'His Majesty's.' In like manner, the buttons on sleeve-cuffs and on the back of the tunic, which became mere ornamental adjuncts, were originally intended to button back the cuffs and to support the waist-belt.

A comprehensive survey of dress, uniforms, and robes would reveal many curious and forgotten things, and would open up a very large field of inquiry. Let us take one point—that of the ermine worn on occasions of ceremony by sovereigns, by peers and peeresses, and always on the Bench by the Lord Chief-Justice and by some others of the judges. Ermine is the fur of the brown stoat in its winter dress, a kindly provision of nature which helps to preserve that animal from utter extinction by its enemies. In the snows of winter the stoat—on the well-known principle of 'protective colouration'—becomes a white-furred creature, and thus is scarcely to be distinguished from its surroundings. This winter change escaped the notice of our ancestors, who, in their simplicity, did not know the brown stoat in its winter habit, and considered it to be another creature—the 'ermine,' as they called it. And they imagined that the ermine was so cleanly a creature that it would sooner die than stain its white raiment. From this supposition to elevating the animal, and later its fur, into the symbol of purity, spiritual as well as physical, was an easy step; and thus ermine became an essential adjunct to the robes of kings, queens, the peerage, and the justiciary. It was a fine thought; and if some who have worn the ermine were not worthy of it, that does not by any means detract from a splendid and beautiful ideal.

To come from high moral principles deep down at one plunge into mere charlatanry is a descent we must make if we would seek the origin of that children's toy, 'Jack-in-the-box,' which originated in the thirteenth century in the trickery of the rector of North Marston, Buckinghamshire, combined with the credulity of his bucolic parishioners. John Schorne, the rector, for the proper keeping of himself in awe and admiration, devised a mechanical imp, working on a spring, which he fixed in the bottom of a long boot. He carried this about with him, and, pretending that he had got the Devil imprisoned in the boot, would exhibit him to the affrighted rustics by the mere pressure of the spring. This released the figure, which would jump up as though attempting to escape. Schorne was in his day, and for at least two centuries later, greatly reverenced. According to the then current rhyme:

> Master John Schorne,
> Gentleman born,
> Conjured Sathanas into a boot.

Pictured representations of him on the rood-screens of various country churches in England still exist, showing this arch-humbug holding a long boot, with a little, horned, impish figure peeping over the top of it. There are, in all, seven of these pictures, each giving him, his imp, and his boot a very different aspect. They are at Alphington, Portlemouth, and Wolborough, in Devon; at Cawston, Gateley, and Suffield, Norfolk; and at Sudbury, Suffolk.

Coming now to objects and phrases in every-day use, we find some speculative interest in that sportsman's makeshift meal, the sandwich. It was the fourth Earl of Sandwich, John Montagu, who invented and gave a name to the sandwich. He was so keen a gambler that he was known to sit twenty-four hours at the card-table; and for one of those playing-bouts he conceived the idea of a slice of cold beef between two pieces of toast, at which he could take an occasional bite without interruption of the game. Such was the form of the first sandwich, a device which proved so excellent that, varied according to individual taste, it has remained popular since the time when 'Jemmy Twitcher' — as his contemporaries knew him—introduced it over a hundred and fifty years ago.

Some things have retained their name, while entirely losing that peculiar character which conferred it. Thus the glass vessel called a 'tumbler' no longer tumbles, unless, indeed, some exceptionally clumsy person overturns it. But the original tumbler was made expressly for the purpose of standing upright in every circumstance, whatever the provocation, and when it 'tumbled,' it did so after the manner in which a professional acrobat or gymnast tumbles. This characteristic is displayed by the silver tumblers belonging to All Souls College, Oxford. These are still occasionally in use on guest-nights, and are small round bowls about the size of a large orange. Placed when empty upon the table, mouth downwards, they refuse to remain in that position, and so perfect is their balance that they fly back to the upright, no matter how they are treated, as though asking to be filled again. But there was another kind of 'tumbler,' made with perhaps an even more hospitable intent. This was the vessel that would not by any chance or provocation stand upright, and it was so fashioned in order that shy drinkers should not shirk their drink, and should finish even the 'heeltaps.'

Of course, the seeker after the origins of expressions may very well, in his enthusiasm, go to absurd extremes, or be led into them by unscrupulous wags, like the literary critic, George Steevens (1736–1800), who delighted in the invention of false origins, to the shame and the annoyance of serious persons who were sometimes led to adopt them. Some of these were extremely ingenious, such as his two variants of the Shakespearian 'When the hurly-burly's done,' which at different times he declared (with his tongue in his cheek) to have been originally 'When the Earl of Burleigh's done,' or 'When the early purl is done.' In similar fashion some still maintain that the expression 'saunterer' etymologically denotes a person or a pilgrim who has journeyed in La Sainte Terre—the Holy Land. A measure of doubt is likewise advisable in the case of the derivation offered for the warning, 'Mind your p's and q's'—not often heard nowadays, by the way. It is said to have been the caution given by French dancing-masters in the times of long pigtails and formal bows, 'Gardez-vous pour les pieds et queues.' But since it seems that in former times cakes and pastries sold in Edinburgh (long under a certain French influence) were actually known as 'petticoat-tails,' a very free rendering of petits gâteaux or gastels, we had perhaps better keep an open mind even in the case of apparently improbable derivations.

There is, however, no doubt about the origin of the proverbial expression, 'Hobson's choice,' which is, in fact, no choice at all. It is well documented, and arose from the firm dealing of Thomas Hobson (†1544–1631), the Cambridge carrier and livery-stable keeper, with the gay and irresponsible undergraduates of his day. He would allow no picking and choosing from among the horses in his stable when the students and others sought to hire. 'That horse, or none,' was his invariable edict, which became so well known that it grew proverbial.

Many are the men whose names have become so familiar through their inventions, or their deeds, or the things done to them that we forget they are proper names. Comparatively few people stop to consider, when they hear of a guillotine, that the adoption of this grim instrument was due to Joseph Ignace Guillotin (1738–1814), a French physician, who advocated its use as a speedy and humane method of inflicting the death penalty.

The 'mackintosh,' that useful protection against wet weather, of course originates from a personal name, Charles Macintosh (1766–1843) having in 1823 patented the principle of cementing fabrics with india-rubber.

In the same manner, the once-popular art of cutting 'silhouette' portraits out of black paper took its origin from a personal name. M. Etienne de Silhouette was an eighteenth-century French Minister of Finance, once noted for his petty economies; but although now forgotten as a statesman, he was the founder or populariser of an art which has perpetuated his name. M. de Silhouette solaced his leisure hours with tracing on the walls of his château shadow profile portraits of his friends, and is the solitary old master of the art, which rapidly spread from his example until the making of silhouette portraits became the rage. It did not die out until about 1850; and, in common with many other things, it has since had something of a revival.

To 'pay on the nail'—that is a familiar expression, and has been for centuries. It is almost equivalent to the entirely modern commercial phrase 'spot cash,' and indicates a cash-with-order settlement. It originated among merchants on 'Change, and may have been no mere figurative speech, but in the first instance have referred to payment on a 'nail,' a name given to a small stone or metal pay-table which appears to have been one of the customary furnishings of a Bourse or Exchange. Four examples of 'nails' remain outside the Exchange at Bristol. They are of brass, and were removed from the old Tolsey, or Market House, in 1771. The oldest dates back to 1549, and bears the inscription: 'This post is the gift of Master Robert Kitchen, merchant, sometime Maior and Alderman of this city, who dec. 5 Septemb. 1549.' Another is without inscription. The third is inscribed: 'Thomas Hobson of Bristol made me, anno 1625. Nicholas Crisp of London gave me to this honorable citty in remembrance of God's mercy in Anno Domini 1625. N.C. Prais the Lord O my soule, and forget not all his benefits. He saved my life from destruction and . . . to his mercy and loving kindness Prais.' . . . The inscription is worn and incomplete. It alludes to the staying of the plague in Bristol in 1625. The fourth 'nail' is inscribed: 'A.D. 1631, this is the gift of Mr George White of Bristol, merchaunt, brother unto Dr Thomas White, a famous benefactor to this citie.' Six lines of verse following are indecipherable. The inscription ends with, 'The Church of the livinge God is the pillar and ground of the trueth. So was the worke of the pillars finished.' Other 'nails' are at Barnstaple in Devonshire, at Axbridge in Somerset, and at Limerick.

When Artemisia, widow of Mausolus, King of Caria, who died B.C. 353, raised over him so unprecedentedly magnificent a monument, she erected something far more enduring than stone or marble tomb, for the fame of it created the word 'mausoleum.'

Among the select company of men who have given their names to useful inventions is John Loudon Macadam (1756–1836), a native of Ayr, to whose enlightened method of road-making with broken granite or other road-metal we owe the verb 'to macadamise.' We cannot extend to the author of 'grangerism' the same admiration, for the Rev. James Granger, who in the eighteenth century established the custom of 'extra-illustrating' selected works, caused the destruction of many books by the practice of taking out their plates for the enlargement of other works. Nor can Bowdler, who 'bowdlerised' the classics for the supposed benefit of the modest, be regarded as a benefactor. Wellington and Blücher were the unconsulted godfathers of two kinds of boots; the Prince Consort had the undesired honour of a kind of watch-chain—the 'Albert'—being named after him; and Mr Gladstone did not invent the 'Gladstone' bag.

'Shrapnel' shell is too familiar nowadays. The name can but rarely carry any personal meaning, but this type of shell was the invention of Lieutenant-General Henry Shrapnel (1761–1842), a native of Bradford-on-Avon, Wiltshire. Briefly, it meant the replacing of the old solid round-shot by an explosive canister containing a number of bullets. There are many millions to-day, unfortunately, who want no explanation of what 'shrapnel' is. Models of the original shrapnel shells—round, instead of the present elongated and pointed shape—to this day surmount the piers of the entrance-gates to Midway Manor, the inventor's residence in Wiltshire.

A conclusion may well be made with the origin of the verb 'to boycott'—which may be either active or passive, according to the temper of the persons who adopt that form of what Mr Gladstone mildly termed 'exclusive dealing.' Captain Charles Cunningham Boycott was a land-agent in Ireland from 1873 to 1886, and resided at Lough Mask House. Those were troublous times, when the Land Leaguers were active, and Captain Boycott, who was courageous enough to see the trouble through, was long under police protection. It was not, however, the violence threatened against him that has made his name a household word, but the refusal on the part of the people to work for him, or to buy of, or sell to, him, which originated the practice and the name of 'boycotting.' Captain Boycott died in retirement, in Suffolk, in June 1897.

BLACKLISTED.

By W. Victor Cook, Author of Anton of the Alps, A Wilderness Wooing, &c.

PART I.

I.

THE east-bound train from Badajoz had completed about an hour of its journey towards the distant capital, and was pursuing its leisurely way across the low, sun-baked slopes of Estremadura. Passengers from the Portuguese frontier had glanced through their newspapers and were getting drowsy, when the guard, scrambling along the foot-boards in that casual way they have in the South, stuck a perspiring face into the window of the compartment, and held up a yellow envelope.

'Is any caballero here called Donald Bruce?'

The passengers looked up from their interrupted doze, and a sunburnt young man in the corner by the window got out his passport. 'That is my name,' said he, showing his papers.

'A telegram for you, señor. See, it is addressed to the train at Badajoz: "Midday train for Madrid, station of Badajoz." It is a full train to-day, señor, or I should have found you earlier. Have the kindness to give me a receipt.'

The passenger did so, accompanying the receipt with a silver piece and a courteous expression of thanks.

It is not often in the pleasant land of Spain that people are chased by telegrams on a railway journey; and while the young man, himself surprised at the circumstance, opened the despatch, his fellow-travellers regarded him with a certain respectful curiosity. Having read the message, he passed it to a long-limbed, hawk-faced old man who sat opposite to him.

The message in the telegram was: 'See the gardener, Prætor's Palace, Mérida, mentioning M'Ilroy, M'Ilroy, M'Allister.' Handed in at Barcelona, it was written in Spanish. The two men looked at each other, and the elder shrugged his shoulders with an air of resignation. 'Mérida is the next station,' said he.

'There is no need for you to delay your journey, Pablo,' said the younger. 'Your wife and family, after all this time'——

'Basta!' The keen, bony face of the other leaned a little forward. 'I know what you would say, my friend. But we set out together, and together, plegue á Dios, we will return. See, here is Mérida.'

The train ran under the broken arch of a crumbling Roman aqueduct—whose gaunt, ruinous columns could be seen straggling away across the land like remnants of some race of fabled giants—and came to a standstill in the station. The two men picked up their slight baggage and got out.

Neither had ever been in Mérida before, and on the dusty platform they stood to take counsel while the train rumbled on its way.

'This is a queer business, Little Bird,' said the Scot. 'I know no more than Adam what this message means, yet it must be urgent. My firm must have sent it on the mere chance of its catching me. Three days ago, as soon as we had obtained our papers after landing, I wrote them of my intention to leave for Madrid and Barcelona by this train to-day, and they cannot long have had my letter. What do you make of it?'

Pablo Pajarillo—he was nicknamed the 'Little Bird' by his seafaring acquaintance on the coast of Cataluña—shrugged his broad shoulders again. 'I confess I can see no meaning in it except what it says. What is a prætor, Señor Bruce?'

'A prætor, amigo mio, is—or, rather, was—a Roman governor.'

'In that case,' the Catalan replied ingenuously, 'he must have been dead some time. We are to visit the gardener of a ghost.' He crossed himself soberly. 'The sooner we begin the better.'

They went out of the station on to a dusty plaza, leaving their baggage at the office.

II.

The name of Mérida is not to be found on the programme of the cheap and educative Spanish tour, and yet few cities of Europe have held their heads so high. Here was a capital city of Spain when Spain was giving emperors and generals, poets and philosophers, to swell the might and fame of Rome. The circuit of her great walls was six leagues, and her garrison of eighty thousand infantry and ten thousand horse made her one of the great strongholds of the Roman world. To-day Mérida is a crumbling, mouldy sepulchre, a cemetery filled with memorials of her mighty past.

The companions crossed the plaza in the glaring sunshine, and stood to gaze at a little flower-grown enclosure, in the midst of which, raised on an ancient column, was a white modern statue of a young girl.

'Madre de Dios, what a heat!' muttered Pajarillo.

It was, indeed, insufferably hot. But the Scot, with the energy of the North in his blood, and the educated man's feeling for the past stirring within him, found the aspect of this place appealing.

'Little Bird,' said he, 'a glass of cool wine would be good for you. There is a posada of a sort yonder. As for me, I will join you later. But this place interests me, and I must explore it while the feeling is fresh. Our man will be at his siesta for the present. By-and-by we will go and find him.'

'As you will, Señor Bruce. I admit that a glass of wine appeals more to me than walking in the sun about this city of once-upon-a-time.'

He made for the posada; and Bruce, left to himself, sat down on a wooden bench beneath a tree facing the Roman column, and began to roll a cigarette. There was another man sitting on the seat, a stoutish, middle-aged man wearing sun-glasses and a broad straw hat, engaged in sketching the monument on an artist's block.

He glanced up as the Scot sat down. 'Buenos dias, señor,' said he, civilly raising his hat. 'You are interested in antiquities?'

Bruce raised his hat in acknowledgment. 'I am a man of my century, señor. But an occasional contemplation of the monuments of past ages leads us, I think, to view our own with a better sense of proportion.'

'Very true.' The stranger added a touch to his sketch. 'This monument, now, is a curious mixture of the present and the past.'

'I confess I do not know whom it represents,' said Bruce. 'I am a stranger, brought hither by the accidental demands of business.'

'Ah!' The artist gave the young man a keen sidelong glance under his sun-glasses, and went on with his work. Bruce did not take to him.

'The statue is to Saint Eulalia, patroness of this old city, one of the first female martyrs of Spain, according to tradition. They say that as a child she suffered by being baked in an oven, towards the end of the third century. Miracles have since been recorded of her, "worthy of a great saint," the ecclesiastical historians say. Her shrine over yonder is a still more curious composition of antiquity and modernity. If your business allows you a day or two in Mérida, you will find the city repay examination.' He pointed with his pencil to a church not far away, in front of which was a massive ancient portico, surmounted by a new cupola in white marble.

Bruce had an uneasy sensation that he was being minutely taken stock of by the learned artist. 'With permission,' said he politely, 'I will stroll across and examine it. A thousand thanks, señor.'

He approached the quaint shrine of the oven-baked Eulalia. Side by side with the modern dedication to the Christian maiden, he deciphered in the old stone portico the worn, deep lettering of the Roman mason, dedicating the building to Mars, the war-god.

Bruce wandered up a hill to a sunlit group of whitewashed buildings, huddled together in a mere corner of the vast site of the ancient capital. He picked his way amid the fly-blown squalor of its mean and ill-kept streets, and suddenly a massive arch, rearing itself high above the houses, shut off the arrowy sunbeams—a triumphal arch to the Emperor Trajan, built of great stones without cement, each stone crossing its entire width. On all sides of him the voices of long dead ages whispered to his imagination from crumbling stone and broken column. Bruce wandered on, and presently came to the Guadiana, sluggish now, and streaked with shoals in the hot September sun. But over its dawdling, murky waters a great Roman bridge, half a mile long, with scores of heavy arches, witnessed to the fury and the extent of the river in the flood. Upon inquiry he learned—as he had guessed—that the massive wall fronting the hither end of the great bridge contained the ruins of the Roman prætor's palace. He found also that visitors were admitted to inspect the place, and was shown the entrance. For an hour he sat in a shady spot beside the river, and indulged his fancy in dreams of the past. Then, recalling himself to the present and its quest, he set off to return to his companion.

He found that philosopher engaged in a friendly game of cards with the landlord of the posada, and ordered refreshment for himself till the game should be played out. Then Bruce and Pajarillo took their way together to the prætor's palace. The artist with the sun-glasses was by this time gone from the statue of Eulalia, but it appeared that he had paid a visit to the posada.

'An inquisitive fellow,' said Pajarillo. 'One must humour such. He gave me a good puro, and in exchange I fibbed to him that you were a commercial traveller from Zaragoza, and that I was your servant. When he had gone, the landlord told me about him. It seems he is a rich merchant from Madrid, who has retired here to lead a quiet life. He has hired one of the largest houses in the town, and spends his time making pictures of old buildings and entertaining his friends. An open-handed fellow, the landlord says. Nevertheless, I do not like him.'

'Nor I, Pablo. Is he a Spaniard?'

The hawk-faced old man gave his friend a quick glance. 'Dios lo sabe!' he shrugged. 'He speaks the Castilian, and I am a Catalan. His name is Marinero, but I never heard of mariners in Madrid.'

'Well, the man is no concern of ours, Pablo mio. This is the way.'

III.

Bruce turned into a cobbled side-street, and they came to a wrought-iron gateway in an old wall beneath orange-trees. To the woman who answered the bell he explained that they sought permission to inspect the Roman ruin.

The woman led them down a pleasant pathway, arched with trailing roses. Half-way down it a similar path running off at right angles gave access to a rambling stone building, in appearance half-ecclesiastical, half-domestic. Stopping at the angle, she pointed on to where the first path entered an extensive garden.

'The house is occupied, caballeros,' said she. 'It is the old walls of the garden which the learned, who sometimes come here, always wish to examine, though what Christians find to interest them in these old stones of the heathen I confess I do not know. Be good enough to summon me when you return.'

Emerging from the trailing roses, the two companions found themselves in a place fit to charm the soul of an artist or a poet. A fragrant garden, rich with all that the Southern sun could ripen, filled a great quadrangle enclosed by the street wall and the house on one side, and on the other three by the vast, crumbling walls of the Roman age. Here a grove of gnarled gray olives, here figs and oranges, citrons and pomegranates, and many fruits and flowers strange to Northern eyes, throve in the fertile soil. They slowly crossed the garden to the massive walls on the farther side. There, in an angle of the Roman wall, where a bastion looked far out over the river and the undulating landscape, a mule harnessed at the end of a long wooden bar was plodding slowly round and round, drawing up water from a subterranean cistern by means of a chain of little vessels, on the prehistoric principle still followed in the East. In the hot sunshine the musical plash of the water falling from the revolving vessels into the receiving-tank had a tantalising sound. Under a fig-tree hard by, an aged gardener, with a hat of monstrous brim, sat smoking the eternal cigarette, uttering an occasional 'Arré!' to remind the leisurely mule that it was supposed to be working, and then relapsing into meditation.

At the approach of strangers the old man rose courteously. 'You would see the ruins, caballeros?' He led them to the top of the time-worn battlements, from which they looked out upon the sun-baked slopes beyond the modern city. As they picked their way along he pointed out the most prominent objects around: the long Roman bridge, the arch of Trajan, the broken ruin of a vast amphitheatre—'the Seven Seats,' the old man called it—which rose against the sky, and the tottering arches of mighty aqueducts that once brought drinking-water from many miles away. Descending again into the garden, he led his charges under an arched stone entrance-way, and so back to his cistern by an underground passage, walled and roofed with stone, and concealing in its gloom, as the old man showed them with a candle, marble pillars admirably carved, of differing styles and epochs. They all sat down again under the fig-tree, and the old guide accepted a proffered cigar with a courtly air.

IV.

'Many a man,' said Bruce sententiously, 'weary of the bustling life of cities, would think himself in Eden to have the charge of a garden such as this.'

The old fellow nodded. 'I have dwelt here thirty years, señor. And yet even in Eden there was the serpent.'

'Very true,' the Scot agreed. 'Let us hope you have none here, señor gardener.'

'Quien sabe? The serpent is a wily beast, señor.'

Bruce felt that he was approaching his affair. 'This Mérida of yours is an interesting city,' he said carelessly. 'I should be sorry to have missed the opportunity of seeing it. A friend of many years, a Señor M'Allister, gave me the good advice to come.' He saw the old gardener start.

'You are from Barcelona?' came the question in a lowered voice.

'Both of us,' Bruce replied. 'Is it possible that you are acquainted with Señor M'Allister, of the firm of M'Ilroy, M'Ilroy, & M'Allister?'

'Señor M'Allister has been a kind benefactor to me,' the old man answered simply. 'It was he who obtained me my post here with the count, to whom the place belongs. And years afterwards he took my son into his employ, and my son has made good progress with that excellent firm.'

'I should know your son. What is his name?'

'Arleto is my name, señor.'

'Enrique Arleto is, then, your son?' Bruce smiled. 'Enrique is one of our most trusted clerks.'

The old man rose and bowed his pleasure at the compliment. 'If I might know, señor, to whom have I the honour to speak?'

'I am Donald Bruce, confidential secretary to Señor M'Allister.'

Arleto raised his great hat, turned a moment to stimulate the flagging energies of the mule with a sharp 'Arré!' and looked cautiously round the garden. 'A few days ago,' said he, 'I sent a letter to my son, Enrique.'

Pablo Pajarillo, who had sat quietly smoking thus far, had followed the gardener's glance. He broke in harshly, 'Señor Arleto, with permission, my friend and I would like to inspect once more those marble pillars in the subway.'

The gardener showed surprise at the sudden request, but led the way down again without a word.

'My apologies for interrupting,' said the Catalan calmly. 'Pray proceed with your conversation, gentlemen.'

Old Arleto looked earnestly at Bruce. 'Since you are in the confidence of my benefactor, I will say that in my letter to Enrique I hinted at a possible danger to Señor M'Allister.'

'Of what nature, my friend?'

'I cannot tell, señor. Three months ago the count let this place to a certain Marinero.'

'Who has just entered the garden from the house,' observed the Little Bird.

'Dios! I did not see him!' The gardener's uneasiness was obvious. 'Is he coming this way?'

'He is not,' said Pajarillo. 'But it occurred to me that he might. He is sitting under a cypress-tree with a newspaper. To tell you the truth, he is too inquisitive a gentleman for my taste, Señor Arleto.'

'I am afraid of him!' the old man blurted out. 'I must be quick with what I have to say.'

'Calm yourself,' said Bruce. 'Señor Marinero knows nothing of us.'

'Quien sabe? He knows more than people think. These are dangerous times, and he is a dangerous man. I am placing my safety, perhaps, in your hands, caballeros, but I owe a duty to my kind benefactor. Here is the reason for the letter which I wrote to my son.' He drew from his pocket a sheet of paper, and spread it out in the ray of the candle, which he had relit.

Down the left-hand margin of the paper, in bold writing, were set out half-a-dozen names which the Scot instantly recognised as those of some of the most prominent British agents and business houses in the Peninsula. In the space against each was a brief report in German script.

The first three names were struck through in red ink, and against each were set the initials 'F.v.F.' The fourth name on the list was that of M'Ilroy, M'Ilroy, & M'Allister. Bruce knew sufficient German to make out the notes written against the name, in a different hand, but with no attempt at disguise. 'Details most difficult,' they ran, 'but all information indicates dangerous activity. Loss of several successful U. confidently believed traceable to secret action on part of this concern. Suppression urgently necessary. Recommend great caution.' The notes appended to the other names on the list ran on similar lines.

'Where did you obtain this paper, my friend?' asked Bruce.

'On the day I wrote to my son, señor, I was picking figs from the tree yonder under the wall. Señor Marinero was writing in the arbour near by, when a message was brought him from the house, and he left suddenly, thrusting his papers in his pocket. I noticed one of the papers slip to the ground, but he was in a hurry, and did not observe it. When I had filled my basket I came down and picked up the paper, intending to give it to him. But as I picked it up I noticed the name of my benefactor, and then I looked and saw these other names. As for the writing between, I could make nothing of it. But I saw some names were struck out, and I read the newspapers, señor. There is the name of Señor Robertson, of Madrid. The papers said that he was killed in a climbing accident in the Pyrenees. There was the mining firm of Belper. Their works were wrecked by a great explosion a month ago, and Señor Belper was among the dead. And there was the consul, Thomas, who disappeared so strangely only a fortnight since.'

'What kind of persons are in the habit of visiting Señor Marinero here?' Bruce inquired.

'Some Spaniards, some foreigners. Usually they arrive in the night.'

'What else do you know of this Marinero?'

'Nothing, caballeros, except that he paints many pictures, and sometimes he is absent for days at a time from the town. He pays well, and therefore is well spoken of.'

'An easy road to good repute,' commented Bruce. 'Well, señor gardener, it grows towards evening, and we have to find an inn. It is fortunate that you and we have met, and maybe we shall meet again. Meantime, I rely on your discretion.'

'To see, to hear, and to be silent are three rooms in wisdom's house,' said the old gardener as they emerged again from the subway.

(Continued on page 26.)

SCIENTIFIC FRUIT-GROWING IN BRITAIN AND AMERICA.

By Charles Ray.

FRUIT-GROWING as a science is in Great Britain still in its infancy. Of course, much has been done of recent years in the way of producing new varieties, in fighting insect pests, and so on; but when all is said and done, we have really advanced very little, and it is an open question whether much of the supposed progress has really been in the right direction. Very little time has been given to the serious practical study of the subject, and while in some ways we have been far too slow, in others we have been too rapid; that is, we have jumped to conclusions before we had thoroughly sifted the facts.

Take, for example, the subject of pollination and fertilisation. We know, of course, that bees and other insects act as agents in fertilisation by carrying pollen from one flower to another; and we suppose that the wind also acts as an agent in this way, although recent investigations in fruit-growing districts show that this is not proven. But beyond these things we know practically nothing of the subject; and although it is of great importance to the nation, yet we are so little interested that we do not make it worth anybody's while to investigate systematically.

A concrete example will show how very elementary our knowledge of the science of fruit-growing is, and at the same time will serve to illustrate the pitfalls that lie in the path of the scientific investigator. Years ago in a certain district of England, when the orchards were not laid out carefully and geometrically as they are to-day, greengage-trees were mixed up with gisborne plums in a very unscientific manner. Good crops of gages were obtained with fair regularity; but, acting on the advice of scientific experts, the growers rooted up the old gisborne-trees of little value, and planted a large acreage with greengages only, in regular rows. For some cause or other, crops have never since been a success. There is always plenty of blossom, but for some unknown reason fertilisation does not take place, and only rarely are there any greengages worth speaking of. An old plantation in the same neighbourhood which still had gisborne-trees mixed with the greengages continued to produce good crops of greengages, and this led to the conclusion that the gisbornes were necessary for the fertilisation of the gages. Plum-trees were, therefore, planted near the greengages, but still the crops did not come, and further investigations showed that in adjacent districts where gisbornes and greengages grew together, years sometimes passed without a crop of gages. The whole matter is, therefore, one of mystery, and so far scientific investigators have been able to give no explanation that in any way solves the problem.

It must be acknowledged that the scientist with his theories is often far behind the practical man; but, on the other hand, the practical man frequently allows his prejudices to prevent him from taking advantage of the scientist's researches, as, for example, when he refuses to spray his trees to destroy insect pests. It is difficult to say whether these pests are on the increase relatively, though, of course, there is no doubt that they are actually. With the advent of the great preserving firms, an enormous impetus has been given to fruit-growing in Great Britain, and thousands more acres are now under fruit than was formerly the case. With such an increase in the provision of their food-plants, it is only natural that the insects too should increase and multiply; and there is no doubt that there is a real need for a national campaign of investigation and action, such as is being permanently carried on in the United States of America.

One firm of fruit-growers in England conducts its spraying on a very large scale, having laid permanent mains and pipes underground in its orchards. Through these the various spraying liquids are pumped by engines. The actual spraying is done by men with hand-pipes, who tap the mains at various points. In a season like that of 1918, when, owing to bad weather and other conditions, the crop was poor, spraying did not, of course, produce fruit; but by saving the foliage of the trees and bushes from the ravages of the pests, it went a long way towards ensuring a good crop for this year. Those who did not spray had, in many districts, the dissatisfaction of seeing their trees bare of leaves, and as leaves are the breathing apparatus of plants, a lack of leaves means a weak and unhealthy tree, incapable of bearing a good crop at the next fruit season.

In all the various phases of fruit-growing, the United States is far in advance of ourselves. Take, for example, its method of dealing with greenfly, that most prolific and destructive of pests. The story is one of the great romances of science. The orchards of California were overrun by greenfly, which destroyed melon and cucumber vines, and blighted apple and pear trees; and every year it was estimated that in the Imperial Valley alone the growers lost a million pounds' worth of produce through this terrible pest. It was so prolific that no amount of spraying would keep it down. There are from eight to eleven generations in a year, and a single female aphis would muster by the eighth generation, if all her children lived and multiplied like herself, no fewer than 441,461,010,000,000 descendants. No wonder, then, that a creature which multiplies at this rate does enormous harm to the plants on which it feeds; and as a matter of fact in California some of the great orchards extending for miles used to be stripped almost bare within two or three days of the first appearance of the greenfly each season. No remedy could be discovered but that of burning the attacked plants wholesale, and ruin seemed to stare the growers in the face.

Now the natural enemy of the aphis is the ladybird, and formerly, before man began to change the natural conditions, the ladybird was able to cope with the aphis in California. After the hibernation period the ladybird became active just when the aphis was beginning to appear, and it made short work of the pest. But the Californian farmers and fruit-growers, by scientific methods of cultivation, have been able to change the time when their melons and cucumbers come to perfection, making it later in the year; and the aphis or greenfly has adapted itself to the new conditions, and also appears later than it used to do. The result is that when the ladybirds wake from their winter sleep, there are few aphides on which they can prey, and they die of starvation; while the greenfly, when later on it begins to multiply, finds its natural enemy, the ladybird, absent from the plantations, and thus has a free field for its depredations. This, at any rate, is what did happen. The matter became so serious, in fact, that the orchards were threatened with extinction; and the State University, with the Californian Commission of Horticulture, decided to appoint the Superintendent of the State Insectary, Mr E. K. Carnes, to make a complete study of the subject.

For months Mr Carnes investigated the habits and life-story of the ladybird, and he came to the conclusion that the solution of the whole problem lay in introducing the ladybirds to the orchards in April and May—that is, later than the time when Nature wakes them from their winter sleep. At this time the melon and cucumber vines are at their best, and the greenfly is beginning to get to work. This was the obvious solution; but how was the advent of the ladybirds to be delayed for some weeks? The difficulty might seem insuperable, but Mr Carnes was not the man to give up a task because it seemed to bristle with difficulties or even impossibilities.

The entomologist's investigations had convinced him that some ladybirds hibernated on the snow-clad tops of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. He therefore went with two assistants up to these difficult regions, and hunted among moss and leaves and pine-cones on the ground to see if any quantities of the sleeping insects could be found. Great was his joy when he discovered that his theory was correct, and that millions of ladybirds did hibernate in these mountain-tops.

Mr Carnes collected some of the insects in sacks and took them to the State Insectary at Sacramento, where he carried out some interesting and important experiments during the succeeding months, waking up different batches of them at different periods by changing the temperature. The problem was to discover if the ladybirds could be kept asleep through the hot months of early spring by being placed in cold store. It was a daring proposition that only a man with a vivid imagination could have conceived, but the future of the Californian orchards depended upon the success or otherwise of the experiment. Mr Carnes placed the ladybirds in boxes in dark chambers at a low temperature, and succeeded in preventing them from waking until April. Months after their usual time they began to rouse and get active, and when let loose in the orchards, at once set to work devouring the devastating greenfly.

This was only one step, but Mr Carnes's wide vision saw the solution of the whole problem. The ladybirds must be collected in the mountains in millions during their hibernation. They must be carried to the State Insectary, and there kept in cold and darkness to continue their sleep until April or May; and then, when they were wanted for the great battle with the greenfly, they must be awakened by being placed in a higher temperature, and finally let loose in the orchards. This was the scheme propounded, but the farmers scoffed at the idea. Mr Carnes, however, knew that the problem was solved, and he went ahead, being triumphantly vindicated by the result.

A few thousands or hundreds of thousands of pounds properly spent in the way demonstrated by American official and educational bodies means a saving of millions every year; and there is no doubt that if more money were available for similar scientific study and investigation in this country, an immense amount of loss could be saved in farm and orchard.

Mr Carnes's experiments and discoveries have led to one of the most remarkable industries in the world. At the beginning of November every year a band of men go up into the mountains to the places that the ladybirds are expected to visit for their winter sleep. These men hunt and watch for the early arrivals, and then mark the spots on maps. It is not their business to collect the insects; their work is to indicate the sleeping-places to the actual collectors, who come later.

We all know that our British ladybirds, when handled, give off a peculiar odour; and Mr Carnes discovered that the early arrivals among the ladybirds on the mountain-tops, as soon as they settled down in their winter quarters, gave off a scent that attracted other ladybirds arriving later. In this way the pioneers who go up into the mountains early in November and note where the first ladybirds settle are able to mark on maps where the bulk of the insects will be found during that winter. Not only so, but these skilled pioneers have learnt by practice to know roughly how many insects will hibernate in each spot, and this number they mark on their maps for the guidance of the collectors. They also give any other information likely to prove useful.

A little later on, in the depth of winter, collectors go up the slopes accompanied by mules, with hundreds of empty sacks, and guided by the maps prepared by the pioneers, they are able with the least possible delay to collect millions of sleeping ladybirds. The work is hard and dangerous, for many of the spots which they have to visit are almost inaccessible, and the climate in winter is severe. For three months, from December to February, this work of collecting ladybirds goes on, and two men—for they work in pairs—will generally collect from fifty to a hundred pounds of insects in a day. These are placed in sacks and loaded on the mules, each mule carrying a little over a hundredweight. Some places are inaccessible to the mules, and there the men go alone, fill the sacks, and bring them down to where the animals are tethered. Often several feet of snow have to be dug away before the ladybirds can be reached; but all obstacles are overcome, and the loaded sacks are brought down the mountain to a camp, whence they are sent to a railway station. There the insects are transferred from the sacks to boxes, and are despatched by train to Sacramento to the State Insectary, where they are kept in cold store for several months. Then, when the warm weather has come, and the orchards are beginning to show their luscious and valuable crops, the ladybirds are weighed out in pound lots, packed in wooden cases with wire ends, and sent off to the various farmers and fruit-growers. Each pound contains about thirty-three thousand ladybirds, and when the farmer gets his box he carries it into his plantations and opens it. The ladybirds, which have already been thawed out of their sleep in the Insectary, are now fully awake and vigorous, and are eager to get out. They fly away to the trees and the vines, and, without any preliminaries, begin their hunt for greenflies. The result is that the pest is kept down, the fruit comes to perfection, the plants are saved, and the farmer reaps the reward of his labour.

This is only one illustration of how thoroughly the Americans go into a question concerning fruit-production, and how persistently they follow up every detail until they have solved a problem such as that presented by the greenfly. In all directions they are equally thorough. The American Bureau of Plant Industry is always busy seeking new varieties that can be grown in all climates. Its agents travel to all parts of the world, its scientists carry out thousands of experiments, and with the United States Reclamation Service, which deals with questions of irrigation, it has made many a dreary wilderness blossom as the rose.

Equally good work is being done in Great Britain (in connection with Cambridge University, for example), but here the funds are not forthcoming to do it on the grand scale as in America. As the recently published report of the Agricultural Policy Subcommittee of the Reconstruction Committee declares, much stronger support is needed for research-work. The staffs are poorly paid, with the result that there is a steady flow of the most promising graduates to our Dominions over seas, to India, and to foreign countries, simply because they are unable to secure adequate salaries in this country.

'That this is bad policy,' says the report, 'and utterly uneconomical, needs no argument.' The use of artificial fertilisers, new varieties of plants, the treatment of pests and diseases, the detection of waste and loss in cultivation are all dependent on research-work, and yet Great Britain is behind even third-rate States. The committee points out that 'the scale of the organisation at Cambridge is still far behind that of the plant-breeding station at Svälof in Sweden.'

'With a little more time,' continues the report, 'and with access to the necessary funds for growth, it is certain that results will be obtained remunerative in themselves and of the utmost financial value to the industry as a whole.'

The war has shown the need for increased home production. Let us hope that there will be stronger Government support for scientific research, on which the whole question of production turns.

SCOTLAND COMES TO ARGENTINA.

By JOHN AULAY STEELE.

HE was a sick man, this Roderick, the red-bearded Scots shepherd, and as I sat by his rough trestle-bed the long Southern night through, he babbled to me in his delirium of the home that he had never seen—a queer, uncanny tale, in the scattered idioms of three languages: broken English, that came haltingly to the man's tongue; rapid colloquial Spanish, decked out with phrases about lazos and bolas, tropillas and cañadones; soft Gaelic speech, of which I could make out little or nothing, save that now and again came up such names as Colintraive, Glendaruel, and the Kyles. From some 'lone shieling' on the coast of Argyll, a century past, the forefathers of this Roderick, Argentine puestero or shepherd, had come, forsaking those fancy-haunted valleys and dark hills to challenge fortune on these vast and treeless plains. Still bearing good Scots names, and hoarding in their hearts the songs and legends brought across the broad seas by the early settlers, the third generation of exiles had well-nigh lost their fathers' speech. Shepherds they had come, and small flock-masters their grandsons were still. By alternate floods and droughts and by disease they were kept poor men in a land of plenty. Cut off from all book-learning, and isolated from their kind, they had intermarried with the sons and daughters of the soil, till now not only did they think in the idiom of Castile, but in many respects they had become indistinguishable from the gauchos among whom they had passed their lives. The sole link left with their Highland home was the old worship. From spots many a league away they would gather when the Scots minister came round to their province on his infrequent visits from the mother-church at Buenos Aires. They loved and welcomed the sight of his black Geneva gown and snow-white bands; they brought their little ones to him for baptism—had 'saved them up,' as one such parent put it; and at the communion dispensed by the itinerant pastor they sang 'the Lord's song in a strange land.' The pipes do not readily lend themselves to church music, but at such gatherings their droning cadence was sometimes the only strain.

Scottish settlement on the river Plate goes as far back as the year of Trafalgar. When in 1805 Britain had one of her 'absent-minded wars' in that far quarter of the globe—the Monroe doctrine had not yet been promulgated—a small British expeditionary force found itself in surprised possession of the city of Buenos Aires. The patriots of the Plate soon drove them out, however, and as a result of the reconquest many a private of the historic Highland regiment engaged was despatched to captivity in the interior.

But the real Scottish invasion was a peaceful one. Twenty years after Whitelock's ignominious surrender to Liniers, the British Government, under Canning, recognised the independence of the new-formed Argentine Confederation—the first of the Great Powers to take that step. The years 1824 and 1825, it will be remembered, began a period when the 'company' and 'association' mania was rife in England and on the continent of Europe, and Canning's commercial treaty with the United Provinces of the river Plate gave a southward direction to the stream of immigrants led by the various associations of the day. Our countrymen, in consequence, became from that date settlers in the towns of Argentina as merchants, and in the rural districts as proprietors, shepherds, or labourers. These were to establish many of the finest estancias of the period, of which some still bear their founders' names.

Without doubt the most notable of these 'colonies' was that which was brought out from Scotland by the two brothers John and William Parish Robertson, natives of Kelso, in the early spring of 1825. John Robertson, at the tender age of thirteen, had begun life as powder-monkey aboard one of Admiral Stirling's vessels, in our attack of 1806 upon Montevideo. The following year found him in Rio de Janeiro, with but two guineas in his pocket, one of which he sent home to Kelso as a present to his mother. Four years' experience of commercial clerking resulted in the youth being sent by some adventurous merchants, in the year 1811, to dispose of a cargo of miscellaneous goods in 'the hermit state' of far-off Paraguay. One result of his hazardous trading on that occasion was that at the age of thirty-two he was able to return to Scotland with a fortune of one hundred thousand pounds, in a vessel of his own, holding besides the position of diplomatic agent for certain of the new South American republics. In six more years, however, war and revolution had rendered him almost penniless. Though now nearly forty years of age, Robertson conceived the idea of entering Cambridge University as an undergraduate, and the remainder of his life was spent in literary labours, of which his Letters on Paraguay remains a most vivacious example. John Robertson was the first man to send a steamer up the river Plate, and the first to attempt agriculture on a large scale in Argentina. The interesting memoirs of this remarkable 'Scot Abroad' are crowded with exciting incidents and hair-breadth escapes, illustrating vividly the dangers and the hardships of the early pioneers.

It was this man, then, who, before the smash of 1831, brought out the Pilgrim Fathers (and Mothers) of the Scottish colony in Argentina. He purchased some sixteen thousand acres, among the best land in the country for agriculture, at a spot called Monte Grande ('Big Wood'), about twenty miles outside Buenos Aires, and the year 1824 saw about two hundred and fifty persons—farmers and farm-servants, tradesmen and labourers, with a sprinkling of professional men, along with their young families—embarked at Leith on board the good ship Symmetry. These Robertson had collected mainly from Stirlingshire and the Lothians, Ayr and the Borders, he himself being a South-Country man; and after grounding on the 'English Bank,' off Montevideo, they at length reached the Outer Roads of Buenos Aires nearly three months later.

A rather remarkable effusion by the ship's poet, 'Tam o' Stirling,' has been preserved:

Frae the land o' brown heath and tartan plaids,
Frae the country o' cakes and barley bannocks,
A comely selection o' chiels and maids
On board the Symmetry swung their hammocks.

Farmers and blacksmiths, prize-ploughmen were there,
Dairymaids, fresh as the butter they made;
Guidwives wi' their weans, sae rosy and fair,
And the honest guidman, wi' his collie and spade.

The elders confessed, as each blew his nose,
And stealthily wiped off a trickling tear,
That the dear auld Scotland, wi' skim milk and brose,
Wad beat Buenos Aires, wi' five hunder a year.

All wondered what people the Argentines were—
Savage or civilised, colour and figure—
And lasses resolved they wad droon themselves ere
They 'd gang without claes, or be kissed by a nigger.

Twenty-two such verses, descriptive of the social side of the seventy-eight days' voyage, bring them to a land

Where jabbering foreigners their luggage received,
The babel o' tongues was enough to confound them,
But naebody understood Scots, they perceived.

Betimes then there stairtet a coo-cairt procession
O' colonists, implements, bedding, and rations,
All bound for the south, where the Rob'son Concession
Lay spread out to welcome the Scots Immigration.

The colonists quickly set to work and built houses at Monte Grande with bricks that they had themselves made. They fenced in and cultivated a large acreage, on which they grew fruit and maize. They raised great numbers of sheep and cattle and horses. They supplied the Buenos Aires market with butter and cheese and flour. All promised fair for 'the Rob'son Concession.' Yet the unsettled state of South American politics was to prove too much for their peaceful penetration, for after three short years the entire colony was dispersed, leaving not a trace behind. Civil war arose—a veritable reign of terror. The colonists were plundered of their goods and chased from their homes; some were murdered on their own thresholds—whole families mercilessly butchered by desperados of both contending parties. Already the founders of the colony had sunk sixty thousand pounds upon it, and their means were now exhausted. The venture, in fact, was really a generation before its time.

No longer might the colonists exist as a community; they must needs spread out and shift for themselves. Of the tradesmen and the artisans, most found their way into the capital and established themselves there as carpenters, blacksmiths, and bricklayers. Of the agriculturists, some went in for dairy-farming, fruit-growing, &c., and in course of time acquired land of their own; others took up cattle and sheep, and did well or ill, according to the variable seasons; others, again, settling in the wrong districts, met with mishaps innumerable. Of these were Roderick and his like, with whose ill-fortunes this chronicle opened.

It has often been remarked that our countrymen who emigrate to foreign lands invariably thrive better individually than collectively. And so it proved in the present instance. The break-up of the Monte Grande colony turned out for good to most of its surviving members. It removed them from a position of dependence, developed their individual initiative, and put in their way opportunities that would never have arisen within the limits of a small and self-contained settlement. The labourer threw down his spade, the tailor his goose, the shoemaker his last, to become adventurers in sheep-farming. Husbandmen, on the other hand, dropped the stilts of the plough to become substantial merchants. For in a new country there is no hard-and-fast division between the occupations; a man may try his hand at whatever comes his way.

Within a year of its dispersion the domestic servants and the milkmaids of the colony were all happily married, and as families arose there began to be felt a need for those traditional Scottish associates, church and school. Ministers were called from the Old Country, and ere long in the capital and in various districts of the province there were flourishing congregations of the Kirk, destined in due course to unite the scattered elements of the Scots community throughout the Republic.

The schoolmaster, too, was abroad. At most estancias where there was a family there was also a dominie. These tutors had their many entrances and many exits; some of them, it was whispered, had in their time played many parts. Many were highly educated men, excellent teachers. A few had come to Argentina in search of health; more had come to mend their fortunes; some had come through love of travel and adventure, and some (in geographical error) to shoot buffaloes!

Not far from the Scottish settlement of Chascomús, in the province of Buenos Aires, there arose in the late 'fifties a wattle-and-daub building known as the 'Rancho Kirk.' There has happily been preserved an amusing poem, described as 'An Idyll or Bucolic,' from the hand of one talented wielder of the cane in those pampa schools, and it pictures well the scene within twenty yards of that church door on any Sabbath morning:

Here, on these vast and thistly plains,
Where universal darkness reigns;
Here, like a candle in the mirk,
The Scots support a Rancho Kirk.

And farmers flock, with all their crews,
To worship God and hear the news.

The coaches, carts, and horses there
Would with amazement make you stare.
Before the little bell has rung
The people stand, a stalwart throng,
And chat in native Scottish tongue;
But words Castilian intermixing,
Which to the stranger is perplexing:
Alfalfa, trebol, and gramillas,
Arrojos, too, and carretillas;
The price of wool, the health of sheep,
Are there discussed with interest deep;
How much the sarna spoils the clip,
And if 'tis best to pour or dip.
Then Southdown wash perhaps is mooted,
And all its pros and cons disputed.
One grumbles, while he cuts tobacco,
That all his horses are so flaco,
He might as well have trudged on foot
As rode to church on such a brute!
Some tell how many sheep they 've lost
By secas, temporals, and frost;
And when they 're tired of sheep and cattle,
Discuss a Paraguayan battle.

But when the little hand-bell rings
They lay aside all earthly things,
Their souls absorbed (my muse supposes)
By what is said by Mark or Moses.

The description, we feel, is true to life—of men who were a quietly religious, God-fearing race, isolated from their fellows, and with few opportunities of social intercourse—the original Scottish settlers and their sons, when Scotland came to Argentina.

HIGHLAND NIGHT: 1715—1815—1915.

O TURN ye homeward in the night-tide dusk!
Return, O lad, across the watery dark.
The wind is eerie, and the sea growls low,
And voices mutter in the caves. O hark!
The sea-bird hath her mate, but none I know.

All day the gulls are crying round the rocks,
And spray is leaping white against their face;
The child is shouting, and the wind is sweet;
Above our heads the flying cloudlets race,
Where we are on the hillside cutting peat.

The sun glints on the waves. I have no fear;
My heart is filled with ancient battle-songs;
But when the winter seas are crying loud,
Phantoms of eld, and marching faery throngs,
From strange old tales into my fancy crowd.

They hold before my eyes a bloody plaid—
A wail of warning hurries down the gust,
The door blows open, and the baby cries,
And dark-red drops are trickling in the dust.
Kneeling I fall and cover up my eyes.

O turn ye homeward in the night-tide dusk!
The door stands open, and the sea growls low.
Ah, lad, my candle shines across the night.
The sea-bird hath her mate, but none I know;
Turn ye to me before the morning light.

ISABEL WESTCOTT HARPER.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE CONGRESS OF VIENNA, 1814–1815.

By Sir RICHARD LODGE, LL.D., Litt.D., Professor of History in the University of Edinburgh, and Author of The Student's Modern Europe, The Close of the Middle Ages, &c.

PART I.

IT is a commonplace of history, and recent history has made it a commonplace of journalism, that a coalition of States is ill-fitted to wage a successful war. Nothing but the imminent danger to the Channel ports and to Paris which was threatened by the German advance of last March could have overcome the reluctance of some of the Allies to accept that unified control of military operations which so happily reversed the current of success in July. But it is less generally apprehended that it is still more difficult for a coalition to negotiate a harmonious peace. So long as actual warfare is going on, the necessity of making head against the common enemy serves to hold the Allies together; but that cement is exhausted as soon as hostilities have ceased and diplomatists enter the arena to adjust a final settlement. The interests of allied Powers can be identical only up to a certain point, and even of common interests some bulk much larger in the eyes of one State than in those of another. And behind all divergence of actual interests there lies the instinctive and almost unreasoning feeling of jealousy, the sense that gains ought to be equal, and that no single State should be allowed to carry off an unfair share of the advantages obtained in a common cause. A completely disinterested State, if such can be conceived, would enjoy under these conditions an immense preponderance, and would almost be able to dictate terms to its colleagues.

To the outside observer watching the course of the recent struggle, the history of the prolonged wars against the French Republic and Empire was necessarily of absorbing interest. And now that the course of events calls us to play our part in the settlement of a world-wide peace, it may be instructive to survey in outline the termination of the only great war which is comparable in extent and in importance with that which raged from August 1914 to November 1918. In order to grasp the situation clearly it is necessary to realise that the settlement of 1814–15 was not embodied in any single document, and that attention must be given (1) to the events leading up to peace; (2) to the settlement with Napoleon in the so-called Treaty of Fontainebleau, and with France by the Treaty of Paris; (3) to the reconstruction of Europe, partly by separate treaties, but mainly by the final act of the Congress of Vienna—the most colossal treaty recorded in history; and (4) to the attempt to secure the permanence of the settlement by the formation of a league of States, which is usually, but not very accurately, known as the Holy Alliance. From each of these episodes some lesson, and perhaps some warning, may be applied to current and future events.

(1) The wars against France had begun in 1792, and had lasted, with occasional interruptions of uneasy peace, for twenty-one years. Coalition after coalition had been shattered, partly by the unity and military strength of France, but far more decisively by the internal dissensions which had rendered the successive alliances impotent to effect their purpose. And every failure had left France the stronger, until in 1810 Napoleon, after his marriage with the daughter of the Emperor of Austria, was the virtual dictator of Europe, with nothing to dread but the maritime hostility of Britain, and what seemed at the time a mere minor disturbance in the Spanish Peninsula. By 1813, however, the whole situation was changed. The loss of the Grand Army in the snows of the Russian winter was followed by the formation of a final European coalition, more formidable than its predecessors, not only on account of its wider extent, but also because behind the opposition of rulers and governments was the force of national sentiment, inspired equally by French example and by resistance to French oppression, and because Napoleon had now to reckon not only with avowed enemies, but in addition with the growing alienation and exhaustion of France.

The history of the formation of this coalition has great significance. The pursuit of the retreating French Army had brought the Russians at the beginning of 1813 to the frontier of Germany, but they could not advance farther unless they secured the assistance of Austria or of Prussia, or of both Powers. Prussia and Austria had both been allies of France, and both had unwillingly furnished troops for the campaign against Russia in 1812. Both States were partially freed from their dependence upon Napoleon by his disastrous retreat from Moscow; in both cases the commanders of the auxiliary forces accepted armistices in defiance of the interests of France; and both Governments were confronted with the problem as to how far they would venture to free themselves from a complicity which had preserved their existence, but had almost destroyed their independence. Prussia, which had suffered most and gained least from France, was the first to take a decisive step. The foundation of the coalition was laid in February in the Treaty of Kalisz, when the Prussian Government, eager to avenge the humiliations endured after Jena and Tilsit, made an alliance with Russia against France. By the conclusion of this treaty the Czar Alexander I. disclosed his momentous decision to follow up the successful championship of Russian independence by undertaking to restore liberty to Europe. Great Britain, whose forces under Wellington only needed the continuance of war in central Europe in order to secure a complete triumph in Spain, readily forgave past defections and promised sorely needed subsidies to the Allies. Sweden, whose Crown Prince, Bernadotte, was an ex-marshal of France, was induced to condone the loss of Finland to Russia by the promise of territorial compensation, and agreed to join the coalition against the French Emperor. But Napoleon, still master of western and southern Germany, and with the advantage of moving on interior lines, was more than a match for the ill-jointed forces of the nascent coalition, and his confidence was increased by victories at Lützen and Bautzen, which confirmed the wavering loyalty to France of the King of Saxony. These French successes gave to Austria the opportunity for which its astute Minister, Metternich, had been eagerly looking. The position of Austria on the flank of the contending Powers gave it the control of the balance between them, and enabled it to intervene so decisively as to secure a preponderant voice in the future settlement of Europe. The masterly use which Metternich made of the advantages which circumstances placed in his hands justifies his claim to a foremost place among the great diplomatists of Europe. He proffered Austrian mediation, obtained from Napoleon an armistice to allow negotiations to proceed, and drafted terms of studied moderation in order to throw the odium of their rejection upon the French Emperor. At the same time he secretly pledged himself to join Russia and Prussia if the proffered terms were not accepted by 10th August. His schemes would have miscarried if Napoleon had had the wisdom and the foresight to make peace, but Metternich had shrewdly reckoned that the Emperor's pride and military self-confidence would resent anything that savoured of dictation from a State that France had so frequently defeated. While diplomacy pursued its dilatory course, Austria was feverishly collecting its forces. The 10th of August passed without any assurance of concessions from France; on the 12th Austria declared war; and on 10th September Metternich concluded the Treaty of Töplitz, by which, for the first time, Russia, Austria, and Prussia were combined together against France. The balance was now decisively turned, and in October the battle of Leipzig destroyed Napoleon's hold upon Germany. The Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved, and its members, with the exception of the unfortunate King of Saxony, who was imprisoned in a Prussian fortress, joined the coalition by separate treaties with Austria. A similar policy was pursued in Italy, where even Murat, the King of Naples, sought to purchase the security of his crown by deserting his brother-in-law and by concluding a corrupt treaty with Metternich.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

With the expulsion of the French from Germany and Italy the primary task of the coalition was accomplished, and Napoleon had another chance of peace if he had been content to retain the so-called natural frontiers of France—the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees. But he knew that his power in France was based upon military triumphs, and that it would be endangered by the confession of failure. His obstinacy, partly due to the conviction that the aims of the Allies were not identical, forced the Powers to invade France in 1814 in order to compel him to come to terms. But the extremity of danger only served to stimulate him to gigantic exertions, and military critics agree that Napoleon never showed greater skill than in his operations on French soil. His very successes, however, contributed to his downfall. At every reverse he was willing to accept terms previously offered to him, only to find that, as in the case of the Sibylline books, they had been altered to his disadvantage. And at every temporary success he disowned his agents and repudiated the proffered peace. The inevitable result was to alienate Austria, the one Power which desired to maintain a Napoleonic dynasty, and to force his opponents into closer union. The four dominant Powers of the coalition renewed their alliance by the Treaty of Chaumont on 1st March, formulated their demands to be put forward at a final conference at Châtillon, and, these terms, which would have reduced France to the old boundaries of 1789, not having been accepted by the prescribed time, resolved to have no further dealings with Napoleon, and to press on to Paris. On 30th March the French capital capitulated, and next day the allied forces made their formal entry. On 1st April the Senate appointed a Provisional Government, with Talleyrand as its President; and on the 2nd the same body decreed the deposition of Napoleon and the recall of the Bourbon dynasty after an exile of twenty-five years. France had no great love for the Bourbons, and the Allies had been careful not to demand their restoration. But there was no alternative solution which commanded any support, and the recognition of Louis XVIII. was the only feasible way of putting an end to the foreign occupation of France.

(2) Napoleon, who was at Fontainebleau while these momentous events took place, was eager to continue the struggle, and was confident that by cutting the lines of communication he could still compel the Allies to evacuate France. But the outspoken remonstrances of his marshals convinced him that there were limits to the loyalty even of the army, and, with the ready compliance of a fatalist, he agreed to abdicate. The Allies could now dictate their terms to him, and by a declaration issued on 11th April they allowed him to retain the title of Emperor, and to hold the sovereignty of the island of Elba for life, with an income of six million francs, to be divided between himself and the members of his family. A declaration by the Provisional Government intimated their adhesion to these terms, and their willingness, on behalf of France, to carry them out. These two documents constitute what is known as the Treaty of Fontainebleau.

The problem of adjusting terms with France was not very difficult, as it had been thoroughly considered both in the various treaties between the allied Powers and in the successive negotiations with Napoleon. As the restored Bourbons were not likely to adopt an aggressive policy so long as their domestic position was insecure, as the Allies had no quarrel with the new Government, and as it was obviously impolitic to discredit and weaken that Government by associating it with a humiliating peace, it was possible to grant somewhat more lenient terms than had been offered at Châtillon to Napoleon. By the Treaty of Paris, which was signed on 30th May, the frontiers were to be those of 1792 instead of 1790, which gave to France Avignon and Savoy, in addition to making certain rectifications of boundary to the advantage of France. This fixing of the French frontiers left more or less derelict countries such as Belgium, Holland, Germany to the left of the Rhine, and various parts of Italy, which had been previously annexed to France. With reference to the disposal of these territories and other matters provision was made, partly in the public treaty, and partly in a separate and secret article annexed to it. By Article 32 of the treaty it was provided that 'within two months all the Powers which have been engaged on one side or the other in the war shall send plenipotentiaries to Vienna in order to regulate in a general Congress the arrangements necessary to complete the present treaty;' and by the secret article, 'the disposal of all territories which His Most Christian Majesty renounces by the public treaty, and the relations necessary to create a real and durable balance of power in Europe, shall be regulated in the Congress on foundations fixed by the allied Powers between themselves.'

But the Powers were not content to leave everything to the Congress, and certain matters which lay outside the direct agreement with France were determined in detail or in outline in the Treaty of Paris. Thus Holland was to be placed under the House of Orange, with a territorial addition, which by a secret article was defined as the country between the sea, the French frontier, and the Meuse—that is, Belgium. The German provinces to the left of the Rhine were to serve for the aggrandisement of Holland, and for the compensation of Prussia and other German States. The States of Germany were to be independent, and united by a federal tie. Switzerland was to be independent, and to obtain Geneva. Italy, outside the provinces returning to Austria, was to be composed of sovereign States—that is, it was not to be united, and no foreign Power, other than Austria, was to hold Italian territory; Malta was to belong to Great Britain; and Antwerp was henceforth to be exclusively a commercial port.

(3) The Congress of Vienna did not meet on 1st August, as had been contemplated at Paris, because the allied sovereigns paid a notable visit to the Prince Regent in England, and the Congress was postponed for two months to suit their convenience. With regard to the Congress —the largest and the most important diplomatic assembly recorded in history—attention may be concentrated on two points: (a) the problems to be dealt with, and (b) the composition and the procedure of the assembly. Both were more or less defined by the two articles already quoted from the Treaty of Paris, which constituted the only reference and guide to the assembled diplomatists. The completion of the Treaty of Paris laid down in Article 32 was expanded in the secret article to mean the disposal of the territories renounced by France, and the relations necessary to create a real and durable balance of power. These, with the creation of a federal government for Germany, a readjustment of the Swiss federation, and a redistribution of provinces in Italy, were fairly substantial and difficult items. It is true that some matters were either wholly or partially dealt with by separate treaties which had been made in the process of forming the coalition and of detaching supporters from the cause of Napoleon. Some were actually faits accomplis, and were never debated at Vienna. Thus Ferdinand VII. had been restored to the throne of Spain; and Norway had been actually handed over to the King of Sweden, though with securities for the maintenance of its constitution and liberties. But in other cases the previous agreements, often made by single Powers without the approval of their Allies, and in all cases frankly opportunist and based upon no guiding principle, created more difficulties than they removed. This was notably the case with the treaty which Austria had made with Murat, by which the latter was secured in the kingdom of Naples, while both he and Austria were to be aggrandised at the expense of the papal States. Another, and, as it proved, a still greater, difficulty was provided by two provinces which had belonged, not to France, but to an Ally of France. The King of Saxony had received from Napoleon the Grand-Duchy of Warsaw, formed out of Polish territories taken away from Prussia. He had loyally adhered to France even after the Russian débâcle, and had lost all his territories in 1813. Both Saxony and the Duchy of Warsaw were in 1814 occupied by Russian troops, and the king himself was a prisoner in a Prussian fortress. It was taken for granted by the victorious Allies that both kingdom and duchy were forfeited by their ruler, and were at the disposal of the Congress.

The composition of the Council was defined in Article 32 of the Treaty as including representatives of all the States who took part in the present war on either side. This was a considerable number; but it proved impossible to exclude from the Austrian capital the representatives of almost every State which had anything to lose or to gain, and also of States which had ceased to be sovereign States before the last war began, but which wished to regain the rank and independence of which they had been deprived. And some States were represented not only by professional politicians, but also by their sovereigns. The Emperor of Austria, the Czar of Russia, and the King of Prussia, besides several lesser princes, were all present for a time, and, though they attended no formal meetings, they were necessarily consulted upon all important points; and the Czar was one of the most industrious wire-pullers in Vienna. It has been estimated that some two hundred and seven States, or would-be States, were represented, some of them by several delegates, at the Congress. It was obviously necessary, if the Congress was to be constituted, to have some authority to decide which of these representatives were entitled to attend, and to settle such problems as whether the King of Saxony could send a representative, and whether the delegates from Naples were to come from Murat, the de facto king, or from Ferdinand of Bourbon, who claimed to be king de jure. And when the representatives had been selected and these thorny problems had been solved, it was clear that in some way or other the quality, as well as the number, of the represented States must be assessed. It would be impossible to treat the Congress as a mob of delegates with equal rights of speaking and voting, and to allow the greater Powers to be swamped by a majority of minor and often inconsiderable States. The only practical expedient to meet this difficulty was that the Great Powers should form an inner committee, and that their recommendations should be submitted to such outside discussion and acceptance as might be deemed necessary and desirable.

But who were the 'Great Powers'? There were two possible answers to that question. The signatories of the Treaty of Paris had practically constituted the Congress, and might reasonably claim some right to regulate its procedure. They were eight in number, and they included Spain, Sweden, and Portugal, which could hardly be called 'Great Powers' in a normal sense; and, besides, their direct interests were already largely provided for. Sweden, as a matter of fact, held rather purposely aloof from the Congress. The other solution was to accept the guidance of the four Powers who had constituted and guided the coalition of 1813, and who in 1814 had reunited themselves in the Treaty of Chaumont as a sort of permanent league. These Powers—Austria, Russia, Prussia, Great Britain—had dictated the Treaty of Paris, and in the secret article already quoted they had deliberately asserted their right to a preliminary and predominant voice in the settlement of Europe. But this claim on their part raised an extremely delicate question. France was a signatory of the Treaty of Paris, and France, so long predominant in Europe, could hardly be treated as a secondary Power. Besides, the France which sent Talleyrand to Vienna was not the France of Napoleon, against whom the coalition had been formed, but the France of Louis XVIII., with whom the Allies had no quarrel.

(Continued on page 37.)

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER III.—CUSTOMS OF THE SERVICE.

THE old 'com.' fairly caught me out at the 'prelim.' We had a general knowledge paper set—a fairly easy thing. I finished mine in about half-an-hour; then, getting bored waiting for Beefy, I started to write some skittish answers for my own amusement. Beefy, who is a practical joker, got hold of these, and when we were asked to pass our papers up, substituted the wretched things for my real answers. Just to show you how I put my foot in it, here are samples of the silly tripe I concocted.

(Q.) What is meant by strategy? (A.) Giving a fellow a thick ear—suddenly.

(Q.) Explain the term Tactics? (A.) Correct handling of a platoon when passing a brewery.

(Q.) What is an outpost? (A.) A military mortuary.

(Q.) What is meant by camouflage? (A.)

Wearing a Burberry to hide a hole in your pants.

Now, just imagine what the old 'com.' thought of me when he went through this piffle. I was in a blue funk. To make matters worse, it was Saturday and leave-day. Adela had got her mother and father off to a Red Cross bazaar, and she had engaged the drawing-room for us—all to ourselves. Beefy and her sister had commandeered the dining-room. This heavenly prospect was damped by a terrible cloud.

'Cheer up, John Brown,' said Beefy.

'That 's all jolly fine, Beefy. You 've let me down, and if I get chucked out, it 's all your fault.'

'You 're a ruddy pessimist. The old colonel is a sport. He 'll be tickled to death. Of course, he will probably have you up, make a hellifa fuss, &c.; but when you go out he 'll burst with laughter. You have got no humour, you silly ass. And you forget that the old chap used to do things at Sandhurst. Hang it all! it 's only a rag; and if there 's trouble, John, I 'll own up. I 'm not a sneak.'

'Fall in for lecture!' shouted the C.S.M. 'And, I say,' he added.

'What, sergeant-major?'

'Is John Brown here?'

'Yes.'

'You 're for orderly-room after the lecture. Make your will out. You 're going to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.'

'Right-o!' I answered, making the best of a bad job.

We then marched away to the lecture-hall to hear the adjutant on his favourite topic—'Customs of the Service.' He was not a bad lecturer, and quite funny at times. We called him 'Blasé Percy.' He had been at Mons, the Marne, and Ypres. Half his nose was off; he had a glass eye, a dummy hand, a silver plate in his tummy, and a game leg. Poor chap! no wonder he was blasé. For all that, he was a sport, and had the Legion of Honour.

'Now, gentlemen,' he said, 'when you 've finished wiping your feet on the tables, I 'll start. You 've got to go through it, so don't go to sleep. My lecture is, "The Customs of the Service." When you leave here you will have commissions. And when you join your regiments, try to do "the correct thing." Don't lurch into your new battalion like an actor-manager looking for trouble. Slide in quietly, just like a little dawg. If you 're not humble by nature, look as humble as you can. When reporting to the adjutant, don't have a woodbine between your lips and your hands in your pockets. He will eat you alive. When I was a sub. I saved myself an awful lot of trouble by cutting the English Dictionary down to two words—"Yes, sir." If you 're not brainy, that 's quite a good scheme. The adjutant will mark you down as decent and harmless, and the men won't know. Of course, this beastly war has upset our easy old system. We 've got to be intelligent to please the newspapers. It 's a bit of a bore, but the best people are trying to do it, and it 's good to be in the fashion. At the same time, it isn't the correct thing to argue the point with majors and colonels. They are big-bugs in the military scheme, and should an old gentleman announce in the anteroom that Macedonia is in Texas, or that Florrie Ford is the wife of President Wilson, don't call him a liar. You will make him unhappy, and when he gets you on parade, he 'll most likely twist your tail. Use your brains, certainly, but don't advertise them—that 's bad form.

'A man is judged by little things, and it is very easy to discover a man's temperament and schooling. For example, in one battalion to which I was attached, a gorgeous youth barged in and presented his card to the adjutant as if he were a commercial traveller. Mark you, he was only joining his battalion that day: but the adjutant was amused to read the following:

LIEUT. TED TIDDLEWINKS, Esq.,
1st Batt. Bombing Buffs.

Tel. address: 'Hustle.' Red Villa, Tooting.

'Now, that visiting-card was all right for The Bing Boys, but it was no good for an officer of His Majesty's Service. I agree it wouldn't prevent our going on with the war. And I am glad to say it was no indication of the real ability of dear old Ted, as he turned out to be. But officers are officers. We control the actions of millions of men, and it 's not at all a bad thing to make the British Army a school for etiquette and good manners. Ted, I may tell you, was an advertising agent in civil life. He simply couldn't help getting that card printed. From his telegraphic address you will observe he was a hustler, and we can do with lots of men like him. However, the adjutant handed him over to me, and I got him to dump his one thousand gold-edged, red-lettered visiting-cards into the ashpit, and gave him a bit of pasteboard like this:

MR TED TIDDLEWINKS,
1st Batt. Bombing Buffs.

'Thus was he shorn of all his gilt, his Esq., his Red Villa, Tooting, tel. address, and all the fripperies of Suburbia. No officer requires a brass band or a newspaper poster to announce his commission or importance. The uniform is good enough, and it 's a mighty good kit, too. Ted was such a good fellow, so willing, so generous, and afterwards so brave, that we adopted him as a regimental mascot. He's now a captain, a D.S.O. And what do you think that devil Ted is going to do next week?'

'What, sir?' I asked.

'He's going to marry my sister.'

'Hear, hear!'

'My sister, I may tell you, is a jolly good-looking gel—so is Ted good-looking—and when she asked my benediction, I wired: "God bless you, Red Villa and all."

'Another point. Don't start attempting to tip adjutants and colonels. You may be very rich, and imagine that if you send me a gold cigar-case studded with diamonds I shall pass you out for your commission. Personally, I should have no hesitation in court-martialling a man who did so. I recall a youth named Solomon M'Isaaks, who blew in from the Argentine. Out there he had to deal with grafters and twisters. To get business he had to give palm-oil on a lavish scale. He was not at all a desirable fellow. He wanted short cuts to success, and didn't like the daily grind of orderly officer, drill, marching, &c. Somehow or other he suddenly conceived the idea that by patronage he might buy a colonelcy or a brigadier's job. So he started to throw fivers about like hot peas, and ended up by sending a cheque to a brigade major. That finished him. He was booted out. If there is one thing we ought to be proud of, it is that the British Army has not the graft of South America. Merit counts, although I'm just afraid a sneak soft-soaps his way occasionally by acting the part of Uriah Heap.

'I may also tell you there are hundreds of little things you have got to know. For example, when the commanding officer enters the anteroom every officer must promptly rise to attention—as a mark of respect. Colonels do not insist on this from mere vanity. It is really discipline, and as all of you may be colonels some day, you will realise the benefit of the system. Another custom is, when you meet the C.O., the major, or the adjutant in the morning, salute smartly, and say, "Good-morning, sir." If the C.O. had occasion the day before to reprimand you for some error, make a point of saying a cheerful "Good-morning," and he will then know that you are no petty-minded individual.

'Remember your table manners. For dinner assemble in the anteroom five minutes before the time. Allow the C.O. and seniors to lead the way to the table, and take your seats quietly. Don't eat with your knife, and when you finish a course, put your knife and fork together. When a mess servant sees a new officer leave his knife and fork sprawling all over the plate he says nothing—but he thinks a lot. He really believes the delinquent is not a gentleman. And it is most important that officers should convey to all ranks that they have a knowledge of the courtesies which are the hall-mark of all well-trained people.

'Of course, you may say, "What has all this got to do with winning the war?" My reply is, it is the whole scheme. For example, the German officer is quite a brave man, but he is not a gentleman. His manners to the German soldiers are the manners of a brute. He never uses "please," seldom "thanks;" while Faith, Hope, and Charity are absent from his curriculum. His whole life is based on brute power, the penal code, and—orders. What a difference from the British Army! Our discipline is the firmest, yet the kindest, in the world, simply because cadets and all officers have had their noses shoved on the grindstone by sergeant-majors, lecturers, and seniors, who insist that if you fail in your duty, and neglect to cultivate the love and the friendship of your men, then you are absolutely no use to the British Army.

'Again, when you want to leave the mess table before the mess president does so, you must go and ask his permission. On a guest night you must not leave the room, except on a point of duty; and you should remain with the guests of the evening till they go.

'I think that is all just now, gentlemen,' concluded the adjutant. 'Fall out, please.'

. . . . . .

At other times this most excellent lecture would have cheered me up, but the coming ordeal made me tremble, and I shuffled to the orderly-room with a heavy, heavy heart. I wasn't worrying so much about what the 'Old Man' was going to say; it was the thought of my leave's being ruthlessly cancelled which made me sick of life. Adela—alone in the drawing-room—waiting for me! To be denied that hour of crowded life seemed like cutting the legs off a race-horse.

As I passed the orderly-room I saw the commandant had a fierce and livery look, for it was a raw, wet morning.

'Quick march—right wheel—left wheel—halt—hands back!—John Brown, sir,' announced the sergeant-major.

The 'com.' looked up. His eyes were sparkling fire, his moustache was like that of a walrus, his cheeks were puffed with wrath, and his neck was red. He struck terror into my soul, and I quaked like a schoolboy. I didn't know, of course, that this was the official orderly-room manner, specially cultivated by ancient mandarins to impress all tyros with the majesty of military law.

'Well, young man,' he blurted out, 'I have seen your effusion. It's all right for Comic Cuts, but it's a personal affront to me. Do you think the army and the war a cock-eyed revue for flippant cadets to throw their mocking tosh'——

'Really, sir, I'm—I'm——

'Silence, d—— you! You, a future officer, get an examination-paper given you, and you deliberately sit down and turn it into a music-hall farce. It's outrageous! It's a scandal!

You're a disgrace! When I commanded the Fuzzy-Wuzzy Camel Corps I would have shot an officer for such an offence. Do you realise the enormity of your crime? It's almost treason. Under the Manual of Military Law I can do anything with you for this. And if I were the C.I.C. I might order you to be strung up by the thumbs. What do you mean, sah? What the devil do you mean, sah?' he concluded, stabbing the blotting-paper with a pen and making it fly into a thousand fragments.

It was impressive—awe-inspiring! I felt like a worm between two stones. I am five feet ten inches, but at the moment I seemed no higher than a grease-spot.

'Please, sir, I'——

'"Please" be d——! Speak like a soldier.'

'I did two papers, sir—the correct one and this one. Unfortunately this silly one was sent up. I did it for my own amusement. I'm most awfully sorry, sir.'

'You're most awfully sorry, are you? Where is the proper paper, then?' he roared.

'Here, sir,' I said, handing it over.

His eye quickly scanned it over. 'Humph! saves your bacon, my lad. I was preparing to heave you out, bag and baggage. However, you're a youngster. I've got boys of my own. I'll give you a chance. Come again and you'll be shot! Now, are you due for leave to-day?'

'I hope you won't stop it, sir. I've an important engagement with a tailor about my uniform.'

'Did you say a tailor or—a lady?' he inquired, looking deep into my eyes.

'A—lady, sir.'

'Well, I have no desire that an innocent person should suffer for your misdeeds. You can have your leave. But never come here again—John Brown.'

'Thank you, sir.'

I was marched out. As the orderly-room closed I heard the 'Old Man' burst into laughter, and say to the adjutant, 'By Jove! we put the wind up that young bounder.'

'Yes, sir,' replied the adjutant.

(Continued on page 41.)

MOSUL—NINEVEH.

By Louise Peralta.

DOWN the broad, wine-coloured river comes a fleet of kelluks, the great skin-rafts of the Tigris, upon whose brown a golden dawn flings splashes of orange. These kelluks carry troops and equipment from Jezireh-ibn-Omar, whence a road through the passes of the Karaja Dagh connects with Nisibin, and so with the rail-head east of Ras-el-Aïn. Close to each shore of the level reach of water are long lines of mahailas, high-prowed like Chinese junks. At its one high, forward-sloping mast each carries, against a background of pious green or set in blazing red or yellow, the Arab crescent and star, with astrological figures underneath, or, it may be, a verse from the Koran in vivid white letters. Conducted with a leisureliness that reaches almost to the contemplative, unlading is going on. From these mahailas, since the country is nearly self-supporting, supplies were conveyed on camels and asses to the garrisons on both banks. For the Eighteenth Turkish Army Corps was astride the Tigris here at Mosul, and the River of Much Experience served as the third line—that is, as the general reservoir from which the daily issues proceeded—for British and Turk alike. With their access to the Gulf, the British could increase and replenish their river transport indefinitely. The resources of India's inland navigation, from the shikar boat of Kashmir to vessels of the Royal Indian Marine, were taxed with this objective from Bhamo to Sind. The Turk had to carry on with his more picturesque craft, in and out among which in this region no longer skims the gondola of Mesopotamian waters, the bellem, which is a down-river boat peculiar to the city of pale-pink Persian roses—Basra. Moored behind the mahailas are two strings of the up-river gufars—exactly the same kind of reed baskets with wooden uprights, plastered over with pitch from the bitumen-wells of Hit, which Herodotus describes as spinning down-stream, 'sound as bucklors,' with merchandise from Nineveh to Babylon.

From the eastern bank of the river a bridge of boats gives passage as far as the mid-stream rocks which at the season of low water are islands whose melon-patches gleam like rich outcrops of pyrites. From the chrysoprase and gold of the islands, whence the heat has hardly yet cast adrift the mists of the morning that linger in delicate gray, the western half of the river is bridged by a solid structure of masonry which touches land in front of the great Bab-el-Jisr, the chief of the seven gates set in the modern walls of sun-dried brick that were built to protect the inhabitants of El Mausil—which is, in Arabic, 'the Place of Connection'—from the raids of the Shammar Arabs, the great Ishmaelite clan which ranges over the whole of Irak. For the Shammar tribes, consummate foilers of the Othmanli tax-gatherer and evaders of conscription, Midhat Pasha, when sent in 1869 as Vali of Baghdad, legislated in an effective fashion which at once bewildered and enraged the palace at Stambul. On the Pasha's recall the Shammar became once more masters of Mesopotamia.

The flame and the flush of sunrise are now thrown upon a ceaseless human stream pouring across the floating highway, and thence along the masonry leading to the El Jisr Gate. At this hour the throng is composed chiefly of such people as are concerned with the provisioning of the town. Nomads of the Beni Lam tribe, their blue keffiyehs bound round their heads by plaits of camel's hair, hustle the herds of goats that are to be milked in the courtyards of the houses. Muntifik Arabs, Semitic in feature, dignified of carriage and gesture, the very folds of whose robes assert independence, drive in the sheep about to be slaughtered according to the Mohammedan usage. Urumiyan water-sellers carry in huge skins the muddy water from the Tigris, which, when filtered, is not the bringer of sudden death one would imagine it to be. Kurds in many-coloured turbans display, on shallow baskets of pomegranate-twigs woven together with string, the still leaping maseh (trout), or, possibly, a fine azad mahi (salmon), just caught in the deep and rapid tributary of the Tigris, the Khansar.

On the other side of the town, in the portion of the walls which faces the west, are three gates hardly less important than the Bab-el-Jisr: the Gate of the Sunset; the Gate of the Abd-al-Jalil, named in honour of the originally Christian family whose chiefs, until the ninoteenth century, were the hereditary governors of the pashalik of Mosul; and the Gate of Saiadin, close by the site of the gate within the ancient walls from which the Conquest-Laden is said to have been driven back during his unsuccessful investment of the town. Towards these western gates, at this early hour, strings of laden camels, horses, and mules move slowly, the drivers armed with long lances of bamboo. The demands of two great armies enormously increased Mid-Asian trade. During the period of activity in Western Asia of the Russian troops, lines of communication between the Middle East and Anatolia and Armenia were to some extent cut off. Throughout the war it was upon the regions eastward of the Caspian and of the Great and the Lesser Zab that the armies in Irak depended for the supplementing of their equipment and stores. Therefore, driven ahead of a dancing rain of far-flung sunbeams, a kafila from Isfahân, with the inevitable white Persian cat seated, for luck, in front of the foremost horseman, would wind itself of a morning within the walls of Mosul at the end of its long road by way of Kum and Sehna. During the war the camel-train from Meshed regularly brought to the Town of Connection the produce of Turkestan. And, far off, against an unflecked horizon, could be seen the caravan from Kasbin that had threaded the toilsome Sauj Bulagh Pass.

The great mills of Bombay have captured Mosul's trade in muslin. Its fame, and the cunning craftsmanship that won it, are gone from the Market of the Inlayers which bequeathed its art to Venice and Cairo. But the Town of Connection is still the collecting and distributing centre for Irak and Kurdistan, and to-day opens one of the two great weeks in the year when the caravans make Mosul a meeting-point. Already the khans in the town overflow with merchants, animals, and bales of goods; and many of the traders who came with the kafilas that arrived the previous evening, having rested, are now making their way in these still fresh hours through the Bab-el-Jisr. They do not enter upon the bridge, but, turning to the left, take the road leading towards Hammam Ali, the great thermal-resort of Mesopotamia, to the north of the town.

Heaps of yellow sand are upblown between the river and a long, low, white wall. The wall edges the broad terrace beyond which rise, each set within its fragrant garden, the consulates of the greater European states. As always, by night and by day, there is on the terrace a va-et-vient of men of every race of the Eastern Mediterranean (Greeks, Armenians, and Syrians predominating), who form the motley crowd employed at Eastern consulates in some capacity or other, from interpreter and clerk to kavass or spy. The opportunity is not lost of falling into groups, the centre of each of which is one of the newly arrived merchants fresh from the murmur and the restless rustle of far-off bazaars, or from the sun-gilt silence of the desert. Even in this hour in which the drum throbs through the song, there is in Mosul a good deal of social intercourse, of the formal Oriental sort, between the consulates and the wide, flat-roofed houses in the town belonging to leading Levantines and Asiatics. And now that the day grows, but is not yet too hot, courtesies begin to be paid; and the knots of traders and hangers-on have to make way for ladies mounted on ridiculously small donkeys, and enveloped from head to foot in shapeless calico wrappers, but without the hideous horse-hair masks worn by the Bagdadi Hanums when they emerge into the streets.

Ophthalmia is a haunting terror of Mesopotamia, and at these meeting-times of the caravans, when Muslims observe almost more strictly than usual the duties of almsgiving and hospitality, noticeable among the throng that betakes itself to the sulphur-springs are the poorer students, suffering from diseases of the eyes, from the Sassoon School and from the Midhat Pasha College of Baghdad. Contrasting with these, of an arrestive beauty of the classic Iranian type, are the lads of from twelve to fourteen from Basra and the Gulf, who, by devious routes and by devices equivalent to shipping before the mast, have worked their way with the kafilas to this great intertribal mart. It would seem that in mankind's first home the race is, here and there, still found in its pristine physical perfection, which, however, deteriorates all too quickly as each youth hastens to eat of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. Is it that in this old land there is still some divine reminiscence of the lost heaven? Does Memory, out of young eyes, gaze back through the aeons to the splendour of the Natal Day?

When these 'cure'-takers of almost all peoples and tongues have emerged from the succession of heated brick chambers at the baths, they pass the hot hours in the fountain-cooled verandas of the Hammam, comforted with the perfumed nargili and stayed with copious draughts of yoghoort, the very refreshing preparation of thick, sour milk. Even the amber wine of the famous Kullar vineyards of Shiraz may here, for his health's sake, be poured for the Shi'ah; while the amazing events of a stupendous era are discussed in the Kurdo-Syriac Arabic of Irak Arabi, with the liquid Persian vowels of Irak Adjemi, with the sibilant consonants of Arabistan. For, if West knows little of East, there is not much which—when it wants the information—East does not know of West.

When the intolerable heat has abated, for the return to the city the Arab 'cure'-taker draws over his white garments his sebba, the camel's-hair cloak which Europeans also find so useful in the extremely varying climate of Mesopotamia. The Hamdani saddler, of whom the Great War has made a 'leather king,' gathers his pustin about his shoulders; while the Kurd tent-contractor of Tabriz, who is become a bloated millionaire of Orient, slings, in his curious fashion, about his waist—the shaggy side out—the enormously thick felt yapanieh. War brought a great life to the River of Much Experience, but it did not change this people, which has lived through all things. Islam, which is Acquiescence, has laid a heavy hand upon this land. But cycles before Islam the East was fatalist, and looked upon life as upon un jeu inévitable. Yet, though lying almost upon the heart of the old, the town of Mosul is comparatively new; and Commerce is its lord.

'My soul has borrowed a portion of pain from hell!' In the great Chauk of the town, sitting cross-legged in front of his piles of sacks of gall-nuts, the mouthpiece of a hookah between his lips, a Khorasani thus expresses the anguish with which he is wrung by the ridiculously low price hazarded by a would-be buyer. Surrounded by possible customers, a trader in shawls is appraising and bargaining over his stock, great bales of which take up nearly half a side of the vast, open courtyard, giving on the Chauk, of the Khan-el-Khalili, the largest of Mosul's score of caravanserais. A crisp odour of roasting herbs tells of the kebabs that are being prepared for supper, and the animals are already at their evening meal, the camels kneeling in the centre of the courtyard of each great khan, and eating daintily the durra served them on a clean white cloth. The beasts that carry the merchants and their merchandise are always objects of interest to the people of Mosul. In the markets everywhere in the Middle East the Arab pony of the Persian Gulf always fetches its value. Though not equal to the pure Arab, it is a most serviceable as well as a handsome animal. The big-boned, clumsy-looking Atak horse is brought in great numbers in the kafilas because of its marvellous powers of endurance. But the favourite is the Turkoman horse of Khorasan, which is strong, fleet, of an extraordinary intelligence, and devotedly attached to its master. The Khorasan camel is also found in large numbers in the kafilas. Of great size and strength, it will carry six to seven hundred pounds to the three hundred and fifty or four hundred of the Persian and the Indian camel. At the end of the ten or twelve days of trafficking in the Chauk there will be a sale and exchange of beasts, when the ungainly but strong and docile cross between the two-humped Bactrian and the one-humped Arabian camel will be in huge demand.

In the Chauk, as the evening wears on, the heat is still great. The day's business over, the traders throng into the underground serdabs of the open-fronted cafés, where they squat on high-backed benches and squabble over dominoes. The shraf, ink-horn and scroll in his waist-scarf, is already established here and there in the square, where some Jews from the Mehalla Yahudi of Shiraz find it agreeable not to be shut within their own quarter for the night, which is what is done with them in that 'Seat of Learning, the Athens of the East'—the city of Hafiz and of Sa'adi. Some Arabs of the town fraternise with them; for in Irak not only is Ishmael on half-brotherly terms with Israel, but these 'Scars upon the Beauty of Islam,' as the orthodox Sunni piously call the Shi'ah, live in complete accord with Syrian Christians and with those gone over from Nestorianism to Catholicism who use the Chaldean rite. Muslim and Nazrini unite in honouring the patrons of the place—Mar Jirgis, who is to us St George, and Nebi Yunus, whom we call in English Jonah, and of whom many curious legends are told in Irak. It was near Mosul that Heraclius broke the power of Chosroes II., and recovered the sacred wood of the True Cross; and although, just nine years later, this region was swept within the khalifate, Mosul remains the Metropolis of Toleration. The followers of the faith which inspires Endeavour are distinguished from the devotees of the religion which inculcates Acquiescence only by the cross tattooed upon their thumbs. They swear by Aïssa, the others by Mahomet; that is the sole difference. Acceptance, therefore, is easy of the error that these people's Christianity is dead. It is certainly mortared solidly within a mere belief that their little parcel of doctrines is the material safeguard of a race. Nevertheless, vitality still throbs in the immured existence.

The Orient takes swiftly—as it gives—the light. Into a surf of marigolds the sun goes down. The lovely dream we call an Eastern night is about to be realised. From the leaning minar of the great Mosque of Nur-ed-Din that rises upon the site of the Christian Church of the Forty Martyrs comes the call of the muezzin: 'To pray is better than to sleep!' The harshness of the full-throated Irak Arabic has softened to an almost liquid echo, when, clear and arresting, with quick-following compelling notes, the bell of the mighty Dominican church outside the walls rings for compline.

Of what avail—the question leaps out of subconsciousness—here, in face of the soulless forces of the Inevitable, the psychic leaven represented by those two Voices? Tenacious, indeed, impalpably but imperiously, of its possession is every influence that has laid hold upon the Oriental psychology.

What, then, of the influences from across the river? Does that Dust over there still lay the cable of its sentience to ours?

East of the Tigris, very far off, the snows of the Tiari heights rest against an intact aquamarine. Subject ranges do homage to these, and receive from sun, snow, and sky robes of honour more dazzling-hued than any bestowed by Mongol Padishah or Sasanian king. Below yet lower terraces, and separated from the town of Mosul only by the Khansar River, is the mound of Kuyundjik—Nineveh, the dust which, seven centuries before the Incarnation, was the exultant capital of Assyria. Here were the Triumphal Way of Sennacherib and the Palace of Assur-bani-pal. A few hours' caravan journey distant, the Diggers—Layard, Rassam, King—have laid naked the crumbling skeletons of the palaces of the Second Shalmanezar and of Esarhaddon, lords absolute over a people snared in the hazard mesh of existence, whose life was made the food of Pride, their love's jewels trampled into a despot's warpath.

Has Death, which for them was not 'august and royal,' sung their sorrow 'up into immortal spheres'? Has Ashtar—she of the Great Temple that commanded the mud-covered plain—breathed a soul into this abased earth in its eternal bed? Has she linked that soul with the souls of the living over there in El Mausil, the City of Connection, and with their cult of 'the gods whose names are with us still'? Has she given this Dust knowledge that it lies again under epic skies?

BLACKLISTED.

PART II.

I.

BRUCE and Pajarillo recrossed the garden in the glow of approaching sunset, and, as requested, summoned the concierge to let them out.

'Señor Marinero has finished his paper,' said the Little Bird.

The woman led them back to the door in the street wall, and having received a gratuity, was about to open it, when footsteps sounded behind them, and Marinero himself came down the path. Greeting them courteously, he dismissed the servant, saying he would himself let them out. 'But first,' he added when the woman had left, 'let me assure myself, gentlemen, that you have seen all my poor house has to show.'

'We have spent an interesting and instructive hour, señor,' answered Bruce. 'You are fortunate indeed to have found a retreat so full of historic memories.'

'Full, indeed, it is,' Marinero agreed—'fuller even than your short visit might suggest. The house itself, as you will have perceived, is comparatively modern, but it is not, perhaps, known to you that the Moors, as well as the Romans, had a fortress here, and that in parts of this building the tribunals of the Holy Office were held during the period of their power.'

'I confess we had no idea of it,' answered the Scot.

'You must return another day, and make a fuller examination at your leisure, gentlemen. But, to whet your curiosity, I must show you, before you go, something of what still awaits your attention. Come.'

He led them along the inner side of the street wall to where it made a corner with the Roman masonry. Here a short flight of worn stone steps descended to a small Moorish doorway cut in the older stonework of the wall. 'I take it,' Señor Marinero said, 'that this door took the place of an older one dating from the Roman epoch, for it is inconceivable that the chambers to which it leads could ever have been hewn out, once the wall had been constructed.'

With a key which hung from a nail he opened a worm-eaten oak door, and lighting a candle which stood within, proceeded along a narrow stone passage, flanked on either side by small chambers which had apparently served as dungeons. Tiny windows in the inner side of these gloomy cells admitted from the passage itself the only light and air which they received. Presently the passage widened into a fair-sized square room constructed in the thickness of the wall, floored with stone, and lit by two slits from the side of the garden. Immediately beneath these windows, if such they could be called, was a small raised dais, and round the walls of the apartment, and here and there on the stone roof, were remnants of rings and iron constructions of a sinister look.

'I imagine this,' said Señor Marinero, 'to have been a kind of examination-room for prisoners. We are fortunate to have been born in another age.' He shrugged his shoulders, and passing through the grim room, went on along the passage. A little farther on it ended abruptly in a much smaller room, perfectly circular, and floored with wood instead of stone. A single slit in the garden wall admitted a faint glow of the evening light, and below the slit several stone steps were built into the wall. Beneath the perpendicular slit of the window was a narrow horizontal one, which admitted no light, and from one end of which a thick iron bar or lever protruded.

'This room, gentlemen, is one of the most curious in the whole place,' said Señor Marinero. 'As the light is fading, it will be convenient if we conclude our tour here for the present. This room has evidently been used in comparatively recent times, and its purpose is a strange one. With your permission, I will show you a quaint example of medieval ingenuity.' He ascended the stone steps, and placing his candle on the top one, took hold of the iron bar. Looking back over his shoulder with a smile, he added, 'If you will stand somewhere towards the middle of the room, you will better appreciate the effect.'

Totally unsuspecting, the two friends did as requested.

Bearing his weight on the lever, Marinero thrust it the full length of the slit in the wall. A rumbling seemed to come from all round the room, and a wild shout broke from the Little Bird: 'Treachery! Madre de Dios!'

He sprang for the corridor, but too late. Responding to some infernal mechanism, the wooden floor gave way suddenly beneath their feet, and, like children shot off a seesaw, Bruce and Pajarillo were precipitated violently into a chamber below.

II.

Bruised and half-stunned by the fall, they looked up from the darkness of their prison, and saw their guide, candle in hand, peering down from the security of his stone perch with an expression of malignant triumph.

'What do you think of our Moorish mouse-trap?' he cried, shaking the fist of his left hand at them. 'English spy and Spanish cut-throat, what do you think of this interesting example of medieval ingenuity?'

With a great effort controlling his voice, Bruce answered, 'Do you intend to murder us?'

'I will tell you a little story, English pig,' said the other. 'A fine romance, by Franz von Festinghaus.' He laughed gloatingly. 'There are two villains in my story. One is called Donald Bruce, and the other Pajarillo.'

A knife flashed suddenly out of the darkness past the candle, but the Little Bird was too shaken by his fall for a true throw, and striking harmlessly on the stone wall, it fell back into the blackness below.

'Do not interrupt,' said the German with a grin. 'If anything happened to me, you would assuredly never get out. Well, there was once a fine fellow named Franz von Festinghaus, of good family, but poor, and condemned for the sake of the Fatherland to labour in that desert of thieves called Spain. Of that cursed land this Franz by industry and application acquired a very thorough knowledge, which enabled him, to his great joy, to give valuable help to his country in her struggle against the attacks of her enemies. In his youth he had served in the glorious German Navy, and by care and forethought, and his wide acquaintance and influence in Spain, he was able to contrive many schemes to aid our gallant undersea boats, which earned him high commendation from his country's representatives, and were even brought to the notice of the All-Highest War Lord himself. After some time, however, it began to be evident that sinister agencies were working on the part of the enemies of Kultur; unaccountable disasters overtook many of our heroic vessels. The representatives of his country sent for Franz, our hero. Money without limit, and the services of a regiment of trusty agents throughout Spain, were placed at his disposal. Two orders only were given him—"Protect our heroes, and destroy those who are working against them." Well, he set to work, our Franz, but the task was hard and dangerous, for the enemies were cunning, and left little trace. They were working, moreover, not all together, or on any settled plan—for our enemies do not understand co-ordination—but like blind mules they were toiling obstinately, one here, one there, to defeat our successful campaign whereby we hold the Mediterranean in a grip of terror.

'I will not tell you how Franz obtained his information, but he obtained it, and as the evidence accumulated against this or that agent of our foes, one by one was suppressed. But month after month there came stories of two men, an Englishman and a Spaniard, and wherever these two went there occurred mysterious losses to our cause. Whence they came, and who financed them, it was long ere Franz von Festinghaus could ascertain, and even to-day there is much to be explained. As for the Spaniard, he was reported to have been a notorious smuggler, and to have lost a brother in one of the ships torpedoed by our commanders. The unearthing of these two men caused our Franz more uneasiness, and—yes, I will admit it—more fear and worry, than any other inquiry. It was just when he had begun to despair of bringing them to book that one of their shrewdest blows against the Fatherland gave him at last the opportunity he sought. Through the plotting of these two villains, a trusty comrade, who was gaining valuable information for our commanders, was captured by the French on the frontiers of Andorra. The French did everything possible to keep the matter secret; but it is not easy to defeat our intelligence service, and at length, to his joy, Franz received from a sure hand a series of photographs of these two men. That was already two months ago, but in two months much may happen. Copies of these photographs were disseminated through Spain, wherever a faithful soul was working for the Fatherland, and high rewards were promised to him who should succeed in tracking those villains. Two days since a telegram—oh, a harmless commercial message!—came to me from Portugal. The spoor had been struck! And then, like a gift from the gods, this very day, as I was pursuing my hobby of an artist outside the station, behold, the very men came walking up to me! I knew them at once, so carefully had I studied the photographs. Yet at first I dared not believe my eyes. I studied them both. I studied the likeness again. I was certain! And now, Gott sei Dank, they are down there!' The German shook his fist again with fierce delight. 'And they ask what I am going to do with them! Ach, my good mouse-trap—it is kolossal!'

'This is a civilised land,' said Bruce. 'It is known that we came to this house. There will be inquiries.'

'And it will be known that you left, swine-dog!' was the answer. 'My servant saw you to the door, whence I myself can swear that I dismissed you. And who will be likely to inquire about you?'

'Those who sent me hither,' answered the Scot. 'And they have a long arm, Herr von Festinghaus.'

'They will need it, to reach you,' laughed the German. 'But this brings us to something practical. Who are "they"? I have suspicions, and a chain of evidence, but it lacks the connecting link. If either of you wishes to see again the light of the sun, you will answer that question, and in exchange for the information, duly verified, I will give you your lives.'

'And the alternative?'

'To lie here till you rot,' answered the German brutally.

'And what security have we that your promise will be kept?' asked Bruce, steadying his voice.

'The word of Franz von Festinghaus.'

'For my part, the security is insufficient,' answered Bruce. 'My companion will exercise his own judgment.'

'Señor Bruce,' said the Little Bird, 'it coincides with yours.'

'In that case,' said Von Festinghaus, 'I leave you to your reflections. To-night I start for Barcelona to remove another obstacle to our cause. In a few days, when I return, I will come and see whether your views—if by that time either of you still has any—remain the same. Buenas noches, caballeros!'

He set the candle on the stair again, dragged at the lever, and the great timbered floor, which hung aslant like a tilted plate, slowly resumed its horizontal position, shutting off from the captives the last spark of light. They heard the German's footsteps die away in the stone passage; then all was dark and silent as the grave.

III.

'This is an evil place, Señor Bruce,' came the voice of the Catalan presently through the blackness. 'I ask your forgiveness.'

'For what, Little Bird?'

'If I had restrained myself a little, my knife would have gone through that fellow's throat. A man's temper should be under better control at my age.'

'Nonsense!' said Bruce testily. 'It is I who am to blame for leading you into this, Pablo. Yet, sooner or later, there must be inquiry after us.'

'Sooner or later,' echoed Pajarillo grimly. 'It is not to be denied that that fellow is clever. But he is no Christian.'

'He is a devil!' cried Bruce. 'Are you hurt, Pablo?'

'My left wrist is sprained, and my legs are bruised.'

'I am not hurt. I must have fallen on you,' said Bruce. He struck a match. Its feeble glow showed how desperate was their position. The floor of the cell was of dry earth, smooth and hard. The grim wall which everywhere surrounded them, massive stone on massive stone, gave not the faintest hope. Ten feet above their heads the huge wooden floor of the chamber above shut them down—'like the lid on a saucepan,' as Pajarillo said. Along the middle of it a great iron bar provided the axis on which the floor had swung. The nature of the mechanism which operated the turning was not apparent, but on the circumference of the floor on one side were metal claws which now held the floor in position.

There came a sudden flutter of wings in the pit, and something struck the flickering match from the Scot's fingers. 'A bat!' he exclaimed, starting back with repulsion.

'Where bats can enter, air can enter. Light another match, amigo,' said Pajarillo. Bruce did so, and Pajarillo groped about the floor. 'Gracias á Dios!' he cried, 'my knife is not broken. Viva the steel of Toledo!'

'Toledo steel will not cut through Roman masonry, Little Bird.'

'Nevertheless, with this in my belt I feel better. One more match, now, and a cigarette apiece, while we compose our minds.'

The cigarettes were lighted, and the companions sat smoking in the terrible dark.

'Pablo,' said Bruce, 'I have not your philosophy. God knows our own state is bad enough, but there will be murder done in Barcelona when that German villain gets there.'

'If so, we cannot help it, Señor Bruce. It is a mistake to think of what one cannot help. There is but one thing for us to think of, and it is how we are to get out.'

'It is impossible,' said Bruce wildly.

'I admit I fear it. Yet a man's brains are for thinking, and may the good God direct our thoughts!'

'Little Bird,' said Bruce in a harsh voice, 'if I go mad in this awful place, strike that knife of yours into my heart. Strike true, and Heaven reward you!'

'Dear friend, whom I love,' the Catalan replied, 'if the time comes I will strike, and strike for two. But the time has not come. Think!'

They sat a long time smoking in silence, then threw away the ends of their cigarettes, and watched the tiny red sparks go out. In the utter stillness each could hear the other's breathing.

'Little Bird!' whispered Bruce at length. There was no reply. 'Little Bird!' he whispered more loudly. Still no reply, though the breathing beside him came deep and regular. Bruce realised with a shock that the old man was asleep!

Well, let him sleep. He knew it would be cruelty to disturb him. Long he sat listening to that regular breathing, filled with agonised thoughts. At last he, too, must have dozed, for he suddenly felt his shoulder shaken, and discovered his companion standing in the dark beside him.

(Continued on page 45.)

ONE DAY.

By INNES LOGAN, Author of On the King's Service, The Raid, Notes from a Field Message Book, &c.

I.

'AND that,' said Charters, who was rather fond of using long words, 'is one of the most despicable accompaniments of the whole war.' He pointed to the open page of an illustrated weekly paper, whereon was a large photograph of a person doing 'war work' in a stage costume and a conscious and affected attitude. 'And these'—he ran his finger down a row of 'war workers.' 'And when you think of the real workers—the nurses toiling year in and year out, all day long, amid sickening sights and stenches, and the appalling monotony of it; and the mothers, staying at home and looking after their own children instead of pursuing the popular whim of the moment—why, you sometimes wish the Huns would get among them and teach them the Schrecklichkeit of war.' He threw the paper at a brown rat which ran rapidly across the sunshine between one heap of ruins and another.

'Yes,' said the doctor rather abstractedly, anxiously hunting through his pockets for their one box of matches; 'have you seen those matches anywhere? Oh, here they are.' He lit a cigarette.

'It's the hypocrisy of it all that sickens me. For downright hypocrisy give me one of your worldly-minded people every time. The religious hypocrite can't hold a candle to him or her. He hasn't got the cheek.'

'Exactly,' the doctor agreed emphatically; 'bad plays in the name of art, and bad books in the name of psychology, and such virtuous indignation if questions are asked.'

'And look at those shows got up for war charities,' continued his friend, filling his pipe very carefully. He did not know how long his pouchful would have to last him. 'If the people who go and the people who act would simply put their hands in their purses for what they could afford, they would raise ten times the amount in a quarter of the time.'

'Yes,' was the sarcastic reply; 'and not a new dress or a picture in the papers to show for it.'

'Of course, all this sort of talk is old-fashioned, and so on, and so forth; but, mark you, doctor, this war is going to be won by the old-fashioned people who think a lot of the stupid old virtues, like conscientiousness and devotion to duty. We have worked through the aristocrats, and the born fighters, and the professional soldiers. What I mean is, we can draw no longer, to any extent, on the men who fight well because noblesse oblige, or those who loved fighting for fighting's sake, or the Regular who instinctively sacrificed himself in obedience to duty. After all, it is leadership that counts. And this war is going to be won by the nation that has as its company and platoon commanders in its amateur army the greatest number of boys who would rather die, literally, than lose their self-respect by being false to their immediate duty.'

'And the greatest number of like-minded people at home to back them up, padre.'

'That too, of course. And it is not the public schools that are going to give the answer. The great majority of these young officers have never been at a good public school. They've been educated at grammar schools, secondary schools, Board schools even—and uncommonly well-educated in a sense, too. But the test is the home. Is the British home producing the right stuff? It is just what we preachers have been hammering at for years—ay, and practising, too. Have any homes given more liberally of their sons to this war than the manses of Scotland?'

His voice trailed off. He saw in a swift vision, as he often did, the Scottish manses in field and town. He saw the spotless, shabby stairway, and the worn study lined with books, and the dressing-gown hanging behind the door, to be at hand because so often a fire could not be afforded. He saw, as in a flash, those square houses where poverty and strict virtue and honourable ambition and a sacred love of learning for its own sake had their home. He saw the toiling and the pinching and the planning, that the boys' education might be worthy of their breeding, and the long years of it, and at last the battle won, and the stalwart lads standing upon their own feet, facing life with quiet, confident eyes, facing life equipped through a father's and a mother's sacrifice. He saw them giving themselves proudly to their country because they had learned to serve, not self, but the King of kings. And he saw, too, the lives, so many of them, quenched by the flick of a bit of lead, the rich lives with the infinite might-have-been—and the manses empty of all but the memory and the pain.

The two officers were sitting on the ground outside the little brick shanty where they had spent the night. Ruin lay all around, and the morning sun blazed on the white chalk-stone of the broken buildings. Their battalion had been rushed into support the previous day, and on arrival had found that the ridge in front had been lost, and that 'support' had become the front line. There were no trenches, but the men had dug in with fury and efficiency; and as the afternoon wore on and no attack developed, medical officer and chaplain had set out rearwards to discover some central place for their aid-post. They had found this lean-to, and, near it, a Nisson hut big enough for any wounded likely to come in. There was ample accommodation, and though there was no shelter, the shelling, so far, had been intermittent and scattered. The camp had few traces of occupation left in it, save a supply of coal and a number of illustrated papers and magazines. If one stood up at the door of the shanty he could see the front (and only) line about three hundred yards away, across the little valley which lay between. They had spent most of the night keeping their little fire going, for the hours of darkness had been bitterly cold; and all night long occasional shell had screamed overhead, bursting sometimes in the buildings round, more often on the road beyond.

Outside the aid-post the ground declined sharply for a hundred yards, and then rose in a gradual slope to the brow of the ridge. There the front line, dug only yesterday, ran. The two Scotsmen began the morning with a systematic exploration of the neighbouring ruins, and before long discovered two other Nisson huts, partly dug in. They were by no means even moderately safe to the experienced eye, but a careful search revealed nothing better, and the doctor finally ordered the aid-post staff to move in as quickly as possible. Then, setting off down the valley, the chaplain and he made their way to battalion headquarters, a hut with walls one brick thick and a tarred-felt roof. There they got some eggs and biscuits which, with a supply of port wine, had been left behind in a canteen, and reported the position of the aid-post to the commanding officer.

There was little news, apparently, and what there was seemed too bad to be true. The situation beyond the brigade front was what is called 'obscure.' The Fifth Army had 'gone;' the Boche had separated the French and the British; there was no one on our immediate right. So the tale, half-believed, went. The two officers filled their pockets with provisions, and hurried back to their post, to find the removal in full progress. The doctor, who was of a sanguine temperament, suggested a visit to the front line.

II.

Parties of men of another division lay scattered in groups of two or three from the dry bed of the stream below to the ridge. Their heads turned to watch the two officers as they pulled themselves up the steep bank to the slope above. As they stood erect the air around them immediately became filled with whistling sounds.

'Machine-gun bullets, padre!' cried the doctor. 'Down again!'

They dropped beneath the bank, and, turning, moved to the left, keeping beneath its shelter, and working round to a sunken road that ran straight up the hill towards the trench. Two days before it had led past a large ammunition-dump, and the elephant-shelters in which the men had lived still lined the road. Each was now filled with men sitting idly with their rifles in their arms—men of the same division as those lying in the field to the right.

'What are you doing?' asked the doctor.

'Waiting for the Germans to attack, sir,' was the reply.

'That 's bad'—they were on their way again—'and I 'm not sure if it does not explain a good deal, this perpetual waiting for an attack. If a man has any imagination, it gets the better of him. It takes a stouter man to defend than to attack.' The doctor paused. 'If he had said, "Waiting for Jerry to come over," it would have had a different sound, somehow.'

They passed a group of officers sitting near the top of the road, and, saluting the colonel, asked if there was any machine-gunning over the eighty yards of flat ground between the top of the road and the trench.

'Only an occasional burst.'

'Well, let's hope the occasional burst does not happen now.' The doctor apparently felt quite cheerful about it.

They reached the top of the road, and began to run. They ran hard, and then, with the laughter born of relief—first cousin to the cheerfulness of the wounded—they dropped into the trench below, among their own men. It was a model trench of its kind, very deep, very narrow, and with a good fire-step. A sentry glanced round at them, then turned to his duty again.

'Yes, sir, you can see them quite plain over there.'

The two officers peered over the top of the trench, and saw a line of gray figures moving quickly, now disappearing, now rising again.

'I think it must be the flank of a big body of them working round to our right, sir. You only see a few of them now and then.'

The loud, angry chatter of a machine-gun farther down the trench broke out, and stopped, and began again.

'What a pity our guns are not here!' said some one as they worked their way down the trench. 'I suppose it's always a perplexing problem whether to withdraw them and risk leaving infantry without support, or to leave them and risk losing them.—Well, Bob, how are things going?'

'All right, sir,' said a tall Guardsman; 'we are getting some fine shooting.' He lifted his rifle to his shoulder as he spoke, and aimed rapidly. Charters and the doctor stepped up on the fire-step to watch, and saw two gray-clad figures moving across a gap. The shot rang out, and at the moment one of the Germans pitched forward on his face and lay still. The other leaped aside and disappeared. The soldier withdrew the long barrel of his sniper's rifle from the parapet, rested the butt on his foot, and grinned.

They passed on, exchanging greetings with the men, and always finding the same cool and watchful confidence that was typical of their battalion and division.

III.

But at the aid-post things were not going so easily. It stood on high, exposed ground at cross-roads, and the shelling had become more persistent and definite. As, safely returned, the padre and the doctor ate their frugal lunch of hard-boiled eggs, biscuits, and tea, the bursts drew unpleasantly near. The knowledge that a matter of fifty yards' difference would land one through the roof of the hut did not add to the pleasure of their lunch.

'Here 's the colonel from the field ambulance,' said the sergeant, appearing suddenly at the door.

They looked out, and saw the commanding officer of the brigade ambulance striding steadily across the open towards them. A shell crashed into the ruins behind him as he came. He walked down the steps into the hut, and took off his steel helmet (better known as a 'tin hat'), and with characteristic directness began discussing arrangements for removing the wounded. Finally he advised them to clear out of a 'foolish place for an aid-post.' One of his cars had been knocked out on the road hard by already.

The colonel's experience was so wide and personal that the medical officer (who was secretly rather proud of his aid-post) reluctantly agreed. Charters frankly heaved a sigh of profound relief. Events proved the decision a wise one. A few hours after they left a shell burst in the stretcher-bearers' quarters, and soon after another blew clean through the officers' hut.

But where were they to go? That was a question not easily answered. So, immediately the colonel had gone, the two set out again, this time accompanied by the 'stretcher-bearer' and 'sick' sergeants, to hunt for a site. Two nights' lack of sleep was beginning to tell, but the need was urgent. A battle might occur on their front at any moment; it was, indeed, expected at any moment. Striking across country, they tried the fields behind the road; up and down and backwards and forwards they searched. The road itself they soon found to be barren of shelter, and a narrower road running back from it towards the rear was in like case. The fields also were quite open; and though, under the efforts of a number of men, a broad trench began to zigzag across them, it was, and would long be, innocent of dug-out or shelter. At length they decided to try a ruined village at another cross-road to their right front.

Villages and cross-roads are not ideal spots for lingering in during a battle, but there seemed no alternative. For long they drew blank in the village. Its ruin was complete, and it contained no cellars. One concrete shelter they found at last. It was small; the short flight of steps which led to it had a nasty twist, awkward for stretcher-bearing. It was half in ruins in any case, and very dirty. They rejected it, and cast round the country-side once again, but again without success.

The afternoon wore on. Once a dispute about a map reference threatened to become acrimonious. Fatigue fell on them. Like every one else in the battalion, they had been on the alert since the morning of the 21st—it was now the afternoon of the 23rd—when at dawn the shattered city where they slept had wakened to the hurtling whistle of the high-velocity shell's incredibly swift approach, its thunderous explosion, and the slapping clatter of whirling masonry falling earthward. They decided to send the sergeants back to the old aid-post meanwhile, and crossing the road towards the line again, lay down on its bank. A steady shell-fire, directed either at the road or at battalion headquarters a hundred and fifty yards forward, broke between the two, thrashing the bare ground. Through the indifference of their weariness, of their supreme desire for rest and sleep, the thought of tea suddenly presented itself, and refused to be dismissed. Tea, and not sleep, now appeared the desirable thing in life, the only thing worth having, and all at once, with a word, they rose and walked, in a half-circle to avoid the shelling, towards headquarters.

The frail hut had two rooms in it, with a kitchen opposite the door. In the room to the left the commanding officer, the adjutant, and the intelligence officer lay stretched on their wire beds, snatching a few minutes' rest. The shells passed overhead at short, irregular intervals. At times they passed so close overhead that it seemed that only by a miracle was the roof untouched. They passed so near that the occupants of the hut had a physical sensation on the crown of their heads as though they had in some sense felt the sweep of the racing shell. The two officers turned to the kitchen and asked for tea. It was served in the room to the right. It was nectar, ambrosia—what do these mean to the soldier?—it was life; it was tea! The waiter, paying no attention to the alarming noises overhead, retailed at great length the symptoms of some small ailment to the doctor, who listened, bright-eyed, happy over his tea.

They emerged reinvigorated, satisfied—and the situation had become suddenly clear. The aid-post must go to the concrete shelter, inconvenient though it was. It was the only place. They sent a message to the sergeants, and turned towards it; and not even the discovery that a hut eight yards from its door contained seven hundred boxes of Mills' bombs could altogether quench their good spirits. They gravely discussed the problem whether one direct hit would send it and all in its neighbourhood sky-high, or if the bombs would go off separately, and so give a man a chance of getting to cover. The aid-post staff could be seen dribbling down the valley laden with bandages and splints, and soon all hands were at work cleaning out the shelter. An orderly, his rifle slung over his shoulder and walking with the steady, assured gait of a man tested and sure of himself, crossed from headquarters with a message for the doctor.

'I know what this means, padre,' said he; 'it means another move.' It turned out to be so; headquarters had got instructions to side-step to the right, and during the night the battalion would move similarly. They began wearily to pack up again.

A stretcher case, one of the few of that day, came down from the front line, in great pain. A fragment of shell had struck the poor fellow over the stomach, leaving no external wound, but causing rupture and bleeding. He died as he was being carried to the 'loading-post,' where the ambulance-car waited.

IV.

Darkness had fallen when the order to move came, and once more the little party set out to find a home. There was the village to go through, a main road to follow, a railway crossing to negotiate; but all these ordinarily dangerous points lay quiet. The enemy was too busy driving down south through the gap to attack on the northern flank as yet. (The attacks came a few days later, and were completely repulsed.) They reached a side-track with a sensation of relief and achievement, for a broad main road is, of all places, the least desirable to be on during shelling. The dry bed of the river was now on their right, and a protecting high bank on the left, between them and the enemy. Three tall trees, one with a great branch shot away and lying across the road, loomed up through the darkness. Just beyond was a row of shelters, a few feet deep, dug into the bank. One after another they cast down their bundles and sought a sleeping-place.

In the officers' shelter there were already two occupants, but they made room for the newcomers. A chair appeared marvellously, and, still more welcome, cups of hot tea. With the false feeling of security one has when he is in a place in which he has never been shelled—the three trees were destined to be the object of much enemy attention later—they gratefully drank the hot, strong liquid, comparing experiences.

'Wasn't it Napoleon who said that an army marched on its stomach, padre?' asked the doctor.

'Yes,' said another; 'but Foch says "c'est l'âme qui gagne la bataille"—it is the soul that wins the battle.'

'Shut that door, for goodness' sake!'

The drone of a Hun bombing-aeroplane sounded very near, so definitely different from the sound of a British engine. The beat of it, the regular pulse, rising and falling, swung round overhead, and moved off down the line. They placed their haversacks under their heads and snuggled down into their overcoats.

'No boots off to-night either, I suppose.'

'Fourth aid-post we've established to-day,' murmured a voice sleepily. 'Wonder where we'll move to to-morrow.'

Outside, the night lay almost soundless, except for the occasional rattle of a machine-gun in the front line. There would be no rest for the men there that night—the staunch men who did the deeds of the long campaign, without self-seeking or advertisement; the brethren of the trenches who had drunk to the bottom of the bitter cup of the weariness and the terror of war.

Another day of the war was over. It had been a day singularly free from casualties; the morrow might bring a different tale. The shelter sank into silence. Their last thought, as always, was of those at home.

Printed and Published by W. & R. Chambers, Limited, London and Edinburgh.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

PROLOGUE.

MY friend Keene-Leslie has often urged me to tell the story of the strange experiences which befell us a few years ago. I would willingly have turned the task over to him, but he is a much-occupied man in his peculiar calling. It was too much to expect him to devote his hard-won snatches of leisure to the chronicling of his own or other folks' adventures. After procrastinating as long as I decently could, at last I gave my partner in adventure a promise that I would tackle the story as soon as I could bring myself to remain long enough indoors. My bondage held compensations, for it was my good fortune to write this narrative in a well-beloved corner of the earth, at a library window which frames a picture of an old, bird-haunted garden; in the middle distance the sun-shot links of a Highland river; and beyond, heaved against the clouds, the great shoulders of the mountain-wardens enclosing the horizon above the long Spey Valley.

On king's highway, lonely bridle-path and sheep-track, through silent forest, over hill and moor, I have wandered across old Scotland from the Braes of Glenlivet until the wind flung me a waft of seaweed from the Linnhe Loch. The enchanted road has led me through a hundred bonny glens, but of them all Gleann Ciuin—The Quiet Glen—calls clearest to my heart, for, its charm and solitude apart, it is my 'kenned' country, the land of my forebears, and its river and its hill-burns still sing, as they did in my boyhood, of happiness and holidays and home.

Ciuin is not its real name. You may search map and gazetteer in vain for it and other places in the tale. So you may the parish records for the names of some of the people whose fortunes are chronicled in these pages. There are a few men left who shun the limelight. Enough, therefore, to say that the Glen hides near where three noble Scots counties join hands, and, looking southward from its uplands, if the mists are not trailing, the eye, following the dark line of ancient woods, past vivid green patches of 'brae-set' crofts, past the birch-clad foothills, mounts to the solitary places of the mountains, haunts of golden eagle and ptarmigan, where, summer and winter, the lonely corries that neighbour the high tops of the Cairngorms are slashed with virgin snow.

In the Glen stands the country-house called, in the Gaelic, Tigh-na-Sith; in the Lowland Scots, The Bield. The word is a full one, conjuring up tranquil visions of a house of peace, shelter, content, voices of friends, the altar-fire of a hearth. Its name chimes with its setting, for the old house hides in a green fold off the beaten track, under the lee of the southern slope of a burly hill, screened by pine woods from the gale, so near the selvage of the moor that the heather creeps close to the gates and on still autumn mornings one may be wakened by the call of the grouse. 'Into Glen Ciuin and out of the world,' so runs the saying in the North; and indeed, when the velvet dusk is closing round The Bield and the warm-lit squares of its windows welcome me home, many a time I ponder the strange chain of events which brought the persons of its drama together on so sheltered and remote a stage.

Doubtless, the place had its share of unrest in the wild old days beyond the Highland Line. A dark memory of the Wolf of Badenoch lingers in the rhyme known to a few of the curious in folklore:

The Wolf he rides wi' four-score men,
Black be his tryst and black his en';
Red runs Spey and red's the sky
In Ciuin, when the Wolf rides by.

In later times the Glen saw its clansmen march away to join Montrose or Tearlach, many of them never to carry claymore home again, their beds in the heather wider than in castle or in shieling. But these ancient strifes are dead, and to-day The Bield rests in its quiet eddy, hardly vexed by a ripple from the great current of the world. Yet, not so long ago, its tranquillity was suddenly broken, and to my friend Anthony Keene-Leslie and myself there came, in consequence, some eventful enough weeks.

The old house is now mine. It contains some things of interest to the antiquary and the sportsman, but I give the place of honour to an old brass casket which rests under a glass case in my sanctum. The exquisite fifteenth-century craftsmanship on its border appeals to the expert in Dinanderie, but the ordinary man might not give the casket a second glance.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

Yet my eyes often turn towards it. Centuries have died since, jealously guarded, it set out under the benison of a great name, and I am now to tell its dark story, and of the share which Keene-Leslie and I—not forgetting Dr Hall—took in strange affairs, meetings with crafty and violent men, stratagems and spoils.

CHAPTER I.

TO a romantic, the quest of hidden treasure may conjure up palms and the tropic moon mirrored in a still lagoon, the 'peacock seas of the buccaneer' and the boom of far Southern surf, with a schooner in the offing, like enough; and if your romantic be of the true, never-grow-old breed, he will hear the sharpening of cutlasses, strange oaths, and one of the crew singing 'Ho! for the Spanish Main' out on the dizzy topgallant-yard as the schooner heels to the Trades. But the winds of chance have set the course of this tale elsewhere. Let our romantic put the tiller of his fancy about, and make his first port of call in one of the windy streets which climb the steep slope of the 'New Town' of Edinburgh, where the eye, looking down the hill from the city's heart, finds a pleasant sense of distance and escape from the pavement in the picture of the blue floor of the Firth, the Fife hills, and the sails of ships seeking harbour or heading for open sea. The ranks of a heterogeneous regiment of shops, from print-sellers to public-houses, straggle and thin out after passing the cool green of Queen Street Gardens, before handing the street over to lawyers' grimy-windowed offices and rows of tall dwelling-houses with flights of steps from their doors, bridging railed sunken basements.

Some of the doors display little brass plates which announce with simple economy of language that there reside within members of the Scottish Bar. Mine bore the inscription, 'Mr Neil Forbes, Advocate.' It now hides a tarnished face in the dusty exile of some lumber-room; but once, in the heyday of its youth, it was the newest and shiniest in all that hopeful street. The familiar plate on many—too many—doors in Edinburgh conveys little or nothing to the layman of the status of its owner; but from the street itself and the number of 'stairs up'—the height of the rookery where the legal bird nests—any lawyer's clerk can classify the owners of the brass plates with swiftness and accuracy. So it is written that Jura Street is dedicated, not exactly to the juniors, but a large subdivision thereof—the young and struggling, the young and lazy, the young and unlucky, all those who are described in the polite euphemism as 'not in full practice.'

Behold me on a raw February evening alone in my bachelor quarters, three stairs up, in No. 19 of the street. I should like to be able to present a picture of myself immersed in work, my table snowed under by documents, corrugations on my young brow through overwork, a pile of 'papers' awaiting my sagacious attack. Sed major veritas. None of these things was there except the corrugations, which were certainly not born of having too much to do. In truth, I was sitting by the fire, a prey to gloomy thoughts, doing nothing more profitable than burning tobacco. Briefs I had none. Until lately, some house property I owned had brought me close on a couple of hundred a year—enough to live on. But there came an evil day when I rose to the Devil's best-dressed fly, the notion of making money without sweating for it. The details of how this came about are now of little concern to any one except myself. The central fact is that I borrowed as much as I could on my property, and put the proceeds into an adventure, felicitously christened 'The Running Target Mine.' If any of the shareholders of this ingenious contraption happen to read this, I offer them fraternal sympathy. Now I sat meditating on my chilly outlook, for that afternoon I had interviewed the family lawyer. He is self-made, hails from the practical North-East, and his countenance—as hard as his head—has never been able to conceal his inability to understand the strange people who cannot take care of the bawbees.

We discussed ways and means until it was appallingly clear that I should be forced to sell my little patrimony, and this I instructed him to do. The result of my 'deal' was painfully easy to comprehend. My bank-book informed me that I possessed forty-seven pounds eleven shillings and fourpence. The rest of my capital had vanished in less than a couple of months into the pockets of the riff-raff of the Stock Exchange. Here ended the first lesson.

The knowledge that I was alone to blame for my being on a lee shore may have been a powerful illuminant in a revaluation of myself, but it was as a farthing dip in the process of getting rid of my troubles. The more I pondered a way out, the darker it grew. I got a few guineas for law reporting and occasional articles for the newspapers and magazines; but I never had made more than a pittance at the bar, and though I was sanguine enough, a merciless clairvoyance told me that I never should. I was near the end of my tether. The thought (I suppose) ought to have left me cold, but I was not so much discouraged as the state of my affairs may suggest. Thank Heaven, resilient youth sees visions of blue sky and open water through the roughest weather. If empty pockets were hateful, they were not the blackest things in a world of compensations. I thankfully reflected that I had been spared the worst of all punishments, the spectacle of others suffering through my want of sense. Notwithstanding my bad miss at the Running Target, I had a vague belief in myself, in the mysterious something which people are accustomed to call luck. The wolf was not actually snuffing at the door, and as I had no notion of meeting trouble halfway, I tackled a Report with what concentration I could. I was in the middle of it when a knock sounded on my door.

In many ingenious narratives where the young and briefless one is sitting alone and a knock sounds on the door, Destiny (ignoring professional etiquette) conveniently appears in the guise of a mysterious, frequently a beautiful, client, and, hey presto! from that moment fame and fortune are his. But the knock heralded nothing more dramatic than my landlady's diminutive 'slavey,' who brought me a couple of missives. One was a bill, which I put beside its depressing brethren in their lair behind the clock on the chimneypiece. There was not much room for it. The other was a note from Keene-Leslie asking me to dine with him at the club that evening. He had just arrived from London, and had sent me the note by a messenger on the off-chance of my being at home and disengaged. With very great pleasure I scribbled a few lines accepting my old schoolfellow's invitation. I had not seen or heard of him for a long time, but I never put his name on the lengthening mental register of the men who have dropped out, for Anthony Keene-Leslie, busy idler, traveller, sportsman, dreamer, man of action, had a way of turning up unexpectedly, debonair, cheerful, bright-eyed and resourceful as in the days when we were boys at school.

Brains were his in plenty. Had he willed, I believe 'Tony' would have made a fine special correspondent; but he preferred the life of a free-lance, and for a time I used to see his name under magazine articles on sport and travel in remote parts of the earth. He had more than a competence—jute and ground rents—and could well afford to gratify an incurable restlessness of mind and body. Danger had an irresistible attraction for him. He had been mountaineer, pearl-fisher, Arctic explorer, big-game hunter in all sorts of savage places, and had done excellent work for a great newspaper in the Russo-Japanese War. After that he had loafed about London, so he told me, doing nothing, and trying to do it well; but the last I had heard of him was from a man who had met him strolling on the Östergade in Copenhagen, well set up and immaculate as of yore, looking as if he had never roughed it for a day in his life. Yet, with all his restlessness, there was nothing febrile in his blood. My old friend was a cool-headed and courageous gentleman.

I had been dining too much of late in the poor company of my own thoughts, and I welcomed whole-heartedly the chance of turning my back for an hour or two on myself and my affairs in Tony's society. Consideration of the Report was promptly adjourned. In half-an-hour I was on my way to the club.

I have good reason to remember the weather on that February evening. It was cold and misty; a raw haar was stealing up from the Firth of Forth; the street lamps looked as if they had been wrapped in dirty cotton-wool. Edinburgh is blest by comparison with London or Glasgow in its freedom from fog; but there is an undeniable thoroughness in some of its easterly haars. After the comfortable warmth of my rooms, the clammy air made me shudder, and I was not sorry to reach the shelter of the club, and to find the wanderer stretching his long legs by the hall fire.

There were a good many men dining, but we got a table to ourselves, and fell a-talking of old times and old friends with great zest. The dinner was good (trust Tony for that!)—whitebait, a Madras curry, and a saddle of mutton—and the wine was a Clicquot of a classic year. By the time we had settled in arm-chairs with our cigars, and Keene-Leslie had begun to discourse of his wanderings, I had almost forgotten that there were such things in the world as bad weather and the Running Target Mine.

My host was a deft raconteur. His yarns led me far afield—Newfoundland and days after caribou; evenings by lonely lakes; camp-fires in spruce woods; big game in Rhodesia; whales in the Arctic; woodcock in Albania.

'The life agrees with you, Tony,' I said to him. 'You look uncommonly fit.'

'To be frank, old man, I can't say quite the same of you. You're looking only middling. Anything the matter? Seems to me you're a bit pulled down.'

'Oh, I'm fit enough, I think,' I said.

'Your statement lacks conviction. Overwork?'

I smiled.

'"Vina, Venus"?'

'Nothing so interesting.'

'What is it? Out with it, my son.'

I hesitated for a moment, and then blurted it out. 'I've been chasing wild-geese on the Stock Exchange, and have got a bad knock. I deserved it; but I don't want to talk about it, Tony. I heard of you in Copenhagen the other day,' said I, to turn the talk from the dreary subject.

'Yes, I was there. I have an interest in a lease of some quarries in a couple of islets in the Gulf of Bothnia. Fancy bringing granite to Aberdeen! But we do it, and it pays, Neil. Well, I was at Copenhagen after my first and only visit to those God-forsaken rocks, and looked up "Fatty" Willis. You remember him at Cambridge? He was in the Foreign Office, before he succeeded to the family place and took to rock-gardening and prize pigs.'

'I remember him. He pulled "Four" in my year.'

'The same. I helped him a bit in a little affair. The details don't matter, but I got a letter of thanks from his Chief, and an invitation to go and see him. I did, and the upshot is that I am now a tracker.'

'A whatter?'

'You'll never guess!' He bent forward and whispered in mock heroics, 'I am one of the cogs of the great machine of Empire, gentlemen, on which—er—on which—er—finish the cliché, Neil.'

I fell into his humour. 'On which the sun never sets; of whose destinies you, gentlemen, the free-born electors of—of Glauryhole, are the custodians—you, whom I am proud to desire to represent in the Palladium of British liberty.'

'Loud applause! You may be in the Palladium yet, if it doesn't improve.'

'Be serious for a moment, Tony! What do you mean?'

'I am one of the members of His Britannic Majesty's Secret Service; but, I pray you, do not form a hasty impression of these gentlemen from the shilling thrillers. I do not pay calls upon ambassadors at 3 A.M., modestly but triumphantly bearing lost papers of State. No Ruritanian princess has insisted on bestowing her lily-white hand on me. I have had no picture-house escapades. No! Mine are minor operations out of the limelight, chiefly concerned with finding out what the fellows on the same job, employed by other Powers, are up to. Hunting the hunters, y' know. Keeping notes of a few suspected people, and all that sort of thing.'

I had an idea that Tony's airy 'and all that sort of thing' meant a good deal.

'Been in any "scraps"?'

'One or two, but all in the day's work;' and he told me of the disappearance and the recovery of one of our attachés in a European capital; of illustrious 'crooks;' of strange moves on the chessboard of foreign politics; the thin, inflammable curtain between the nations and the furnace of war. They were matters which are not seen in the newspapers, and they made me stare.

'I like the job. It suits me. I'm a mixture of impatience and perseverance. Something new to rub one's wits on turns up every now and then.' He puffed meditatively at his cigar for a minute. 'You remember the accomplished Mr John Vandeleur's verdict in the New Arabian Nights,' he went on. 'Let me recall it. "I have hunted most things," quoth that redoubtable rascal, "from men and women down to mosquitoes; I have dived for coral; I have followed both whales and tigers; and a diamond is the tallest quarry of the lot." Well, my friend, I have the temerity to differ from him. I have found man-hunts more interesting than searching for beasts or jewels, and I have chased all three. Yes, the life suits me. But I am a selfish dog, yarning away about my own affairs. Tell me about your coming a cropper.'

'A purely personal matter, and of no interest to any one.'

'"Of no interest!" You know me better than that. Out with it. I insist.'

The story of the Running Target was disagreeable, but it had the merit of being short. I let him hear it.

When I finished, 'I'm sorry, Neil,' said he. 'The old definition that "a mine is a hole in the ground, frequently owned by a liar," is true. Can I help you? You can count on me.' He said many kind things which may be guessed.

'No, my friend. I'm going to stick it out, and meanwhile put up with the bed I've unmade.'

'Like the lower deck, "Grouse and carry on." Well, "Wull to Cupar, maun to Cupar;" but if ever you're up against the dead end, or anywhere near it, let me know, even if I'm at the ends of the earth. Promise me.' He meant what he said and I promised, little thinking of the queer times that were in store for us.

It was midnight when I gave Tony 'Good-night,' after promising to lunch next day with him at the Caledonian.

An unwelcome surprise awaited me when the hall-porter opened the door. The haar which had been creeping up from the Firth in the earlier hours of the evening had grown into a North Sea fog—so dense that the line of the street and the very pavement at my feet were hidden, and my hand, held at arm's length, was scarcely visible.

CHAPTER II.

FEELING strangely alone in the stillness, I began to grope my way homeward slowly on foot. The fog filled the streets from roofs to pavement with a blinding vapour. I had slipped an electric-torch into my pocket before starting for the club, but its light was a mere pin-point against the impenetrable gray wall. Foot by foot, blindly, but without a blind man's assurance, I crept along until I came to the corner of the street which led northward to my quarters. It must have been close on half-an-hour before I got my bearings, but I managed to reach the railings of Queen Street Gardens, and there I felt more confidence. I was within a few minutes' walk of home, and with a hand on the railing I made quicker progress. I had not met a soul since I left Tony, nor had I heard a sound except the melancholy voice of the sirens from the blind ships in the fog-wrapped Firth.

Suddenly my fingers touched something alive, and my wrist was gripped by a strong hand. I am not a weakling. With a wrench I freed myself, and flashed the electric-torch on the man, my mind made up for a struggle. It was a hundred to one that the fellow was a professional thief who welcomed the fog as an ally; but to my, 'What the devil do you mean?' there came a stammered, 'Pardon, signore!' The torch showed me a tall, shaven, dark-eyed man. He repeated his 'Pardon, signore!' and added, 'A vile night, and you made me 'fraid.'

He probably spoke the truth, for my silent approach in my rubber overshoes may have startled him. His face was very pale, and I remember the light from the torch glinted on a pair of brass rings in his ears. From these and his clothes I put him down to be a sailor, and his use of the word 'signore' told me his race.

'No harm done,' I said curtly, and moved on, keeping my ears open in case he might follow me, but I heard nothing; and in another minute I arrived at No. 19. I had just opened the outside door, when I was brought to a standstill by the sudden beat of swiftly running feet. I listened. The man who ran with the haste of this one on such a night most assuredly had something to run from.

Curious to get a glimpse of him, I left the key in the latch and went down to the foot of the steps. The fleeing man was in the middle of the street, coming up the slope towards me. He must either have been running for some time or he was woefully out of training, for he was gasping. When he drew near me he slowed down and came to a standstill, trying to control his breath, and, I thought, listening intently. The density of the fog forbade my seeing him, but I kept perfectly still; and presently he moved off again, walking quickly and softly, and, so far as I could judge, still in the middle of the street. When his footsteps died down I turned to go into the house, and at that instant came a low whistle and once more the sound of flying feet. This time they came from the opposite direction, as if the runner had turned and was now doubling on his tracks. Some rowdy undergraduate's escapade or a commonplace prowler dodging the police, I thought; but in a few seconds he came full pelt almost past me, swerved suddenly, and fell within a few yards of me, where he lay very still.

I hastened to the roadway, and a flash of my electric-torch made it plain that the man was hurt, perhaps in danger. I put my arms under his shoulders, and had no difficulty in picking him up and carrying his light weight. The key was still in the latch, and in a trice I had opened the door and lifted my limp burden inside, where I laid him down gently on the stair. The gas-jet was burning, and by its dim light I made out a pale face, with straggling wisps of sandy hair. To reassure him, I put a hand on his shoulder. It was wet, and the torch showed me that his sleeve was blood-stained. When I bent over him he opened his eyes and said in a hoarse whisper, 'Have they got it?' The words were hardly out of his mouth when he swooned again. Just then I felt a slight current of cold air, and glanced at the door. It was being very cautiously opened, inch by inch. Still bending over the man, I kept a wary eye on the door, and presently the profile of a man's face appeared and a dark eye peered stealthily through the opening about a couple of feet from the floor.

I sprang erect. Instantly the face vanished, but I had caught sight of a brass ear-ring, and I knew that the watcher was the man whom I had stumbled against at the railings a few minutes before. Jumping to the door, I threw it wide open. The fog filled the doorway, and realising that the prowler might be near me, intent on some devil's work, I drew back swiftly and slammed the door. Its clang may have stirred the clouded wits of the man on the stair, for when I reached him his eyes were open and his hands raised in a feeble attempt to ward off something.

'Come with me. You are safe,' I said, as I took his arm and helped him to his feet. He was trembling, as much, I believe, from sheer terror as from bodily weakness.

For a moment he hesitated. 'Is—is there—any one wi' ye?' he asked, staring wide-eyed over my shoulder.

'Not a soul.'

(Continued on page 53.)

THE CONGRESS OF VIENNA, 1814-15.

PART II.

ALL these problems were in the air when, in the course of September, the Ministers of Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Great Britain began to take up their residence in Vienna. These men—Metternich, Hardenberg (with Wilhelm von Humboldt to assist him on account of his deafness), Nesselrode, and Castlereagh—had been intimate associates for nearly a year and a half. They had conducted all the ramified diplomacy of the coalition; they had sat together in conference with the agents of Napoleon; they had followed the allied troops into Paris; and they were the men who were mainly responsible for the Treaties of Fontainebleau and Paris. On their arrival in Vienna they at once assumed the function assigned to them by the secret article of 30th May, and undertook, as a matter of course, to draft a programme for the coming Council. Metternich was accepted as president, and Gentz, his friend and confidant, was to be secretary. They were still at the threshold of their work when they were confronted with two very serious difficulties. Talleyrand came to Vienna as the plenipotentiary of France, and before long it became apparent that the comparative unanimity which had enabled the coalition to extort its terms from France by no means extended to the general policy to be pursued in Europe.

It did not require the acumen of a Talleyrand to discover that France, in spite of the Bourbon restoration, was still regarded as a pariah among the States of Europe. There were several problems in which France was vitally interested. Louis XVIII. was resolved not to recognise Murat as King of Naples; he did not wish for a national union of Germany under Prussian guidance; he hoped for the restoration of his kinsman the King of Saxony; he desired to aggrandise Piedmont as a possible balance to Austrian ascendancy in Italy; and the Czar was to be prevented, if possible, from obtaining that dictatorship in Europe to which Alexander's ambitions tended. But the primary task imposed upon Talleyrand was to break up the coalition, which was still in spirit anti-French, and to vindicate for France that share in the settlement of Europe from which the dominant Powers proposed to exclude her. For carrying out this task there were certain obvious advantages on the side of France. Her own fate was already settled by the Treaty of Paris—no territorial gains were open to her; she could pose as a disinterested Power, and as a disinterested Power could act as arbiter between the contending interests of other States. Also, all the secondary States, finding themselves excluded from the inner diplomatic circles, were inclined to combine with France against the pretensions of the Allies of Chaumont, and to look to her as the champion of their rights. And, finally, Talleyrand was prepared to put forward a principle—the Bourbon principle of legitimacy—as a guide to the Congress, and, however fallible such a principle may appear to us a century later, it was better to have some guiding principle than to allow the Congress to degenerate into a disorderly scramble for the selfish interests of individual States.

Talleyrand's first opportunity came on 30th September, when the representatives of France and Spain were for the first time invited to confer with Metternich, Nesselrode, Hardenberg, and Castlereagh. The programme which the four had drawn up and signed was now laid before the Conference, and in the discussion Hardenberg spoke of the 'Allies.' A dramatic scene followed. Talleyrand at once fastened on the word, and asked who were the Allies and against whom were they allied. It could not be against Napoleon, for he was at Elba; if it was against France, then a representative of France was out of place in Vienna. Yet the presence of France was necessary to consecrate the principle of legitimacy, on which the maintenance of order and stability in Europe depended. He concluded by demanding the speedy meeting of the Congress, and by contending that the Congress alone could give a mandate to selected Powers to prepare the basis of a settlement. The embarrassed Ministers of the four Powers found it impossible to answer the arguments and the claims of the French representative, who had at one bound made good his position in the inner committee of the Council. With this victory Talleyrand was content. He tacitly withdrew his demand for the meeting of the Congress proper, which in the end never met at all. The formal business was, without a mandate, undertaken by the eight signatories of the Treaty of Paris, but in practice Spain, Portugal, and Sweden hardly counted, and the real decision rested with the five Great Powers—Austria, Russia, Prussia, Britain, and France.

This notable success on the part of France was not due solely to the superior dialectic of Talleyrand. It really arose from the circumstance that on certain vital questions the Allies of Chaumont were diametrically opposed to one another, and that France as a matter of fact held the balance between them. The great bone of contention was Poland. Alexander I. had occupied the Grand-Duchy of Warsaw, and was determined to retain it as a kingdom of Poland, of which he was to wear the crown. This involved a complete reversal of the policy of the partitioning Powers, who had agreed in 1795 that Poland should be blotted from the map of Europe, and that the name should never be used again. To obtain the assent of the other States, Alexander proposed that Prussia should receive the forfeited Kingdom of Saxony, and contended that Austria was sufficiently compensated in Illyria and Italy. Prussia was reluctant to resign what had once been its provinces in Poland, but was afraid to alienate Russia, and was ultimately induced to accept the bribe of Saxony. Austria was averse to a kingdom of Poland, whose creation would endanger its hold upon Galicia, but was still more hostile to the proposed transference of Saxony, which would bring Prussia to the most exposed frontier of Austrian territory, and would give to Prussia an immense preponderance in Germany. Britain, less directly interested, cared little for Saxony, was not unwilling to aggrandise Prussia, provided Prussia would accept British rather than Russian patronage, but was resolutely opposed to the aggrandisement of Russia. Castlereagh professed his willingness and even his desire to see a real kingdom of Poland reconstituted; but it must be an independent Poland, not an additional kingdom for the Czar.

These dissensions gave to Talleyrand an immensely strong hand to play, and he played it with his accustomed skill. He set himself successfully to strengthen the antagonism of Austria and Britain to the proposed distribution of territory, and less successfully to sow dissension between Russia and Prussia. Alexander, who knew Talleyrand well, tried in a personal interview to intimidate or cajole his formidable antagonist. It was a dramatic conversation. The doctrine of legitimacy was a red rag to the Czar, who boldly declared that the interests of the Great Powers constituted the public law of Europe, and threatened war and the desertion of the Bourbon cause if he was not allowed to keep his coveted spoil. As Talleyrand was obstinate, he tried to bribe him by offering to support the French contentions with regard to Naples, but the French diplomatist was too wily to sacrifice a primary for a secondary interest. Unsuccessful in diplomacy, Alexander tried to confound his opponents by confronting them with accomplished facts. He handed over Saxony to the occupation of Prussian troops, and he sent his brother to Warsaw to proclaim the restoration of the Kingdom of Poland. The only result was to increase the alienation and the obstinacy of his opponents; and finally, on 3rd January 1815, a secret alliance was made between Austria, Britain, and France, by which they agreed to defend their common interests by armed force. Bavaria, Holland, Hanover, and Sardinia were willing to join the league. Talleyrand wrote in triumph to the French king: 'The coalition is dissolved; the isolation of France is at an end.'

The threatened rupture was averted. Convinced that the hostile forces were too strong for them, Russia and Prussia gave way. The King of Saxony was restored on condition that he should renounce the Grand-Duchy of Warsaw, and cede a considerable part of his kingdom to Prussia. Prussia recovered its old province of Posen in Poland, and the part of eastern Galicia which had been wrested from Austria in 1809 was now restored. The remainder of the Grand-Duchy, with the exception of Cracow, which was made a free and neutral city, was handed over to the Czar, with the title of King of Poland. These arrangements, practically settled in February, were embodied in the final act of the Congress.

Events proved that Talleyrand had gained a Pyrrhic victory. The news of the dissensions at Vienna, which he had so artfully fomented, reached Napoleon at Elba, and encouraged him to believe that his hour had come. His return to France, the rally to his cause of army and people, and the flight of the Bourbons constitute one of the most dramatic episodes of history. The foundations on which Talleyrand had built were utterly destroyed. He had acted as if he had been the Minister of a Louis XIV.: he was now the discredited Minister of a James II. The coalition against France, whose dissolution he had exultantly proclaimed, was reconstituted, and the Treaty of Paris was for the moment a dead-letter. But the Congress of Vienna continued its labours through the storm, and carried out its work with a precipitation which was in strong contrast with the slowness of its earlier proceedings. Various committees, consisting for the most part of minor and industrious diplomatists, adjusted the settlement of Italy, the constitution and composition of the Swiss Federation, the limits of the new kingdom of the Netherlands, the provision of a new and very unsatisfactory constitution for Germany, the distribution of German territories left of the Rhine, which gave to Prussia the guardianship of the western frontier, the condemnation of the slave-trade, and the regulation of the traffic on rivers running through separate states. The once thorny question of Naples had been settled by outside events. Murat, distrusting the willingness and the ability of Austria to protect him, had thrown in his lot with Napoleon, had been declared an outlaw, and had perished in an attempt to recover the kingdom from which he had been expelled. The Bourbon Ferdinand was restored. The final act, which embodied the decisions on all the questions before the Congress, and which left the question of the Turkish dominions in Europe severely alone, was signed on 9th June 1815. France, after Napoleon had been defeated and sent a prisoner to St Helena, had to submit to a new Treaty of Paris, by which its boundaries were reduced to those of 1789, and it was compelled to submit to the humiliation of being occupied for some years by foreign troops. The Bourbons came back 'in the baggage of the Allies,' and Talleyrand, who for some months had played so prominent a part as their agent, ceased to be a Minister of the Crown.

(4) When peace had at last been assured to Europe, the allied Powers were free to consider measures to ensure its permanence. Alexander proposed that they should pledge themselves to act together in brotherly affection in accordance with the precepts of the Christian religion. This mystical document, which was signed on 20th September 1815, constitutes the 'Holy Alliance.' But the more practical measure was the renewal, on the initiative of Metternich, of the league of Chaumont. By the 6th Article of the treaty which was signed on 20th November, the four Powers undertook to hold periodical meetings for the consideration of measures desirable to secure the tranquillity and the prosperity of peoples and to maintain the peace of Europe. In accordance with this agreement successive Congresses were held at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818 (when it was agreed to terminate the military occupation of France and to admit that country to the Quadruple Alliance), at Troppau and Laybach in 1820, and at Verona in 1822. The peace of Europe was not seriously threatened during these years, and the Congresses were mostly employed in securing the tranquillity and the prosperity of peoples by suppressing all attempts to gain constitutional liberties.

The reader may draw his own conclusions as to the bearing of the Vienna settlement upon present problems. But there are a few obvious points to which attention may be called. It is clear that, even if separate treaties were imposed upon Germany and her Allies, as the Treaty of Paris was imposed upon France in 1814, a Congress is necessary to settle such imperative questions as the relations and the boundaries of the Balkan states, the boundaries and the future government of Poland, the future of peoples possibly detached from Austria or from Turkey, the fate of Constantinople and the Straits, the evolution of order out of chaos in Russia, securities for the maintenance of peace and for the observance of international law, &c. It may be urged that all these problems should have been settled beforehand by the Allies. The answer is that this was impossible. No politician, however prescient, could be assured what the precise conditions would be when a settlement came to be made. Premature agreements were found in 1814 to hamper rather than to aid decision. And the attempt to solve such problems at the outset would destroy a coalition before its work was done. If it had been proposed to assign Poland to Russia or Saxony to Prussia before the Congress of Vienna, Napoleon would never have been defeated.

In 1814 defeated France sought to conciliate her enemies by deposing Napoleon and restoring the Bourbons. In 1918 defeated Germany sought to obtain better terms by getting rid of the Kaiser and by accepting a democratic Government. The first attempt to merely tinker the existing constitution of Germany has been abandoned with the retirement of Prince Max, and a national convention is proposed for the framing of a new constitution. This creates a difficulty which did not arise so acutely in 1814, as it delays the creation of a stable Government for the conclusion of peace. But the new Government, whatever it may be, will be associated with the humiliation of Germany, as the restored Bourbons were associated, however unfairly, with the humiliation of France. The Hohenzollerns may hope to have at least the chance which Napoleon had in the Hundred Days.

The place of the defeated Power in the future Congress is a matter of interest. The prejudice against France was extremely bitter when the diplomatists met at Vienna. The prejudice against Germany will certainly be no less when the Congress assembles at Versailles. A change of Government does not immediately absolve or whitewash a people. Yet Talleyrand was able, by fomenting dissensions among the Allies, to gain for France an active and effective voice in the settlement of vital questions. Germany has already shown her desire to play the same game, and it will be the task of the allied statesmen to frustrate her by maintaining that unity which has given them their present ascendancy.

Allusion has been made at the outset to the influence which a disinterested Power may exercise in a diplomatic conference. This is as true now as it was a century ago. The fact that the United States stands aloof from the distractions of Continental politics has given peculiar importance to American intervention, and is likely to give to President Wilson or his representatives a balancing and possibly a decisive voice in many post-war problems in the West.

There are two points which specially concern us. In the great French wars Britain was, as she is now, the supreme naval Power, and complaints were made then, as they have been now, both by belligerents and by neutrals, of the way in which we used our maritime ascendancy. The cry for the Freedom of the Seas was as familiar to our ancestors as it is to us. Yet at the Congress of Vienna no allusion was made to these intricate problems of international law. British maritime power had rendered such invaluable services to the allied cause that no member of the coalition was prepared to propose its curtailment, and France could not venture to do so. And in the Treaty of Paris, Britain restored to France almost all her conquered colonies except Tobago, Santa Lucia, and Mauritius, an act which Napoleon at St Helena described as quixotic. On these points it would be dangerous to prophesy from past history.

As to the Holy Alliance and the future League of Nations, the differences are so great that it is not possible to draw much guidance from any analysis of the past. The Holy Alliance is interesting as the first attempt to devise an inter-State control of separate States which in theory retained their independence. It achieved some measure of success so long as the original motives which inspired it, war-weariness and hostility to the French Revolution, remained in full force. It began to break down when international jealousies and divergent interests rendered the co-operation of the Great Powers difficult; and it broke down altogether when the revolution of 1830 gave France and Britain to the guidance of principles which were diametrically opposed to the cautious conservatism of the remaining reactionary Powers, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. The first great breach of the Vienna settlement was made when Belgium was severed from Holland. The aims and the composition of the League of Nations are not likely to resemble those of the Holy Alliance, and therefore its fate may be different. But it is clear that it will be easier to found such a league than to maintain it when circumstances and conditions are changed.

There is one final difference between the Congresses of the past and the future. The Congress of Vienna had no guiding principle: it would not accept the principle of nationality, which savoured of the French Revolution, and it was reluctant to accept to the full the more congenial principle of legitimacy which Talleyrand propounded. But the allied Powers in December 1916 pledged themselves to the principle of nationality, and this may furnish a useful (though not an infallible) guide through some of the tangles of post-war problems. It will not, however, in itself strengthen or cement a League of Nations, which must seek to correct the excesses of national aims and ambitions by supplying the check of international control.

THE END.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER IV.—WHAT WE TALKED ABOUT.

NO doubt our military dons believed that after drill we swotted Haking, Needham, Infantry Training, and Stonewall Jackson, not forgetting Notes from the Front, and all the pamphlets on soldiers' bunions, number nine pills, &c. We certainly did swot—when they were looking or moving around. But a cadet's day is a strenuous day. From 6 A.M. to 4 P.M. running, drilling, lectures, and physical jerks feed up the best of men, and we were glad to leave shop and gather together round the fire. There we unbared our souls, and made no bones about it. Army life is an open life, a much manlier life than even the public school. There's no beastly fagging, no 'bloods,' but a universal hate of the prig and the prude. War is a wonderful leveller. And at this school there was a regular mix-up of breeds and classes.

In my own hut there were many characters. Ginger Thomson, for example—the queer beggar who wouldn't wash. But he had the M.M., as well as the French Military Medal, and a brilliant record at Oxford. He entertained us when he dissected our professors, and it was good to see him cross swords with Billy Greens, the ex-parson. Greens hadn't the chest of a hen, but he was the Church militant. He was a plucky little devil, and if any man interfered with his evening devotions, Greens would get up and fight. Nobby Clarke was a howling Radical lawyer, inclined to argue the point; while Tosher Johnson was a Canadian cow-puncher. There were others, not forgetting Beefy Jones, the lustiest beggar who ever carried a gun. So, when gathered round, we were interesting. One night we discussed religion.

'Men can't be intellectual and godly, old chap,' declared Ginger. 'If you want us all to sing psalms and chant "Holy, Holy," you'll have to close the schools and breed us like heifers and hogs. To be a Rationalist, one need not be a morality-wrecker. Many unbelievers are clean—cleaner than those who attend communion on Sunday and commit perjury on Monday. Clean up the Church, and I'll be a parson.'

'How can we clean it up, when you're destroying any little good we can do?' exclaimed Billy Greens. 'We're not supermen—we're human. We can't perform miracles; and I'll tell you this, old chap, religion is a bulwark for the poor, the sick, and the blind. Destroy the Church, and you'll destroy the last shreds of public decency and restraint. Your doctrine will plunge us into the moral laxity of the Huns. We're fighting for God in this war, and that's why I'm in. I loathe the whole armour, but I won't throw it off till we rid the world of this canker and curse. This is a holy war.'

'Well, Billy, I'm giving you a hand, although my views are not your views. Personally, if all the padres were good fellows like you, I would cut out my doubting and inquiring brain, and become a sidesman in your parish church. Religion is all right; it's the average parson who is all wrong. Some are the fag-ends of humanity; others are ordained Don Juans; many are mercenary adventurers; and only a few are like you—real good men, who believe in what they preach. Hang it all, Billy! half of your parsons are not men; they're women in breeks. You're about the only man I've seen fit to be Archbishop of Canterbury. When I'm Premier, you'll get the job.'

'Hear, hear!' echoed the boys, for Billy Greens was a popular chap.

'Your flattery's well meant, Ginger, but I've no need of it. I can carry my own bat. You're not morally bad. Indeed, you're on a higher plane than many. But, for all that, your intellect makes you dangerous. And it's up to me to keep you in order. In this hut I'm the Church militant, and if you convert any of these boys to your doubting Rationalist creed, I'll take it out of your skin.'

'By Gad, Billy, I do like your pluck! You're a white man, if you are a parson. I'll be a real good boy,' murmured Ginger, who in his heart had a swelling love for the plucky little padre.

'I'll vote you in as a bishop too, when I get into Parliament,' interjected Nobby Clarke.

'Thanks, Nobby; but you're a rotten Radical. I've no use for your Mumbo-Jumbo trickery and Manchester morality. Your crowd is a mixed bunch of twisters and prudes. You sing the Auld Hundred on Sunday, and pull down the Established Church on Monday.'

'Good old Billy!' shouted Ginger.

'My dear old Pieface, your Church won't be any good till you get Disestablishment. As long as padres have got security of tenure, they won't work. They regard a living as an investment.

All you can get them to do is to play bowls, read Elinor Glyn, and drink whisky with the squires. They 're the enemies of freedom, Free Trade'——

'And Free Beer,' piped Beefy.

'Yes, they are political mandarins who want to keep the Old Country in chains. The Liberal Party will save all you High Brows from revolution and anarchy. Yet you won't thank us. You gobble the Morning Post, chew the Spectator, and lick the feet of Arthur Balfour. You Tories are a damned lot of nose-wipers and job-seekers. You haven't the stomach of a fly.'

'What about Haldane?' roared Beefy, who got his politics from the Daily Mail.

'Well—what about him?'

'The Daily Mail says his soul is in Germany.'

'If you read the Daily News you would find that it was his Expeditionary Force which landed in France in 1914, and his Territorial Force which warded off invasion. All your Tory Government did when in power was to change the design of Tommy's shirt-tail and hand out caps made in Germany. You 're great fellows for political swank and eyewash, but you haven't the brains of a hen. And even in your Tory Coalition Government you 've got to get Lloyd George to pull you through.'

'Nobby!' cried Ginger.

'What?'

'I 'm fighting your constituency at the next election. You 're a pest, a peril, and a blighter. And if the Boche doesn't kill you, I 'll smite you dead on the platform as soon as you whisper Free Trade. Free Trade will ruin the Empire. We 're going to have Protection, even if I 've got to lay you out on a shutter of the Daily News. And I 'll bribe the hooligans to smash up the printing-machines of the Manchester Guardian. You Radicals have got to be destroyed.'

'Gentlemen,' said Nobby, striking an oratorical pose, 'look at this unwashed pro-consul from Oxford. He 's really afraid of Advanced Liberals passing a Utopian measure that every citizen must be washed. And he, the product of culture, the flower of chivalry, the superman, would bribe the toughs to smash up the Manchester Guardian. Oh Ginger, thy name is Autocracy!'

'Yours is Democracy, and it 's a pretty rotten creed. You 're rushing us into a Republic, with a President in overalls, and Cabinet Ministers who drop their h's, and snore when they 're sucking their soup. You won't be happy till you see field-marshals as bus-conductors and admirals as A.B.'s. You 'll cut off the Colonies, and let us fizzle out as the inglorious scrap-heap of a once glorious old Empire. Nobby, you 're a politician and a public fraud.'

'Is he?' said Tosher Johnson, the Canadian.

We all looked up with a start. Tosher was a dark horse.

'Yes,' Ginger retorted with emphasis.

'Well, I guess Nobby's Free Trade is all bosh, but he 's a man of push and go. You 're too darned slow for a funeral over here. Your hoofs are sticking in the feudal mud. An earthquake 's the only thing to stop your browsing on Homer and chewing the rag about "form." This is the Dollar Age. Make good or go under. You wowsers from Oxford and Cambridge want your blinkers taken off. The classics cut no ice in this age. Homer, Socrates, and Plato won't sever the hamstrings of the Hun. When you were loafing around with Shakespeare, Tennyson, golf, tennis, and "Rugger," the Hun was dumping his goods in Canada and every bush town in the Empire. It makes me sick to hear all this gaw-damned talk in your papers. You 're a fine people, but you only crawl. You won't run. If you don't get a spark under your old machinery, this old scheme will peter out like Spain and Rome.'

'Rotten materialism,' shouted Ginger. 'Your philosophy is "guessing," your soul is "calculating," and you 're clean gone on "results." You 've been taught no history. Old things you don't know or understand. And when you land in the Old Country, you want to bring your commercial morality into the only decent Government in the world. You 're all jolly good fellows. Fine soldiers! Good citizens! But you 're dollar-mad, and have no bottom in your politics or finance. Smuts is a colonial, but he doesn't talk like you.'

'He was at Cambridge. Good old Cambridge!' shouted Beefy.

'Yes,' answered Ginger. 'Smuts is about the only man you 've produced at Cambridge. He refused to play the giddy goat, and put his nose down on the classics, logic, history, and law. That 's what you want, Johnson.'

'Not for me, old chicken. Homer never built the C.P.R., Shakespeare ain't a bit of use on a Calgary beef-ranch, and Darwin's theory won't milk a Holstein or a Jersey. A clear head, a strong back, and a good riding leg cut ice in these times. Business is business. And dollars keep up men and munitions. You ain't wise, Ginger.'

'Well, boys,' said I, butting in, 'we 've discussed everything from bishops to Free Trade and the classics, but we are getting muddled and fogged. This fellow Ginger from Oxford is paralysing our repartee and logic, and old Tosher wants to make the Old Land into a dollar-factory. It seems to me that the main issue raised by this howling Radical, Nobby Clarke, is whether we shall vote for Bolsheviks or Imperialists. I don't quite agree with high-browed Ginger, nor do I support all the materialism of Tosher. But the future is clearly a titanic contest between Republicanism and Imperialism. I move we put it to the vote.'

'Certainly,' shouted Ginger.
Result

Republicanism . . .	1	(Tosher)
Imperialism	23
Imperialist Majority . .	22

'Nobby!' shouted Tosher, after the vote.
'What?'
'You're a gaw-damned Tory, after all.'
'No—I'm a lawyer.'
Lights out!

(Continued on page 56.)

BAPTISM OF FIRE.

By R. P. Hughes.

'THIS,' said the C.O., indicating with a blunt forefinger a tiny red line on the map outspread upon the table, 'is the sap you will engage to-night.'

The line specified projected from another of similar hue, but slightly thicker, that ran undulating north and south across the surface of the map. Opposite this heavier line, one of blue followed an almost parallel course.

The crooked little projection on which the C.O.'s finger rested represented a German sap which for some nights past had been the occasion of considerable annoyance to the occupants of the British trench, shown by the blue line, across the way. Rifle-grenades and 'pine-apples' had a nasty habit of whizzing over at frequent and uncertain intervals. The harried officer in charge of that piece of trench finally lost his temper, and implored the powers above, almost with tears in his eyes, to turn the artillery on to the sap 'and blow the blasted place to pieces.' Artillery aid was accordingly invoked, and, in addition, the Stokes mortar battery received a chit from Brigade, detailing them to co-operate with one gun.

Stubbley, the junior sub. of the Stokes battery, gazed thoughtfully over his C.O.'s shoulder at the crooked red projection, and thence to a group of small black lozenge shapes set slightly in rear of the blue line, and designated by a facetious survey department 'Dirty Bucket Farm.'

'Just a nice distance from No. 1 emplacement,' he commented.

'Zero hour,' said the C.O., 'will be at 11.30. As soon as the artillery opens up, poop off for all you're worth. Let 'em have a "hurricane."'

Later in the day Stubbley made his way by devious communication-trenches to Dirty Bucket Farm—a sorry heap of red ruins, set in a wilderness of weeds and mud—and there examined with the utmost care a grim little gun squatting in the shelter of a low, crumbling wall, mounting guard, to all appearances, over a pyramid of gray cylindrical bombs at its side.

Stubbley whistled softly to himself as he made his inspection, testing elevating and traversing gears, squinting with puckered brows down the narrow barrel, and not overlooking the important base-cap. He was nineteen years old, had 'been out' one month, and was boyishly jubilant over the planning of this, his first independent 'shoot.' But for the absence of Thomas, his senior by one 'pip' in the battery, who had departed on an urgent visit to the field cashier, his chance might not have come so soon. Consequently he whistled at his task.

Before leaving the emplacement he applied an eye to a zigzag fissure in the low wall, and gazed across two hundred yards of solitary desolation at the broken sky-line of the German trenches.

'We'll make that sap look silly to-night,' he told himself cheerfully. . . . .

At a few minutes to eleven Stubbley and his gun-team arrived quietly at the scene of operations, blood-thirstily prepared 'to do the dirty on Fritz.' The night contributed ideal conditions to the enterprise, in that it was dark, clear, and windless. The men, stooping to their task of preparing the bombs for firing, conversed in whispers. Stubbley, standing a little apart, abstractedly watched the German Very lights as they curved gracefully through the sky towards the British lines. One would occasionally fall in the tall grass about the emplacement, and fizzle brightly for a few seconds. Then the men would pause in their operations, and remain crouching motionless till the glare died down. Standing upright they were in full view of the German trenches.

The leisurely sequence of the lights suggested to Stubbley either that the Boche mind was at peace with itself, or that he was secretly concocting some new devilment. Had he been at all 'jumpy,' or in the least suspicious of anything 'dirty' impending, hurried pyrotechnics and incessant bursts of fire would already have advertised the fact. But the night remained peaceful and still. Only once or twice in the distance did a solitary machine utter a querulous rat-tat. Overhead the stars shone with soft brilliance.

The minutes crept by sluggishly. From time to time Stubbley stirred impatiently, and he took constant glances at his watch. Once, when two flares fell in quick succession almost on top of the emplacement, he held his breath in an agony of suspense, fearing he and his team had been discovered. As the last few minutes ticked away he turned to stare expectantly into the darkness behind. Over his shoulder, in a low tone, he warned the team to 'stand by.' For five palpitating seconds he watched, motionless, and then a long line of flame leapt and flickered silently across the dark sky.

'Fire!'

The command issued like the crack of a pistol from Stubbley's lips. With a short, vicious bark and a quick, leaping spurt of fire, the first bomb left the barrel. Overhead, at the same moment, swept a roaring torrent of sound. The silence of the night was ripped to shreds, and a screaming avalanche of shells descended with blinding flashes on the Boche trench.

As far as the eye could see the western sky was red, and furiously throbbing. Like a shaken tapestry it flickered in a fantastic medley of light and shadow. It danced feverishly. Countless fierce thrusts of flame stabbed it again and again, and for each coruscation back there a vicious crimson splash winked and crackled in front over the Boche trenches. The interval between the two was filled by a swift, rending scream, which, multiplied by a thousand, and flowing without pause, made up the terrific pulsing roar which in England, on the morrow, would echo feebly as 'some slight artillery activity.' To-night the undiluted force of it went like wine to the heads of Stubbley's team. They yelled and sang at their work. For a time they seemed to go mad. In that fantastic, lurid light they had the aspect of demons, furiously toiling in a dusky corner of Hades. The jaunty little gun seemed to partake of the fever of its masters. It barked hoarsely, leapt excitedly on its straining base-plate, and spat forth bombs and fire indiscriminately. Then the lust of battle fell fiercely on the sergeant. He snatched the bombs from his Number 2 as if they were hotter than he could hold, and almost flung them into the barrel. He was chanting at the same time in an ecstatic sing-song, 'What a fine little lady! Won't she give 'em hell?' over and over again.

Stubbley's heart danced for sheer joy. He leant against the brick wall, watching with rapt eyes the swift succession of blood-red splashes that marked the bursting of his bombs on the Hun sap. To the rest of the battle he paid no conscious heed. The louder and more shattering percussion of heavy ordnance he ignored with the amiable contempt of the front-line man for all back-area folk. At intervals the explosions lit up swirling clouds of smoke that rolled like a fiery fog over the Boche trench. Then, all at once, Stubbley's trained ear, engaged, practically of its own volition, in distinguishing between and identifying the multifarious notes of the bombardment, from the vicious scream of the whiz-bang to the leisurely trundling of the fifteen-inch 'how.,' picked up a new, sinister note—a swift hissing and spitting in the air about him, that sent him headlong to his hands and knees. In that position he listened attentively for a moment with his head on one side, then peered from the frail shelter of the wall across to the Boche trench. To his amazement, in the heart of the coiling smoke and flame he discerned the stabbing flash of a machine-gun. He smiled grimly to himself. Over his shoulder he yelled an order to his sergeant, then turned again to watch the machine-gun intently, admiringly. The position its team had chosen was suicidal to a degree. Stubbley swore at them for 'stout idiots.' He was almost impelled to dash across and shake them individually by the hand for their intrepidity! Iron Cross men, every one, he thought.

In ten seconds his mortar was laid afresh. It commenced to bark with short, staccato reports. Upon the doomed machine-gun, heroically blazing away to the last, suddenly descended a hail of furiously exploding bombs. . . . .

'C'est la guerre,' reflected Stubbley philosophically, and turned again to his gun.

Green flares were now shooting up from the Hun line, calling frantically for the aid of artillery. The answer came, after a short interval, couched in furious terms of 'crump' and shrapnel, and thenceforth antiphonal thunder shook the skies. The medicine with which we had been plying the Boche was being savagely flung back at us, to the last dregs.

Dense clouds of smoke, mingled with acrid, choking fumes, rolled sullenly over our trenches, blotting out observation and imparting an air of hopeless confusion to the duel. Men in the front-line, cowering beneath the whistling iron blast, becoming suddenly apprehensive of an attack by Fritz in person, fired their rifles feverishly, and flung bombs into the wire in front. Stretcher-bearers, encumbered with their loads, groped blindly from point to point, and called down bitter curses on the artillery for 'starting the blasted business.'

In Dirty Bucket Farm Stubbley's men, bathed in perspiration, continued to pour a steady stream of bombs on to the devastated sap. Death swooped and hovered threateningly above them. Bullets, from a concealed machine-gun this time, whipped viciously through the air, missing heads miraculously by short inches. Geysers of dirt and stubble flung up by exploding shells showered incessantly down on them. Still, with a stubborn, profane disdain of everything but the needs of their gun, the team 'carried on,' working in a sort of cold fury.

Suddenly a man fell with a gasping cry as a white-hot shrapnel-bullet found its billet in his chest. Stubbley and another bore him hurriedly to one side; and a moment later the sergeant's voice, sounding like a thin echo above the roar of the bombardment, cried, 'All rounds fired, sir.'

Stubbley was endeavouring fumblingly to apply a field-dressing to the already dying man's breast. 'Dismount the gun,' he shouted back, 'and send some stretcher-bearers at the double.'

The bombardment was near an end and the shelling dying away fitfully when the stretcher-bearers came. They hurriedly lifted the limp form on to their stretcher, and staggered off down the smoke-choked trench, crouching low at exposed points to avoid flying shrapnel.

Stubbley's team had gone with their gun, and Stubbley set off alone after them. Portions of the communication-trench were blown to bits, and a sinister, foul odour rose in spots where recently had stood sad little wooden crosses. At short intervals Stubbley found himself compelled to climb out of the trench and proceed overland. All along the route he overtook straggling stretcher-parties bearing wounded to the dressing-stations.

'You 've had a lively time, eh?' said the C.O. when he arrived at the dug-out.

Stubbley made a weary gesture with his hands, and suddenly saw the colour of them. Being only a youngster at the game, he turned white and sank giddily into a chair. The C.O. poured out a stiff measure of whisky, and Stubbley gulped it down. He choked and shuddered as the fiery stuff bit his unaccustomed throat, and then said with a gasp, 'We 've had a hell of a time up there to-night.'

The C.O. lit a cigarette, and picked up the magazine he had just laid down. 'One soon gets used to that sort of thing,' he remarked coolly; 'you 'll come to look on it as more of a beastly nuisance than anything else presently. In the meanwhile, thank God you 've had your baptism so cheaply—and go to bed.'

Stubbley went to bed.

BLACKLISTED.

PART III.

I.

'AWAKE, señor; awake!' cried Pajarillo, and his voice had a confident ring. 'I have slept, but I have dreamed a good dream in a bad place. I was home in Barcelona, and from the glare of the streets I had stepped into the gloom of our grand old cathedral to say a prayer of thanks to San Pablo, my protector, in his chapel behind the apse. I had lit a candle before the image, and, as it burned, suddenly the flame shot upwards, a keen white shaft of fire that struck to the very roof. I watched in fear, and saw that the roof was burning, but I could not move. Then a glowing beam fell at my feet, and looking up, I saw the fire extinguished, and through the roof the moon sailing in heaven.'

'An odd dream, amigo. Would we were in the cathedral now!'

'With the blessing of God we shall be there ere many days. Strike a match, Señor Bruce.'

Before the match went out, the Catalan picked up their two straw hats from where they had rolled. Bruce heard him tearing the straw. 'Now,' said Pajarillo, 'take my knife, and get upon my shoulders. You are the smaller man. Cut away at the lid of our saucepan as hard as you can.'

'Cut through a solid oak floor with a sheath-knife!'

'Por Dios, if there were no better way, I would try that, ere I would die like a rat in a hole! But, by the blessing of the saints, we have both steel and fire. Oh, là-là! The good San Pablo shall have his candle! Quick! Climb!'

Understanding came to the Scot. Desperate as was the expedient, it gave new hope. 'You would have us burn our way out, Little Bird!'

'I would have us try. Step by step the pilgrim goes to Rome. Mount, and begin. Cut little chips and strips, till the knife bites well. Above all, do not snap the blade. When you tire, you shall carry me.'

Scrambling on his friend's broad shoulders, Bruce struck a match. The Catalan carried him to a point immediately beneath one of the iron clamps which held the floor, then bade him stand on his shoulders and steady himself by the wall as he worked. 'Keep the knife clear of the iron!' he warned.

In the inky darkness the Scotsman began hollowing out the timber above the iron as Pajarillo directed. It was fatiguing labour for a man who had not tasted food for many hours. After a while they changed parts, and so, taking turn and turn about, worked feverishly till exhaustion compelled a rest. By that time they had hollowed out two respectable scoops in the thick, though worm-eaten, timber—one horizontally above the iron claw, the other straight upwards through the floor, so far that its apex made a hole an inch or two in diameter. A match which they struck to inspect the result of their labours showed a goodly heap of chips and shavings on the floor of their prison.

'It will do,' pronounced Pajarillo. 'The timber is dry.'

They stretched their aching limbs on the ground, and smoked another cigarette.

'Now for San Pablo's candle!' said the Little Bird. 'First we will offer him our hats. Fill your pockets with chips. I will do likewise, and will mount first.'

Climbing up again, the Catalan inserted the strips of torn straw into the horizontal funnel, and applied a match. As the flame took hold he fed it with chips of wood, dodging from time to time the burning fragments as they fell. When they had burnt up all the wood in their pockets they refilled them, and Bruce took his turn as stoker. By now the fire had gained a grip of the thick, dry timbers of the floor, and the flames licked redly round the angle between the funnels and up the chimney formed by the upright one. A few minutes later the corner of the floor was unmistakably on fire above their heads. With the heat and the smoke beginning to trouble them, the two prisoners strove to confine the outbreak to the area round the hole. In this they succeeded beyond their hopes, the strong draught created by the little window in the upper chamber causing the flames to roar lustily up through the chimney, while leaving them comparatively cool below. Their principal danger was from the burning fragments that fell upon them as they worked.

Gradually the heat and the smoke increased. The hole burned larger and larger; but their throats parched and their breath came in pants as they hacked at the glowing rim. From time to time they flung themselves down on the floor to escape the fumes; but they dared not lie long, lest the whole mass of timber above them should ignite and bake them, like St Eulalia, in an oven.

At last, as they were lying face downward in the remotest part of their prison, a great slab of red-hot timber crashed to the ground, leaving the gap nearly a yard across.

'We must put it out!' gasped the Little Bird. 'Can you bear me?'

They kicked the blazing fragments from under the hole, and acrid smoke filled the pit. Bruce tottered towards the fire, and the Catalan, climbing on his shoulders, hacked wildly at the burning edges above him till the showering fragments drove them, choking, back. Again and again they returned half-fainting to the attack, but little by little the conflagration was being curbed. Nerved by desperation, they conquered at last, and, utterly prostrated by their frightful ordeal, flung themselves, scorched and gasping, on the ground.

A long time they lay there like dying men, while the air slowly freshened about them, and above them the charred wood slowly cooled. Then they staggered to their feet again, cut away the still glowing edges, and rested once more.

'It will be cool enough to try now,' said Bruce at last. 'Come, Little Bird.' The younger man's vitality had lasted the better, and it was he who now, though his limbs tottered under him, took his companion on his shoulders. Getting his arms and shoulders through the gap, the Little Bird dragged himself up. It was too far down for him to reach his friend, but stripping off some of his clothes, the Catalan made a rude rope, by means of which, despite his injured wrist, he hauled the young man up after him. They rested again ere making their way along the dark passage by which they had entered, only to find the door at the end fast locked.

'Ay de mi!' groaned Pajarillo, 'that villain did not mean us to escape. But it is an old lock, amigo. It should be reasonable.'

They flung their united weight upon the door. The rusted lock gave with a crash, and stumbling out into the blessed air, they ascended the worn stone steps to the garden, and found themselves face to face with the old gardener.

White to the lips, the old man stood back against the street wall, and stared as at an apparition. And indeed, haggard and grimed with their fighting of the fire, with torn and burned clothing, they were a sufficiently terrifying pair to emerge in the first paling of dawn from the heart of the ancient ruins.

Bruce went and took the old man by the arm. 'Señor gardener, where is that villain, your master?'

The hue of life came slowly back into the old man's face. 'Madre purísima!' he stammered. 'It is the caballeros of yesterday! Señor Marinero went by the night train for Madrid. I smelt fire, gentlemen, and came into the garden.'

'Señor Marinero has tried to murder us,' said Bruce. 'Get us out of this quickly, and say nothing to any one.'

'There is no one in the house except my wife, who is deaf, and my daughter, who answers the door, and she is asleep.'

'In that case, we will go first to the well, and wash and drink.'

As they crossed the garden Bruce outlined their night's experience, amid exclamations of sympathetic horror on the part of the old man. While they washed he brought them food, so that when they emerged later into the street their aspect was less calculated than it had been to arouse terror or suspicion. There was no train for the capital till nine o'clock, by which hour they had each purchased a much-needed new suit of clothes.

II.

On the slope of a wooded hill in the pleasant environs of Barcelona, a narrow gateway gives access from the road to a well-kept drive which, sweeping in wide curves through groves of oranges, citrons, and figs, leads to the white façade of a wealthy merchant's country seat. In a shady arbour, overlooking the rich plain, the distant city, and the blue sea beyond, an old man was sitting, with a girl of twenty summers at his side. The sunny garden around them was musical with the plash of fountains, and fragrant with the scent of flowers. It was Sunday, and a lifelong residence in the South had not changed the attitude of old Alan M'Allister to that day. In no single office or wharf of the many which his firm possessed throughout Spain was any business done on the first day of the week. A little Union-Jack hung over the arbour. A letter lay open on the old gentleman's knee—a letter from his only son, a captain in His Majesty's Navy. A proud light shone in the old eyes as he gazed out over the Mediterranean.

'Thank God, you have a brave man for your father, child,' he was saying. 'I won riches; but my son is winning honour. Eh, Flora, but this war makes an old fellow wish he were young!'

The fair-haired girl smiled. 'How many old gentlemen of seventy-five could say positively, grandad, that they had put eight German submarines out of action?'

Alan M'Allister shook his white head. 'My dear, I am only the cashier. It is that young dare-devil, Donald, who is delivering the goods—he and that queer smuggler friend of his.'

'I wonder where they are now,' said Flora. A far-away look came into her blue eyes.

'If I were to guess, I should say at Mérida. In a day or two they ought to be home.'

'Oh!' cried the girl. 'And you never told me!'

A trim maid crossed the lawn to them, bearing a card on a silver tray. 'A gentleman wishes to speak to you, señor, on very urgent business.'

M'Allister passed the card to his granddaughter. 'Who is it, Flora? Your eyes are young.'

The Scottish girl took the card and read: 'Hernando Marinero, Casa del Palacio, Mérida.' She glanced at her grandfather, but the wrinkled old face told nothing.

'Bring him here at once, Anita,' he ordered.

A minute later Von Festinghaus stood bowing before them

'You come from Mérida, señor! I—I do not think we have met before?'

The anxiety behind the controlled old voice was too obvious to escape the astute Teuton. He bowed again, and took the opportunity to steal an appraising glance at the girl. Her sudden pallor confirmed his theory. He gave himself the pleasure of playing a little further upon their emotions. 'From Mérida, señor. I found your business office closed, but the caretaker gave me your address, and I came immediately.'

'I understand your business is urgent, señor?'

'It is, alas! It is a business of life and death.'

Flora M'Allister sprang to her feet. 'Has anything happened to Señor Bruce?' she cried.

Franz von Festinghaus looked grave, but in his heart he triumphed. 'Señorita, I grieve to say that Señor Bruce's days are numbered.'

Alan M'Allister, too, was on his feet, clutching the back of his chair with his hands. 'What is this you tell us—Donald Bruce dying?'

'Alas, señor! To-day, perhaps, or it may be in two days, or even a week. But it appears that he has a report to make to you—a matter of such importance that, though he lies in my house, I could not persuade him to entrust me with it. If he could see you personally, it would, I think, relieve his mind.'

'And his companion—what of him?'

'His companion, unfortunately, is in prison. I do not profess to know the details of this matter, señor. I only know that Señor Bruce lies very near to death, and that I have taken him into my house.'

'But the trains!' cried the old merchant. 'Dios! The trains of this country will take two days to get me to my young friend. He may be dead by then.'

'Too true, señor. Yet, if you would condescend to make use of my automobile, which stands at your door, we should be there long before the railway could take us. It is a good machine, well found. On the way I could tell you all I know of this sad affair.'

The old man looked with troubled eyes at his granddaughter. 'Flora, I must go at once,' he said in English.

'Take me with you!' she pleaded. 'Oh, grandad!' A deep blush coloured her face, followed by deadly paleness.

'Go and get ready, child,' he said with great tenderness.—'Señor Marinero, in five minutes we will accompany you. Forgive me if I seem discourteous. This is a great blow—a very great blow!'

'I believe you, señor.' The German bowed with horrible irony. 'I will go and see that all is ready for you and the señorita.'

The trim maid-servant had left Señor Marinero in a cool apartment, and had set before him a box of the best cigars and a bottle of wine—one of the choicest wines of M'Ilroy, M'Ilroy, and M'Allister. She was returning to her quarters, when the bell summoned her again to the door. Another car had drawn up, and in the porch two men were standing—two haggard, travel-stained men, at whom Anita first looked askance, and then stood back with an exclamation. One of the men she knew, but, Dios, how he was changed!

'Señor Bruce!' she almost gasped.

'The master is at home?' demanded Bruce abruptly.

'Si, señor. But he is going out. A gentleman has called for him. His car is waiting, as you see.'

'What gentleman? Tell me, Anita; it is important.'

'A Señor Marinero.'

'Anita mia, I must see Señor M'Allister at once. At once, you understand! And Señor Marinero must not know of my seeing him. Take me to him!'

'To hear is to obey,' said Anita, with a curtsy in which was some mockery, for she was a favoured domestic, and not accustomed to this curt tone from one who was a frequent visitor to the house.

Before accompanying her Bruce spoke in a low voice to his companion. 'Little Bird, go back to the gates, and if that villain Festinghaus leaves before me, watch which way he goes. I will follow in our taxi and pick you up.'

III.

If Franz von Festinghaus had not allowed himself a few hours' rest after his long journey, before procuring the fine car which stood at the door, he would never have received the message which reached him as he was drinking his second glass of wine. He took it from Anita's silver tray, and tore it open with a queer misgiving. 'Señor M'Allister presents his compliments to Señor Marinero, and begs to state that important news just to hand removes the necessity for him to leave Barcelona at present. He hopes to have the pleasure of communicating with Señor Marinero at an early date.'

The German sprang to his feet. 'Is that all, girl?' he demanded angrily.

'Si, señor.'

Von Festinghaus stood staring a moment at the slip of paper, then strode from the room without a word. Anita followed him to the house door. 'Is there any message for my master, señor?'

'Only this,' said the German darkly; 'it is a proverb, my dear. The fox may know much, but the hunter must know more.' He sprang to the driving-seat of his powerful car, and glided away.

With a face ominous as thunder, and at a pace that boded ill for anything which might meet him, he drove towards the road gate. The drive narrowed in the last straight stretch before the gate, and as the German swept down this in full career a man stepped swiftly out from the shelter of some bushes—a gaunt old man with a grim, hawk-like face. The man's right arm jerked back over his shoulder, and Franz von Festinghaus caught the sudden gleam of a poised knife.

With wonderful quickness the German's right hand flew to his breast-pocket, his left hand still on the steering-wheel. Fifteen yards from the gate his revolver cracked out. It was all a matter of seconds; but so is life and death. His steering swerved ever so little from the straight as he aimed, and as the man with the knife sprang backwards, the great car crashed into the stone gate-post, and amid the shattered ruin Franz von Festinghaus lay still.

The Little Bird glanced swiftly up the drive, and saw that he was alone. The engine was still throbbing amid the wreck of stone and iron, and before returning his unthrown knife to its sheath, the Catalan drove its sharp point with all his force into the tire nearest to him. He was kneeling beside the dead man when the taxi in which he and Bruce had come to the house drew up, and the young Scot sprang out.

'There has been an accident, señor,' said Pajarillo calmly. 'One should drive slowly on such a narrow road. A tire bursts, one swerves —adios!' He threw up his hands with an expressive gesture.

The chauffeur of the taxi bent over the dead man. 'The caballero has broken his neck,' he announced. 'Santísima Virgen! It is enough to unnerve a man!'

'It is indeed,' said Bruce. 'You must go and report this matter to the authorities at once. On the way, stop and send a doctor. My friend and I will await your return.'

The man drove off, taking the corner by the broken gate with extreme caution.

'Stand in front of me a moment, Little Bird,' said Bruce. 'There may be papers in this rascal's pocket which may be more usefully examined at the Casa M'Allister than at the Capitanía General.' He ran quickly through the dead spy's pockets, tossed the revolver among the bushes, and straightening himself again, caught the Catalan regarding the German with a whimsical expression.

'What are you thinking of, Pablo mio?'

'I was thinking, señor,' said the smuggler philosopher, 'how blind is the chance which sways the balance of men's lives—how you and I, after a hundred adventures, stand safely here, looking down upon the place from which we started, and upon this man, who, two days ago, held us as good as dead. He hated us very heartily; but he was a clever worker in his own cause. It is my belief he would have died more happily with my knife in his throat than by this blind cuff of fate. It would have been more satisfactory both for him and for me.'

'It would have been more difficult to explain at the Capitanía General,' said Bruce grimly. 'Pablo, I believe you are a pagan!'

The smuggler crossed himself piously. 'God forbid!' he exclaimed. 'All the same, accidents are tragic things, Señor Bruce.'

'You will take a better view of them, Pablo, when your wife and family welcome you home this evening.'

'Hombre, and that is true enough!' exclaimed the Catalan. 'To think that for the moment I was forgetting them—my wife and family, who have been awaiting me so long! Ah! here comes the doctor.'

THE END.

LOVE-LIGHT.

Dusk and darkness, dawn and day,
My belovèd, what are they?

Dusk—the clouding of thine eyes,
Doubt, and tears of sad surprise.

Dark—the passing of their light,
Leaving me in starless night.

Dawn—those harbingers of heaven
Shrive the penitent forgiven.

Day—O life once more worth while—
The sunshine of thy trustful smile.

Dusk and darkness, dawn and day,
My belovèd, such are they.

FRED. W. BAYLISS.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE HEART OF THINGS.

By HENRY LEACH.

LONDON, Yesterday.

FOR each and all—or nearly all—this that opens now should surely be the happiest of all New Years, if events and hope and promise can make it so. Storm and darkness have passed away. A terrible oppression is lifted; an appalling fear has gone. Life comes back to the world. Great powers of evil have been crushed. Never in its history did humanity face the opening of a new year or the beginning of any period, never did it await the dawning of a day or of a season, with such a leaping hope as now. Every man and woman, and every child, feels this pulsing hope; over all the world it is the same. Nations have been destroying; now they are going back to work, and to work as never before. They are to build a new civilisation, a new world. It is now that they begin. The grand work of reconstruction starts. Plans are laid, schemes prepared, determinations are formulated; and so, it seems, by the greatest force of circumstances that ever was exerted, here we are at the New Year, making resolutions as of yore. For four winters past it was only the effort to victory that was resolved upon or could have been. Now it is different. So are men and women and their thoughts and conceptions, and in this solemn hour of peace and a new beginning, with a new security and an overwhelming promise that seem almost too good to be true, we may be sure they will not think and then resolve in the old and little way. Resolutions must be made to match the majesty of events. Once it was good enough to contemplate small reformations in personal life and its little systems; but there has been a gigantic smash, and now there has to be reconstruction. We hear and see everywhere the vowing and the planning of this reconstruction. It is the word of the hour. The whole world and its system have to be reconstructed; humanity begins again with the New Year. And the nations have made a resolution to do their new building well.

* * *

The individual for his part, as an item in the nation, has two resolutions that he must make. They are not chimerical or optional things, of no account, as such determinations for the assistance of the weaker-willed used once to be. They are urgent and imperative; they are associated with each other; and they must be carried to realisation, or the war and the victory will lose some of their value. In the first place, the individual, the citizen, is beginning his own life anew. It can hardly be the same as it was before in any case whatsoever, even though old occupations are continued or resumed. The pressure of exterior circumstances arising from the war is on every person who walks the earth. So at the beginning of this new time there has to be some adaptation, varying in its measure, and it will follow from this that there must be some personal reconstruction. One imagines that most persons have been contemplating it. The war has given them new and broader conceptions of life; they see more clearly and farther; and doubtless they have resolved that, so far as they can, they will of themselves and in themselves make of life a better thing. By so doing they will not only assist themselves, but, as citizens make a state, they will force on a special national reconstruction, a new system of thought and action and ideals which, without their personal resolve, would not be accomplished, because politics, which in some measure assisted the beginning of the war, were not killed in it, and because it is the fatal tendency of politics to continue in their old courses and become worse in them, unless the citizens by their own resolve make new national ideals and establish new influences. At the very moment of the arrival of peace the old politics reared their heads again, and in Great Britain, never so great, thoughts were turned to a parliamentary General Election. Now, such an election may have been necessary or it may not. That, it may be said, is a matter of opinion, and here no such matters are discussed; much less are sides taken in such controversy. But, supposing for argument's sake that the election was necessary, here at any rate was a sudden, startling, and surely ominous return to one of the littlenesses of the old life, for, as we all know, an election at its best is but an orgy of insincerity. Now, in the same week—the very week of the armistice, the stoppage of the war—that our people turned to their election, the French—who were surprised at us—were devoting much of their time and thought in their Senate and in their Chamber of Deputies, and everywhere outside Parliament, to considering and planning how they could best show and prove the gratitude that they felt to their soldiers who had won them this noble victory. That was the one thought that was uppermost in their minds, that seemed to fill them to the exclusion of almost all other thoughts. Here, with us, it was politics; with the French it was their brave, their splendid poilus, the saviours of their glorious country. If you examined the Paris newspapers of that week you would see that after the first exultation of victory, during the exultation even, thoughts were all of the poilus coming back victorious from the war, and of how Parliament and people might help them. The citizens were competing with one another to show their love and gratefulness. The municipal councils passed resolution upon resolution; they changed the names of streets in abundance, giving them new designations in honour of the soldiers. In the Chamber of Deputies new Bills, resolutions, and so forth were introduced to show that France at that moment was not, and never would be, forgetful of what she owed to her sons who fought and won. Provision in many ways was being made for them; our noble Ally felt that this was the first work to do in peace, and it must be well done. But we of Britain owe a debt, not smaller, to our own soldiers, not less worthy. And it is known, to our sorrow, that the soldiers back from the war before it was ended, with great suffering and handicap in life to bear for the sacrifice that they made for us, were not done by as they should have been. This is not the will of the people; it cannot be the intention of the Government; it comes about through the fault of system and of politics. However it may be, it is a most revolting thing that these soldiers of ours who made sacrifice were so neglected while an election was being arranged, though in France they were not neglected. Whatever the necessities of any election, surely the very first duty, supreme above all others, the safety of the State being assured, was the settlement of the debt we owe to the soldiers in so far as such a debt can ever be settled. Did we not, however inadequately, extol them in the war? Did we not so often say that there was no nobler death than death for country, that country might live on? We meant it indeed. But here at the first moment was a suggestion of insincerity, and we know that other nations make it a charge against us that we are insincere as a people. No doubt they are wrong, but they must not be given opportunities, and never was it so necessary that our consciences in a supreme matter should be clear.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

* * *

That charge of insincerity against the British people sometimes stung. This, the moment of the new beginning, the reconstruction, the resolution, is surely the time for the nation and the citizen to determine above all things that in all matters there shall be a new and a very great endeavour towards sincerity. If there must be a new resolution for the nation and for the individual, should not this be the one, for in itself it must be the greatest of resolutions, comprehensive of all others? It means that henceforth there shall be truth and reality, and nothing else; and if there are truth and reality, the grand aims of life cannot go far amiss. Have we not said all through the war, and with terrible justification, that now at last we were being taught the meaning of truth and reality as never before, and that new conceptions of life and effort were springing from them? The war exhibited truth; it won for truth. Yet how well we know what insincerities were woven with the splendid deeds and noble achievements all through its history! Perhaps it was inevitably so. War is a negation; it makes a maelstrom of gross materialism; it seems to promote one supreme necessity, and every expediency must be introduced to serve that necessity of victory. The expediency is everything, and the twin-sister of expediency is insincerity. Governments and peoples, leaders of great movements, all who control and influence, feel that they should do and say that which best serves the great interests of the hour. Conscience may be a little strained, but it is felt that here for plain expediency is the best excuse there could ever be. Some virtues may be assisted by war, but the advantage to humanity here compares sadly with the loss. Yet at the beginning, taken by surprise, forced as we were by all considerations of honour and circumstance against our will to participate in this war, it was almost universally declared that war was, after all, a good thing in some respects for people who had grown rich and careless, and that Britain needed some such tonic. In such declarations there was surely a little expediency, insincerity; and there had to be more of them during the four years when so often, with shocking insincerity, that noble word patriotism was so much exploited. Expediency insisted; in the poor and faltering systems of the world there seemed no help for it. But now we know the truth about war, and the peoples will make a great effort to abolish this loathsome thing. Try to recall the occasions during the struggle of the world in which any argument was formulated against the practice of war. They were few indeed. That was not the time for them; nothing could have been more inexpedient than any such contentions. The good or the bad of war had to be not more than mentioned, for the supreme consideration was that the war should be persisted in and won.

* * *

For a plain and arresting statement against the practice of war—which, remember, for all the Leagues of Nations, some insist is inevitable in the future—there was nothing in the last four years to surpass in candour and simple truth what was written upon the subject by Mr A. C. Benson in his delightful book, Father Payne. Here is a little volume which of itself for philosophy and ideals of life and conduct might be taken as the basis for a system of self-determination at the beginning of a new period. Some one had said to Father Payne that he believed it was good for a nation to have a war; that it united the people with the sense of a common purpose, it evoked self-sacrifice, and it made them turn to God. Then, in the course of a long and reasoned answer, the chief character of the volume stated most splendidly and with a courageous frankness the case against war and all its expediencies and insincerities. It is worth some fresh thinking now when the war has gone. The man who opened the discussion agreed, upon being questioned, that he meant that in spite of the loss of the best stock and the disintegration of families, and the hideous waste of time and money—subtracting all that—there was a balance of good to the survivors. Father Payne asked him if he were sure of this, and went on: 'How do you know? Would you feel the same if you yourself were turned out a helpless invalid for life with your occupation gone? Are you sure that you are not only expressing the feeling of relief in the community at having a danger over? Is it more than the sense of gratitude of a man who has not suffered unbearably, to the people who have died and suffered? The only evidence worth having is that of the real sufferers. Take the case of the people who have died. You can't get evidence from them. It is an assumption that they are content to have died. Is not the glory which surrounds them—and how short a time that lasts!—a human attempt to make consciences comfortable, and to relieve human doubts? The worst of that theory is that it makes so light of the worth of life; and, after all, a soldier's business is to kill and not be killed; while, generally speaking, the worst turn that a strong, healthy, and honest man can do to his country is to die prematurely. Of course, war has a great and instinctive prestige about it; are we not misled by that into accepting it as an inevitable business?' And then step by step a tremendous case is built up against this hideous thing. 'I don't agree,' says Father Payne, 'that it produces a noble temper all through. It does in many of the combatants; but there is nothing so characteristic at the outbreak of war as the amount of bullying that is done. Peaceful people are hooted at and shouted down; thousands of general convictions are overridden; the violent have it their own way; it seems to me to organise the unruly and obstreperous, and to force all gentler and more civilised natures into an unconvinced silence. Many of the people who do most for the happiness of the world can't face unpopularity. They are apt to think that there must be something wrong with themselves, something spiritless and abnormal, if they find themselves loathing the cruelties of which others seem to approve. I do not believe that war organises wholesome and sane opinion; I believe that it silences it. It is a time when base, heartless, cruel people can become heroes. It is true that it also gives serene, courageous, and calm people a great opportunity. But on the whole it is a bad time for sober, orderly, and peaceable people. . . . War seems to me the temporary triumph of the old bad past over the finer and more beautiful future. Do not let us be taken in by the romance of it. That is the childish view, that loves the sight and sound of the marching column and the stirring music.'

* * *

The people, each as individual, all as a nation, which, with all its faults, has been the greatest civilising, progressive, and uplifting influence that mankind has known, would do well to determine to think deeply upon the grand matters of fate and future with which they are so much involved. They did not, until recent years, realise to what extent they were the instruments of the unseen Force working out for them a mighty destiny, and through them adding a step towards some ultimate and far-off achievement of the most godly kind that we cannot imagine now. But the force, the future, the meaning, the mystery of it all made restless thoughts during the war in the minds of those who never before had disturbed themselves with any consideration or speculation upon what was not of the material moment. When death was spread over the earth; when love was lost, and sorrow and anguish abounded; when wickedness in many forms was rampant, hell was a grim reality, and life, uncertain, was scarce worth living save for something unknown, unimagined, but yet something that was set as an instinct in the heart and gave men and women faith and hope—in that time of a slow but vivid awakening stricken peoples looked at nights upon the firmament of stars, in the spring mornings upon the miracle of a budding flower, sometimes upon the innocence of a little child. They began to think for the first time in their existence—and to wonder. And little by little, without the teachings of priests or the learned, they began to construct some faint, vague image of reason in their own philosophy. Independence was conspicuous in this thought. Men and women felt weary of the methods of some old teachings; they sat and wondered and prayed in the great cathedrals of their own minds, and strove for some enlightenment; for if there were none, no hope, no promise, how pitiful were the earth and man, how meaningless and stupid must life be reckoned! We have all seen the phases through which what we call religion has passed in this fierce testing-time of war. In the early months the people turned in prayers to God. They went to the churches and the chapels, which were filled on Sundays. God was claimed for us. But yet did there not seem to be a littleness in some of those conceptions in those days, and a strange opportunism in the sudden piety? This phase of a not wholly sincere fervency passed; the war bore heavily on the people, then more severely; in body and soul the strain was felt, and some gave way to doubts as the hosts of hell swung along in their temporary triumph. It was wondered then, if the spirit of this darkness and destruction should indeed gain, what for philosophy and truth? And it seems that it was from this and the rejection of the Devil and despair, the proud instinct of man insisting fiercely—yes, fiercely—on hope and belief, that brought him to more hard thinking, to a certain rejection in many cases of the shams and shibboleths of modern forms. The world at war seemed to make to dwindle everything in life and beyond life as it had been thought of before; all conceptions had been too puny; the God of the universe and all beyond had in these casual or formal or political fancies been too small, too local, too much concerned with the small things of the minds of the people of earth. That was the mistake of the careless, unthinking people, madly pursuing their poor pleasures. The horrible, hurtful war at least expanded the imagination and excited the conception. If the supreme achievement of existence were only to be obtained by the faithful and exact performance of nice, but seemingly unimportant, details of ritual, or, again, if it should be that the truth was only to be sought in the coldest austerity of manner and surrounding—here we speak not of creeds and denominations—how about this thundering cannon-stricken world in which men in millions were wrested from all earthly happiness and called upon to die? Here were forces working greater than all those little forms. The imagination was enlarged. Vague as they were, some certainties were created in this personal study of philosophy and metaphysics. Some true sense of the infinite was formed. It came even to be realised that in terms of the universe and eternity this war was, after all, only a little thing. Perhaps somewhere in some circumstances it might not be remembered.

* * *

There is hardly a word in the English language, a plain word, which is oftener misapplied than the word 'universe.' Really it means the all of which the world is but a tiny and perhaps insignificant atom. It means the firmament, the things we see and do not see, the whole system of created things. Yet in an egoistic ignorance we make it a synonym for the earth alone, and in the midst of the war a bishop, who should have known better, spoke publicly of London being the worst place in the universe. Some might with reason protest that it is perhaps not the worst place even on earth, but not even a bishop is qualified to state that there is more evil in our London than could be discovered in Mars and Jupiter, for we know not what evil they harbour or do not. But that is the way, to think of earth as all, and then it follows that life and simple materialism are likewise looked upon as all. M. Anatole France, in one of his essays on literature, utters a striking thought. He had been considering a new volume by his compatriot, M. Maurice Barrès, entitled Le Jardin de Bérénice, and was perforce led to deep reflections on the grand and elementary problems of existence. And near the end he says that, sceptics and believers, we are all submitted inevitably to the same necessities, which are the necessities of existence. 'This very night,' he writes, 'one of the first pleasant nights of the year, at the finish of reading your book, my dear Barrès, I opened my window; I looked up at the stars which quivered in the sky, relieved of its winter mists. And the mystery of those sparkling unknowns troubled me once more and as grievously as ever, for I had just been reading what was not consoling. And I thought, perhaps life such as we see it and such as we conceive it down here, organic life, that of the beasts and of men, is only an accident quite peculiar to this little, insignificant world that we call the earth. Perhaps this most trifling planet has been spoiled, has gone bad, and all that we see and are is only the result of the malady which has corrupted this poor fruit. The sense of the universe wholly escapes us; maybe we are bacilli, vibrions in dread of the universal order. Perhaps. . . . But, as Martin, who was a wise man, said, "Let us cultivate our garden."' Looking about us, we observe the alarm of the Churches, who realise or admit the littleness of their own dogmas. They are anxious now, in some cases, for their own safety; the politics of religion are being recast; here again there is to be reconstruction. But men and women have been set thinking in their own way; and now, when beginning their own lives afresh, with the awful revelations of the war sweeping through their minds, the fleeting vision of the tremendous infinite that has flashed upon their souls, surely they cannot go forward in simple uncaring thoughtlessness as once they did, devoting the power of thought to small matters of machinery and materialism and paltry politics as if these things, great and necessary in themselves, were in themselves complete, instead of being small assistances to that progress of humanity which some day may achieve its Creator's aim. When the brave soldiers made their utmost sacrifices, when they were at the moment of the last agonies of their suffering, in the great hour of their glory, their thoughts, their conceptions, their realisations expanded infinitely beyond the earth and all its little works. In their last hour some sense of universe must have been upon them, however unthinking they may have been before; some determined grappling at a mystery which in some way was soon to be solved for them. 'Why?' The intensest pressure of the simplest interrogative was upon them then. 'Why?' What, they must have thought, were kings and emperors, wars and peace, happiness, as we know it, even? Could they have thought of politics and elections in any circumstances as being supreme affairs? Perhaps we must have elections, even politics; but would not these soldiers say, if they could speak again, that life is a mistake if in all its action and endeavour a wider, farther, greater view is not henceforth taken after the revelation of the war, after this immense gift of victory? But politics, Governments, will not of themselves take the grander view, move in the higher way. It is by individual thought and resolution that individual life, and so national life, may be rescued from all its littleness. Let, then, a people that has wrought well, and not without reward, resolve that in all things it will endeavour to be worthy of its victory.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER III.

THE wounded man drew a deep breath, and, my arm in his, we mounted the stairs to my quarters. Bolting the door, I put my queer guest into one of the arm-chairs in front of the fire. Then I turned up the light. I confess to having felt an irrational sense of disappointment, for the external man revealed was commonplace, with nothing to suggest midnight adventure: a man of medium height, slight in build, his sandy hair and thick, untidy, reddish stubble framing very ordinary features. He looked a city-bred type; dozens of his kind could be met in a quarter of an hour's walk. His clothes were of the variety known to the economical and the impecunious as 'reach-me-downs,' clean enough, but on the border-line of shabbiness.

Clasping and unclasping his hands, he drew another long breath as he looked round the room. I noticed that his hands were delicate and well shaped, though his nails were grimy. He was still looking white about the gills, so I mixed him a strong whisky-and-soda, which he swallowed in a couple of gulps. Then he sat back in his chair, a patch of colour stealing into his pale cheeks. He touched his shoulder gingerly, and on my suggestion pulled off his jacket. He had been stabbed in the shoulder; but although he was still bleeding a little, the wound was only a surface one. Sponge and water showed me that it was not serious. To give him a little time to collect his wits and get his bearings, I filled and lit my pipe leisurely. Then I asked him, 'Well, what is it all about, my friend?'

'I—I don't know, sir—at least, in a way of speakin', I do'——

'Up to the point where I picked you up and carried you off the street.'

'Aye! I'm a bit dizzy yet wi' the knock I got, but I'll begin to pick up the ends o' the business in a minute or two, I think.'

'Begin at the beginning,' I said. 'I call myself a lawyer. Short of law-breaking, I shall treat what you say as between ourselves, and possibly I may be of use to you.'

'Well, sir, you've dune me a kindness, but there's no very much to tell, and what there is, is no exac'ly to my credit; but ye can judge for yoursel'.'

He was a shipping-clerk employed by Neilsons of Leith, he began, in a high-pitched common voice. His name was James M'Nair, and he lived in bachelor lodgings near one of the Bridges, in a street the name of which I forget. He had been working late in the office in Leith, till about nine o'clock, in connection with the unloading of a steamer called the Prospero. Afterwards he had gone to a picture-house, where he met, for the first time, a second mate on a Baltic tramp. The two 'forgathered,' and he took the mate to the Prospero, where the steward regaled them with Danish corn-brandy and cigars. When he left the ship some time after eleven, the last car had gone; but he took the opportunity of hiring a four-wheeler which had arrived with one of the Prospero's engineers from Edinburgh. The fog thickened, and after half-an-hour's crawl the cabman refused to go farther. M'Nair decided to make for home on foot. He had groped his way up Leith Walk until, he thought, he must have been close to the junction at Picardy Place. There he almost ran into a man, who passed some remark about the vile weather and asked him for a light. M'Nair took out his match-box and struck a light, and in its momentary glare saw the faces of two men. He didn't like their looks.

'Thought they were Dagoes. At any rate, they didna look like Breetishers,' he said. But he showed no signs of alarm, and, with a remark about the fog, went on, quickening his pace, however, as he could not shake off an uneasy feeling that he was being followed. Once he stopped dead to listen, and thought that he heard footsteps come to a sudden halt.

'I started off again,' he continued, 'but my nerves broke, and I began to trot, and then fairly ran for't until I was clean dune.'

'When you slowed down near here.'

'Aye! Then I heard a whustle, and a man—like as no, one o' the men I met, but I dinna ken—closed wi' me. I jumped back, but he was quicker 'n me, an' afore ye could wink he had knifed me.' He fingered his shoulder again. 'My God! I was lucky, eh? I was mortal feared, but the sting o't roused me, and I let drive wi' my foot. He tripped and fell, and off I went again at random until I dropped.'

'Then I cut in.'

'Aye; and here I am, sir, thanks to you.'

'Why didn't you shout for the police?'

'At first, when I started to run, there was nothing to tell the polis. I was ashamed o' my fears, and I just ran and ran. This last business o' the knife was so sudden that it knocked me silly like. What beats me is to put a name to the business! If they were thieves, they maun have been gey hard up, for I'm no exac'ly like a Carnegie. . . . But did ye—did ye see anybody?'

'The face of a man watching us. He looked round the street door after I carried you into the passage, and vanished when I went to the door.'

Some colour had been coming into his face, but at my words a slow pallor crept over it. The man's nerves were in rags.

'Ye 'll no turn me oot, sir?' he said, almost abjectly.

I would not have turned a dog out in that night, let alone a terrified weakling, and I was curious to hear more of his story, for I had a suspicion that he was keeping something back from me.

'You are safe enough if you can make shift here until daylight.'

At my words a vast relief showed in his face. 'It 's kindly of you, sir, to a stranger. I 'll be no trouble to you.'

'But, first of all, I want to know what you meant by saying, when you were coming out of your swoon, "Have they got it?" Who are "they," and what is "it"?'

He stared at me for a little, plainly puzzled. Then his face cleared. 'I was thinkin' that a' the siller I had in the worl' was in my pocket. That must ha' been what I was at. I ken o' naething else. Ye maybe never kenned what it is to have only a poun' or two atween you and "the beach."' Little he knew!

He plunged a hand into his inside pocket, and, with a gulp of manifest relief, drew out a shabby purse, which he opened. 'All safe,' he said, fingering some one-pound notes. 'No that there are mony o' them. I was mair ta'en up wi' thinkin' o' the danger o' my life than my siller. I never was in sic' a deil's business before.' I was watching him closely. He caught my eye, and suddenly rose to his feet. 'Good God, sir! Ye surely—ye dinna think that I have been in ony mischief—or that—that I have onything that—that—doesna belong to me.'

'I have not said so.'

'No, but—— Well, it 's fair and due to you to put myself right. I 'll tell ye what I 'll do. I 'll leave everything in my possession wi' ye, in case o' ony trouble afterwards. But I 've nothing o' value except twa'ree poun' notes. Ye can hold them all until ye 're satisfied that I 'm an honest man.'

'I express no opinion. But your offer is fair. Suppose you turn out your pockets.'

'That I will,' he said without a moment's hesitation, and produced the purse first. It contained four one-pound notes and two florins. Next came an evening paper, a small ready-reckoner, a cheap gun-metal watch, a pocket-book, and a pipe, a tobacco-pouch, and a match-box. These made up the sum of his possessions. He smiled whimsically as he laid them on my table.

'That 's the lot, except the claes I stand in,' quoth he. 'There 's just one thing I 'm concerned wi', and that is no to lose my job,' he said earnestly; 'an' I tell ye, sir, I honestly think, somehow 'rither, that thae gentry mistook me for somebody else. I 'm no worth knifin'. But if ye send my things to the polis, they 'll come aboot the office, an' I 'll be ill put to it wi' the guv'nors. It 'll no be very pleasant.'

Sympathy with the under dog compelled me to explain that, while keeping a judicial mind on the whole business, I did not intend to consult the police, but that, as he suggested, I should retain his belongings for a day or two in case of developments. The fact is that I was now rather bored with the whole affair, and had come to the conclusion that the man was a harmless nonentity, who, out too late, had been tackled by some night-birds, not above such small deer.

After thanking me most cordially, M'Nair confided that he had a friend in 'the polis' whom he proposed to consult regarding the assault, and who might help him without unnecessary publicity. But he had little hopes of the ruffians being traced.

It was now after one o'clock, and, without more ado, I placed the articles belonging to my scared-looking guest in a small portable cabinet, locked it, and took it into my bedroom. I put some coals on the fire, and gave the man a couple of rugs. Then I told him to make himself as comfortable as he could on the sofa until morning, and lay down in my own room half-undressed to turn and toss until half-past five, when I gave up hope of sleep and got up.

When I opened my bedroom door, M'Nair was sitting in the arm-chair. I turned on the light, and was struck by the man's white and drawn face. Plainly, the poor devil had not closed an eye.

'You look done up,' I said. 'Lie down for an hour or two. There 's no great hurry.'

But he had to get home before he went to his work, so he protested. He would get a 'brush up' and some breakfast at his lodgings. I had been very good to him, he said. Did I think there might be any danger from 'yon fellies' in the street?

'Most improbable that the blackguards would be fools enough to prowl round here and risk being caught; but I'll let you out by a back entrance to another street, and I'll go part of the way with you. Your stuff is locked up in the cabinet in my bedroom, and if you drop me a post-card to this address'—I gave him my card—'I'll be here to hand them over. I shall be interested to see you again, and to hear if you have anything to report.'

He wrote his own address in a slovenly hand on a slip of paper, and laid it on the chimneypiece.

CHAPTER IV.

ALL was quiet when we descended the stairs and slipped out by the back-door. It was nearly six o'clock, and a very dark, cheerless morning; but the fog had lifted, and the lamps picked out the lines of the streets. I piloted my guest along a narrow Mews Lane (which I had often used as a short cut eastward) to its junction with a thoroughfare parallel to Jura Street. We saw nobody, and, except for the rumble of a city dust-cart going its round in the distance, not a sound was to be heard.

'I ken where I am now,' said the adventure-ridden clerk, 'and I'll make for hame. I can tell ye I'll steer clear o' foggy nights and late hours after this. Just keep my bits o' things as long as ye like, sir; but I'll no forget your kindness, and I'll come back and see ye wi' any news I may have.'

He reiterated his thanks, shook hands with a respectful heartiness, and after giving a look up and down, set off at a smart pace in the middle of the street. In a moment or two he had disappeared in the half-light. I walked quickly back to my rooms yawning my head off, went to bed, and slept for a couple of hours.

With my after-breakfast pipe came clarifying reflections. Had I helped a deserving fellow-creature or a rascal? His story was coherent, and given without either glibness or hesitation. His 'douce' Lowland accent, his clothes, his little servile mannerisms seemed to me to proclaim him to be a harmless counting-house subordinate. He had probably been tracked by some of the scum of the port for the sake of his few shillings.

Yet I was haunted by his eager, whispered question, 'Have they got it?' and the manifest anxiety in his eyes when he asked it. More than once I found myself, like Paul Demetrius in The Red Lamp, murmuring, 'I wonder!'

I had taken only a cursory look at the man's belongings, but now I unlocked my cabinet, took out the odds and ends which he had left with me, and made a thorough examination of them. With the exception of the purse and its contents, they were worthless trifles. The paper was an Evening Dispatch of the previous day, unmarked in any way. I looked in the well-thumbed ready-reckoner for its owner's name, but there was no writing of any kind on it except a few pencilled jottings of figures on the title-page, faint and nearly illegible.

There remained the pocket-book. It was an ordinary cheap article, well worn, with a limp elastic band round it. It had a couple of pockets and a postage-stamp case. In the pockets I found two cigarettes, and nothing at all in the stamp-case.

I lifted the cigarettes, and was turning them round idly to find out the brand, when it struck me that one of them was unusually well packed, and heavier than the other. On examining the ends I found the outer casing was about the thickness of a paper mouthpiece such as one sees attached to Russian cigarettes. Having stuck a pin into the tobacco at one end, I felt its point touch something hard. The same thing happened when I tried the other end. To pick out the layers of tobacco was an easy matter, and when I pushed a pen-holder gently through the casing, a little brown cylinder slipped out into my hand. The shadow of a doubt arose regarding the ingenuousness of my new acquaintance.

The cylinder was a neat little roll, not much thicker than a good-sized quill. It was tightly packed, and when unrolled proved to be in two parts—one an outer covering of rice-paper, and the other a little roll of torn, stained paper, the right-hand margin and the foot of it straight, the left side zigzag. It was covered with writing, so small that I had to use a magnifying-glass to read it. Although the writing was cramped, it had been set down with scrupulous care and neatness. But it was unintelligible.

There were about a dozen lines of writing. The letters were strung together without being divided into words, and there was no sign of punctuation. I was able to pick out some letters which appeared to form English words, but most of the writing was a meaningless jumble. However, I traced, among others, the words 'drove,' 'belief,' and 'track;' and the last line interested me, for it ran thus: 'ossahumiliata †.' Plainly this was meant for two words, 'ossa humiliata.' The use of Latin and the little Roman cross at the end of the document struck me as curious. 'Ossa humiliata' were words which I had read or heard somewhere, I was sure, but I could not remember the source. It was now about half-past ten, later than my usual hour for putting in an appearance at the Parliament House. I postponed a further examination of the paper, and carefully replaced it in its hiding-place in the bogus cigarette, which I put back in the pocket-book. The companion cigarette was a real one, containing nothing but cheap tobacco. This I also replaced, and having locked the cabinet, went out, to find that the fog had left behind it a chill and depressing drizzle of rain.

The Parliament House that morning was as dull as the sky outside. The big fireplaces in the hall, for a wonder, claimed nobody except two prize bores, and after an arid five minutes with them, I fled to the reading-room and entrenched myself behind a newspaper. Almost the first thing that caught my eye was a paragraph headed, 'Tragedy in the City.' Boiled down from its journalese, the substance of it was that a dead man, supposed to be a foreign sailor, had been found early in the morning in an 'entry' in Durham Place, an obscure alley about three-quarters of a mile from Jura Street. He had been stabbed to the heart, and when his body was discovered, had probably been dead for two or three hours. The police were investigating the crime, and the account concluded with the illuminating flash of journalistic inspiration that it was evident the murder had been committed under cover of the dense fog. I laid down the paper, my thoughts back to the events of the previous night. Recalling the man's flight, his wound, and the discovery of the bogus cigarette and its contents, a sudden thought struck me. I went to the telephone and rang up Neilsons of Leith, the firm with whom the man M'Nair had said he was employed. I knew one of the partners slightly. He was in, and answered my call.

'Does the firm employ a clerk named M'Nair?' I asked.

He did not think so, but he would find out.

Presently, 'No!' came the answer.

Had there been a steamer of theirs called the Prospero discharging last night at Leith?

No! They neither owned nor had chartered a ship of that name. What was I getting at?

I answered that it was a matter of little consequence, purely a personal affair; and after exchanging British growls at the weather with him, I rang off, thoroughly and painfully conscious that I had been playing the Good Samaritan to a fluent and competent liar, if not something a thousand degrees worse!

I hurried out, and in a few minutes was at the police-office, where I was closeted with the authorities, and gave them a full statement of my experiences of the previous night.

'We should like to have a look at the man's belongings left with you,' said the Chief, 'and it will save time if an inspector goes to Jura Street with you, and brings them back here.'

To this I, of course, agreed, and a taxi soon set us down in Jura Street. I brought the cabinet out of my bedroom, took it to the window beside which the inspector was standing, and unlocked it. To my astonishment, it was empty. I stared blankly at him.

'I swear that I put the things into the cabinet with my own hands, and locked it,' I at length exclaimed.

(Continued on page 70.)

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER V.—A CANADIAN NEWSPAPER.

ONE evening I was seeking for something to read, when my eye lighted on a strange-looking newspaper with American sort of headings. I picked it up. It was The Shack Valley Times, a typical Canadian production, bright, brief, personal, and amusing. I got all the milk records of the Dominion, the price of wheat, the names of the mayor's last set of twins, and an obituary notice of a famous racehorse. Good, I thought, turning over the page. Lo and behold! there was a huge photo of Tosher and a full-page heading:

'SHACK VALLEY'S NEW NAPOLEON,
TOSHER JOHNSON, THE MAN-EATER,
GOES TO SCHOOL FOR FIELD-MARSHALS.
SPECIAL INTERVIEW.'

'The boys and girls in Shack Valley,' ran the editorial introduction, 'will be real glad to know that Tosher Johnson of this city is making good. When he left here in 1915 he said he was out to win the war. Since then he has been collecting scalps on the Western Front. He has sloshed no less than twenty Germans, and his name is famous from Boulogne to Verdun.

'Our correspondent, Jim Penman, at present with the Canadian Forces, was fortunate enough to secure a special interview with our gallant townsman, who thus unbosomed himself: "Tell the boys of Shack Valley that I'm pushin' real hard in the fireworks business. It isn't all beer and dollars out here. It's all mud and death by instalments. Since leavin' home I've lost my false teeth, two stones off my corporation, and my Sunday-school character. They've turned me into a white-tusked Khalifa, bent on canning Huns and catchin' curios for the Shack Valley girls.

'"All the married men of Shack Valley who want to get quit of their wives ought to book right here. There's free passes up to the Sudden Death Establishment, and a photo-man to take your chivvy when you're passin' in your checks. I've had my pants blown clean away to Berlin, my sittin'-down place peppered with shrapnel; the beef of my legs is lyin' up in Bapaume; and there's blood from my nose around La Bassée. I've been choked with the Kaiser's lavatory gas, and got chucked to heaven one night along with a horse and an automobile. Oh my, I did want to go home!

'"Still, it ain't bad! I was made a lance-corporal for rescuin' the captain's bottle of whisky under a bombardment, and a full corporal for collarin' three pimple-headed Huns who came over to ask me the time. Why, I'm just real good at the butcherin' business. I've got a jab-knife and a bludgeon dotted with nails. When I'm bored stiff I hops over, clubs a few German waiters on the top-knot, and brings back the latest news from the Crown Prince's doss-house behind the line. Talk about pictures! Why, this is the best picture-show out of Toronto.

'"Oh, you can tell the boys they've given me the Military Medal for doin' a little job on a dark night. It was dirty work at the cross-roads. A fight for a hole—a shell-hole. They wanted it, and we wanted it. So we staked our pitch and said, 'Come on.' I cut a pound o' steak out o' a German lootenant, and made three widows in Potsdam. Had to be done! No Shack Valley boy's goin' to lie down to them fellows. Oh, it's a hellifa life!

'"Now I'm in a school for officers. They reckon Tosher is push-and-go stuff, and want to rig me out as a big gun in the fightin' business. I ain't at all keen, for you've got to be respectable, and when you're wearin' one pip, you're barred from askin' a lady, 'Is this the way to Bond Street?' There's a real first-class crowd here—remittance men, cow-punchers, log-rollers, grafters, and let-me-downs, not forgettin' sky-pilots and kids from school. But they're bright boys, and can jaw on anything from eugenics to corn cure. Why, it's just good to think o' the stuff that wants the King's commission. Some are all 'side,' and some need it. And they're all gaw-damn Tories, except one, and he's a lawyer. (I'm watchin' this fellow.)

'"They're teachin' me how to eat sardines without usin' a knife, and how to chew an orange without splashin' my dial. And you can bet your boots they show me how to do the big salaams to the Great Boss. It's a wonderful business! When I get back I'll know how to wipe my feet on the mayor's mat. They call it 'form,' and they think we wild fellows from Shack Valley are the ruddiest lot of gum-chewin' hobos that ever wore an army shirt and climbed up a gun. But I'm givin' them hot stuff, an' teachin' them that we from out West ain't one-eyed chicks from lop-brained Alabama.

'"Still, it ain't a bad institooshun, and the girls round here are prime. I can get a kiss for a maple-leaf, and a wife by givin' a nod.

'"Oh boys, it's a hellifa fine war! Give Laurier a miss and come right over. The way to heaven's cheap, and all funeral expenses paid.

'"Besides, the beer's real good."'

(Continued on page 78.)

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS.

FERRO-CONCRETE SHIPBUILDING.

SINCE the above subject was alluded to here in February last further developments have taken place. The six-hundred-ton ship then referred to, the Namsen Fjord, has completed a round voyage between Christiania and the British Isles, which involved a trip of about two thousand miles, owing to the roundabout route followed for the sake of safety. At Moss, in Norway, where this vessel was built, another ship of four thousand tons was then nearing completion, while four more of from one thousand to one thousand six hundred tons were in course of construction. Other work in hand includes two floating-docks in ferro-concrete capable of lifting vessels of seven thousand tons displacement. Progress in ferro-concrete shipbuilding is also being made in the United States of America, and a reproduction from a photograph showing a ferro-concrete ship of five thousand tons in course of construction at San Francisco recently appeared in a science paper. It is interesting to note that the cost of this vessel is estimated at slightly over one-third of that of a steel ship of similar dimensions.

A NEW FORM OF DOOR.

Owing to its obvious advantages, what is known as the 'service' door, which has been applied to the rooms of the newest and largest hotel in New York, is likely to become popular for hotels, if not for private houses, all over the world. The door itself, so far as the outside frame is concerned, differs little from one of the ordinary pattern, and may be opened and closed in the usual way. Within the frame, however, is a cupboard formed by inside and outside doors, which are curved outwards so as to give greater depth to the interior space. When the occupant of a room with a service door wishes to have his boots polished or his clothes pressed, he merely opens the inner door, places them in this space, and communicates with the hotel office by telephone, when the attendant opens the outer door, and removes them from the other side. The process, of course, is reversed when the articles are returned, except that the necessary signal is given to the guest by pushing a button instead of through the telephone. The arrangement ensures absolute privacy, as the inside and outside doors of the cupboard are so interlocked that it is impossible to open both at the same time. In these days, when houses and flats are often left unattended, owing to the cost and the scarcity of servants, service cupboards in outside doors should prove invaluable, as, if tradesmen were supplied with keys for the external doors, parcels could be left in security, although at the moment the house or the flat was unoccupied. The service door, it may be added, is the invention of Mr Franklin J. Matchette.

COTTON CHARGE-BAGS FOR HEAVY GUNS.

Germany is the only country that uses cartridges for guns of more than six-inch calibre, the shell and the charge for impelling it being put into the breach separately in the heavy ordnance of other nations. The cordite, or whatever explosive is used for the impelling charge, must be put up in containers made of material that will be completely consumed when the gun is fired, as any smouldering substances left over might prematurely explode the next charge. Until recently silk bags have been used exclusively to contain the impelling charge, and this material has proved entirely satisfactory. It is, however, very costly compared with other textiles, while there has been a shortage in all countries owing to the war. These conditions have led the war authorities of the United States to carry out a series of experiments with a view to the use of chemically treated cotton, and so successful have these proved that it has been determined to prosecute them on a larger scale. If permanent success is achieved, the economy effected will be very considerable.

UNPUNCTURABLE TIRES FOR BICYCLES.

There are few cyclists who, when compelled to execute repairs to inner tubes by the road-side, have not longed for unpuncturable tires. This desideratum now seems to have become an accomplished fact in Sweden, where the shortage of rubber has caused great efforts to be made to find a satisfactory substitute for the pneumatic tire. The new device consists of a thin strip of hardened steel supported on the rim by springs, the combination being said to give results comparable with those obtained by the use of rubber. Skidding is prevented by the sharp edge of the steel tread, while such tires are, of course, quite unpuncturable. Whether the new device will survive when rubber again becomes plentiful is perhaps doubtful, but as a war-time measure it has proved very useful. The cost per tire is about seventeen shillings, which could, no doubt, be greatly reduced under normal conditions.

SAFETY-NETS FOR WORKMEN.

Hitherto no protection has been considered necessary in this country for the workmen engaged upon the construction of high buildings, and it has remained for California, where human life was thought to be less valued than over here, to lead the way in legislation for the lessening of risks to those who build lofty structures. In future, where the provision of temporary planked floors is impracticable, safety-nets are to be provided below the workmen employed in the construction of high buildings. This plan has been recommended by the Safety Department of the State Industrial Accident Commission. Half-inch Manila rope is used for the nets, which have a mesh of four inches each way, while the borders are of three-quarter-inch rope. The nets are made up in sections measuring thirty feet by ten feet, and the borders are provided at intervals with loops for joining them together. The cost is said to be almost negligible.

VERSATILITY OF THE AEROPLANE.

The uses to which aeroplanes can be put are constantly extending, one of the latest having been the conveyance of X-ray apparatus and operators to various points near the fighting-lines. A 'radiological aeroplane' or an 'Aerochir,' as the new machine is called, was described recently before the Academy of Medicine of Paris by Drs Nemirowski and Tilmant. In addition to the pilot, accommodation is provided for a surgeon and a radiographer; while the fuselage is fitted with a Röntgen-ray generator, an operating-table, instruments, and the necessary accessories. Another purpose for which aeroplanes were being employed before the end of the war was the evacuation of the wounded. A comparatively small machine for this purpose was described in these notes for March 1918. Later efforts in this direction included the fitting up of a Caproni aeroplane for carrying ten to twelve stretcher cases.

A NEW FERTILISER.

Fertilisers will form one of the most pressing needs of the world in future, unless new discoveries put an end to the present shortage. Hence the manufacture in Italy of a substance known as 'tetraphosphate,' of which the fertilising qualities are said to equal those of superphosphate, is of particular interest. The process of manufacture is a simple one, the natural phosphate rock being ground to powder, and roasted in a furnace for several hours at a temperature of from six hundred to eight hundred degrees centigrade. Before being roasted, however, the ground rock is mixed with 6 per cent. of a reactive agent consisting of equal parts of calcium, sodium, and magnesium carbonate, with a small proportion of sodium sulphate. After leaving the furnace the product is hydrated by cold water, and subsequently cooled. The resulting concentrate contains 15 to 21 per cent. of phosphoric acid, and is reduced in strength for practical use by the addition of sand or dry earth. A special commission appointed by the Italian Minister of Agriculture has pronounced the fertilising qualities of tetraphosphate to be at least equal to those of superphosphate, and the substance has the additional advantages of being free from causticity, acidity, and deterioration. Moreover, the cost of the plant needed for its production is only about 15 per cent. of that required for an equal output of superphosphate, while the process can be advantageously applied to minerals containing only low percentages of phosphorus. The method of working was invented by an Italian in 1914, and the process has been patented and is being exploited by a company both in Italy and in other countries. According to the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Milan, eleven plants, with an annual output of about fifty thousand tons, are being operated in Italy, while four more are under construction. Another near Luxor, on the Nile, is turning out twenty thousand tons a year; and at Kaseir, on the Red Sea, where a plant is being erected for working a very rich local rock, the yearly output is expected to reach two hundred thousand tons.

GIGANTIC AMERICAN LOCOMOTIVES.

In these pages, on 1st June 1917, reference was made to what was then the largest locomotive in the world. Colossal as were the dimensions given, they have been exceeded recently by those of a locomotive for handling the increasing traffic on a difficult section of the Virginian Railway. Some idea of the conditions to be overcome may be gathered from the fact that at present trains of sixty cars, each weighing seventy-five tons, or a total of four thousand five hundred tons, are being hauled over this section by three enormous locomotives with a combined tractive and pushing force of nearly one hundred and fifty tons. We have nothing to compare with these figures in this country, where what seem to us huge locomotives and long trains would look diminutive indeed by the side of these American monsters. The engine and the tender we are about to describe weigh together four hundred tons, and the former has a 'drawbar pull' of nearly eighty tons. We are used nowadays to stumpy chimneys on British railways, but the one on this locomotive is a mere ring, while the boiler is practically level with the top of the cab. The smallest diameter of the boiler is close on nine feet; near the back it exceeds this figure by several inches. The furnace measures fifteen feet in length by nine feet in width, and is fed with coal by a mechanical stoker. As the boiler and the cab are together over sixty feet in length, it is quite evident that special provision must be made to enable them to pass round curves. This is done by building the supporting frame in two parts, with a ball-and-socket joint between them. Each part is carried upon five pairs of coupled driving-wheels and one pair of small idle wheels, the former being driven by a pair of cylinders, one at each side. The boiler is rigidly connected to the back part of the frame, but only rests on the front part, where it can slide across to one side or the other when passing round a curve. Steam from the boiler, at a pressure of two hundred and fifteen pounds to the square inch, is first used in the back pair of cylinders, which measure thirty inches in the bore and have a stroke of thirty-two inches. Having done its work in these cylinders, it is further expanded in those on the front part of the frame, which have a bore of no less than four feet, or as large as that of some of our older locomotive boilers. As no great speed is required, the driving-wheels are only five feet in diameter, and by comparison they look absurdly small, owing to the huge size of the boiler and the framework. Twelve tons of coal are carried in the tender, together with thirteen thousand gallons of water, and the coal is consumed at the rate of six and a half tons an hour. Considerable difficulty was experienced in sending these enormous locomotives, of which twelve have been built at Schenectady, a city of New York State, to Virginia. Eventually the boilers, bare of all excrescences, were left on the frames and hauled by a roundabout route, about a fortnight being occupied in the journey. The difficult section of the line for which these locomotives are required is fourteen miles long, with a gradient of over one in fifty for eleven and a half miles, and trains consisting of seventy-eight seventy-five-ton cars are to be hauled up this incline. Such work, however, is far beyond even the power of one of the new locomotives, two of which will push behind, while the head of each train will be hauled by an older and somewhat less powerful model.

EXHAUST GASES FROM MOTORS FOR COOKING AND HEATING.

Owing to the need for strict economy in the use of all sources of heat, any scheme whereby heat which is now wasted may be utilised is worthy of careful consideration. Included in the category of wasted heat is that contained in the exhaust gases and cooling water of gas and oil engines and the motors of cars and aeroplanes. Why the waste heat from the motors in cars is not more extensively used for warming these vehicles in winter has always been a mystery to the writer. This heat, however, can only be employed for the one purpose, whereas that from stationary engines, such as those used for lighting country houses, is capable of performing several domestic functions. When the exhaust gases leave a gas or oil engine they have a temperature of about one thousand degrees Fahrenheit, which is quite hot enough for all kinds of cooking. Again, the water used to cool the cylinders is warm enough for baths, or even for radiators, after it has performed its functions in the engine. These facts have been taken advantage of by Mr F. A. Wilkinson, M.I.E.E., M.I.Mech.E., of Hatfield, Herts, in connection with a five-horse-power oil-engine which drives a dynamo for supplying the house with electricity. The dynamo charges a storage-battery, from which current is drawn as required, so that electricity for lighting and heating is always available. Six rooms are warmed by the exhaust gases and hot water from the engine, while a bath can be obtained in eight minutes. The engine is run for only about one and a half hours a day, even in midwinter, and although situated in an out-building, it can be started from the house by passing current from the battery through the dynamo; in fact, this operation can be done automatically, under the control of a thermostat, if desired. For cooking, an electric oven is used with a gas-container in the bottom connected with the engine exhaust-pipe. Boiling is performed by means of tubular rings, through which the exhaust gases are passed. Inside the rings are electric heating elements; hence all the apparatus can be worked by electricity when the engine is stopped. The use of cheap tar-oils for small motors in place of petrol or even paraffin, now made possible, as explained in a note in this column last month, renders such schemes as the above economical for country houses, even under existing conditions.

NEW SOURCE OF OIL IN SWEDEN.

In Scandinavia the shortage of petroleum has been even more pronounced than in this country; consequently every possible home source of substitutes is being exploited. Among these is alum schist, of which there is an almost unlimited supply. This substance, under suitable treatment, yields benzine, paraffin, and lubricating oils; and a factory has recently begun operations in Sweden which is capable of handling thirty thousand tons a year, from which twelve hundred tons of spirit and oils are derived.

SAFETY STEP-LADDER.

Most of us have trembled for our own safety or that of another when mounted upon a tall pair of steps resting on slanting or uneven ground. The risk of capsizing, however, has now been entirely overcome by the ingenious application of a leg or strut at each side. These legs are hinged to the top of the steps, and spread out at the bottom, thus giving almost as much rigidity sideways as that given in the other direction by the steps themselves and the folding portion. When the steps are folded the side legs lie along them, their lower ends being caught in suitable clips.

A GAS-CONSUMPTION RECORDING DIARY.

In these days of fuel and lighting restrictions it is imperative that a careful check should be kept upon the consumption of gas, to ensure that proper economy is being exercised. To enable the householder to do this, a very handy Gas-Consumption Recording Diary has recently been put upon the market at a cost of one shilling net (by post, one shilling and three-halfpence). Space is provided for weekly and monthly records of the amount of gas consumed from November of one year to December of the next year, and provision is made for the institution of weekly and monthly comparisons between the meter-readings in consecutive years. In addition, full instructions are given as to how to read a gas-meter, a simple accomplishment which so many people have never troubled to acquire, but with which the force of circumstances is likely to compel them to become familiar.

WELDED INSTEAD OF RIVETED JOINTS FOR SHIPS.

Considering the length of time that electric welding has been used for making joints in similar structures which were formerly riveted, it is surprising that the process has been applied to shipbuilding only within the last few months. A steel ship is built by joining together hundreds of pieces of steel, and if the joints can be made as strongly by welding as by riveting, and at a lower cost, the adoption of the former process is obviously a paying proposition. In order to test the advisability of welding in the building of standard ships, an experimental vessel has been constructed in a south coast shipyard entirely by this process. This vessel is one hundred and twenty-five feet in length, and has a displacement of two hundred and seventy-five tons, so that she is quite large enough to prove the effectiveness or otherwise of the system. All the joints in the skin plating were welded continuously outside, while the bottom plating was similarly dealt with inside; but up the sides the seams were only welded at intervals, or 'tack welded,' as it is called. The process of welding was explained in a note on 'Electric Welding for Damaged German Ships' which appeared in these pages for May, so that we can pass on to the results, which really form the important feature. In the first place, one thousand pounds of steel was saved, together with two hundred and forty-five man-hours, still greater economy being expected in both of these items for subsequent vessels. According to the Admiralty experts, a saving of 25 to 40 per cent. in time and about 10 per cent. in material will be realised in future welded ships of this size. The first welded ship has now been in service, carrying full cargoes, for some time without showing any signs of weakness; in fact, there is every reason to suppose welding to be even stronger than riveting, while the joints should be absolutely water-tight. Electric welding for steel ships has also been tried in the United States; but in place of a complete vessel, a forty-foot length in a large ship was welded instead of riveted. So satisfactory has the trial proved that the United States Shipping Board have authorised the construction by this method of a number of ten-thousand-ton standard ships. In future vessels a combination of welding and riveting is to be adopted, as for some parts the latter is the less costly process.

INSTRUCTION IN FARM BOOK-KEEPING BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Those of our agricultural readers who have just begun to keep books, or who are contemplating doing so, will learn with interest that Mr D. G. Macdonald, joint-author of the little volume, A Simple System of Book-keeping for Farmers and Smallholders, recently referred to in these columns, has instituted a Correspondence Course of Lessons in this important subject specially intended for working farmers. All communications regarding the course should be addressed to Mr D. G. Macdonald, 103 Roslea Drive, Dennistoun, Glasgow, from whom full particulars may be obtained.

To Correspondents who wish fuller information regarding new inventions, publications, &c. mentioned here, addresses will be furnished, when possible, provided a stamped and addressed envelope or post-card be sent to the Editor, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.

THE ALLEGORY OF THE ALLIGATOR.

By HEADON HILL.

I.—1890.

TOWARDS the close of last century the garrison at Kurrachee was composed of one British and two native battalions of infantry, and a battery of the R.F.A. It was about the year 1890 when the 2nd Battalion of the Royal Musketeers was drafted there, after two years at Poona. In those days the station was far from popular. It was five days by sea from Bombay, and the railway that started at Kiamari Bundar led to no cheery stopping-place on the hither side of Delhi. The social horizon was limited, and sport, except sea-fishing, was—as was to be expected on the sandy fringe of the Sindian desert—practically non-existent.

The Musketeer officers voted Kurrachee dull, after the gaieties of the great Deccan station on the brow of the Western Ghats. The fact that the Napier barracks were the finest in India, with the best parade-ground, was small compensation for joys left behind. They grumbled that there was only one tree in the place, which, having survived its early struggles, grew in the arid patch humorously called 'The Government Gardens.'

The battalion had been six months in its new quarters when news was received that Second Lieutenant Otto von Pilsen was coming out to join from the depot in England. His foreign name caused some speculation, not to say misgivings. Though at that far-off time the German menace had not reared its ugly head, the mess was apprehensive about the table manners of a young gentleman with a name like that. So when, in due course, Von Pilsen arrived, and proved to be a fresh-looking boy, speaking English without the trace of an accent, and with a clean record at Harrow and Sandhurst to vouch for him, the Musketeers breathed more freely, and settled down to judge him on his merits without prejudice.

'K. of K.' had not reached India then, with his terrible new broom, to teach the army that they were soldiers first and last, day and night. The new subaltern, however, began to develop unpopular traits. He was keener on his profession than on the scanty amusements available. When, by the unwritten law of the station, he should have been philandering at the bandstand, he remained in his bungalow reading military history. Till privately admonished by the adjutant, he committed the unpardonable solecism of talking shop at mess. By the end of his first month he was pretty much of an outcast.

At the end of the third month the O.C. sent for Second Lieutenant Chamier, the subaltern who shared a four-roomed bungalow with Von Pilsen in the Napier lines. Colonel Daubeny was a kindly, but irascible, martinet of the old school, whose efforts to combine a genial manner with spasmodic discipline rendered him an uncertain quantity to his young officers.

'Look here, Chamier,' he began, when that youngster was ushered into his presence, 'what do you make of your stable-companion?'

Relieved to find that the summons was not due to any delinquency of his own, Chamier permitted himself to smile. 'Though we live in the same bungalow, sir, I see next to nothing of Von Pilsen,' he replied.

'That isn't an answer to my question,' snapped Colonel Daubeny. 'If you haven't made friends with him, it ought to be easier for you to let me have your unbiassed opinion.'

'Well, sir, if you want me to speak freely, I don't like the chap,' replied Chamier. 'None of us does,' he added in a burst of confidence; 'and really I see no more of him than the rest of us do. He spends all his time off duty in his own room, mugging up war-books and writing letters for the mail.'

Colonel Daubeny, who had been walking up and down the matted floor, went to the window, and stood for a long two minutes gazing over the white level of the parade-ground.

'I don't like him either, and I don't like his name.' The colonel faced about suddenly. 'Harrow and Sandhurst, indeed! No trouble about a trifle like that. Mark my words, young fellow—you may live to see them verified, if I don't—the nation he's sprung from will try to swallow the world some day. That's neither here nor there—yet. What I want of you is to play the Good Samaritan to Von Pilsen. He is developing into a rank outsider, and I can't have one of my officers hall-marked as a pariah. Get to know him. Play with the beggar, even if it's only marbles, Chamier. Work up the social side of him. Get at the back of his mind. It will be a kindly action. This is an order, remember, and confidential.'

Chamier's efforts to cultivate intimate relations with Von Pilsen were not marked by appreciable success, probably because the task was repugnant to him. If he had been met half-way it might have been different, but the last-joined subaltern seemed to have turned sulky. Having been snubbed for talking shop, he had apparently decided to talk as little as possible. Whenever Chamier penetrated to the other side of the bungalow, his welcome was not effusive.

However, by dint of perseverance, Colonel Daubeny's delegate began to make a little headway at last. In return for generous confidences about his own people, he managed to extract the information that Von Pilsen's father was a member of the London Stock Exchange, and that, though born in Germany, he had been a naturalised Englishman for twenty years. He was a rich man, with a fine house at Surbiton, and he made his son a liberal allowance.

'You don't spend much of it,' laughed Chamier. 'You could very well lead the life you do on your pay. There isn't much scope for a flutter here, but at least you could buy a couple of ponies, and enter them for the regimental gymkhana. I would ride one of them for you with pleasure.'

'I do not care for what you call sport,' was the churlish reply.

Dick Chamier, as was proved by his after-career, was doggedly persistent, and a fortnight later he returned to the charge. There had been rather a 'wet' night at mess; and noticing that Von Pilsen had treated himself liberally, Chamier contrived to leave the mess with him, and on the way back to their joint domicile shot a bow at a venture.

'Look here, old chap—he forced a cordial note, while expecting a rebuff—'to-morrow is Sunday, and after church-parade I am going to jog out to Muggur Peer on a camel. It is one of the few local attractions, you know, and has got to be seen. I wish you'd come too, and relieve the tedium of a solitary pilgrimage.'

'Muggur Peer?' said Von Pilsen. 'I have not heard of that. What is it, anyhow?'

'A sacred shrine, twelve miles out, and just over the border of Baluchistan. The priests' trump card, I'm told, is a tank full of alligators, much venerated as deities in these parts. A muggur means an alligator, and peer is enclosed water in the vernacular.'

'The Baluchis are disaffected, are they not?' Von Pilsen asked quickly, and with seeming irrelevance.

'They don't love the Raj, but it's too near the frontier for any bobbery against British officers,' Chamier replied. 'Baksheesh is more in the line of the holy men, I expect. Parties go out every Sunday, and it's only by a fluke I haven't been there before. There's no chance of any trouble.'

'I'm not afraid of trouble,' rejoined the other solemnly. 'Yes, I will come with you to this temple across the border.'

This was the first experience of both young officers in voyaging on the ship of the desert, and Chamier was not sorry that the mode of progression offered but little scope for conversation with his uncongenial companion. What with having to adjust his person to the unfamiliar gait of his camel, and listening to the weird cries of the Pathan oont-wallah seated in front of him, he was fully occupied, and he had no doubt that Von Pilsen was in like case. He found time to wonder a little that his brother-subaltern had accompanied him so readily; also to pat himself on the back for obeying Colonel Daubeny's order in such uncomfortable fashion.

The long jolt over the sand came to an end at last under the welcome shade of an oasis of acacias and date-palms, hedged, save at one opening, by an impenetrable barrier of prickly pears. A hanger-on of the temple—a 'sort of minor canon,' as Chamier dubbed the half-naked, furtive-eyed rascal—piloted the cavalcade to a range of whitewashed, mud-built huts, which at once gave Muggur Peer away as a commercial undertaking. The 'minor canon' volubly explained that this row of one-storeyed hutches had been specially erected for Sahib Log to eat tiffin in before visiting the muggurs.

Chamier had provided a bountiful luncheon-basket, to which two healthy appetites did justice. As if at a signal, while crumbs were being brushed away and the last drop of Bass drained, an imposing figure in flowing blue garments, surmounted by a white turban, darkened the doorless entrance. In broken but intelligible English he introduced himself as the high-priest of the temple, and expressed his eagerness to do the honours. The temple itself, he explained, deep in the heart of the wood, was not shown to non-believers; but the peer and the muggurs were entirely at the disposal of the noble sahibs.

So the priest conducted them to an oblong pond, surrounded by a low wall, on which they leaned, gazing expectantly down into the stagnant water, in which nothing more exciting than a score of what looked like nearly submerged tree-trunks were floating. But suddenly one end of one of the trunks canted upwards, and Chamier caught the gleam of a wicked little round eye. It almost seemed to wink at him.

'By Jove, those are the muggurs!' he cried. 'Awfully sacred, no doubt, but as lazy as they make 'em.'

The Baluchi priest did not resent the blasphemy. He informed his visitors that the muggurs were hungry, and waiting to be fed.

'It is the usual custom for sahibs who honour us to sacrifice a goat,' he added. 'The price of a goat is five rupees.'

Von Pilsen, who had been singularly silent, woke up at this. 'Oh, yes, yes!' he exclaimed. 'That will be fine. Here are the five rupees. Let us sacrifice a goat, by all means.'

The reverend man pouched the money, and blew a shrill note on a silver whistle. From the recesses of the grove a couple of coolies came running, carrying a live goat, which they flung over the parapet far out into the tank. Instantly the placid surface was changed into a boiling caldron. The sluggish monsters awoke to frenzy, each seeking a morsel of the sacrifice, and churning the pool into a maelstrom. There was a vision of snapping jaws and bloody teeth, and then all was still.

The turmoil lasted no more than a minute, but while it lasted Von Pilsen was beside himself, clapping his hands and shouting ecstatic applause.

'I call it beastly,' said Chamier, turning away in disgust. 'You've had a run for your money, anyhow.'

'Beastly?' protested Von Pilsen. 'It was grand. I see more in it than a sacrifice to heathen gods, Chamier. It is an allegory of the force that moves the world. I just loved it. It illustrates the function of the strong to rend and swallow the weak. Stay; that reminds me,' he pulled up with an awkward laugh. 'I must speak with our holy friend.'

Chamier walked aside, while Von Pilsen exchanged question and answer with the guardian of the temple. It was not till long afterwards that he guessed the sinister meaning of that conference. For the moment he attributed his brother-officer's exaltation to a touch of the sun on the ride out, but he took advantage of the ten minutes' respite to charge his memory with every word spoken in the course of that weird outing. During the return journey, as on the outward, sustained conversation was impracticable, and Chamier was glad of it.

After mess that night he went over to the colonel's bungalow and gave him a graphic account of his companion's behaviour at the tank, repeating his wild utterance after the sacrificial ceremony.

'The whole thing was too silly, sir,' he concluded, 'but I thought I had better tell you.'

The Crimean veteran's frown relaxed into a kindly smile. 'You have rendered faithful service, my boy, on which I shall not fail to act,' he said. 'This will form the basis for a confidential report to the War Office for which I lacked material. "The force that moves the world," indeed! "The strong shall rend and swallow the weak!" It's our job to stop 'em, anyway; and, please God, we shall, though I may not be alive to see it. Good work, Chamier; and there'll be a good mark against your name for it.'

Confidential reports are accounted poisonous things, but this one bore fruit pleasant in the mouths of the Musketeers. A few months later Second Lieutenant von Pilsen resigned his commission, alleging the reason that his father had failed in business, and was unable to continue his allowance. For some years Chamier was curious enough to search the London Directory, and the name of the elder Von Pilsen was still there. Then he dropped the habit, and for a long while forgot all about the Sunday excursion to Muggur Peer.

II.—1917.

The boys went over the top at dawn, part of an advance on an eight-mile front. An hour later they were masters of the formidable German trench bisecting Polygon Wood. They took another hour to consolidate the captured position—a euphemism for bombing the enemy out of his dug-outs and bayoneting those who would not surrender—and then the divisional general came slowly along the hard-won trench to see that all was well.

Outside a dug-out of more imposing pretensions than its neighbours, he was stopped by a hard-bitten sergeant of his old regiment, the Royal Musketeers.

'I beg pardon, general,' said the sergeant, 'but there's a Boche orficer in here as there's nothing doing with. Fair barmy, I think he is. He won't fight, and he won't put his hands up. Says he's a muggur, sir.'

'You are sure of the spelling?' said General Chamier with a twinkle.

'No error, sir,' grinned the sergeant, taking the point.

The general glanced up at a big notice-board over the entrance to the dug-out, and saw that this was the headquarters of a battalion of the Prussian Guard. Followed by his aide-de-camp and the sergeant, he descended a flight of steps to an electrically lit chamber, where two British privates were standing over an elderly German officer seated in a comfortable arm-chair. It was quite a luxurious interior—the temporary home of a man who did himself well.

Chamier's eyes narrowed as they settled in stern scrutiny on the obese figure with the heavy features, and his thoughts flew back to his old colonel, long since dead and gone, and to the vaguely wise words he had uttered on the evening after that rasping camel-ride to the Baluchi shrine. 'It's our job to stop 'em, and, please God, we shall,' Colonel Daubeny had said all those years ago. The old soldier's prayerful prophecy had come true on the Ypres-Menin front that day, whatever the future might hold.

The German battalion-commander had risen, and was staring at the English general with haunted eyes.

'Hallo, Von Pilsen!' said Chamier. 'Curious meeting, eh? How about the allegory of the alligator, and the function of the strong to rend and swallow the weak? Your All-Highest Muggur has taken on a goat that's a few sizes too large for his paunch, I'm thinking.'

'I have been cursing the All-Highest these last six months,' groaned the prisoner. 'Take me away and hide me out of sight.'

'You will be taken away all right,' replied General Chamier dryly. 'But first satisfy my curiosity, please. They must catch your spies very young, Von Pilsen—even breed them specially. You were one, weren't you, when you joined the Musketeers from Harrow and Sandhurst?'

'It was not of my free-will. It was the system—the machine,' was the passionate reply.

FIRST LEAVE.

IT was the second summer of the war, and we had not grown so well accustomed to the sight of soldiers on leave as we have done since. Perhaps that was why I noticed him, but I think I should have done so even when it became the usual thing to have a soldier on leave as one's travelling companion.

His was that tragic product of the war—the face of a boy with the experience of a man behind it, the tragedy of lost youth sacrificed to the great cause. Though, indeed, there was nothing of the tragedy about him as he alternately sat down in his corner and jumped up to look eagerly at the moving interest which a London terminus always affords, and which seems to appeal so strongly to those who come back from 'over there.'

At last the train moved out of the station, and he settled down to read. There was something curious about his tunic—he was certainly an officer, but his single star was very new, and there was still a mark where his sergeant's stripes had been. Obviously he had won his commission on the field, and had done a quick change from N.C.O. to officer, without ever having the chance of getting his uniform.

Now he was home on leave, and it was clear to see that his papers were not absorbing his mind. Every few moments he would lay them aside and feast his eyes on the wonderful panorama of an English August. It must have been his first leave after those awful, early months, and probably his first time abroad, and he had never known what England really meant to him. He was full of the joy of it, and was taking in every aspect of its beauty.

Long before we reached his destination his belongings were all put away in his pack and he was ready to get out. As we neared his home he leant out of the window, taking in all the well-known points, and while the train was yet slowing down he was out of the open door.

I could not resist looking out to see who had come to meet the boy as I saw her hurrying along the platform. There she stood—a little old lady—an expression almost of unbelief in her face that her boy had been brought back to her. In a moment she was lost in his arms, lifted off her feet—the great tenderness of his strength.

It was too sacred a moment for a stranger to see, but if I have ever seen heaven in a woman's eyes, it was there in that little old lady's.

LINES WRITTEN FOR A MOTHER'S WAR ALBUM.

MYRIADS of mothers in our dear Homeland
And in our vast Dominions have been blest
With gallant sons, who thought it shame to stay
In selfish ease at home, when ruthless foes
Conspired to hold the world in thrall, and make Free men, to whom their liberty is more Than life, subservient to a conqueror's will.

To bring that threatened Empire of the Sword
To naught, our sons, responsive to the call
Of duty, have, in Freedom's sacred cause,
Served and fought valiantly, dared and endured
All that men can, giving their dear young lives
For us unfalteringly—on land, at sea,
And high amid the clouds in whirring 'plane.

'We would not wish them to a fairer death.'
'God's soldiers,' their imperishable deeds
No words can fitly tell, no recompense
Man's gratitude bestows can match their worth.

Ah! what can dry a mourning mother's tears,
And ease her anguished heart, but to believe
Their service and their cause safe in His hand
Who orders all with righteousness and love?

A SOUTH AFRICAN.

 TO CONTRIBUTORS.

1*st*. All communications should be addressed to 'The Editor, Chambers's Journal, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.'

2*nd*. For its return in case of ineligibility, postage-stamps should accompany every manuscript.

3*rd*. To secure their safe return if ineligible. ALL MANUSCRIPTS, whether accompanied by a letter of advice or otherwise, should have the writer's Name and Address written upon them IN FULL.

4*th*. Poetical contributions should invariably be accompanied by a stamped and directed envelope.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

A FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE.

By Mrs HERBERT MARTIN, Author of The Heir to Sunninghall, &c.

PART I.

I.

A FOUR-HORSE coach was winding amongst mountains in the Highlands on a certain summer afternoon, when shadows were lengthening and the rich tints of heather and moorland growing deeper towards evening.

A young man, with the pale, keen features of a Londoner, who might easily be guessed for what he was—a barrister—and a rather shabbily dressed but sweet-faced girl, side by side on the box-seat, had been talking with increasing interest—an interest largely proceeding from a different point of view. She found him amusing, clever, a little cynical, yet kind. He had discovered in her a strangely fresh and innocent nature, a diverting ignorance of life (as he knew it), a good deal of out-of-fashion culture, and an eagerly receptive mind; no ballroom miss; no modern, smoking, free-spoken, slangy, flirtatious specimen, but one who had known the roughness of poverty, the necessity of 'doing without,' the stress of hard work.

They had slid somehow into almost intimate talk. It began with some slight politeness on his part, frankly and gratefully acknowledged—almost with surprise—and, after a couple of hours, they felt as if they were friends.

One by one the other travellers had been dropped by the way. Murray Esdaile was going to the farthest point reached by this coach, and it seemed as if his companion were also. Only a couple of quiet, sleepy bagmen remained, smoking incessant cigars. Partly to pass the time, partly because the girl pleased and interested his rather blasé mind, the barrister (using the faculty acquired in law-courts) was skilfully drawing out the details of the girl's life, amongst others that her name was Margaret Dale.

'They call you Maggie or Daisy, I suppose, in common life? Margaret is so stately for everyday use.'

'Mother and Ellen call me Peggy,' she answered, colouring a little.

'You have a mother?'

'Yes. She is a widow. Ellen is very delicate—quite a cripple. They live at Clapton. I don't suppose you know it. It is not a fashionable or a very nice part of London.'

He had discovered ere this that his London—the London of the parks, the theatres, Piccadilly, Kensington, Belgravia—was an unknown world to this brown-eyed, soft-voiced, pale girl, whose prettiness was only gradually dawning on him, for it was not at all of a voyant or striking kind. Art and dress had done nothing for it. Her light-brown hair, of the colour the French call blond cendré, had no gold in it. A fashionable girl would probably have gilded (and spoilt) such hair. It had some natural wave in it, and no curler or waver had ever touched it, so the damp air had not straightened the fluffy little bits round the ears. Modern 'beauty specialists,' doubtless, would not have been satisfied without darkening eyebrow and eyelash, and touching with rose the almost colourless complexion, which certainly would have been improved by a healthier tint. But the man had not failed to notice the sweet, firm curve of the child-like, innocent mouth; and in point of fact it is the mouth that gives the character to a face, and can make it fine or mean, kind or cruel, self-controlled or sensual.

So she spent her days in a shabby, out-of-the world northern suburb, poor little girl! He soon found out they had not been idle days. She had been nursery-governess—mother's help—whatever word glosses over the servitude which no 'general' would undertake at the starvation wage the so-called 'lady' is not ashamed to offer a real lady.

'I hadn't enough exercise, and had perhaps a little too much work,' she told him in her candid, simple fashion, 'so I broke down a bit. The doctor said I must have fresh air and change. As I couldn't afford that without earning something, I was glad to hear of a situation as companion to a lady in the Highlands. I thought myself extraordinarily lucky to hear of something like that, for, you know, it is not easy for a girl like me, who is not really clever or accomplished, to find anything. But perhaps, after all, I am not so very lucky, because—— But I beg your pardon,' her face all suddenly rosy with a blush; 'I ought not to trouble you with my affairs.'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

'But please do,' he coaxed her. 'I really like so much to hear. I feel as if we knew each other, and if you will trust me I will honour your confidence.'

'You're very kind,' she said as simply as if she were a child, instead of a young person over twenty, going to a 'situation.' 'I was going to say that after I had engaged myself to the lady I happened to meet the companion who had left her. Perhaps she exaggerated—I hope she did—for she told me I should never be able to stand her; that she was purse-proud, mean, very selfish, and so spoilt that she thought everybody only created for her pleasure. It sounds as if it must be exaggeration, doesn't it?'

Esdaile laughed. 'Well, I should hope so. It is not what one would call an agreeable portrait. Who is this charming lady?'

'It is a Miss Mackenzie of Glenfaden Castle. She is a Scottish heiress, and lives with an aunt who is a very old lady. I believe Miss Mackenzie is not much more than thirty-five.'

The young man had started at the name. He said nothing, but stared steadily at the heads of the horses. Margaret Dale would have been astonished if she had had the power of reading his thoughts. Miss Mackenzie of Glenfaden! He did not wish, at any rate at the moment, to let the girl become aware how familiar the name was to him, but he wanted to know the magnificent salary the 'Scottish heiress' was going to give her companion. He managed in an artistic, guileless manner to draw this out of 'Peggy.' After all, Peggy was not such an ugly name!

In consideration of her youth and inexperience and the inestimable advantage of mountain air, it seemed she was going for her travelling expenses and twelve pounds a year. Twelve pounds a year! He had a sudden swift vision of a tall, high-nosed, red-haired lady in pale-green satin, emeralds, and pearls, who smiled on him very graciously, and reminded him of Queen Elizabeth. Then some words came back to him: 'Go in for the Scotch oof-bird, old chappie. I have it on good authority that she hasn't a penny less than ten thousand a year in her own right, and owns a castle in the Highlands with top-hole shooting and fishing. Go in and win, old son, and you'll be one of the blest.'

And she had offered Peggy Dale twelve pounds a year! This gave a man something to think of—a man who, with all his faults, was neither mean nor unchivalrous. The child had such an open, pathetic pair of soft brown eyes, such a sweet mouth! These pleaded for her far more eloquently than words. Esdaile sat thinking with uneasy doubt of the last season: of the suppers at the Carlton, the dinners, the balls, the polo at Hurlingham—all in the company of that smiling, gracious, beautifully dressed, red-haired lady of the fortune and the castle, whose invitation to visit her he had accepted, and accepted, too, with a pretty fixed resolve as to the outcome and ending of his visit. 'Purse-proud, mean, very selfish; so spoilt that she thinks every one created for her pleasure.'

Great Heaven! If half this indictment were true, a man would pay dear even for ten thousand a year, a castle, shooting, and fishing! Almost he wished he were not bound for Glenfaden.

II.

A rude termination was put to Esdaile's uneasy meditations. The coach had reached a sharp curve in the winding, uphill road. On one side was a steep, rocky hillside; on the other the narrow road shelved abruptly towards a deep valley strewn with stones, clumps of gorse, bramble, and heather. Just as they turned, the leader shied suddenly, the wheel swerved on a stone. Before there was time to realise what had happened the coach was overturned; coachman, guard, and passengers were flung headlong down into the ravine. Murray Esdaile picked himself up, dazed but unhurt, from a prickly bed of whin and heath, which had saved his bones, and looked dizzily for the others. The bagmen were sitting up, evidently not much the worse, rubbing themselves; the coachman lay motionless in a crumpled heap; the guard had staggered to his feet with a bleeding head; but Esdaile could not at once see the girl who had been talking so freely to him a minute ago. A sick fear seized him. She might be dead—poor, sweet little Peggy of the confiding eyes. Yes, thus far had the stress of the moment brought him. He was thinking of her, caring for her, as if he counted acquaintance with her by months or years, instead of hours.

As he looked round him, cold with the sweat of fear, he saw her some distance off on the ground. Her eyes were shut, her face dead-white. He made his way to her, lifted her head softly to rest on his knee, drew out his flask, and poured a few drops of spirits between her pale lips. The burning stuff made her shudder, but revived her. Her eyelids fell back, and with a thrill of actual rapture he met the sweet brown eyes fixed full on his. Absurd! She might have been some one very near, very dear, to him, instead of a chance fellow-traveller. He spoke to her in a gentle, caressing voice as if she were a little child, asking how she felt, if she were hurt anywhere, if she knew where she was, who he was—a rather ridiculous question, as she did not even know his name. Her eyes slowly lost their vague mistiness, and she tried to smile. She was hardly yet quite alive to the fact that her head rested on a young man's knee.

'I don't know whether I am hurt or not. I think my arm is, a little.' Then, as fuller consciousness came, she started up with a beautiful blush. 'Oh,' she said in a trembling voice, 'of course I remember now! I know what has happened. You are the—the gentleman who was talking to me. But what has become of the others—the coachman, the guard, the poor horses?'

'If you are sure you are really not much hurt,' he said, his own voice not quite steady, 'I will go and find out and see just what has happened. Will you stay here? We must see what can be done. I am afraid the driver is—is in a bad way.'

He could not say what he believed—that the poor fellow was dead. This was only too true. The coachman had been pitched on his head and killed on the spot. The guard had seized the terrified horses, still attached to the shattered coach. He was hurt himself, but not seriously so, and had recovered his presence of mind. He knew, he said, of a few cottages a little way farther on, a rough wayside inn, and a poor farm. He would ride one of the horses on to a village some five miles off, and fetch a doctor; though no doctor, he feared, could put breath again in the poor driver. The lady and the gentleman might be put up at the farm for the night. The other two passengers decided to lead the remaining horses towards the village. Esdaile was anxious to spare the girl the shock of the knowledge of the coachman's death and the sight of his body. He urged her, if she felt she could walk, to let him take her to the farmhouse at once. They would probably not find a luxurious resting-place, but they might possibly get some supper and a bed.

Margaret Dale was too confused and shaken for any independent thought; she only wanted to obey the owner of the quiet, kind voice, and to follow him wherever he might lead. Her ankle was a little twisted, her arm bruised and scraped. He drew the arm that was not hurt through his, and led her, almost carrying her, as quickly as he could, from the scene of the disaster. The pain of walking forced tears into her eyes, but she set her lips and was heroically uncomplaining. He caught a glimpse of her swimming eyes and compressed mouth, and stopped, penitent.

'I'm hurrying you too much, and it hurts! I am so sorry. I wanted to get you out of this. Is the pain very sharp?'

'Oh, it's not much,' she answered breathlessly. 'I can bear it quite well. I ought to be so thankful it is not worse.'

'Yes,' he said gravely, 'there's that. It's odd to think that we might both of us be lying dead. We have come well out of a great danger.'

'Thank God!' she murmured under her breath.

The man of the world, cynical after the manner of the day, had not thought to say that.

'Yes,' he said half-mockingly, 'thank God for us; but what about the other poor chap?'

She stopped, looking anxiously in his face. 'The driver? Oh, I had forgotten! Is the poor man dead?'

'Stupid!' he said to himself. 'Why did I let her know?' Aloud he said, 'The guard will send a doctor. Perhaps he's only unconscious. I am sorry it hurts you so to walk. The stones are awfully rough. I'm going to carry you over this part.'

Before she could utter an eager protest he took her up gently and carried her over his shoulder. She was light and thin—sadly light, he thought, though it made his task easier.

When they reached a smoother and more level path he set her down, and she stammered a confused word of thanks.

III.

They were now in sight of a cluster of rough stone buildings, bare enough and poverty-stricken; a forlorn farm with dilapidated sheds and straw-yards, a waste before the door where some gaunt and leggy fowls were picking a scant portion. A stern-faced woman, large-framed and angular, with a shawl over her head and a rough frieze skirt, came to the door and looked at them with an air of cold, dignified aloofness, which made Peggy feel inclined to apologise for her mere existence. She showed some interest, however, when Esdaile explained what had happened, and she called the 'gude man' and an underling in a ragged worsted jacket to go down and help at the scene of the accident. But she looked very dubious when Esdaile asked in his blandest voice if she would let the lady sleep there that night.

'Eh, sir!' she said in a rough, mannish voice, but with a hint of kindliness in her eyes as she looked at the pale, dishevelled girl, 'it's a gey poor place this for the likes o' gentlefolk to bide in. A'm thinkin' yer gude leddy'll no find it to her likin'.'

Peggy, unused to the broad Scots accent, looked on bewildered. Esdaile, however, was only amused to find the farmer's wife took them for a honeymoon couple. 'Oh, anything will do for to-night—won't it, Miss Dale?' He turned and addressed the girl pointedly.

'Eh!' the woman said. 'So ye're no marriet. I thocht ye was. Aweel, go ben, young leddy—there's no providin' for mischances.'

It was indeed a bare, poor, comfortless place. A girl used to soft living would have turned from it with disgust, but Peggy did not seem to notice anything when once seated on the wooden settle in the chimney-corner, warmed by the turf fire which smouldered on the bare hearth. Her chief thought was for the poor driver. She could not bear to think of him as dead—the gruff, good-natured man who had flourished his whip so gaily over the backs of his horses and cracked jokes on the way. She looked urgently at her companion.

'Please,' she said—'please go and see how the driver is! I'm all right—quite comfortable now—only for my arm. I am so anxious to know about him.'

'I will go,' he said gravely; 'but I can do nothing for him.'

He turned first to the woman of the house to ask her about supper and accommodation for the night. Both promised to be poor enough. She had a 'taste' of tea, a drop of milk, oat-cakes, and eggs. The 'young leddy' should sleep in the best chamber; he must find a place where he could. While she bustled about, he went out just in time to see the body of the driver carried past on a door to the rough wayside inn, where it could lie to await the doctor.

Peggy, meanwhile, dressed her hurt arm as well as she could with lard, no other ointment being available. And when Esdaile came back the woman had laid as good a supper as her poor means afforded on the trestle-table in front of the hearth. He had to tell the girl of the driver's fate, and see the brown eyes fill again with tears and the sweet mouth tremble with pity. He put his hand frankly on hers, with a great wish to comfort her; she looked so young, so dependent, so tender. She was utterly unself-conscious, and did not move her hand or repel the slight caress. Already they were fast friends, and had plenty to say, while he coaxed her to eat more than one egg, oatcake toasted and buttered, and to drink coarse tea sweetened with brown sugar.

It was then she suddenly discovered—and laughed at the discovery—that she did not know his name, though she had told him hers. He gravely presented his card. The dour mistress of the house unexpectedly relaxed. She contemplated them from the background with keen eyes when they were not noticing her, and decided they were 'coorting,' and, with a true feminine indulgence for sweethearts, kept the gude man and Jock out of the way, serving their supper in the back-kitchen, while the supposed lovers were allowed to enjoy theirs by themselves. A little Northern canniness also entered into her attitude. She believed this 'fine-spoken' gentleman would be good for a sovereign at least, and sovereigns were a scanty crop in that cold, desolate region.

(Continued on page 86.)

TRAVEL IN WAR AND PEACE.

By A. Russell Walker.

IT is one of the numerous paradoxes of the Great War that, while it has compelled one section of mankind—and even of womankind—to do more travelling than they ever expected to do in their lives, the other section, who journey mainly for pleasure and recreation, have found foreign travel completely barred to them. What may be described as the globe-trotting habit was becoming almost universal before the summer of 1914. All the principal nations of the civilised world were more or less interested up to that date in the vast and complex system of international travel, which had been gradually built up over a period of half a century. The gigantic developments of cheap international transport, which was one of the marvels of the later years of the nineteenth century, had ended, apparently for ever, the era when foreign travel was exclusively the privilege of the wealthy and cultured classes.

In the early part of 1914 it seemed the most ordinary thing in the world that Tom, Dick, and Harry should wish to see something of other countries besides their own, and in powerful quarters everything was done to help rather than to hinder them in fulfilling their desire. Not only were travelling scholarships becoming very common at our universities and larger schools, but frequent trips of an organised character were run for the definite purpose of bringing our working-men into contact with their fellow-workers of other nations. In addition to these somewhat specialised avenues of popular travel, there were innumerable opportunities for the public to go abroad. 'A week in lovely Lucerne' or a fortnight in the gay French capital was a luxury, it is true; but it was a democratic luxury, which was not only well within the means of the clerk or the artisan as the reward of a little economy, but was almost as commonplace a feature of the lives of the middle and lower middle classes as was the Grand Tour among the nobility and gentry of a hundred years ago. Correspondingly the upper classes had begun to go farther and farther afield in search of out-of-the-way and untrodden paths of travel. Cairo and the ancient Pyramids of Egypt were already regarded by many as in the same category as Nice, Biarritz, or Monte Carlo; to have been there once, or even twice, was nothing whatever to boast of in society circles when hundreds—nay, thousands—among that class had turned the city of the Pharaohs into a gay cosmopolitan winter resort. It was even becoming common enough to meet people who had stood under the ruined walls of Nebuchadnezzar's palace at Babylon, or had spent weeks shooting big game in the jungle of tropical Africa. For those who could pay for such exotic luxuries of travel there were already tourist agencies at work, whose business it was to organise and handle the details, so that the traveller was almost as free from worry and danger as if he were journeying from London to Switzerland. Literally there was no place or country, from China to Peru, which when Germany shot her bolt in 1914 was not being exploited in the interests of the tourist. In fact, it seemed to be only a question of time before specially conducted tours would be arranged by some enterprising travel agency into the heart of Tibet, or possibly even to the North and South Poles!

The outbreak of war shattered this carefully-built-up organisation with one blow. Though it was by no means generally appreciated at the time, the placarding of notices at the London railway termini in August 1914 regarding the indefinite suspension of cross-Channel services marked the end of Continental travel for the great majority of civilians for the period of the war. Of course, these services were not long in complete suspense. Very soon they were recommenced on a new and restricted basis, and it is a matter for pride and satisfaction that they have been continued in spite of much danger and difficulty ever since. But they have carried no tourists. The limited band of civilians who have crossed the narrow seas since the summer of 1914 could in no way be brought within the ordinary meaning of that term. Many of them have gone, with sorrow and anxiety in their hearts, to see relatives sick unto death at one or other of the hospitals outwith the fighting-zone; others have gone on patriotic work to assist in some way the cause of their country or its Allies, or in specially organised groups and parties to see at first-hand what our splendid armies had done, and were doing, in the interests of freedom and liberty. None of all these can in any true sense be said to have travelled for the sake of pleasure or recreation, and in every case the necessity of having a duly authorised passport was in itself a guarantee that travel for sight-seeing purposes, or for other motives unsuited to the gravity of the hour, could not be indulged in in war-time. On the other hand, that narrow streak of water between us and France has carried on its bosom several millions of our own flesh and blood, who have gone to fight in our armies in France and Flanders, and among whom there must have been a large proportion who, but for the Great War, would never have travelled outside their native country. Large numbers have found their way across the ocean to far-off and strange lands on a similar mission. The marvellous East will henceforth live as a reality in the minds of hundreds of thousands—nay, millions—of our fellow-countrymen who have seen service in Egypt, Palestine, India, or the Balkans. The world outside these islands, and even the great dominions and colonies overseas, have been discovered for us as a nation by this war. For generations to come the tradition will linger, and it is incredible that the old spirit of insularity can have the same influence over us as it has had in the past.

For some time after peace is signed no doubt the conditions resulting from the war will tend to make travel difficult and expensive. The demands on inland and water transport for military demobilisation and for commercial purposes will inevitably be very great, and it is quite probable that a large number of those who have travelled so far and so widely during the past few eventful years in the service of their country will look forward to a quiet period of restfulness in their own home-land. But once the artificial war restrictions are removed, there will be thousands of people who will be ready and eager to set forth again on their travels. It is certain, for instance, that the numbers of those who will visit the great battlefields of Europe will be enormous. Switzerland, Italy, France will be full of tourists as soon as measures can be taken for their reception. The only places which are likely to be left severely alone are the countries of our present enemies. The bitterness of the war may die away in time, but for many years it is hardly probable that tourists from the Entente nations will visit either Germany or Austria in any great numbers.

Pessimists may say that there will be little extra money available in the coming years for luxuries such as foreign travel—at any rate, so far as the masses of the people are concerned. That may be largely true; but folk have a knack of finding the money somehow for things they really care for, and travel for those who love it is well worth all it costs.

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

CHAPTER V.

THE inspector took the cabinet and looked inside it, but it was absolutely empty. The thing was bewildering, and I was beginning to think that I was dreaming, when a knock came at the door, and my landlady entered.

'Were there any callers for me, Mrs Watson, or was there anybody in this room?'

'Beg pardon, sir; I hope I did no harm,' she said, seeing the uneasiness in my face, 'but a gentleman called just after you left this mornin'. He said he had an appointment to meet you here, and if you werena in he would wait. I showed him in, but he didna bide five minutes. He said you would know who he was, and that he had left his card. He had no time to spare, and would see you some day soon.'

'Some day soon!' I echoed blankly. 'Some day soon!'

'I hope there 's naething wrang, sir,' said Mrs Watson, looking at my puzzled face.

'N-no. Nothing of any consequence,' I answered mechanically. 'Was he a man with reddish hair and a stubbly chin?'

''Deed, no! He was as clean as a priest—a ceevil-spoken, weel-put-on gentleman.'

'And his card?' put in the inspector.

'I looked for it after he left, but couldna find it.'

'What time was this?'

'No ten minutes after you went out, sir.'

With a sinking heart, I went to the chimney-piece. The man 'M'Nair's' address in his own writing had also vanished.

'Thank you, Mrs Watson,' I murmured feebly. 'Really, it doesn't matter. We needn't keep you longer.'

When the door hid her portly presence, I turned a crestfallen face to the inspector. He was making notes.

'More than one on the job, whatever it is,' he said grimly. 'Red-hair has a useful friend. They must have wanted the pocket-book badly. I'll wager the second man watched you going out this morning. Well, well! We had better interview the landlady again, and try to get a better description of this morning's visitor.'

But all Mrs Watson could tell us about the caller was that he was neither short nor tall; that he was dark, clean-shaven, well dressed in grayish tweeds; that he wore a light overcoat and a bowler-hat, and carried an umbrella and a pair of gloves. From the few words that passed between them, he appeared to her to be a man of education, and without any peculiarity in his speech, manner, or features. Her impression was altogether vague, almost valueless for the purposes of identification.

'There are a couple of our men watching the house by this time,' said the inspector when Mrs Watson left us again, 'but I doubt if there will be any more mysterious callers, now that the pocket-book has gone. I think we 'll get your friend of last night, though. Perhaps they have him at the office already. Now, we must make a search of the rooms.'

Both sitting-room and bedroom were examined thoroughly, but not a trace of the articles which I had locked up in the cabinet was found.

'Is it possible,' said the inspector, 'that your memory has played you a trick? You may have taken them out of the cabinet and hidden them somewhere else.'

'No. They were put in the cabinet, which was then locked and taken to my bedroom by my own hands. They have been removed this morning. However, I 'll overhaul my evening clothes again.'

I was doing this, when I heard a sharp 'Hullo!' from him. I looked up. He was holding up a dress-shirt to the light. It was the one which I had worn at dinner on the previous night, and on its starched front he showed me a red smudge.

'Looks like a blood-stain,' he said.

'I believe it is. The man clutched me when I lifted him.'

'If it is a finger-print as well as a blood-stain, we are lucky. I 'll take it with me and have it examined.'

After a final overhaul of the room, back we went to headquarters.

I was shown the dead man in the mortuary. I saw a peaceful young face, Southern in lines and colouring, olive and tanned, with a short, dark beard and moustache. Seafaring clothes marked the man's calling. A few shillings were found in his pocket, but nothing to help identification. The police thought that, in all probability, he had met his death in a commonplace brawl. One Dago less in some fo'c'sle, likely!

But I wondered if, by any curious chance, the running feet in the fog had any bearing on the man's death. I pictured the dead sailor, in possession of some dark knowledge, being lured on or followed in the fog, and in a twinkling struck out of this eager and stirring world.

The little tragedy filled my mind and depressed me. When I went out to the street, to my annoyance (for I prided myself on my nerves) the sudden bang of the time-gun on the Castle made me jump like a nervous old lady. A decent luncheon and Tony's company would, I thought, be a welcome change from my thoughts, and I quickened my pace to keep my appointment with Keene-Leslie at the Caledonian.

CHAPTER VI.

AT the hotel I found a note from Tony telling me that he might be a few minutes late, so I got into a comfortable arm-chair by the fire in the lounge and waited. In the opposite corner a man was seated, reading a newspaper. The thoughtful, rather melancholy face, the dark, glossy hair, brushed back and contrasting sharply with the pale skin, stirred some memory. When he looked up and caught my eye, I felt that I ought to know him. The same thought must have occurred to him, for, after a glance or two at me, he laid down his newspaper and crossed the hearth-rug.

'You are Mr Neil Forbes, and I think you are wondering if you know me. Am I right?' he said with a friendly smile. 'We met for a minute at The Bield some months ago. You were just leaving to catch a train. I am your uncle's doctor. Hall is my name. I took over old Marshall's practice from his executors.'

'Of course! Now I remember. I have heard my uncle speak gratefully of you, Doctor Hall,' said I as we shook hands. 'How is he?'

'I should like to give you good news of him, but I'm afraid I cannot say that he is quite fit. He has strange fits of depression. And I am doubtful about his heart. I don't mean to say that his condition is very serious. A sudden strain, you understand, must be avoided. No more days on the hill or in the forest for him. He has grassed his last stag, unless he chooses to take unnecessary risks.'

The doctor's statement came as a complete surprise. Although the colonel had not been quite himself of late, I had put this down to his increasing years, and there had been nothing in his letters to me to cause me any anxiety.

'I must run North to see him as soon as I can,' I said. 'He may be lonely sometimes. I am his nearest relative. May I ask you to let me know, from time to time, how he is?'

'With pleasure.' He hesitated for a moment. 'I should like to ask you a question which, at first, may seem to you to be a little—shall I say?—inquisitive. But my profession and your relationship to the colonel must be my apology.'

'If I can be of any help, please do not hesitate.'

He stood looking into the fire in silence for a moment or two, as if debating with himself the form which his question would take. Then he turned a grave face to me.

'Do you know if your uncle has any private worries or anxieties?'

The question disquieted me. My impression of the colonel was that of a man exceptionally free from care, and of singularly cheerful and easy-going temperament. Apart from the stereotyped grievances born of low rents and high rates, I could not have recalled a grumble from him. My uneasiness must have been reflected in my face, for the doctor hastened to assure me that there was no reason for alarm.

'Pray do not misunderstand me,' he said. 'I may have caused you needless anxiety. I merely asked the question in case that the same thought had occurred to you, or that you knew of, or suspected, any cause for depression.'

'None!' I replied with emphasis. 'Nor have I ever found the slightest trace of it in his manner or his letters.'

'I am very glad to hear you say so. But, tell me, is it possible that he has any enemies?'

'He is the last man on earth whom I should associate with making an enemy.'

'I am sure that you will bear with me, Mr Forbes, if my questions touch on any private matters. I gathered that he lived abroad in his earlier days?'

'Yes, with his regiment in India for some years, long ago. Since his return he has lived at The Bield the ordinary contented routine of a country gentleman, fond of sport and outdoor life, taking his share of public duties; a man, as you know, popular and respected, with hosts of friends. His life has been placid and uneventful. Indeed, I have heard him congratulate himself on its freedom from vicissitudes.'

'Yes. All this tallies with what I have heard.'

'But about this depression, doctor—have you anything definite to go on? I mean, something more than your observations as a medical man.'

'Just what I was about to tell you. It is a curious business. I hardly know what to think, but the fact is that twice or thrice he has told me that a black-bearded man—a stranger—has been seen by him near The Bield. "Prowling" was the word he used, and I came to the conclusion, not so much from the colonel's words as from his abstracted, worried air, quite unlike his normal cheerfulness, that the man's appearance had been unwelcome and disquieting.'

'Strange! He is not the man to knuckle down to his nerves. Is it possible that he is the victim of a delusion?'

'Here I hesitate. I am not sure. Men of his age, of course, often develop curious little mental flaws. The word "delusion" ought not to be used lightly; and yet—and yet—no one except the colonel—I made careful inquiries—has ever seen this mysterious stranger.'

'The colonel himself has no doubt about having seen him?'

'None. He is unshakable on the point; but I must add that he was not communicative, and I did not care to press him. All I know is that at least twice, if not thrice, he has complained to me that a dark-bearded, "foreign-looking fellow" (those were his words) was seen by him prowling about the grounds. I believe that you may get more information from him than I, and if you can make a point of seeing him soon, perhaps between us we may arrive at the cause of his moodiness.'

'I meant to run North before long, and I will start a day or two earlier than I intended. The colonel has always appeared to me to have a sane and well-balanced mind. I shall be surprised if he is under any delusion.'

'Pardon my pursuing the subject. Blackmail is not unknown, Mr Forbes.'

I shook my head. I was certain that the chivalrous old gentleman had no dark memories.

'Impossible! I am sure that he has nothing to hide.' I spoke a little stiffly, perhaps, and the doctor was prompt to notice it.

'Mr Forbes, my work is the repairing of men's minds and bodies, and I run across many curious and pitiful cases which teach me that the "impossible" and the "improbable" often mock one's preconceptions.'

'Doubtless. But blackmail! The colonel is the soul of honour.'

'There is no need for any one to tell me that,' said the doctor, with a warm ring in his voice. 'I know no man for whom I have a greater regard and, if I may say so, affection. He is without fear and without reproach. But I cannot shut my eyes to the melancholy fact that the lives of many sensitive, innocent men and women have been wrecked through chantage.'

Again I shook my head. 'I am inclined to disregard both the blackmail and the delusion theories. If my uncle says that he has seen a man prowling round the house, I believe him. If you put aside blackmail, what motive could any one have for coming to an out-of-the-way corner of the world like the Glen?'

'Robbery? Is it possible?'

'There is always the risk of robbery, of course. The world is full of thieves. But unless a thief happens to be a simpleton, he doesn't advertise his intentions by showing himself beforehand taking a lively interest in the crib he proposes to crack.'

'Still, it is possible. Is there anything of great value—jewels, curios, or the like—which might attract a thief or even a crazy collector? I have met a collector whose hobby for intaglios grew from an obsession to a mania, and who carried out, single-handed, a series of the most cunning thefts known to modern criminologists. His name would surprise you.'

Beyond some not very valuable pictures and the modest family plate, I knew that The Bield contained nothing worth the attention of a professional cracksman. The pantry, I imagined, would be the most attractive room in the house for the class of prowler found in a remote district like Glen Ciuin, and I said so.

'Well, well!' replied Dr Hall. 'Whatever may be the cause, I hope that you will see the colonel soon, and sound him tactfully on the subject. There may have been a temporary derangement, a mere speck of dust, so to speak, in the brain's mechanism. You can count on my letting you know any developments worth recording. Now, I must be off. I am returning to the North by the afternoon train, and I have a good deal to do before I start. I am not sorry to go, for I confess that a little of the town goes a long way with me. A city practice would soon knock me up. Indeed, the charm of the Cairngorms—I am a lover of mountains—appeals to me even in this wild weather.'

'And to me, doctor. Perhaps some day we may climb them together.'

'Let us hope so. Truth to tell, my dislike of towns and my love for the open were the chief causes of my settling in the Glen. I get my share of sport. I have a penchant for observation of wild life with a camera, and I hope soon to publish a monograph on Alpine lichens. I am often out on the mountains alone, and know almost every corrie of them by heart. Apart from my hobbies, I think of a long day in these solitary places as a—how shall I put it?—a "soul-bathe."'

I nodded. 'I know what you mean.'

'It is good to meet one who understands. Au revoir, then! The colonel will be interested to hear of our chance meeting.'

We shook hands cordially, and he left with me the impression (one which I never had cause to correct) of having met an interesting and capable man.

Although he had assured me that there was no cause for alarm, Dr Hall's information disturbed me. The colonel was my dead father's brother, and the most lovable of men. The thought of any real or imaginary trouble touching him weighed upon me. I made up my mind to go North in the spring vacation, and was considering uneasily the chill question of ways and means, when Keene-Leslie arrived and bore me off to the dining-room.

The cloud on my spirits would not lift, and it made me the dullest of guests. I intended to tell Tony my adventure in the fog, and to get his views on it after luncheon; but it is a bad plan, when one's mind is charged with a subject, to hold it in reserve during a meal. The result in this instance was that it induced in me a species of conversational paralysis. I count it a crime to spoil good talk, but my contribution consisted of punctuating Tony's remarks with futilities such as 'Just so' and 'I suppose so.' My thoughts wandered. I was miserably conscious of failure, and wholly glad when the luncheon came to an end and we went back to the lounge.

'You're not very lively, my friend,' said Tony. 'You haven't opened your mouth for the last half-hour except for purposes of nourishment, and (contrary to your custom) you kindly allowed me to deliver a monologue on passing affairs without comment or contradiction. Further, you are distrait, and you are looking a bit fagged. What is it, Neil? I shouldn't worry too much, if I were you, over your "tip-and-run" in the mining market.'

'Truth to tell, my own anxieties have been pushed into a back-seat since I left you last night. I have a story which may interest you,' I said; and then I gave him an account of my adventure in the fog and its sequel. He listened so intently that his cigar went out.

When I had finished, 'A red-haired liar, a dead sailor, and a rifled cabinet!' he exclaimed. 'This sounds promising. Let me hear it again, and I'll take some notes.'

Once more I went through the story carefully, step by step, while he took notes, now and then asking a question.

'It seems to me that you have come well out of it with nothing more than a smear of blood on your shirt. That pocket-book was wanted badly. Its present possessor isn't a beginner. The words "ossa humiliata," followed by the little cross at the end of the paper, are queer. I happen to remember that they occur in an antiphon in the Roman Catholic Office of the Dead. The complete sentence runs: "Exultabunt Domino ossa humiliata" ("The humbled bones shall rejoice in the Lord").'

'What do you make of it?'

He shook his head. 'Nothing as yet. But I am most interested. Do you mind taking me to your rooms and letting me have a look round? We have an hour and a half before my train starts.'

We arrived at Jura Street in a few minutes, and there I showed him the cabinet. He put me through my story again, amplified his notes, and checked them with my statement.

'I should like very much to meet the ingenious Mr "M'Nair,"' said he.

'Have you any theory?'

'None meanwhile, except that I agree with the fairly obvious conclusion come to by the police, that the man who opened your cabinet was a confederate of "M'Nair." I'll get a copy of the finger-print on your shirt-front from the police. I can arrange this through Scotland Yard—with whose chiefs, as you may guess, I have more than a bowing acquaintance—and I'll pigeon-hole the copy of the print along with my notes. But, to be quite frank, unless Mr "M'Nair" is laid by the heels, I'm not going to refer to them or think about the business, unless, of course, there are developments. Take my advice and do the same. Don't bother about murders that don't belong to you. And now I must bolt for my train.'

I saw him off from the Waverley, and returned to Jura Street, fully resolved to follow his counsel and trouble myself no further with an affair which, I thought, was no concern of mine.

(Continued on page 83.)

GERMANS AND NATIVES IN NEW GUINEA.

By Thomas J. McMahon.

THE world has not heard of all the cruelties of the Germans towards the natives in the early days of German New Guinea. Those cruelties have left their marks—marks of decline and disease that seem almost irremediable. The Germans' disregard of native life is evidenced in this territory as in all their other colonial possessions. Prior to the war the colony's loss in commercial value, through death and sickness among the natives, made the Germans pause, and, with that thoroughness which characterised all their doings in New Guinea, they by force and hasty measures tried to restore what they had fast been destroying—namely, the native population, which had come into baneful contact with German officials, planters, and traders. The late German governor—to his credit be it said, all speak well of him in New Guinea—seriously championed the rights of the natives. He brought in many humane regulations regarding their comfort and their protection from exploitation. Still, after all, it was a tardy and limited humanity. According to British ideals, there was much yet wanting to free the unfortunate natives from the environment of slavery. It seemingly would be an impossibility for Germans to consider any human being of black colour worthy of kindness, or to be treated in any other way than as a slave to the superior white man. To this day the average German planter looks upon concern for the health, the comfort, and the uplifting of native labourers as so much sentimental rubbish. He would kick and flog a troublesome native to death—if he dared—with as little feeling as he would abuse or shoot a dog. The German makes no secret of the fact that he considers the natives as animals, to be worked and driven in any harsh way, so long as he himself is deriving wealth from that labour.

The population, therefore, of the many islands of what was German New Guinea territory has dwindled from thousands to hundreds, and the dwindling still goes on.

This depopulation is startling the Australian administration, as it did the German just before the war—when it was too late for action. That has been left for the present more humane administration. Missionaries, in particular, and all other classes now, are alarmed at the numbers of natives that are dying of disease. The very savages, those away from general civilisation, already are tainted with the scourge of the white man (sexual diseases); whilst those brought under the direct influence of Europeans show a percentage of disease so high as to brand the native races as rotten. Every year the shortage of labour increases, and whenever the veil of inquiry is lifted, the main reason for it is found in the appalling ravages of death and disease. A wise administration, such as the present, is looking into the future with anxious eyes; for, if the native races continue to decline at the present rate, the development of the islands will be threatened with a complete stoppage. This is what the Australian régime, with laudable zeal, has set itself to check and remedy.

On the other hand, British public opinion must get a shock, when the facts come out and the numbers are known, as to some of the effects produced on the natives throughout the Pacific by 'sentimental' ideas of protecting them from slavery and harm. Such views lead to the most absurd results, and produce in great measure bad effects instead of good. Whilst there are missionaries about, their vigilant eyes will see that no slavery or exploitation of natives takes place; but it is the missionaries in many parts who are complaining that the natives are becoming more useless and idle as they become more protected. The native is not responding in bettering himself and preserving his island home in a way that might be expected from him in return for the liberal treatment which the British administration insists shall be his. This public opinion is pampering the native too much, and so spoiling him; and the greatest efforts of any British administration in its management of natives are made abortive. Natives do not recognise the quality of kindness as we understand it. They take it for weakness, and they make no effort for improvement. This is so in German New Guinea at the present time. The Australian administration has gone from the one extreme to the other, from German cruelty to British sentimental humanity. The natives, in their new freedom—a freedom that lacks any kind of effective restraint—are, to say the least of it, quite out of hand. 'Me no frighten of Government' is what you will often hear 'cheeky' natives say—and nowadays there are far too many of the natives who are 'cheeky' (an independence that galls the Germans excessively). It is very evident that, much as the Australian régime in German New Guinea would like to do—and it has the loftiest and most sensible of ideals—it is made timid by the bugbear of outside public opinion, is afraid to act as the situation demands, and is merely taking the line of least resistance in the matter of forming the character and encouraging the usefulness of the natives. Undoubtedly the management of the natives is the administration's weakest point; but in all fairness no blame can be put upon the administrator and his officers. The natives, under this benign influence, are fast becoming less energetic, whilst their powers of cunning are being developed to an extraordinary degree. In Rabaul to-day it is possible to find black 'artful dodgers' that compare very favourably—or unfavourably—with Dickens's. To give an instance of this: it is quite a common practice for a native, an old hand, sentenced to a caning, to pass the order quickly on to some new hand, raw and unsophisticated, who receives the punishment, as may be imagined, with feelings of intense surprise. Visitors to Rabaul, or, in fact, any part of the German territory, since the occupation, are pretty unanimous in their uncomplimentary references to the pampering of the natives that is going on, and in maintaining that (as in Fiji in these times) the natives are likely to become an encumbrance and not an asset.

However, if it is impossible to commend the native legislation of the new administration in German New Guinea, no praise is high enough for the magnificent attempt it has made and is making to check the decline in population and to heal the sick. Native hospitals, fully equipped, are everywhere, and nothing is left undone to promote new health in the wretched people. These hospitals are to be found on missions, on plantations—in fact, wherever there is an attempt at settlement. It is a sad sight. The hospitals are always crowded; the sufferings and the mutilations from disease and wounds are too horrible to be realised by any who have not witnessed them. These black peoples, who were strong in their ethics of morality in the days before they knew the white man, are to-day in thousands the victims of German lust. Contamination is spreading from village to village, like some awful plague, and the most appalling instances of it are always coming up for observation. Children in the most sorrowful plights are to be seen in most of the wild villages, innocent mites, their bodies stunted, shrivelled, and unnatural in every respect, covered with filthy sores. Human abominations, too horrid for description, once seen, never to be forgotten. And this it is that the Australian administration, with wonderful zeal and determination, has set itself to check; and it is succeeding in a way that will reflect everlasting credit on it, and shed an added lustre on British humanitarian ideals.

In German times the Chinaman was en-encouraged, and it is almost impossible to go anywhere in this territory without meeting John. It does not matter how lonely the spot or how remote; there, trading with the natives, will be found a Chinaman. The unanimous opinion, especially of officials and missionaries, is that the Chinaman, with his 'ways that are deep,' is not a good model for the natives; rather, he prefers to come down to the level of the natives and be as they are. With the Chinaman's laxity of morals, and the native's power of assimilating taints of civilisation (and John Chinaman is a first-class monitor), the results may be better imagined than related. The Chinaman manages persistently to evade the law, and though he keeps out of jail, does not keep out of mischief. There is a cry out against him, and there must be some reason for it. The natives show no respect for Chinamen—'Kongkongs,' as they call them. Yet, around the Chinese trading-station there always will be found natives, especially women, and everything points to the truth of many remarkable and weird stories told of the Kongkong's conduct, and affords good arguments for putting some restraint on his increase, at any rate as a trader.

It is a debatable point with some people whether taxing natives is a wise and fair proceeding. Judging by present-day results in German New Guinea, it has uses that stay argument against it. When at first introduced by the Germans, it was accompanied with harshness and cruelty, and was not acceptable to the natives. Now they have grown accustomed to the regularity with which the time for payment comes round, and the tax, or 'throw-away money,' as they call it, of ten shillings per year is paid up promptly. In twelve months the amount collected by the Australian officials made a record never approached in the days of German collecting. The levy's uses lie in the fact that in order to have the money to pay the tax the natives must do something to earn it. That means that it suggests or keeps awake in their minds the necessity for work. If it were not for this tax (enforced by the German law), many more natives would remain idle, and recruiting would be more difficult. It also helps in the maintenance of the many roads that run through the territory, for a native who cannot find his tax-money goes off and puts in so much time on his district roads. It is in travelling round at such times as tax-collecting days that the decimation of the native population can be fully realised. Villages are to be seen with mostly old men and women—with no children. Villages that one and all were once full of life, of spirited and healthy inhabitants, now contain twenty or thirty poor, miserable beings, upon whose faces are marked plainly disease and death. When taxes are paid questions are asked and answers recorded on a printed form: 'Are you married?'—or in local parlance, 'You got Mary [wife] belonga you?' 'How many children?'—or more correctly, 'How many piccaninny, man [boy], Mary [girl], you got?' Out of every hundred adult natives, perhaps one-third may be married, and not one-half of these will have children. The dire result is, of course, evident, and it is little wonder that some of the smaller-sized islands are no longer subject to the tax; there are either no natives left or so few that it would not pay to bother about them.

Natives employed by the administration or those working for planters or others are exempt from taxation. The idea is to make the rest realise that work brings its reward in money, which not only pays the tax, but buys extra food and loin-cloths, knives, and tobacco. In other words, it is meant as an incentive to keep busy, and this makes the chiefs of each village, who are held responsible for the full amount to be paid up, round up their men on the approach of the tax-collector, and see that the money is ready. It is sometimes paid half in German marks, and half in English shillings; but the whole village must pay the amount assessed according to the latest returns, allowing for decreases of population.

One of the strangest conditions of this German territory is the 'pidgin-English' that is heard everywhere. German speaks to German, Englishman to German, and all to the natives in this absurd lingo. No one attempts to speak either pure English or pure German, and the pidgin-English may really be said to be the territory's language, so common is it. It is wrongly supposed that the natives can understand nothing else; but one has only to go to the missions, where it is forbidden, to find that the native can understand and speak pure English or pure German more easily than he can the gibberish that is constantly forced on him. On a mission boys can be found able to read English, and even set up correct English for printing; whilst on a plantation, if you want a crosscut-saw, you describe what you want in pidgin-English, in this vague style, 'Pull him, he come; push him, he go; all time kai-kai [eat] tree.' When you require hot water for a shave, you order your boy to bring hot water 'to cut em grass.' If you want a bottle of beer opened, he is instructed to 'fight em bottle.' When a boy waiting on you at table wants to know the brand of cheese you like, he requests, 'You wantem su-su [cheese] all the same good smell, or all the same stink [Stilton].' A native's impression on seeing a piano played finds language in this fashion, 'Big fella, white fella massa, he fightem teeth [notes] belonga big fella boxis [piano], and big fella boxis, my word, he plenty sing out;' and so on. The most absurd word-pictures are presented in this queer language to denote the simplest article or action. The Germans, strange to say, always have used it in dealing with their natives, and a German will speak most fluently in pidgin-English, using quite a number of English words in so doing. Yet if these same words are put together in proper English grammatical form they become as Hebrew to him. Just before the war the German governor, already alluded to, was so impressed with the absurdity of pidgin-English that he founded a college in Rabaul where he was going to force natives to learn pure German. Quite a number of natives from various parts were enrolled, and when once these got a sufficient knowledge of the German language they were to be sent out to help their fellow-natives, and from then punishments were to begin in order to help in driving out the silly language that has taken such a remarkable hold on men, white and black. It is a pity that the German governor did not get his opportunity, for there is no college in Rabaul now for the extermination of one of the grossest absurdities extant.

Of the many tribes in the many islands of the territory, it cannot be said that one is low in the standard of intelligence or the possibility of usefulness. To judge by their lazy ways and persistent stupidity, it would be an easy matter to consider them as well-nigh hopeless as regards learning trades, incapable of becoming alert and skilful in any class of work; and yet, go to the missions, and even on to some of the plantations, and it is possible to find natives qualified for any mechanical work, and even with literary abilities sufficient to make first-class teachers and clerks. There is no doubt that the natives have not had, and are not getting, a fair trial. The Germans treated them as animals, abused them and prevented their individuality from appearing, scoffed at their intelligence, and gave them neither hope nor chance. The British, in one moment, it might be said, lifted them to a pedestal that puzzles them, that takes all their natural native spirit out of them, and that wants them to possess all the attributes of the white man, with the disadvantages of a black's skin; and the consequence is an all-round failure. When one compares them with the natives of Java, for instance, allowing for the superiority of these islanders, it does not seem that, in the initial stages, these intelligent German New Guinea natives, in any number worthy of note, are making headway as they should, or are even giving promise of so doing. With such a rich territory as is the whole of German New Guinea, and with such possibilities of development, the natives are so lacking in ambition, so far behind as an asset in the progress of their own country, that it is self-evident that some new method must be tried to arouse ambition in them, and to make them understand how essential they are to the future advancement of their country.

DOCTORING A CHINESE CREW.

THE medical supervision of a Chinese crew calls for an unusual degree of callousness, patience, and gravity of demeanour. Fortunately the mate who practises the healing art aboard our ship is a canny Scot, and is abundantly blessed with these qualifications.

One of the most common complaints we have to deal with among our 'yellow pearls' is beri-beri. This disease is caused, it is supposed, through over-indulgence in polished or, it may be, mouldy rice. Ashore there is little danger of their contracting it, their diet there consisting mainly of fresh air and an occasional banana; but immediately they come aboard a ship where rations, especially rice, abound, they develop an alarming coefficient of consumption. Officially they have three meals a day; in reality they have only one, beginning when they turn out, and ending when they turn in. It is rice, rice, curry and rice all day long. The average daily consumption of dry rice per man with us is two and a quarter pounds, this in addition to his bread, potato, and meat allowance. Moreover, when symptoms of beri-beri become apparent—a discoloration and mortification of the flesh—the victim will not give up his rice, even if we assure him that the sacrifice will save his life. He would far rather die. In fact, he is convinced that he will die. To live would be an impertinence, and wholly contrary to the fitness of things Chinese.

A typical case of this fatalistic hopelessness was that of a young quartermaster—'Smiling Morn' we called him, from his bright and sunny nature. He contracted beri-beri shortly after he joined us. We had great hopes of effecting a cure, however, as he was a robust and intelligent fellow. To this end we tried to induce him to give up rice. The mate commanded, threatened, coaxed, pleaded. But it was in vain. 'Beri-beri in ankle now,' he explained. 'By-and-by reach knee. By-and-by reach middle. By-and-by reach heart. When reach heart me die.' It might be a month; it might be six months; but it was inevitable. It was so written, and he took what the gods sent without murmur or complaint. If they sent death—why, it was nothing to make a song about. Meanwhile he would have their present gift—two and a quarter pounds of rice every day!

And under such circumstances not the whole faculty of Harley Street could save life.

'Their malady convinces the great assay of art' (Macbeth, iv. 3). So, very quietly and at the earliest opportunity, we discharge all beri-beri patients at our first port of call where a shore hospital will accept them.

Another common disease among our Chinese crew is consumption. On one occasion a fireman had it unknown to the 'doctor,' himself, or his mates. These last thought he was malingering, and often belaboured him unmercifully for his laziness. They had a natural objection to doing his work as well as their own. One day the engineer-on-watch found him lying in a corner of the stokehold, moaning and coughing, and evidently in great pain. His mates had mauled and pummelled him till he was half-dead. Within a week he died. None of his fellows would touch his body; it was left to the mate and a quartermaster to sew it in canvas. The steward ventured to put in a few joss-sticks for the safe passage of his soul. We buried him at midday, stopping the ship for the ceremony. Only after great physical as well as moral persuasion would the firemen come and witness the burial of their late shipmate. 'Why trouble? He makee die proper,' they grumbled. Next day the chief fireman asked to see the captain. To him he explained what fast friends he and the dead man had been—that his (the dead man's) brother was almost as his own. Would the captain pay him what wages were due his dear departed shipmate, so that when we returned to Singapore he would be able to hand them over to the bereaved relatives? . . . The captain has a quick tongue and a heavy boot. His reply was brief and pointed.

The great majority of our celestials are inveterate opium-smokers. They can secrete only a very little on their person when they join the ship, and they cannot get supplies on the voyage. The result is that their stores quickly become exhausted. Out of charity we have occasionally to administer an opium pill to relieve the terrible agony of their craving.

Then, of course, they occasionally suffer from 'bunk-sickness,' or, as it is less popularly called, laziness. We had a perfect epidemic once. Sailor after sailor reported sick and unfit for duty—temperature and appetite normal—and the trouble was spreading to the quartermasters.

'Give them salts—generous doses at short intervals,' advised the captain, who had learned much wisdom in his sailing-ship days. His medical philosophy was simple. 'If a man feigns sick, salts will cure him. If he is sick, they may.' (And I can vouch for the truth of this unromantic criterion.) So salts it was—copious doses at short intervals. Yet their pains and aches and appetites persisted. We tried sundry wonderful concoctions of our own devising—all without result. Our vilest tasting patents they tossed off at a gulp—and looked for more. The truth is, they like medicine! The captain grew desperate.

'D' you think this ship is a —— Chinese convalescent home? I'll —— well log the next man that is ill!' And, strange to say, on the morrow there were no pains or aches complained of.

One fellow, a great, hulking Foochow trimmer, gave us a lot of trouble. He had had an abscess removed from his leg two days before we left port. Normally the wound would have been well healed in a week, but he persisted in probing it with his finger, or a pin, or his knife, or anything that came handy, just to 'catchee see,' as he explained. Eventually the mate had to lash him down to save his life.

They place implicit faith in the mate's ministrations, and that for a reason that throws an interesting sidelight on the Chinese mind. They argue that the mate will do his very best to cure them and make them well again, if only in order to get work out of them. A shore doctor has no such vital interest in their welfare. Frequently we have had some of our crew refuse to take the shore doctor's medicine (they know it by the bottle and the elaborate label), alleging that it made them worse. Yet they declared themselves much benefited by that same medicine transferred by the mate into a ship's bottle (this harmless precaution is necessary), and flavoured with peppermint to disguise the taste. Simple faith is still potent to work wonders. With its help a judicious mixture of water, cascara, cough-mixture, and grave-faced bluff will effect marvellous cures.

Every morning, immediately after breakfast, the boatswain lines up the invalids for the day. He speaks the most intelligible English, so he acts as interpreter and describes their symptoms to the mate. Moreover, he is responsible for the mate's orders being carried out. If Ah Foo has to take a bottle three times a day, the boatswain must see that Ah Foo takes his bottle three times a day.

Our medicine-chest requires to be replenished at every port, for hardly a day passes without our having an invalid of some sort. Prominent amongst our drugs is a great cask of 'Asiatic mixture,' a wonderful panacea, guaranteed invaluable in the curing of all Oriental diseases. I do not know what the ingredients are, but I can certify that it looks and tastes its name, every drop. 'When in doubt, prescribe Asiatic mixture,' we find an ideal medical maxim. The orthodox dose is a table-spoonful, but nothing less than a bumper wine-glassful will satisfy our hardened crew. Asiatic mixture, black draught, and salts are the staples of our pharmacopœia.

And, all things considered, we have very few 'casualties.' Perhaps a qualified medical man might marvel, and occasionally stand aghast, at the treatment of our 'doctor.' But it must be remembered that his sole medical education has been a compulsory course of twelve lectures on 'first aid.' He has to deal with men who cannot describe their own trouble. 'Head makee feel very pain,' is about as precise as they ever are in detailing their aches and symptoms. Fortunately there is always what the mate calls the 'statistical point of view,' according to which the population of China is constantly somewhere in the neighbourhood of four hundred millions.

JOHN BROWN.

CONFESSIONS OF A NEW ARMY CADET.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D., and the Doctor; &c.

CHAPTER VI.—THE MODERN GIRL.

IN peace or war we cannot do without the ladies. They brighten this weary world, cheer us when we are in the depths, and tend us 'when pain and anguish wring the brow.' Our mothers mould our characters, our sisters help to keep us clean, while other fellows' sisters provide the love and the inspiration so needful to man. And war is good for the business of Cupid. Danger gives admiration scope, and promotes the deeper affection.

Adela was my star. When drill and lectures were done, I basked in her smiles and played the old, old game. But, like all women, she loved to tease. It was, therefore, in keeping with her character to send me the following:

'MY DEAR JOHNNIE,—Don't come on Saturday, as I shall be engaged. We are having two Australians to lunch, and shall be busy all day. You will understand. Love. ADELA.'

That was all she said. Two Australians! I felt annoyed, for these Cornstalks are the deadly rivals of the British Army. One of them had stolen my little French girl in La Bassée, while another had vamosed with my V.A.D. from a Strand hotel. No, it wasn't good enough, and I loudly swore.

'What's wrong, John?' inquired Beefy.

'Adela is booked for Saturday. The Anzacs are cutting me out. I'm fed up!'

'I'm in your boat too, old chap. Her sister is apparently on the same stunt. She sent me word this morning, but I am not worrying. There's lots of girls in this world. A little change will do us good. I'm fed up being respectable. Women are the limit. They're getting too sure of themselves. They're like salmon—want a lot of playing before you land them. There's nothing like cold indifference to bring them round.'

'You're an authority, Beefy.'

'Well—yes. I've paid for my experience. I've loved everything from a parlour-maid to a general's daughter. They're all the same. As Kipling says:

> The colonel's lady
> And Judy O'Grady
> Are sisters under their skin.

'Pursue them, lavish the wealth of a millionaire on them, yield them your life and soul, and they'll go round the corner to—the other fellow.

> They're contrary
> And they're wary;
> They're devils till they die.'

'You're a cynic, Beefy. You've met the wrong sort. You can't expect barmaids and ballet-girls to have souls. They trade their charms and squander their affections, but the real decent kind are not half-bad. I've a weakness for the opposite sex.'

'Oh, you're a ruddy idealist. You're always up in the moon. You're too trusting. You can't trust a woman. If I had my way, I'd go over to the system of the Moslems.'

'You're blasé, Beefy. You have had such a good time that you think the world has gone wrong. What's the good of being a cynic? I'm not posing, old chap, but I do think there's a lot of goodness in modern girls if you care to search for it. Why, they're real sports! Look what they're doing to win the war. They're nursing, driving, ploughing, and cooking, without a grouse. It's a great revelation! This war has given them their opportunity. You can't put these girls into harems after the war. Your mentality is crooked, Beefy.'

'Per-haps! All the same, I'm convinced the modern girl is neurotic. I may be blasé and all that, but I'd much sooner have the steady old Mid-Victorian type than these short-skirted creatures who adore a naval man on Monday and elope with a soldier on Tuesday. Seems to me they only want a good time. A fellow with a Rolls-Royce has a better chance than a man with a Ford. Women judge you by your cheque-book. They want to hook the fellow who can give them everything from a pug-nosed poodle to a collar of diamonds. They're nearly all adventuresses, and the only chap they understand is the primitive one who spanks them hard when they get into their tantrums. Women are all right when they're mastered. We men are long-suffering, and much too generous to the average girl.'

'You're a jealous devil, Beefy. You want your own way. Freedom, apparently, is made for you and not for the girl. I'm no great Christian, but I do think if you trust a girl she will always play the game.'

'Oh, you're a blinkin' ass!'

'Why?'

'Adela has just told you not to come to-day, as she is busy with the Anzacs. And yet you talk about trust!'

'That's true. Still, on reflection, it would be an impertinence for us to warn all the other fellows off the track. If I'm annoyed, I'm not going to be narrow-minded about it. Besides, I'm not engaged to the girl. I've an open mind so far as a mate is concerned. I'm simply looking around, and I won't endorse your barbarian creeds. Why, Beefy, you're almost a Hun where the other sex is concerned. Come on, you silly old ass; let's go and get some fresh air.'

'All right, John Bunyan,' mumbled Beefy, shoving on his cap and sauntering out of the camp.

We took a train to the nearest town, a manufacturing place, alive with munition-girls and other war workers. As we ambled along we had time to observe the manners and methods of the crowd. A healthy Amazon gave us 'the glad eye.'

'There, John, didn't I tell you they're as primitive as in the Bronze Age?'

'That's just the fun of the uneducated. Hang it all! I thought you rather liked that sort of thing.'

'That's not the point. What I want to prove is this. You can "pick up" almost every girl in this street. These girls are man-mad.'

'You judge by superficial things. Of course, there may be a little in what you say; but you must remember that men now and after the war will be scarce in the marriage-market. I'm sorry for all the nice girls who are being left on the perch. As for the lady who smiled, she doesn't represent her sex. You know it, too; but you are simply bent on "chewing the rag." You're a fat-headed old'——

'Excuse me,' said a sweet-faced girl at that moment, touching my arm.

'Yes?' I answered, a little abashed.

'Are you in the Cadet Battalion at Windmoor?'

'Yes,' I replied more pleasantly, observing how charming she and her companion looked. Beefy was grinning like a nigger.

'I wonder if you could give this note to your fellow-cadet—Robert Clarke.'

'Oh, Nobby Clarke?'

'I believe you call him "Nobby."'

'Certainly—delighted! May I have the pleasure of telling him the name of the sender?'

'His sister—Marjory. I do hope you will excuse my asking you, but I want him to come to-morrow for tea, and I thought I should meet somebody from the camp. I was rather nervous about stopping you, for you appeared so engrossed in some discussion.'

'Yes, we were discussing girls. My friend here is a bit of a cynic.'

'Don't believe him,' interjected Beefy.

'I think you are all very gay at the Cadet School. Now, will you excuse me? My sister and I have to go on to hospital. We're V.A.D.'s, you know.'

'Oh, don't go yet,' pleaded Beefy. 'I wonder if we may ask you to tea at the picture-house.'

'It's hardly conventional, is it?'

'But it's war-time, Miss Clarke, and of course—we know your brother. He's in our hut. He will be quite pleased, I am sure.'

'That sounds consoling to my conscience.' Then turning, she called her sister Hilda over, and away we went to the tea-rooms. They were well-educated and most charming girls, and Marjory dispensed tea like a duchess.

'Do tell me, Mr Brown, what you two were fighting about when I stopped you.'

'A simple matter. Beefy, here, was saying women are neurotic and cheap. I took a brief in defence of your sex—that's all.'

'Mr Jones is saucy, I think,' muttered Marjory, just as she was about to put her pretty teeth into a cherry-cake.

'Per-haps; but don't you think you girls get it all your own way these days?' answered Beefy.

'Yes, after thousands of years of bondage. It was surely time to break the shackles. We've been cooped up like canaries. There's a big difference between freedom and folly. I don't think the average girl makes a mess of things. Ours is not the easy path you think, Mr Jones. Why shouldn't we do things? We can't all get married, so we have to carve out our careers. If we do have our innocent pleasures, I think we work mighty hard for them, especially in war-time.'

'Yes; but aren't you girls a fickle lot?'

'That depends on the sort of girl. Many of you boys chase powdered creatures, who are as brainless as they are hopeless. They are the moths who rush at every bright candle, but they don't represent the nice girls in the provinces or away in the decent West-End homes. These girls are getting our sex a bad name. You boys are so silly—— Do have more tea,' she said, peering into Beefy's cup.

'Thanks—I will.'

'I think you boys learn a lot of nonsense when you go to public schools. Some schools have a rotten atmosphere. You dabble in pernicious literature and in matters beyond your years. What you want is fresh air and plenty of tennis or golf with real nice girls! You won't get the best of our sex at stage-doors or in saloon-bars. And that's where many boys form their views. However, we've got the vote, and we'll help you through. Have a cherry-cake.'

'Come, come, Miss Clarke! You're not all saints; you know that.'

'Granted, Mr Jones. But what about the men? Don't you think there are faults on both sides? The world was never perfect, and never will be, but it's silly to hate each other. Come now, let's be friends. You're much too nice to have those silly cynical views. I really think you're just arguing the point.'

'Not exactly. Just look at the bunch of girls around us here. They've got bags of flour on their faces, red paint all over their lips, and they do fancy themselves. They'll pick up anything in trousers.'

'These are the drones, not the busy bees. All the best girls, like the best boys, are helping to win the war. They haven't time to idle all day here. But the average man is a queer creature. He doesn't want a W.A.A.C., a "Wren," or even a humbly dressed V.A.D. They haven't got enough frills or fripperies. When he gets his leave he hobnobs with the girl slackers. After a day he is disillusioned; then he turns round on the sex. You men are so inconsistent. You want the lilies, but you always grasp the deadly nightshades. Do have another cake.'

'Ah, well, you're different,' mumbled Beefy.

'Thanks—but I'm really "feeding the brute." You boys want mothering. It doesn't do to let you have it all your own way. The world, somehow, has gone mad. This war is making all of us catty. It's much nicer to be chummy, isn't it?'

'Yes, I think you are right on the chummy point.'

'Good! You're really not so pagan as I imagined. At first I thought you were a wild man of the woods.'

'I thought girls preferred that kind.'

'Perhaps; but they're not reliable. Still, I believe the average girl likes a blend of the saint and the sinner.'

'You women are certainly a mystery.'

'To a man—yes. That's our armour. You are all so fickle that we daren't put all our goods in the window. You're really better when on the end of a string and kept in suspense. It stops you chasing our rivals. Women have no use for polygamy. When we find a good thing we hang on to it.'

'We're certainly not so subtle as women.'

'That's easily explained. You are the hunters; we are the hunted. We need a lot of tricks to dodge you. For all that, a woman is quite simple. What she really craves for is affection. That's what she is here for; give her that and she'll give you the moon.'

'Well, you're a marvel.'

'No; I'm only a girl.'

'But other girls don't talk like you.'

'More's the pity! You men are so scarce that girls frequently sink opinions and principles to catch you. It's really not worth the trouble. There are more things in heaven and earth than chocolates or trousers. Why should a girl let a man be the great I-Am? It's not good for him! It makes him a Turk! Equality of intellect and opportunity is surely reasonable.'

'By Jove! I believe you're a suffragette.'

'Why not? You've had it all your own way for centuries. You've flooded the world with materialism. There are better things. Surely you don't want us to be German Fraus—fat frumps and housekeepers merely. You need Idealism. Girls have more of it than men. And it's your pagan code that's really upset our sex. You'd sooner have omelet than love.'

'But we must have omelets.'

'You don't want a woman simply to preside over pots and pans and jam-jars. If the German women had only asserted themselves there would never have been a war.'

'Explain.'

'You must know that German women were locked in their kitchens, trained to prostrate themselves at the feet of man, and squashed when they asserted the sweeter and more reasonable philosophy which women have been given, so as to neutralise the barbarism of the world.'

'There's something in that, I grant you,' conceded Beefy.

'Now you are really coming round.'

'You are such a good advocate, you know. But I never thought pretty girls like you could be suffragettes. You don't need to be.'

'Heavens! What a thought! Must a suffragette have flat feet and a pug-nose? It isn't really a question of votes; it's a question of broadening out our philosophy and making the world more happy. There will be no more Hohenzollerns once we take a hand in the legislation of the world.'

'I'll vote for you—by Jove, I will!'

'How nice of you!' said Marjory, smiling sweetly and collecting her umbrella, gloves, &c.

'Must you go?' I asked regretfully. The discussion had been so interesting.

'Oh yes; we're on duty at four. Now, good-bye, Mr Brown.—Good-bye, Mr Jones.'

'Good-bye. Oh, by the way'——

'What?'

'Will you come to tea again?'

'Delighted. . . . Good-bye.' And away she and her sister went—a couple of dream-pictures in the garb of the V.A.D. As they disappeared I turned to Beefy and said, 'Well, old chap, what about women now?'

'Marvellous! Marvellous!'

I thought so too, for I had been thinking hard about Adela.

Was she flirting with the Australians?

(Continued on page 92.)

SHADOWS.

LINES WRITTEN IN ILLNESS.

I LIE and watch the shadows on the wall—
Strange shapes of bird and beast that come and go;
They are but faery-forms of things I know—
The firelight flickers redly over all.

It is too dark to read; I lie and dream.
Without, the night has lit the first pale star;
Peace in my chamber reigns. The things that are
Are mingled strangely with the things that seem.

Life is but half a dream, wherein we see
The shadows of those things we may not know;
Yet do we trust the forms that come and go
Hold forth a promise of a world to be—

And, till the creeping darkness covers all,
We lie and watch the shadows on the wall.

ALLAN SANDERSON.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

HOW THE WAR CAME HOME.

By LAUCHLAN MACLEAN WATT, Late Chaplain to the Forces, Author of The Heart of a Soldier, &c.

WHEN the harvest was deepening into rusted gold, I was resting in the sweet repose of a Scottish glen, and my heart became like a chamber of imagery, a place of many pictures, remembering what those four full years had held for the world. I asked myself often how this thing began. And I recalled several of the ways in which the war had come home.

I.

At the outbreak of war I was living on a little rocky islet, in a wild, long arm of the Scottish western seas. On either side of the loch rise high mountains, solemn and wonderful. A great pass, cleft through the granite wall, carries the highest road in Scotland, now long unfrequented, along its steep side. Sometimes the gap is filled with dripping mist, dark, weird, and terrible; and sometimes the sunshine leaps like a cascade through it; and then cloud-shadows dance. It is as though the heroes of ancient legend were at sport on the forsaken track which long ago was dragged through the glen, as men would drag a rope over a rocky ledge. Among those peaks lies the paradise of deer, and a vast desolation stretches where the quiet sheep browse. And at night, Heaven knows what ghosts whisper and gibber by black pools that glimmer in the dark, not a ripple disturbing the wide glower of stars, shining, sky-deep, in the peat water. Out beyond the mouth of the loch stretches the Island of Mist, the home of my heart, and of my blood-folk—serrated peaks of dim, beaten silver against a sky of pearl. From that crag in the sea we look upon it all, getting out of our beds to watch the wave lift the moonlight along with it as it babbles among the stones, stealing the lambent tenderness of the night into the caverned gloom that lies about the rocky walls. And we listen to the swift feet of the fresh tide running in, over the tired shoulders of the other that crawls out wearily towards the main. There is nothing else to do there but to look and to dream. Nothing could be more remote from world-jealousies and world-strife.

The corn was yellowing towards harvest when the blast of war broke across the glens. I heard a woman singing on a hillside just the evening before it came, as the gloaming shadows trailed along the shore. I do not think that any since then have heard a woman sing all through that land. And I do not believe that any woman will sing in our generation there again. For the soul of the Highland womanhood is watching, with low, soft crooning, from which the tears are winnowed, by graves in shell-torn battlefields, forsaken, over the seas. There is not a woman stooping to-day over the binding of the sheaves in Highland fields but when she rises looks across the water as though for a returning sail.

All that war means in the offset swooped down upon us in one hour. Day and night we heard the trains on the mainland carrying southward the brave lads from the wave-swept Hebrides. The call entered every little straw-roofed cottage and every stately home alike. It touched the sportsman on the moors and the fisher out upon the deep. It brought the lad in from the croft, the father from beside his little babe new-born, the mourner from the open grave. It woke the sleeper with its urgent clutch upon the arm, saying, 'Come.' And they looked around the world that meant everything to them, and went off into the cloud that so soon was to envelop all the earth.

Then came the cry of Lovat and Lochiel for men to follow them, as of old, to the fight. When that cry went up the glens in 1745, for the sake of the ancient Stewart dynasty, outcast from its throne, hundreds of Frasers and Camerons leapt across the heather to the banners of their chiefs. But a hundred years ago began the clearing of the quiet places for sheep-runs and for deer, and the Highlands of to-day are desolate. The folks were driven out of their crofts in thousands, to the rocky shores, or oversea. So the deer heard the cry of the chiefs, and wondered. And the sheep browsed where the clansmen had been. And the nettle waved on the wall of the roofless shealing. But the men who were still left in the clachan arose, and went away to get ready for the battle. And the children of those who had been scattered far through the world left their prairie homes, returning for the Old Land in the day of stress.

What a change came over everything then! Myself, going south to the call, saw, as the train swept by, the old folks out in the fields, wearily and slowly at work among the stooks.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

Four years ago! And now hardly a house yonder but has one dead, to remember with a sigh. And for many all the youth, which was their hope, is lying asleep under the crosses, or without a grave, in the lands of war, far remote from the quiet homes among our mountains. Alas! the old folks in the fields—the gray ones at the firesides—the little children wondering at grown-up people's tears—and the girls, loverless, looking over the sea!

That was how war came home to us in the hill places first.

II.

And then we heard how suddenly our nation had stepped into the welter, and how swiftly she had sent to the help of the outraged nations what she had to send. It was not much that we had to give, but we gave it—some seventy thousand men, the 'Contemptible' Invincibles, never to be forgotten by any to whom the remembrance of the brave is a precious thing. There never was an army like that in the world, and there scarcely can be again—representing the acme of military training, the fullness of military experience, and the deepest secret of military endurance. They found themselves immediately up against an overwhelming force, fighting divisions where they expected brigades; and they had to go back, foot by foot, mile by mile, leaving their bloody prints as their ever-thinning line retired, until at last they stood, knowing it was the final barricade of resolve their backs were up against. So their aching feet took hold on sacrifice, and they died where they stood. Their graves are their witnesses for ever.

I think I see them when they left first for the front, stealing down in the dark, through the sleeping villages of England, to the sea. One can picture the unlighted windows of the quiet cottage homes, the autumn dust deep in the highways, the gloom of roads that led through glades of woodland, where the trees met above them as they marched with their faces towards the war. That ghostly marching, which enabled our army to be in Flanders before anybody woke to hear of it, stands out as one of the most dramatic episodes of the great tragedy of our time.

I crossed the Channel in the troopship City of Benares on Christmas Eve 1914, and, midway, met the meaning of war face to face in the night, when slowly, illumined with lamps, like stars, the hospital-ship Asturias came athwart our course, with her burden of stricken men, gathered up from the Valley of the Shadow. We never forgot her, for she was no casual wayfarer, whom one passed without knowledge, on the midnight highway. She was the Sister of Mercy of the seas; and many a soldier blessed her as she passed upon the waters, and wondered, with sudden pain, when he heard how the hard-hearted enemy had sunk her in the deep. And the meaning of this war fell upon us, as with wounding, once again.

They sent our men out silently; and, save for their own songs and the scrunch of their feet on the roads of France and Flanders, silence went with them. I remember seeing them filling the streets of French towns as they silently, in the dark, moved forward; and I think there can be no more grimly doom-like thing than the great khaki lines going on, with not a note of music to hearten them. When the first band came to Havre in 1915, it was like a blast of cheer to all. There is nothing that so lifts the weary feet which have fallen out of rhythm, or awakes the heart that is drowsing towards exhaustion, on the march, like the voice of the trumpet, the beat of the drum, or the cry of the Highland bagpipe.

And, in the field, the war came home to me again and again. As I walked along the trenches, or sat and spoke with the men, or, with them, flattened myself against the muddy wall of a dirty ditch in Flanders while the trench-mortars or 'whiz-bangs' shook our little world of pain and dying; or went with them when they went to die—when they spoke to me of home and the hearts they loved; or when the deep silence of understanding lay between us, deep as the flood-tide, with tenderest thought; or when they lay beside me, broken with bloody ruin of manhood, ah, love of Christ! how the war spoke to my heart!

III.

It came again to me, its great, vast, inexhaustible meaning, when I saw the men in America, marching down Fifth Avenue, bronzed from the camps, ready to cross the seas. And the Jews enrolled to serve in Palestine touched the picture with an old-world significance. And then when I crossed with the ships that brought the thousands back to Columbus's ancient world to fight for liberty, returning in the ways Columbus went, to show the Old World that they had discovered a greater wonder than he had—the broad gladness of a vast freedom, without which assured to him no man can truly live.

IV.

Just the other day I sat in a green place, in a public garden, above the city of Edinburgh, and looked across that wonderful ancient place, over which lie such memories of a romantic past. The eye moved from ridge to ridge, from the battlemented towers that crown the Castle Rock, to the blue line that stretches off to the horizon, beyond the Bass Rock and the Isle of May, out to where the sleepless ships are watching the highways of the deep. How still it was! A gray lady in mourning wearily walked along, lost in thought. A man, with the sure touch of age upon him, passed. Then, after a long interval, a young fellow with wound-stripes on his arm, and a woman with a little child by her side. And that garden used to have crowds in it! At intervals the sound of the laughter of children was wafted to me, breaking on the stillness, from streets somewhere, out of sight, where they played. And a distant dying march of pipers was blown in gusts across the town—the old battle-strain of Donald Dubh, that for so long has made the feet of the brave keep time together, hastening to battle.

It was like a city under a spell, a glamour of gray sadness lying over it, somehow, even in the sunshine. The tall houses seemed to be listening for some strangely hushing word—the tall houses, with so many firesides now lonely for ever; with windows that women looked from, through eyes out of which the light has faded—with hearts which the sniper in Flanders pierced with the same bullets that struck down the blue-eyed Scottish lads who were their hope and joy.

Away to my right rose the many-towered school of Fettes, which has given all its youth to the sacrifice. Seven boys who were heads of that college in the past seven years are sleeping to-day beside their comrades oversea. In front of me lay the dome of the University, from which went every life that could, so full of promise for the intellectual progress of our age, willing to die for liberty.

I looked down upon houses which I knew had been darkened, and on one home that lost in a single hour its two brave sons in the great German drive of spring. I remember their father, aged with a sudden sorrow, saying to me, as he looked upon me with eyes that could not weep, 'I am sorry for Peter. He would be so grieved to die in a retreat. He would not have grudged his life if it had been in an advance he fell.' And house upon house, besides, I saw, saddened by the loss of only sons, in whom ended the story of long and ancient lines.

V.

And then, down where the corn was ripening for the reaper beside a great Scottish river, the sigh of whose passing spoke to me day and night of peace, the war was brought home to me still. Stately woodlands grow along the lofty river-banks, and ancient homes of noted names gleam through the trees. Broad acres lie around them, and the feet of men with names familiar on the lips of history trod their rooms. But in every one of them the blinds are drawn, the hearths are cold, the homes forsaken. Grass grows in the winding avenues. The leaves fall silently, and where they fall they lie. The high-roads stretch through quiet fields into hills of silence. For the men, rich and poor, are all away; and they who lived in these old places will never come back again. Through the sunshine and the shadow of the long years, the flushing and the fading of Scottish summer-times, the glow of dreamy autumns, and the winter storms, they will come back no more, nor see the valleys that they love, the river ever precious to their soul, the home of heart's desire. Now and again the arrow overleaps the seas, sometimes all the way from the distant East, and touches a cottage roof in the village, and the children going to school whisper the name of the brave lad who is dead. And a mother flings her apron over her face, and rocks herself to and fro, in restless longing for the unreturning. In glens, where the sheep so lately filled the world with wailing for their lambs snatched from them, quiet-faced women set the lighted lamp in the window ere they remember that he of whom they thought will need it no more to guide him home.

VI.

My God! shall it ever be again? One who had been a captive in the land of the enemy since the dark day of Mons wrote the other day: 'I am weary often, but I know the dawn is coming. For I have faith in my country.' That is the spirit that kept us going on. There can be no pity for those who, of evil aforethought, have widowed the heart of the world. But our children's children, if there be any—what of them? On their day nothing like this must dawn. The clean nations of the earth must smite hands on this. To-day we face the driving back of hell into its black shame finally. We write our compact in our best-loved blood. We bind ourselves, as with cords of lives most precious. Wrong shall be buried in its grave in hell when the boys come marching home. But from that grave there must be no resurrection. The stone of completed judgment must be sealed upon the mouth of it for ever and for ever. And whoso tries to lift that stone the world shall grind into bloody dust, without pity or remede.

That is what the war has brought home to us. The hope of men looks for a dawn over the waters to-day; and, thank Heaven, it does not look in vain.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER VII.

NO light was thrown on the death of the foreign sailor, nor was he identified. I paid several visits to the police authorities, and found that no one had taken the trouble to look at the body of the murdered man. In two or three days the newspapers exploited a new sensation, forgetting the Durham Street affair as speedily as, in turn, they forgot its successor. Yet a vague uneasiness, a feeling which had its root in something deeper than curiosity, clung to me. I could not shake myself free from the shadow of the night of the fog. Hitherto I had not believed in the theory that most men think that they possess the makings of a detective; but my vanity had been touched by my having been hoodwinked in the matter of the cabinet, and now I confess that I caught myself scrutinising every red-haired man whom I saw, and looking out warily for the next one. I do not know how many innocent citizens I must have scanned—some hundreds, I should say—but I saw nobody even remotely resembling my quarry, until one day, about dusk, a man with a short, scrubby, reddish beard gave me, as he passed, a significant and furtive glance. Instantly I turned and followed him. He threw a swift look over his shoulder and went down a quiet side-street; but, so far from quickening his pace, he came almost to a standstill at a shop window. Obviously he was in no hurry to get away. On the contrary, he was waiting for me, and with every appearance of equanimity. Our interview lasted for about ten seconds, for he proved to be a fifth-rate bookmaker's tout. Leaving him soldered to the spot by my language, I resolved to have done with amateur detective work.

There was enough anxiety to be faced in my own affairs without bothering, as Tony put it, about 'murders that didn't belong to me.' The wolf was getting nearer the door, and there were no prospects of work coming my way. But I trod my daily beat between my rooms and the Parliament House, keeping a stiff upper lip, hoping against hope that matters would somehow or other right themselves, and, if worried, was never downcast, although I had many a bad quarter of an hour and many bitter moments of self-criticism. Once I thought of applying for a vacant legal post in a fever-haunted, Godforsaken equatorial swamp; but as there was always the chance that I might get it, I hesitated. For once indecision belied its reputation and did its victim a good turn, for while I was balancing the pros and cons I received a telegram which put consideration of everything except the immediate present into the background. It was from my uncle, and ran: 'Come at once, if possible. Business urgent.' I sent off a reply, and took the first train North, wondering what the urgency was, and troubled by renewed fears regarding the colonel's health.

After Perth I got a carriage to myself in the early morning train, and had a sound sleep, waking up to the greeting of a fine Highland spring day as the train panted up the Drumochter.

Old Angus Macbain was waiting at the station with the dog-cart. Angus was 'handy-man' at The Bield, and no one ever earned the description better. He had been in my uncle's regiment, and having returned to his native glen after many years' service, was whole-heartedly devoted to his master. Angus could tie a fly with any one on Spey. He had been a fine shot and stalker in his day; and now, a benevolent despot, he looked after the lodge, helped in the stables, and, by way of recreation, 'took an interest' in the garden and tended a little croft of his own. A thirty years' war with a long succession of maids at The Bield had left him an unvanquished and grizzled bachelor.

His account of my uncle relieved me. 'The colonel iss well,' he informed me; 'yess, and ferry well. Indeed, it iss a long time since I wass seeing him so well. To pe sure, he will not pe having the long days on the hill he once wass, but him and me iss no so young now.'

'Indeed, it is a long time since you taught me the Spey cast, Angus. But I heard that my uncle had not been quite well.'

'He would pe keeping that to himself, then. Indeed, I have seen nothing wrong with him. If he hass no peen himself, he hass not troubled other folk with it. But that iss the kind of him! You will be telling me, Mr Neil, if he iss no well. It iss thirty years come Martinmas since I have been with him, and there iss no man like him.'

'I know it, Angus! Be sure that I shall tell you; but, from what you say, the colonel must be as fit as his years warrant.'

Much relieved by the thought that the state of my uncle's health was not the cause of my summons to The Bield, my spirits mounted wonderfully. Every yard of the drive was a delight. The morning was bright and serene to the zenith. The atmosphere, tingling, sparkling with the tonic quality of dry champagne, was so clear that distances seemed lessened, and familiar features of the strath stood out clean-cut and strangely near. In the windless air the Cairngorms, for once, were clear of mist to the high tops, their dark fastnesses and ramparts in abrupt contrast with the steel-blue canopy of the sky. I could pick out the bright threads of the hill-burns that are for ever running down their silver ladders, the green spires of well-remembered woods, and many a spur scaled by me when, an eager youngster, I had been out on the range in all weathers from Airgiod Meall to Ord Ban. Nearer gleamed my native river, its green haughs speckled with crofts, little blue stalks of peat-reek rising from them in the still air; above them, tier upon tier, their immemorial guardian mountains, awakening in me, as they always do, a strange inward incommunicable sense of wonder and solace. The beauty, the peace of it all was like a cool hand laid on hot, tired eyes. 'A soul-bathe.' I had almost forgotten Dr Hall's phrase; but now it was recalled, and it lingered with me until we turned into the avenue of The Bield and I was greeting its owner.

Old Angus was right. My uncle looked in his ordinary good health. He was, perhaps, a trifle more bent, and showed a few more white hairs; but his eye was undimmed, and his voice had the same kind and mellow ring in it as of old. Any fears I had vanished at the sight of him.

'I'm heartily glad you are able to be here, my boy,' he said, running a kindly, scrutinising, blue eye over me. 'First of all, breakfast! The business I want to tell you about will keep until you have sampled Janet's eggs and bacon; and then, no doubt, you'll want to have a stroll round the old place and get rid of some of the town's cobwebs. Afterwards I'll let you hear a yarn, and ask you a favour.'

'Command me, and I will do anything in my power,' I said, with all my heart.

'I know I can count on you, Neil. The yarn I'm going to spin is a curious one. Come into my room after you have had a look round, and I'll let you hear what I have to say.'

Breakfast over, I spent a pleasant half-hour going round the old place, and renewing my youth in the process. I interviewed old Janet, most faithful of henchwomen and best of cooks. I called at the kennels with an offering of bones for the slobbering and friendly pointers, walked round the garden and the tree-fringed lochan near the house where I had caught my first trout, heard the old call of the river, and looked down the valley to the little kirk's steeple, the cluster of village roofs, and many another well-remembered ancient landmark of boyhood and home.

My uncle was waiting for me in his room when I came back to the house. 'The Laird's Room' (as it is called) demands description. It plays an important part in this chronicle.

The Bield originally had been in form a long, narrow parallelogram, its entrance facing almost due south. About thirty odd years ago some damage was caused by a fire, and my uncle, when rebuilding, carried out several alterations and improvements, the most important being an addition of a couple of wings. We are concerned with the eastern wing only. In its south-eastern corner, on the ground floor, is the drawing-room; and running along the wing, in succession from the drawing-room, their windows facing eastward, are a little-used writing-room, the library, and at the north-eastern corner 'the Laird's Room.' Branching off to the left at the end of the corridor is a small apartment used as a gunroom. The storey above consists of dressing-rooms and bedrooms, my uncle's bedroom being in a turret room immediately above the drawing-room. The wing is shaped something like a key, the south-east corner forming the end of the handle, and 'the Laird's Room' and the gunroom the other end of the key.

'The Laird's Room,' lit by a large window in the centre of its eastern wall, is a nondescript apartment, a mixture of lounge, study, and smoking-room. Its door is in the corner of an L-shaped corridor, and a few yards farther along the corridor is the gunroom door. Deer and sea-otter skins cover the floor. Half of its eastern wall is lined with book-shelves, and round the room hang two or three portraits, a few good sporting prints, and some grinning heads, trophies of the colonel's younger days.

My uncle, unlike the majority of soldiers, was never a stickler for tidiness. He had bachelor ways of his own, and the maids had strict injunctions to leave his belongings just where they were, whether the room required to be dusted or not. In consequence, one found books on the floor, papers littered in odd corners, and a mantelshelf laden with a timepiece, companionable-looking cigar-boxes, tobacco-jars, salmon and trout flies, old photographs, and odds and ends. The furniture, too, was a curious jumble. A fine old bureau was flanked by pretentious chairs of Tottenham Court Road descent—uneasy-looking vulgarians. A Jacobean arm-chair beside the big open fireplace had as vis-à-vis a veteran Crimean sofa, a horror in horse-hair. Exquisite pieces of old china were jostled by cheap and impudent imitations and Japanese trumperies, hideous enough to set one's teeth on edge; but with all their haphazard company of furniture and bric-à-brac, my uncle's quarters were the acme of comfort and cheerfulness.

(Continued on page 104.)

BUDDHIST MONASTERIES.

By David Boyle.

THERE is no more familiar sight to any who have travelled in Burma than the collection of buildings that house the devotees of Buddha. From the more pretentious and artistic structures, built of solid teak, or even brick, to be found in the towns or the flourishing agricultural or riverine villages, to the humble bamboo hut, with its straw-thatched roof, met with in the remoter parts of the country, there is scarcely a village, or even a hamlet where only a few families are gathered together, that does not support its monastery.

Primarily built by pious donors, and set apart as the abode of ascetics desirous of following in the footsteps of their great Master, the monastery yet serves several useful purposes in the social life of the people. Perhaps its chief claim on them is that it forms the village school, through which every male child of the community passes during some period of his earlier years. Here he is taught to read and to write, and when sufficiently advanced in these accomplishments, passes on to the rudiments of arithmetic. Hence we find that, whilst in India scarcely one male in ten can read and write, in Burma the percentage of literate males is between forty and fifty—probably more if Buddhists alone are taken; this at least was true up to ten years ago.

Another useful purpose served by the monastery is that of hostel or resting-place for the stranger and the traveller, whether he be European or native, and whatever his religion. Standing in its own grounds, usually marked off by a fence, the monastery is generally situated on the outskirts of the village, and is surrounded by shade-giving and fruit-bearing trees. Should the village be a flourishing one, the superimposed roofs and gabled tower of the main building, rising high above the trees, make it the most conspicuous feature in the village landscape, and mark its situation to the weary and footsore traveller long before he reaches its hospitable precincts. There are, indeed, few sights more calculated to revive one's flagging energies towards the end of a long day's march, with the evening closing in, than suddenly to spy afar off the gilded top of some monastery spire shimmering in the last rays of the setting sun. As one approaches one is struck with the neatness and order that pervade the grounds, scattered about in which are a number of wooden or bamboo shelters, some open on all sides, with merely a roof and a raised floor, and some with partial walling thrown up—'Zayats' (literally, the place of stopping for food). It is in these shelters the traveller, without let or hindrance, finds his resting-place, and even his food, from the monastic store, should he be without the means of obtaining any.

The interior of the monastery itself gives the impression of one large room broken at the sides by a few partitions shutting off some smaller chambers. Usually a wide and covered-in veranda surrounds it on all four sides, where the monks are accustomed to take their exercise. In some conspicuous part of this interior is to be found the image of the great Buddha, of brass or soapstone, with its carved supports or fronting steps glazed by the wax of many candles. Some half-burnt, flickering candles will be found there impaled on spikes, and flowers in bunches everywhere, their petals blowing idly across the floor. Perhaps, if one waits long enough, one will see an anxious village mother come in and, placing her child on the ground, kneel a while in prayer, to rise strengthened with a part of the great peace. At early morn or at evening, just when the sun falls behind the western hills, the deep melody of a song rings out, and priests and scholars meet in weirdly rhythmic chants of prayer. The whole village life centres round the monastery, and in return fuel and water, needed labour and materials, are supplied by the villagers at the command of the headman; nor are these unpleasing tasks, for one acquires merit by working for the religious rulers. Daily at earliest dawn, just when the white mists begin to fade before the sun's first finger of gold, a little procession will leave the monastery, composed of yellow-robed priests, with big earthenware bowls, accompanied by small boys beating a little gong. They slowly pass up and down the streets, while women come out and fill the bowls with rice and vegetable foods; meat they may not eat, for Buddha forbade the taking of life.

The monastery, too, is the council-chamber of the elders, who meet there in the long hot-weather evenings, and sit in circles discussing the latest news, perhaps of village, perhaps of national, import. Little risings of discontent are sometimes fostered in the monasteries, whose rulers, if under unsympathetic magistrates (happily rare), feel their old power and influence undermined, and so, when peace and liberty are at stake, the power of the Buddhist Church and the yellow robe in all the towns and villages of Burma is a vital factor in the destinies of the people.

Now the war is over, the old half-buried peacefulness will return, and under the shaded buildings, where the gold mohur drops her crimson petals to mingle with the golden rain of the 'padouk' trees, the elders will talk with wonder of the world war that swept away so many lives into the Nirvana of peace.

A FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE.

PART II.

I.

ESDAILE and Peggy drew close to the peat fire, for, though it was summer, the evenings were chilly in this region. They had plenty to say to each other. Adventure had made them intimate, but the girl did not know how much of herself and her hard, courageous life she was unconsciously revealing. Meanwhile he let her learn little about himself.

'Couldn't you have done better than accept such a miserable berth?' he asked her. 'Couldn't you have a real holiday first, at any rate, so as to get well?'

She shook her head. 'No, I really couldn't. I expect you are rich, and know only rich people, so you will not understand what "not affording" things means.'

He laughed. 'Rich! Why, I consider myself fearfully hard-up.'

'Are you?' she cried, opening her eyes wide with surprise. 'I should never have guessed it!

You—you don't look like a poor man. I should have thought you went to a—perhaps a Regent Street tailor. Besides, you told me you had a flat in Kensington. They cost a lot. Unless,' she added naïvely, 'you mean West Kensington.'

'No,' he said, laughing still more, 'I didn't mean West Kensington.'

'And you talked of your club. I always supposed clubs were very expensive. Not that I know anybody who lives in the West End and belongs to a club.'

He was looking very much amused. 'Perhaps our standards may be a little different. Now, what do you consider a "rich" person's income would be?'

She pondered. 'Well—of course, there are people, like Miss Mackenzie, who have enormous fortunes; but a family who had seven or eight hundred pounds a year would be very well off, wouldn't they? And a bachelor—couldn't a bachelor live most comfortably on three hundred pounds? My father left mother only two hundred a year. That is not enough for her and Ellen and Bob; for Bob doesn't keep himself yet, though he earns a good deal. You see, I am obliged to do something to save my board and pay for my dress.'

'But, my dear child, you can't dress on twelve pounds a year!'

'Oh yes, in the country. My last situation was quite well-paid, and I saved some money. I know it is not much'——

'Much! It is a disgraceful sum for a rich woman to offer a lady. Do you know, Miss Peggy, I happen to be acquainted with Miss Mackenzie.'

She started, and a quick look of pleasure flashed over her face. 'Are you? Were you going there now?' Then an expression of dismay succeeded. 'Oh, but'——

'Well, what's wrong?'

'I—I should not have said what I did, what I had heard, if I had known. I told you she was selfish and mean'——

'Why shouldn't you have said it?'

'Of a friend of yours?'

'I didn't say Miss Mackenzie was a friend of mine.'

'But you were going to see her. I supposed you must be a friend.'

'There's such a thing as les beaux yeux de la cassette.'

'I don't know what you mean.'

'No, I dare say you don't.'

'If you didn't like her, why should you visit at her place? For shooting?'

'Perhaps—partly—let us say so. I think she likes me, rather. But I am not at all sure now that I shall go on and visit her. Perhaps I have had a warning to go back. I advise you to do the same.'

'Oh, how could I?' she said sadly. 'I told you mother is poor.'

'I do not think it would be difficult to find a situation quite as well-paid and generally desirable,' he said dryly.

'But I promised to go there.'

'You did not calculate on a spill.'

'If I go on, will you?' she asked with innocent entreaty.

'Why should you wish me?'

'It would be easier for me. I—I seem now to know you quite well.'

'It is odd. I feel the same towards you, little girl. Indeed, I fancy I know you a great deal better than you do me. Possibly you are not difficult to understand. You have nothing you're ashamed of showing, perhaps.'

'No. But I think you have not either.'

'Ah, you know so much about life and men, don't you?' He spoke, she thought, sadly. He kept his eyes on her. She suddenly felt shy, and looked away. 'I believe I could both shock and surprise you.'

'I suppose I don't know much about life, indeed,' she said, apparently addressing the fire; 'nothing at all of the sort of life you must lead. I have never known any men well but father. Bob is only a boy still. Father had had great disappointments and failures, and he was rather melancholy and reserved. I have never met any one like you to talk to.'

'Well, come now, I told you I was hard-up. What should you say that meant?'

She blushed. 'It's ridiculous to ask me, who have never been anything but poor! I dare say what seems riches to me would be poverty to you. I suppose, if you live where you say and go about a great deal, you may spend what would appear enormous to me.'

'Well, tell me, would you call a man in town living in decent rooms and going out a good deal, as you say, poor on six hundred pounds a year or so?'

She stared at him in blank surprise. 'Poor! On six hundred pounds a year? For one man? Oh, I can't think how you can spend it!'

'I assure you I don't find that difficult. Would you marry cheerfully and expect to have a comfortable home on that income? Our talk is getting rather sordid, isn't it?'

She laughed at his question. 'How strange it is that two people should think so differently! I don't suppose I shall ever marry—that does not come my way; but I know I could manage well on much less than six hundred pounds a year.'

'And live in a little house in Clapton or Kilburn?'

'Yes. I suppose that sounds dreadful to you.'

'I don't know. I could imagine a fellow might not be so very miserable—on certain conditions. It would a good deal depend on the person one lived with, eh?'

'Yes,' she admitted softly. 'It might not be —riches. One might want a little more—some day.'

'Still, you think six hundred pounds a year, to begin with—and prospects—would be wealth to you?'

'Oh yes.'

'Suppose—suppose a fellow with ten thousand a year proposed to marry you, what then?'

'What an absurd idea!' she cried, with pink cheeks. 'Utterly impossible. I never even met such a man; and if I did, would he think of me?'

'But "suppose," as children say—if he did?'

'If I liked him'——

'Put that on one side. Think of ten thousand a year.'

'I can't put it on one side. I could not marry any one unless I—liked him.'

'You consider it would be wrong—wicked?'

'Of course,' she assented quickly. 'Of course it would be wicked to marry any one for money.'

'And would you think it wicked of me to marry some one for money?'

'If you disliked her—— But we are talking nonsense. You would not do it.'

'Wouldn't I? Do you know, you nice little girl, I am afraid if you really knew me you would think me wicked.'

'No, no; don't say so,' she said in a distressed voice. 'Please, don't. I know you are not.'

'How?'

'You have been very good to me.'

'I have done nothing for you yet, but I should like to be good to you, Peggy. Let me call you Peggy to-night. I have only known you a day, it is true; but we have been oddly thrown together. I am much older than you. I am thirty-five, and you are twenty. I mean no harm. You won't be angry?'

'I am sure of that,' she said gently, still looking at the fire. 'You may call me Peggy.'

'Well, Peggy, do you know, I never in all my life made friends with a girl like you.'

'How like me? I am not in the least uncommon.'

'Aren't you? Well, all I can say is, I never met a girl so candid, so good, so kind as you are. A girl who thinks first of what is right rather than of what is pleasant.'

'Oh,' she said, blushing furiously, 'I am not all that! How can you know what I really am?'

'How can I know, little girl? Why, your heart looks out of your sincere eyes and sounds in your voice. Nothing base, nothing selfish, could live in your heart. I read your character as if it were printed in an open book in a language I understand. You have told me about your life—of your mother's hard struggle—that you have done your little best to help her; how you have been always short of money, of pleasure, of luxury, of joy. Most girls I know grasp those things as their right'——

'I have had pleasures, though,' she murmured. 'I really have!'

He smiled. 'What would a society girl say to them, I wonder? The gallery of a theatre at Christmas, eh? A little suburban dance? Well, you have trusted me so far, and I feel it very, very good and friendly of you. Now, I should like, in my turn, to tell you a few things, to make a confession of a life that I am afraid will seem a poor, cowardly, selfish affair to you. I fancy it would be a help, a relief, to me. This meeting of ours has been so different from any I ever had with a girl. I can't but remember that you and I went very near death together. We might have gone out into an untried country, like that poor fellow. Somehow that's got hold of me.' He had dropped his voice; it was grave and low, and thrilled with real feeling, no longer blasé or cynical. His dark, tired, deep-set eyes searched the clear liquid brown of hers. They reminded him of pure, clear water which reflected sunshine. 'May I be an egoist for a little while, and tell you what a poor sort of chap I am, Peggy?'

'Oh yes,' she answered, and her voice was low and fervent too. 'I shall not find it egotistical. I do not believe you are that.'

'I am. I am indeed. I have been a spoilt child, never patient with anything going wrong. I am at the Bar; but, though I got a good start (my father was a judge), I never worked hard, and did not trouble much about briefs. If my bread had depended on it I might have done well, for I'm no fool; but my father left me six hundred pounds a year, and—though you think it riches for a bachelor, and I don't—it was enough to free me from working when I didn't want. You do think it riches?'

'Well,' she said, 'you must remember I have never been used to society. We are poor, simple people. Is it really not enough for you?'

'Well, when one's rooms are one hundred pounds, and there's clothes and club and food and endless other things—travelling, pleasure, smokes—it doesn't seem to go very far. Anyhow, the money goes. It's habit, like everything else, and selfish. I'm abnormally selfish. You may shake your head, little girl. It's true! I'm only not too selfish to know what I am. So I made up my mind, when I married, not to look out for just the girl I could care for—not a girl who would be sweet to me and for me—but just a woman with money.' He said it with grim sincerity; but when Peggy started away from him with a look of pain and shock, a wave of compunction, of shame, and of wild longing shook his soul.

'You wouldn't do that!' she cried.

'I was going to do just that,' he said fiercely, but the fierceness was not for her. 'Last season I was thrown together a great deal with this Miss Mackenzie, the heiress. Some friends of mine she was staying with started the idea.

They knew I talked of marrying money; they believed the lady liked me, and perhaps had no objection to being married. That sounds caddish; but remember this is my confession, and I'm just telling naked truth. She was pleasant to me; of course I did my best to please her. I did not dislike her. We met in a house-boat at Henley. That meant a good deal of intimacy. I won't say I didn't make a sort of love to her; but I shied at the last bald "Will you have me?" I was called away. Before I left she asked me to Glenfaden. When we were chucked off the coach I was just meditating on the oddness of things—that you were going as an employee of the woman I meant to propose to. What you said about her was the first unpleasant shock, and fell on my scheme like cold water. And now, Peggy, tell me truly just exactly what you think of a fellow who had made up his mind to ask a woman to marry him because — and only because—she has ten thousand pounds a year and he wants it. Wouldn't it be quite as praiseworthy to be a highwayman and hold a pistol to a lady's head for her jewel-case?'

'Oh,' she panted, 'but you wouldn't! You're not really in earnest. You wouldn't do it!'

'Upon my word, I was going to Glenfaden just to do that.'

'But now'—she was still breathless—'now you have thought about it—been so near death—you won't do it!'

'I will go back to London—if you will go with me'—leaning forward so that he could see her face, and thrusting his foot into the red embers to see it better. 'See here; we both have a chance of reconsidering. Give up Miss Mackenzie and her twelve pounds, and I will give up Miss Mackenzie and her ten thousand.'

'But,' she said, half-sobbing, 'I must do something.'

He got up quickly and said in a suddenly light manner, 'Oh, I know heaps of people. I promise I'll get you something better than that. Think it over to-night. We'll meet and talk about it to-morrow. You're looking worn out; you must go to bed and try if you can sleep. I'll have a stroll and a smoke. Good-night.'

He nodded and went out abruptly. Peggy wondered if he could be offended. He was odd; he never shook hands. She felt a little unhappy, too excited to sleep. She tossed on a hard bed till dawn.

II.

The low morning sun had dyed the hillsides, the waste of heather, the climbing copses of fir and birch, as it were, with rosy wine. The air was as wine too. All things were made new in the stainless purity of a late summer's dawning.

Esdaile, who had slept but little, woke with a sudden desire to see how the world looked in its awakening. He generally faced it when all things were stale and commonplace. The pungent sweetness of the air, cold as a child's fancy of love, struck on his face, and he took in a long draught of heather-flavoured nectar. Everything wore a rosy glamour, touched by the light finger-tips of Aurora. The good old earth, the beautiful old earth, seemed young as Hope. And there was Peggy. He had wanted her so much, he was sure she would be there! Peggy, sweet as the morning and touched with its rose, her eyes no longer the eyes of a child, but shyly conscious, averted from his. She had lost her childish dreams, and was afraid of a woman's dreams. In a moment Murray Esdaile flung away all his doubts, his worldly fears and hopes, and knew himself and his purpose. He was in love with this little girl. He wanted her. He must have her! She must make a man of him, give him a life better worth living than he had ever dreamed. When they met he held out both his hands, and when hers answered them, trembling, he made her look at him. She saw what was coming, but her fear and her joy were so mixed, she did not know which it was that made her shake so.

'Peggy! Dear little Peggy — darling little Peggy, will you come back with me? Will you show me how to be worth your caring for? I will not go and sell myself to that woman. God has thrown us together for life—for salvation.'

'Oh,' she said in a sob, 'but you don't know me. I'm not fit.'

'It's I that am not fit. I know you can't really care for me yet; it's too soon. But let me take you home to your mother—let me only try to make you care—let me see you—take me on trial. That's all I ask, dear—all I ask now. No, it's not all, dear little girl, who look as sweet as the morning. You will let me kiss you, for indeed I love you. It's only a day as yet we've been together, but I want it to be for life.'

Peggy's soft lips, that had never been touched by a lover, did not refuse that first kiss which carried with it the promise of a new life.

III.

The next day Miss Mackenzie found in her newspaper the reason of Esdaile's non-appearance. The accident to the coach was described, the death of the driver. The paragraph went on to say that the passengers who were on it were, it was believed, not seriously hurt. A gentleman of the name of Esdaile, from London, two other gentlemen, and a young lady were travelling by the ill-fated coach.

'I wonder if the young lady is the girl I was expecting, and when Mr Esdaile will come on to-day,' Miss Mackenzie said to her old aunt. 'I hope he was really not hurt.'

But Mr Esdaile did not come that day or the next. Nor did Miss Dale.

But in a few days there came a letter:

'My dear Miss Mackenzie,—An accident, which for me might have been, but happily was not, a serious one, interrupted my journey to Glenfaden, where I was hoping to spend the visit you kindly proposed. I fear now this visit must be indefinitely postponed, as I find I shall be detained in town for some time. It was very good of you to invite me, and I hope on some future occasion to have the pleasure of seeing you again.—Believe me, gratefully and sincerely, Murray Esdaile.'

And there was a neatly written, rather childish little letter as well:

'Dear Madam,—I was a good deal shaken and a little hurt in the coach accident. I am advised to rest a little before I undertake any work, and I must ask you to be good enough to excuse my breaking my engagement to you. Yours truly, Margaret Dale.'

Miss Mackenzie threw down both notes in a temper.

'What can be the meaning of this? He's off with me, I suppose. Can there be anything between him and this girl? I dare say she's a little wretch.'

Her doubts were solved when she saw some six months after a notice in the Times:

'Esdaile—Dale.—At St —— Church, Clapton, by the Rev. John Robinson, Vicar, Murray Esdaile, of the Inner Temple, to Margaret, daughter of the late Richard Dale of —— Terrace, Clapton.'

'The fool!' Miss Mackenzie said, and threw the paper violently on the floor.

But it was the wisest thing that Murray Esdaile ever did!

THE END.

ST BARTHOLOMEW—A LITTLE-KNOWN FRENCH POSSESSION.

By the Rev. Montague L. Foyle.

The traveller who looks out on the Caribbean Sea from a suitable point in the highland of the British West Indian Island of St Christopher (or St Kitt's) sees a small archipelago that must have been the glory of the pirate and the privateer in the old and prosperous days of those islands. Several isolated rocks and cays are visible, and in addition there are four small inhabited islands, none of which is in British possession. Nearest of all, to the north-west, lies St Eustatius, separated from St Kitt's by a narrow, dangerous channel, only twelve miles wide. Twenty miles to the north-west of that island, there rises gaunt and clear out of the sea the rock of Saba, fit home for the race of hardy navigators who inhabit it. Then, thirty miles to the north of Saba, there is the island of St Martin. St Eustatius and Saba are owned by Holland; St Martin is equally divided between that country and France, the Dutch portion forming with the sister-islands the leeward group of the old Netherlands colony of Curaçao. The remaining island can be seen some thirty miles to the north of St Kitt's; it is called St Barth's—or, to give it its full title, St Bartholomew. Over its ruined fortifications there waves the Tricolour, and it is included with such other little-known spots as the northern half of St Martin and Marie Galante, in the important French colony of Guadeloupe, communication with the mother-island being maintained by a fortnightly mail schooner, which serves both St Bartholomew and French St Martin. The distance from the administrative centre of the colony is well over a hundred miles. St Barth's is only eight square miles in area, and twenty-four miles in circumference, and constitutes a commune of the colony, with its own mayor and representative on the Legislative Council.

Its early history is very obscure, but in all probability the island was first sighted and named by Columbus soon after the discovery of St Kitt's in 1493. It is reasonable supposition that he first saw it on St Bartholomew's Day of that year, and that, as in the case of St Vincent, the pious explorer, sailing under a banner blessed by the Pope, gave the island the name of the saint. For many years afterwards, in consequence of its small dimensions, the island was included with its larger neighbours in the various grants and compacts made for colonisation purposes. The year 1648 is generally given as the first definite date in its history. At that time St Kitt's was held jointly by the British and the French, signs of which occupation are to be found to the present day in the fact that the southern half of that island has such foreign names as Dieppe Bay, Cayon, and Basseterre; whilst the northern part has the familiar English names of Sandy Point, Old Road, and Half-Way Tree. It was from the French side of St Kitt's that there originated the first attempt to colonise St Barth's. Shortly after their installation the population was estimated at one hundred and seventy whites and fifty slaves, their principal wealth being sixty-four thousand coco-nut trees. But disaster soon fell upon the infant colony in the shape of invasion by a large number of Caribs, the original inhabitants of the West Indian Islands, now almost extinct save for a few preserved by the British Government in Dominica. The poisoned arrows of these invaders played havoc with the population, and the settlement was wiped out. But by the generosity of the mother-country the island was repopulated, and in 1760 it was stated that there were nine hundred people on the island, of whom about one-half were whites.

Then, as now, the great recommendation of St Barth's was its beautiful land-locked harbour, small but commodious, offering an excellent base in early days for the pirate and for the fleet in the Napoleonic wars, and affording at any time exceptional shelter from the devastating West Indian hurricane. Whilst the climate is healthy, the soil of the island is not fertile, being entirely of a light sandy nature and very strongly impregnated with salt. The rainfall, on which the island is entirely dependent for water, is very scanty, and steep, abrupt ranges of hills are a serious impediment to cultivation. But the harbour prevented St Barth's from being overlooked in the days when the Caribbean Sea was the cockpit of the navies of the world, and its usefulness brought about a most interesting change of ownership. In 1785 the island became the property of Sweden, and had the distinction of being not only the sole West Indian possession of that country, but also her only colony. At that time Sweden, under the aggressive policy of Gustavus III., was making a bid for influence in European politics. One of her captains chanced to visit the island, and was struck with the undeveloped possibilities of the harbour. France, with her hands full in India, Canada, and elsewhere, was easily persuaded to sell, and so St Barth's changed hands. The Swedes took very kindly to their new possession, sending out a European governor, building a fort to guard the harbour-mouth, maintaining European soldiers, erecting a Lutheran church, establishing schools, and despatching an occasional warship on a tour of inspection. Once for a short time the British held the island, descending from St Kitt's and capturing it in the name of George III.; but it was soon restored to the Swedes. A missionary who visited the island at the beginning of the nineteenth century refers to 'the strangely mixed population of French, English, and Swedish speaking people.' But St Barth's never became thoroughly Swedish. The French had been in possession too long; the distance from Stockholm was too great; there was nothing to attract Swedes to the island; the cost of maintenance was heavy, and the revenue very small; and Sweden's dream of a colonial empire slowly vanished. So in 1877, after a plebiscite of the inhabitants, the island was restored to the French, in whose possession it has been ever since. The transfer was keenly resented by a small minority. On some modern maps St Barth's is still marked as Swedish, the fact of the rendition having escaped the notice of the projector.

The island is most emphatically one not likely to be included in any itinerary of the West Indies, and guide-books generally dismiss it in a few words. There is nothing to induce the tourist or the business man to risk the uncomfortable sloop journey from either Basseterre, St Kitt's, or St Thomas, the nearest steamer ports of call. Occasionally a collector of old furniture, a searcher for Carib remains, or a travelling dentist will pay a passing visit; but otherwise visitors are rare. Several times, in the course of ecclesiastical duty, the writer has crossed the dangerous channel from St Eustatius. The voyage has frequently been a wearying beat up against the wind, constant tacking necessitating double the actual distance being covered; whilst on two occasions the journey of twenty odd miles has taken forty hours, an experience in an open boat far too painful to be recommended. The little town and harbour of Gustavia is not easily made by a sailing-vessel, for the entrance is only about one hundred yards wide, and is protected by a dangerous reef of rocks. The scene inside the harbour is typically tropical—still, blue water; houses with red shingled roofs and white walls; a background of coco-nut palms, behind which are high hills, surmounted with pines. The town has a population of eight hundred, and consists of two rows of houses, bordering the three sides of the harbour. Its grass-grown streets bear such ambitious names as La Rue Thiers, La Place du Port, Rue Oscar II.; and it has its mairie, poste, and gendarmerie. Swedish remains are naturally very interesting, and are to be found in the ruined fort, of which the sentry-boxes are well preserved; the cemetery, with its few Swedish tombs—one of which records how the deceased, having faithfully served the King of Sweden, received the title of knight; the former house of the Swedish governor, now used as a court-house; and the ruins of the church. Only the belfry of the church now stands, and the great bell is rung each night at eight. There is also a small school, endowed in the old days, and still maintained by money sent out from Stockholm. And there are to this day a few inhabitants who refuse to accept the recession. To them Sweden is still their country, Gustavus V. their king; and whenever one of them dies, the Swedish bell is tolled. Such loyalty says much for what must have been a very beneficent administration.

But the interior of the island is the interesting part. There is a sharp distinction drawn by the inhabitants themselves between the urban and the country population. The townsmen conform to the usual characteristics of West Indian life, and consist of whites, coloured, and blacks, most of whom speak French and English; whilst the religious outlook is represented by Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Methodist places of worship. A small proportion of the town residents, chiefly officials, have come direct from France. The war has touched this isolated spot in the presence of a few wounded soldiers from the Dardanelles. But the St Barth's countryman constitutes a distinct class, unlike anything to be found elsewhere in the West Indies. By far the majority of the settlers of 1648 were drawn from Brittany and Normandy, and despite centuries under a tropical sun, their descendants have retained, almost unimpaired, the characteristics of their forefathers. The traveller who climbs the narrow sandy track leading over the hills behind the town finds himself immediately transported to northern France. The whole country-side is populated by a white people, frugal in their habits, very clannish, hardy sailors, industrious cultivators, keen fishermen, devout Roman Catholics, understanding very little English, and speaking a patois akin to the Norman French spoken in England about the Conqueror's day. The women all wear the picturesque head-dress so familiar to those who have penetrated the interior of Brittany. As the traveller passes round the little, sun-baked island from settlement to settlement—Curaçao Bay, with its fishing-boats; Flambeau, with its small yam-cultivations; L'Orient, with its groves of coco-nuts, its large Roman Catholic church and school; and Saline, with its salt pond—he realises that only people as hardy as those descended from the industrious peasantry of north France could wring a living from so unfavourable a spot.

In common with so many of the smaller West Indian Islands, Ichabod must be written over the history of St Barth's. The island probably reached its highest prosperity in the days of the Swedes, and since then has steadily declined. The abolition of slavery, with its cheap and abundant labour, the complete absence of natural resources, the lack of capital, isolation, and constant emigration to America have all had a harmful effect. At present the island is simply held by France and worked by nobody. Gustavia is a free port, so that the mother-country does not even obtain revenue to assist in defraying the cost of administration. One cannot help looking at the badly silted and neglected harbour, and wondering if prosperity could not return through that source. If the port were properly dredged, the entrance widened, and the reefs blasted, the island might have a future as a base for small steamers and large sailing-vessels. Perhaps France may now find in her small possession scope for the energies of some of her demobilised poilus. Then St Barth's may flourish again.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER VII.—PSYCHOLOGY.

'WHAT'S the stunt to-day?' inquired Ginger one wet morning.

'Lecture,' I answered.

'What on?'

'Psychology.'

'A precious lot of psychology we'll get in this school. They know as much about it as they do about Mars. I'm fed up with these army lecturers. They make me sick. They're parrots, and all cribbing from one another.'

'But this is a new man.'

'Oh well, we'll give him a hearing,' said Ginger, picking up his notebook and sauntering over to the lecture-room.

What Ginger said was partly true, for many of the lecturers bored us stiff. A few of them were dug-outs who got their theories of modern war from the daily papers. Others were well-meaning men, but often they lacked originality. Army training had repressed their individuality, and they were apparently afraid to break conventions. When a good man did come along the dead-heads seemed to get jealous, and the brilliant rebel quietly disappeared. The army will not be an army proper till jealousy is made bad form.

When we had assembled Captain Cheerall entered briskly, looked at us—and—smiled. A good beginning! We decided not to sleep, but to plumb his depths.

'Gentlemen, you may smoke, if you like. I find it breeds a friendly feeling.'

'Good chap!' mumbled Beefy.

'Now that all your chimneys are going, I want to have a chat with you about Psychology; but before I start, let me say to you—don't hesitate to pull me up if you disagree. Ask as many questions as you like, for I loathe the ancient method which places the lecturer on the pedestal of a mandarin, and forces facts down unwilling throats.'

'The goods!' I whispered.

'Psychology, in brief, is the science which classifies and analyses the phenomena of the human mind.' As an old army officer, I regret to say we knew precious little about it before the war. Some of the Staff College men had it as a side-line. Haking, in his somewhat rambling book on Company Training, struck the first intelligent notes on the subject. Colonel Fuller of the "Ox and Bucks" tried to drag it into the arena of military training. Here and there an isolated enthusiast worked out his own pet theories. But, broadly speaking, our army knew nothing about it. The French Army, however, was more progressive. Several French officers had produced excellent books on the subject prior to 1914; and in the French military academies psychology was a term well known to every student. Germany also worked at it, but not so effectively as France. Many of the Russian generals, such as Brussiloff, the Grand Duke, and Alexeieff, were keen students of the science.

'Why, then, did we know little about it? The answer is this. We are a conservative people. We are mentally lazy. We resent new ideas, mainly because they disturb our happy old ways. Let us admit our faults, for it is the negation of all sound work to cover up errors in military training.

'Psychology is not so difficult as people think. Professors make it difficult when they ramble off into bewildering scientific phenomena instead of getting down to earth. This game is really a study of what the other fellow is thinking, how his thoughts affect his actions, and the sum total of his intellectual output. You do not require to be a university don to grip its essentials. Common-sense, ordinary intelligence, and organised study will give you the rudiments. And no man has a better opportunity to exploit the science than the army officer. He commands all types, all creeds. In his daily work he is rubbing against the efficient and the inefficient, the alert and the lethargic, the successful and the failure. If you, as future officers, will make it your duty to observe the mental meanderings of your units, you will quickly discover the road to high command. By knowing your men, you can handle them. By classifying and treating them as mere units, you will eventually cause anything from a mutiny to a disaster in face of the enemy.

'All of you, I hope, will shortly command platoons. You will then have sixty men to rule. You will find your job easy or difficult, according to your ability tactfully to enforce your orders, to create in the minds of your men the belief that you are a more powerful personality, and to get out of all ranks the maximum of work with the minimum of friction. Take an example. When I entered this room I did so in a very alert manner. That was not accidental; it was deliberate. I was determined to impress on you that I was no straggler. Next, I reached this desk, and smiled. Why? To make you feel you were not dealing with a ferocious martinet who uses his rank to enforce his orders and opinions. Finally, I said you could smoke. This suggestion removed any remaining vestige of rank or distinction, so far as this actual lecture is concerned. I came here to get at you.'

'You 've got us, sir,' said Ginger.

'Thank you,' he answered, amidst laughter. 'To carry this particular argument to its final conclusion, let me say I do not know the gentleman who said, "You 've got us, sir," but, from his appearance, I imagine he is an intellectual, bored stiff with military formalities, and regards me as a Heaven-sent Harry Lauder to cheer him up.' (Loud laughter.)

'Your laughter, gentlemen, I accept, not as a mere compliment, but as evidence of a mental sympathy. In brief, we now understand each other. And that is the basis of good work and military efficiency. Therefore, when you get command of your platoons, this will be your first duty—Know your men.

'When I say you must know your men I do not mean that you should disregard any of the regulations laid down for the personal conduct of an officer. Stupid familiarity breeds contempt. If you start addressing the sergeant as "Old Chap," the corporal as "Bill," and a man as "Tommy," your prestige will fall to zero, and your men will regard you as a priceless buffoon. On the other hand, there is absolutely no need to be a snob, a martinet, or an autocrat. A martinet is a man of limited intellect, afraid of his own inferior knowledge. An autocrat is usually a bully, like the Kaiser. My tip is, to act the part of a quiet and courteous British gentleman, with just a suggestion of reserve to frighten off a cad who desires to exploit your very good nature. But your greatest asset is knowledge. Ability engenders respect. Tact retains respect. And psychology enables you to exploit that respect in the very best interests of His Majesty's Service.

'Let us still keep to the platoon. The first man you will meet will be the platoon sergeant. Supposing you have mastered this science of the mind, your knowledge enables you, perhaps, to see that the sergeant is, by temperament, what the Scots call "dour;" he may also be quick-tempered, inclined to resent criticism—in short, "touchy." Now you are up against something. You must remember that temperament is either hereditary or the result of environment. Again, you may discover that this man is otherwise an excellent soldier. Your acquaintance with psychology will immediately suggest to you that your sergeant will have to be handled with kid gloves, even to the extent of openly conceding a point now and again to his little whims. That is common-sense. No sergeant is perfect, and no officer is perfect; and it would be the height of folly and presumption for any new subaltern to give an otherwise excellent N.C.O. a dog's life. Be patient, well-meaning, and courteous, and in a month's time the sergeant will, metaphorically, lick your boots.

'There are other N.C.O.'s in the platoon. In our present-day armies, as you know, these non-coms. are frequently men of social standing, and —more important—men of character. Degrees are as common as peas in the ranks to-day. All are open-eyed and certainly democratic. Such men are sensitive. But they are not Bolsheviks. They are intensely critical, but equally patriotic. They have only one standard of measurement—

BRAINS. This is an embarrassing situation to an officer who is simply "a son of his father"—nothing more. But it is not at all a bad atmosphere for a gentleman of culture, vigour, and enthusiasm. Certainly there is a demand for the higher qualities of leadership. To a keen soldier this is a most glorious incentive. You will not succeed unless your will, your personality, and your merits are predominant. You have got to be top dog. But you must never obtrude your rank as the badge of that right. To go on parade with the feeling that there is a guard-room behind you to enforce your whims and ill-balanced opinions is madness. The guard-room is really meant for the criminal and the hopeless fool. Knowing your job and knowing your men will really result in less crime, less discontent, and the creation of a happy and efficient unit. This aim is perfectly easy to a student of psychology, provided he has the will which springs from health and broad-based culture.

'Another important point. When your company commander desires to make new N.C.O.'s, he will, if he knows his job, consult you as to the best men in your platoon. Here you must be careful. The unthinking and brainless sub. is frequently attracted by shallow and insincere qualities. A man who soft-soaps his fads and carries tales may strike him as "a ripping chap—just the man for the stripe." On the other hand, a good officer's servant, a successful regimental policeman, or an obliging company clerk may figure high in his estimation, to the detriment of other men possessed of CHARACTER, EDUCATION, and DETERMINATION. To pass these men by is to commit a great offence against efficiency. Indeed, if ten thousand stupid subalterns selected ten thousand stupid individuals as platoon sergeants, and these N.C.O.'s were all together in a great push, what would happen? DISASTER!

'I am not here to frighten you; but I am here to kill that damnably dangerous theory that platoon drill, and nothing more, is all a soldier requires to know. We have had enough of that fetish. We are fighting the Germans. They are no fools. Unless you realise the serious responsibility of your high office, you are utterly useless for the Service.

'Again, you will have to father, guide, train, and lead the men—the glorious MEN. I hope you will not regard this as "a beastly bore," but as a privilege. The men who died at Mons, who leaped forward from the Marne, who barred the gates at Ypres, and stemmed disaster at Cambrai are no servile, cringing crew. They are cavaliers and—GENTLEMEN. Remember that! Open out your heart, but keep your head. You will find in your platoons dukes' sons and cooks' sons, aspiring generals—and some ruddy fools. Occasionally you may strike a desperado—a man who does not care twopence for officers, cells, or a firing-squad. When you run across this type you must go easy. A wrong word, and the man may spring from the ranks and strike you down. And it is here that psychology comes to your aid. Study the man from all angles, and you will discover some little thing which touches his real soul. It may be a little act of kindness. For example, I once had a man who had knifed a policeman in civil life. He was a desperado. The N.C.O.'s were afraid of him. They could do nothing with him except chuck him in the guardroom. This made him worse, and I was really afraid of his committing murder. One day when out walking I met him alone on the road. I did not expect him to salute me. But he did. So I said, "Well, Smith, are you having a walk?"

'"Yes, sir, away from the —— misery. I'm fed up and nearly off my chump. I'll desert."

'"Have a cigarette," I answered.

'"Thanks," he grunted, but a little flicker in his eyes suggested surprise. Very tactfully I led him out into the country, talking about anything and everything till we struck the top of a mound. This, as you know, was quite an unusual procedure for an officer; but I was dealing with a desperate man, and I was going to have no murder in my company.

'"Sit down, Smith," I suggested.

'"I think I will," he grunted.

'I gave him another cigarette, and in twenty minutes' time he was in a most friendly mood. His brutality—which was really superficial—was melting.

'"Now, Smith, I'm your company commander. What's the trouble? Let's have it out, man to man. They say you loathe the army and hate your officers."

'"That's a —— lie, sir. I don't hate my officers."

'"What is it, then?"

'"I hate Sergeant B——. He's a swine. He rags me. I'll murder him!" he shouted. There was an ungovernable madness in his eyes.

'"Steady, Smith," I said. "Let's talk quietly. Have another cigarette."

'He took one, and his gust of passion passed away.

'"Then you are either going to commit a murder or desert—is that it?"

'"Exactly, sir. I've nothing against you. You've been hard, but square. I've got my dues. When I'm wrong I takes my punishment. I likes my officers; but I hates the —— sergeants, specially Sergeant B——."

'Now, this Sergeant B—— was a good soldier, but he could not tell the difference between an undergraduate and a ploughman. He used men like machines, and had given me a lot of trouble. At the same time, Smith was no Christian. Yet, somehow, I felt all his offences resulted from misdirected energy. So I said, "Look here, Smith; you'll go back to barracks, and to-night you must declare a truce between yourself and your so-called enemies. To-morrow morning you will come and see me at the company orderly-room, when I shall have an interesting proposition to put before you. Will you do so?"

'"Yes, sir," he grunted, after a long pause.

'I left him to wander back to barracks. Next morning he turned up, shaved, boots shining, and buttons cleaned. I checked my expression of surprise and opened out.

'"Now, Smith, I've been diagnosing your case. You're over-healthy and naturally mischievous. Your hatred for sergeants is really jealousy. I think in some things you are a strong-minded man. In short, you want to lead and not to be led. If I could get inside your brain-pot I might discover a lurking ambition to be an N.C.O. and throw your weight about."

'He burst out laughing, and I felt I had got him.

'"To-night you will appear in orders as lance-corporal, and you will be transferred to Sergeant Jones's platoon. I shall expect you to go to school to improve your education. And here is a week-end pass to celebrate your good fortune. Finally, Smith, I hope to God you will never be before me again, for crime in my company breaks my heart. I'm treating you as a gentleman. And I'm quite sure you will always be one. Fall out, please."

'Smith saluted like a Guardsman, turned about, and ceased to be a public nuisance.

'Sergeant-Major Smith died at Mons.'

When the lecturer finished this anecdote a terrific cheering burst from all the school, and there was just a suggestion of something dim about the lecturer's eyes. He was thinking of how Sergeant-Major Smith had held up a whole German battalion when all his officers were wiped out.

'I hope you will excuse my giving you this story of Smith. But, really, that is better than all the pamphlets on psychology. Smith might have ended up on the gallows. Instead of that, he died as a warrant-officer and a hero. You will now see how important it is to study the human mind. And I hold that if you can master the mental meandering of your platoons, you may rightly aspire to the General Staff. When you are a G.S.O.—III., II., or I.—you will realise what platoons, companies, regiments, and brigades can do, and will never issue orders likely to cause discontent and endanger our moral.

'Now, the psychology of your own army is an important thing, but the psychology of the enemy is doubly important. We are up against a most cunning, brutal, and ungentlemanly foe. Great victories can be secured only by clever reading of enemy thought, and astute counter-tactics. Take the battle of the Marne. Joffre brilliantly defeated the Germans, not by superior man or gun power, but by superior strategy, based on a correct reading of the enemy's power, vanity, and historical beliefs. In this work we also assisted. The Germans were stupid enough to believe that Lord French would throw the B.E.F. into Belgium. This was the German scheme and their dream. Lord French declined the bait, and the Germans lost precious days before they found out their stupid analysis of our psychology. As for Joffre, he certainly had no intention (originally) to fight it out at the Marne, but the blunder of a French general before Namur compelled him to select this field. His retirement was a glorious trick in which he pandered to the Paris dream of Von Kluck, tickled the enveloping theories of the Crown Prince, and drugged the whole German nation—Kaiser and all—into the belief that the end of France was near. Time and again he resisted tempting opportunities for a general action, till the Marne was reached. Then, when the German General Staff was drunk with victory, when their line was lengthened, their munitionment and rationing tedious and difficult, their troops tired with their hitherto magnificent marching, he launched his blow—faulty in parts—but staggering and effective as a whole. With a crash he killed the Paris dream. With a bound he swept corps after corps of the hardest-trained troops in the world into a tragic rout and irredeemable disaster. The Marne was the defeat of Germany. Since then they have simply been fighting for terms. And this glorious victory, for which we ought to thank our God, was helped immensely by the ability to read the enemy's mind, and the refusal to accept his preconceived theories of the Allies' action in such a war.

'Since the Marne we have improved. Take Byng's thrust at Cambrai. For three years we used preliminary bombardments before making a great assault. And at Cambrai the enemy knew of our coming attack. But he waited for our bombardment. Instead of that, Byng's men took up their beds—and walked for miles into the enemy's lines. This was entirely unexpected, and therefore successful. Byng, I say, is a most excellent student of psychology.

'But we must also admit that the enemy has improved. At Cambrai we massed our reserves in the centre to meet the counter-attack which would be launched in accordance with known German tactics. The Germans, however, discovered the weakness of both of our flanks, and struck sledge-hammer blows. Had it not been for the supreme courage of the Guards, of London and Highland Territorials, Cambrai might have been the funeral of our High Command. This proves that we have no monopoly of psychology.

'While I ask you to respect and never underrate the power of the enemy, do not fear the enemy. And do not believe he is superior. The German clings with frenzied energy to trench warfare. He is afraid of the open—afraid of the British and the French in open manœuvre. He remembers the Marne. He remembers the Russian push into north Germany, the success of Brussiloff in Galicia, the brilliant strategy of Maude, and the glorious work of Allenby and Smuts. In open warfare we can beat the German to a frazzle because of our mental alacrity, willingness to scrap original orders, and to adapt ourselves to sudden and unexpected onslaughts. The German is a worker, a thruster, and a courageous fellow; but a mere handful of troops, with only shrapnel and bayonets, held up one million Huns at Ypres. Lord French outmanœuvred the enemy there. Ypres was the grave of German Push-and-Go.

'The German is helpless in open warfare.

'The enemy is not afraid of shells or bayonet, but he is afraid of superior intelligence. The camouflage of Allied military thought is more distressing to Germany than lyddite or gas. Our naval policy in refusing to disclose the facts about the number of German submarines sunk, and how we have sunk them, is destroying the moral of the German Navy. Our counter-propaganda is smashing his propaganda. While he may console himself with the Russian Revolution, he is suffering the fires of hell from the intervention of America. This suffering is easily explained. The American brain is the most resourceful, the most subtle, the most deadly in the world. I am speaking commercially, of course. No Von Kühlmann, Ballin, Hindenburg, or Von Boy-ed can master it. The American discovery and exposure of the German plot in Mexico was a masterly feat in intelligence. The use of German ships to transport American troops to France is a business-like answer to Germany's submarine campaign. The subtle distinction which President Wilson makes between the German Government and the German people is equally sound. The prompt organisation of an American Propaganda Department in Switzerland, to inform the enemy—free of charge—about his impending doom, is excellent. Ford's creation of anti-submarine boats, which are being turned out like sausages, will stagger the gentlemen of Kiel. In short, the American knows the German. American aid is the death of Germany, in the military, political, and commercial sense of the term. And the entry of America, like our own entry into this war, was due to faulty German psychology, a stupid reading of the national mind, failure to understand the spirit and soul of America—as of Britain—as well as blind reliance on bluff, bombast, rapine, terror, corruption, and assassination for the intimidation of neutrals.

'The Allies are more intelligent than the Germans.

'Now, gentlemen, I have shown you the tremendous importance of psychology, in the work of platoons, regiments, armies, and embassies. You must study the subject. You don't need to go to Oxford. You can do it in your own hut. Look at your neighbour! Study his face, his eyes, his talk, his facial expressions and physical actions. Watch him at work. See whether he slacks or pulls, fights or funks, tells the truth or dodges the truth. You will feel at sea for a long time, but in the end your eye and brain will enable you to see the hero and the fool, and instinctively to sense the coming thought or action of an opponent. Psychology gives you the wisdom of the old, the touch of the blind, the sense of the tried, and a general strength which is irresistible. This gift will enable you to create an uncomfortable apprehension in the mind of the enemy—a sense of something tragic; a feeling that there are bombs under the earth and above the earth; that something which destroys the nerves of the German nation and the German High Command.

'That's all, gentlemen,' he concluded.

We gave him a mighty cheer.

'Oh, by the way, any questions?' he ejaculated.

No one got up. All seemed satisfied; but just as he was turning away, Ginger Thomson jumped to his feet.

'Sir.'

'Yes?'

'I want to tell you something. Before we came in here we were arguing the point about rotten lectures and rotten lecturers. But I feel we owe you much. You have helped us a lot. We all hope you will come again, sir.'

'Delighted! Oh, by the way, I missed a most important point. You can never apply this science—to a woman.'

'What about a girl, sir?' we all asked.

'Hopeless! Good-afternoon.'

We burst out laughing as he turned away. Thus he left us as he met us—smiling.

There's something in psychology.

(Continued on page 111.)

YOUTH.

TRAMPING on the highroad,
Racing o'er the mead,
Taking every little path
To see where it would lead;
Plucking sheaves of blossoms
To drop them by the way;
Talking for the sake of talking,
Laughing all the day,
Youth is fair and youth is free,
Youth is made for you and me.

Age may shake his solemn head,
Walk his sober pace,
Think his great experience
Judge in every case.
Age is bound by tape and rule;
Age is but a slave.
Laugh we then our gayest laughter,
Leaving age the grave.
Youth is fair and youth is free;
Age can wait for you and me.

J. D. HESSEY.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

MR SWEETBREAD'S SURPLICE.

By PAT SUNDAY.

PART I.

I.

THE missionary garden-party was at its height. The bishop had reached the last spoonful of his ice-cream, which, like himself, was extremely pink and good.

'This sweetmeat is most delicious,' he remarked, with a sigh.

'All profits from the ice-cream are going to be given to missionary work in the Arctic regions,' declared the archdeacon.

'That being so,' said the bishop, 'I shall, without hesitation, consume another portion.'

When he had finished he leaned back in his comfortable canvas chair, smiling blandly at the throng of guests moving about among the clumps of rhododendrons or seated underneath the elms. It was towards the end of that incredibly happy June before the war. The sky was like blue satin, a band was playing light music, and his lordship had not been afflicted by a single twinge of gout all day.

'With regard to the rectory of Tittlebury,' said the sharp-looking little archdeacon, bending forward, 'I had hoped you would offer it to my curate, young Sweetbread.'

The prelate looked vexed. 'It has oftentimes been reported to me by others,' he replied, 'and I have myself noticed with much grief, that Sweetbread is extremely addicted to—ah—flirtation. My presence here even does not cause him to desist. It is at least twenty minutes since he entered yonder summer-house across the lawn, accompanied by a gaily dressed young lady, and he has not as yet emerged. Now, when I was a curate, it was my inflexible rule never to engage in conversation with an unmarried lady for more than three or, at the very outside, four consecutive minutes. This course obviated jealousy, and quenched unfounded hopes. Though oftentimes entreated to do so, never—no, not on one solitary occasion—did I diverge from that, my golden rule.'

He smiled happily, as if innumerable exquisite memories were presenting themselves to his mind, then exclaimed, to turn the conversation, 'How beauteous are the hues of yonder rhododendrons by the pond!'

But the archdeacon persisted. He was a most pertinacious little parson, and it was believed in clerical circles that no bishop—no archbishop even—had ever refused him any request whatever.

'My lord,' he urged, 'Sweetbread's an exceedingly eloquent preacher. He can make even the newspaper reporters weep by his sermons. With my own eyes I've seen a whole pewful of them crying like infants. You must reward his great gifts somehow. And I'm sure your lordship somewhat misunderstands his attitude of innocent amiability towards young women. I'm convinced that the sole reason of his extreme affability towards them is his desire to attract them to church. Indeed, he has often assured me so himself. Since he became my curate the number of young ladies attending my church has more than quadrupled. Why, last Sunday morning the offertory-plates were so laden with threepenny-bits that old Simmonds, my churchwarden, dropped them down the chancel-steps. You must really give Sweetbread the rectory.'

'Must? Must?' said the bishop heatedly, crushing a daisy beneath his heel. 'No mortal man says "must" to me. And I must confess my disappointment—nay, my chagrin—at your championship of so frivolous a youth. He's very young, you plead. Why, twenty years hence people will remember his frivolity.'

'You're right there,' agreed the archdeacon—'about people remembering a curate's frivolity for twenty years, I mean. Why, the duchess told me the other day she remembered quite distinctly that one evening more than twenty years ago, when you were in your first curacy, you persuaded her to come home from church by a roundabout way, saying you wanted to show her the reflection of the sunset in the pond, and you brought her to a very high and slippery stile—on purpose, she was sure. Then you tried to kiss her, but the slippery'——

His lordship turned as red as the rhododendrons, and flicked his handkerchief at a wasp which was aeroplaning round him, allured by the melted remnants of ice-cream in the episcopal saucer.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

'I have often observed,' he interposed hurriedly—'and in this I am corroborated by the testimony of a host of other bishops—that a wasp invariably selects the most exalted prelate in any assembly as his first victim.'

'I 've noticed that myself,' said the archdeacon. 'Her grace says she thinks you are even more frivolous now than you were then, because last Sunday'——

'A wasp,' interrupted the bishop, again hurriedly, 'would rather sting one bishop than a thousand archdeacons'——

'Very probably, my lord, and very naturally. Her grace said that if she were asked who was the greatest flirt at the present time on the bench of bishops—in a dignified way, of course—she would certainly say'——

'The father of that young lady in the summer-house,' interjected the bishop, still struggling to turn the conversation, 'is shamefully neglecting his duty. Who is she?'

'My daughter Christabel,' answered the archdeacon slowly.

The bishop beamed again all over his face. This sudden triumph over the archdeacon reminded him, somehow, of the fight in which he gave that little dignitary a black eye—though he himself had simultaneously lost a tooth—when they were boys together at Eton. What a splendid combat that was, and how much more friendly they had been afterwards; and how remarkable that every encounter they had had since had the same effect of strengthening their friendship!

'Are they engaged?' inquired the bishop, leaning forward confidentially.

'Not yet,' whispered the archdeacon, 'but I intend'——

'You intend to make him propose, whether he wants to or not,' interposed the bishop, waving his forefinger at him happily, and gazing into the lesser dignitary's face with an air of inexpressible sagacity.

A very young curate in spectacles, sauntering by alone across the grass, noticed the look of wisdom on the bishop's face. 'Oh, how wise and good he is!' he thought. 'I wish I could hear what he is saying. It would be so profitable—so helpful.'

He drew near the chairs, hoping to catch some of the crumbs of knowledge that fell from the dignitaries' table.

'Hey!' called the archdeacon to him sharply. 'Don't you see there's a wasp annoying his lordship? Take it away!'

The loyal young fellow, overjoyed at the prospect of doing his bishop a service, attacked the insect with exemplary zeal.

'Don't use more cruelty, pray, than is absolutely necessary,' enjoined the bishop humanely.

The curate pirouetted about for a few seconds, then uttered a cry of anguish, and applied his handkerchief to the tip of his nose.

'How careless of you!' said the archdeacon reprovingly. 'Run off to a chemist's, and get him to put some ammonia on your nose. It 's a capital thing for stings.'

'You should have been more careful, young sir,' said the bishop. 'However,' he added forgivingly, 'I am not unmindful that the pain you are now enduring was caused by zeal in my service, albeit reckless and misdirected.'

The poor young fellow hurried off towards the park gates, and at that moment a red-faced footman came to clear away the crockery.

'That there harchdeacon and bishop seem to be hextraordinary hamiable old noblemen,' he opined in the kitchen afterwards. 'When I took their hice-cream saucers away they was a-laughin' and a-gigglin' fit to bu'st theirselves.'

When they were alone the bishop once more took the offensive. 'How many of your curates have you succeeded in marrying to your daughters?' he murmured slyly.

'There 's the duchess—beside that big monkey-puzzle,' answered his fellow-dignitary quickly. 'Look—she 's coming this way fast—she 's caught sight of you—she 's waving her parasol at you'——

'I must hie me home at once,' said the bishop, getting up hurriedly. 'Much toil awaits me at the palace.'

'Stay! What about that rectory for Sweetbread?' asked the archdeacon, seizing his arm.

'Oh, I 'll give him it,' answered the bishop, glancing apprehensively in the direction of the fast-approaching duchess.

II.

It would have been possible for the archdeacon to advance towards the summer-house which concealed his daughter in a perfectly straight line. However, he preferred to proceed strategically towards it in a series of zigzags, stopping once or twice to invite to a tennis-party several handsome young curates—three of his daughters were still unmarried. Skirting the pond, he advanced cautiously upon the trellised summer-house from the rear. It was a tumble-down old edifice, its defects being partly concealed, however, by masses of roses and honeysuckle. The indefatigable little dignitary bent down, as if to examine the flowers more closely, found a tiny chink between two boards, and peeped in.

'The dear archdeacon must be passionately fond of flowers,' remarked one old lady to another, as they were passing by. 'How pleased and interested he looks! Perhaps he 's composing a sermon on flowers.'

'Hush!' whispered her companion in awe-struck tones. 'Don't you see the look of celestial happiness on his face?'

They tiptoed away along the gravel walk very reverently and fearfully, lest the crunching of their footsteps should disturb the saintly old man's devotions.

What he saw through the hole was indeed exquisitely gratifying to him as a match-making parent. Three of his curates had in succession been married to three of his daughters, more or less willingly, and Sweetbread, in spite of his frivolity, was an exceptionally eloquent man, and much more likely to win a distinguished place in the Church than any of his predecessors.

'Bless them!' murmured the archdeacon.

Then a doubt assailed him—he remembered Sweetbread's unfortunate propensity to flirtation.

'If he hasn't proposed already, I'll make him,' he thought.

He slipped cautiously round to the front of the arbour, burst in upon them suddenly—and caught him kissing her.

'How dare you, Sweetbread?' he thundered with terrifying ferocity. 'A curate has the presumption to kiss his vicar's daughter without first obtaining his permission! Unheard-of insubordination!'

The young couple rose to their feet. Sweetbread's eloquence, for the first time in his career, failed him; while little Christabel wrung her pretty hands and screamed.

'The bishop saw you going into the summer-house,' said the archdeacon to him sternly, 'and is taking steps which will necessitate your ceasing to be my curate any longer.'

'If I have to leave you, I'll take your daughter with me,' retorted Sweetbread.—'You'll marry me, won't you, Christabel, poor as I am?'

'Of course I will, darling,' she answered fervently.

'Eleven hundred a year isn't what I should call extreme poverty,' said the archdeacon in a curious voice.

'Whatever do you mean, father?' cried Christabel.

'I've just persuaded the bishop to appoint you to the rectory of Tittlebury,' he explained to the young man. 'That's what I meant by saying you'd have to leave me. I wanted to break the news of your promotion to you gently. I know a man who broke a blood-vessel when offered a fat living unexpectedly. Gently, my boy; don't be so demonstrative. Remember you're a rector-elect. Suppose a young curate happened to look in at this moment, what a shock it would be to him to see a rector, perhaps his own future rector, kissing eighty to the minute!'

The rector-elect desisted, and shook the archdeacon's hand with effusion.

'I want a word with you in private, Sweetbread,' said the archdeacon. 'You must leave us now, Christabel.'

'I won't leave him now—or ever,' she answered, pouting.

The archdeacon peeped out of the door of the arbour. 'Miss Webber has just gone past, Christabel,' he said persuasively. 'She spoke to the duchess about you in a very nasty way this afternoon—about me too. I overheard her. She seems to dislike you?'

'She hates me,' said Christabel, her eyes flashing.

'Overtake her, then,' suggested the archdeacon vindictively, 'and tell her of your engagement. She's been trying hard to capture Sweetbread for herself, so I'm told. Point out to her the many attractions of your future home at Tittlebury; tell her you'll have the finest vineries in the county—heavenly views of the river—nineteen bedrooms—up-to-date sanitation—and a viscount residing in the parish.'

Christabel tripped off, smiling.

'The bishop has been exceptionally trying this afternoon,' said the archdeacon, 'and I feel my nerves really need a cigar.'

They sat down on the little rustic bench in the arbour, and began puffing. 'It is my duty to warn you, Sweetbread,' said the archdeacon gravely, 'that Christabel has one extremely serious failing.'

'What is it?' inquired Sweetbread with apprehension.

'Jealousy!' answered the archdeacon.

'That's nothing,' said Sweetbread, enormously relieved, picking up his cigar again, which he had dropped in his alarm. 'All women are jealous.'

'Alas! that is only too true,' admitted the archdeacon sadly. 'But she is even more jealous than the average woman; she inherits the tendency from her Spanish grandmother. She is as jealous as—as'——

'As the bishop's wife?' asked Sweetbread in alarm.

'Quite—perhaps even more so, if that were possible,' admitted the archdeacon sorrowfully, with a compassionate glance at his companion's troubled face. 'Everybody has heard the tale of how you kissed nine vicars' daughters in one week. You'll have to give up that sort of thing.'

'I will,' promised Sweetbread. 'I'd give up any enjoyment for Christabel's sake.'

'And you must be careful not to praise any lady in her hearing,' resumed the archdeacon. 'If you encounter any good-looking lady when out visiting, you must say afterwards that her nose is too long or too short or too red—to please Christabel.'

'I will,' promised Sweetbread.

'And if she ever accuses you of having kissed, or of wanting to kiss, any lady, say in tones of disgust that you'd rather eat your surplice, or something of that sort.'

(Continued on page 120.)

THE WAR AND THE UNITED STATES.

By Captain H. W. Yoxall (Late British Military Mission to the United States).

I.

NOW that the Great War is, so far as the fighting is concerned, a thing past and done with, it is natural that statisticians and publicists of the various countries should begin to strike the balance-sheets of their national achievements. It is, moreover, right for them to do so, for all of the allied nations may well be proud of their efforts in the cause of Freedom. Only let us avoid invidious comparisons in assessing the respective contributions to the credit side of victory's ledger. Such telling of counts might lead to recriminations and bad feeling, and the great alliance will have been formed and have conquered to no avail if it is to fall in pieces as soon as the compelling ties of association in war are loosed.

Let it be granted, then, that the allied countries—each in its way to the limit of its peculiar capacity—all strove their utmost for the common cause. If I write here particularly of the effort of America, its effect on the war, and the reaction on that country itself, it is not with the desire to magnify that effort in comparison with the general sum of our exertions (indeed, the United States, through its late entry into the war, was of necessity spared much of the stress and many of the sacrifices which the Allies have borne), but rather to interpret it and to point its importance, which is far more than a question of facts and figures.

But first it will be well to recapitulate some of the difficulties under which the United States has laboured in the matter of its participation in the war. In the first place, the country had been long wedded to a tradition of pacifism, which involved a policy of isolation from the tangled skein of European diplomacy, in which it saw the causes of all wars. For a considerable time the mass of uninformed American opinion simply looked on the war as another quarrel of the European chancelleries. To detach the country from this frame of mind needed a considerable quality of command on the part of the American leaders, and time was necessary for the diffusion of the correct view. Again, they had to deal with a heteroclite population which made combined national action difficult of accomplishment. Not only did America nourish the German viper in her bosom, but large sections of the foreign-born population added to the apathy of the uneducated native a measure of hostility, more or less deep, towards one or other of the Allies—in particular Russia in the case of the Jews, and Britain in the case of the Irishmen. In every way these feelings were exaggerated and worked upon by those in America—especially the countless German agents—who for one reason or another wished to keep the country out of the war. Even when war had been declared, they checked the progress of the national effort by damping the fires of enthusiasm for the allied cause, with which America had associated herself.

Again, it must be remembered that America entered into the war considerably less prepared even than did this country. I have heard Americans complain because the Government, knowing the inevitability of war, did not start their preparations until the actual declaration of hostilities. But it was the deliberate policy of President Wilson to abstain from any act of provocation, that the responsibility of Germany might be demonstrated to the last degree; and the moral importance of America's subsequent declaration of war was greatly enhanced thereby.

Then, having declared war, the country was brought up against two other great difficulties arising from the physical facts of geography. The first and most obvious was that all the naval and military operations and much of the political consultation had to take place at a distance of three thousand miles from their base of government, with an exceedingly vulnerable line of communications in between. The second was the size of the country itself, which, though of inestimable advantage in the marshalling of natural resources, greatly increased the problems of transportation, and at the same time made the spread of information and the circulation of the proper patriotic spirit a matter of great difficulty in the outlying communities. Farmers and country-people, living far from the sources of news and the centres of political discussion, grudged to spare their men and money for a war which they did not understand.

Such were the disadvantages which America had to meet when she went to war. On the other hand, she had the assets of an enormous and unprecedented accumulation of wealth obtained, though in no way to her discredit, from the misfortunes of others; of vast man-power and natural resources still almost intact; and of the ability to make her preparations undisturbed behind the protection of the allied armies and the British fleet.

In spite of this, the American effort was undoubtedly disappointing at first to the Allies. We did not understand the American method, obvious though it was to all who understood their industrial system, of concentrating at first on elaborating the means of production, and of deferring production itself until it can be undertaken in quantity. When the American effort had matured, it burst upon the world in a magnitude which amazed every one—most of all, the Germans.

II.

What, then, did our associates do? (The Americans were never officially our allies, much to the chagrin of a large section of their people.) It is difficult to summarise such a wealth of achievement in a few pages, and the figures, in any case, are so vast that it is difficult to realise their meaning. But we may set down some of the capital items of their war effort.

By the time hostilities had ceased the United States had sent over two million soldiers to Europe, and was prepared to double that number by the summer of this year. The feeding of that vast host was being conducted entirely from America, its equipment and its arming (the notable exception in this case being that of tanks) almost entirely so. (In no particular was such supply as America drew from the allied countries reacting detrimentally on them. When for any reason the Americans borrowed, it was of our surplus, not of our scarcity. They lent in the same manner; it was an economic arrangement for the pooling of resources.) And this feeding, equipping, and arming, be it said, was being done on a scale never before attempted in military history. The American lines of communication in France were a marvellous example of what energy, initiative, and wealth can do. Docks, railways, freight-yards, warehouses, locomotive and motor depots, salvage-shops, gas and electricity plants, camps, hospitals, schools of instruction, and training-centres were erected on an unprecedented scale. As a sample of what was done we may take a certain French port where before the Americans came it was possible to land twenty thousand troops and six thousand tons of freight a month. On one day last summer forty-two thousand American soldiers were landed at the same port, and on another single day five thousand tons of freight.

Secondly, we may consider the naval side of the American effort. Naval construction was immensely accelerated, and the number of ships in the navy was increased from the pre-war figure of three hundred to about one thousand. During the war the Americans have concentrated mainly on small anti-submarine craft, from destroyers downwards; but for the next three years a large building programme of capital ships is contemplated pending any international compact of disarmament. To man this increment the personnel of the navy has been increased fourfold. About three hundred American vessels, regular or auxiliary, were operating in European waters when the armistice was signed. American ships conveyed 46 per cent. of their army to France, and did a great amount of the escorting of these forces. The increase in production of American merchant shipping was phenomenal. Before America came into the war her flag flew over a total tonnage of two million four hundred thousand tons, but 80 per cent. of that was engaged in lake and coastwise trade. In America's nineteen months of war two thousand nine hundred and eighty-five merchant-vessels were built, and there was a total increase, including commandeered enemy ships and bottoms requisitioned from neutrals, of five million tons. Incredible feats of rapid construction were performed, such as the launching of a ship of twelve thousand tons twenty-four days after the laying down of her keel.

This shipping was employed, first, in the transportation of men and material for the American forces; secondly, of raw material and finished products required by the Allies for war purposes; and, finally, of food for the Allies and indigent neutrals. The value of the contribution of the United States to the solution of the European food problem cannot be over-estimated. In one month of last year the United States exported more than three times as much beef to Europe as in any previous year (seventy-three million as against twenty million tons). In 1917 there was an export increase over the figures of the previous year of eight hundred and fifty million tons of meat and eighty-one million bushels of grain, and the increase was maintained last year. These huge increments were derived partly from a great increase of production, partly from economy on the part of the American people. In the last twelve months of the war they saved one hundred and twenty-five million bushels of wheat by rationing. And it was all voluntary rationing, we must remember. Of course, no one pretends that the food-producers and the shipping-owners did not make great profits out of the European shortage, but the general American public displayed admirable powers of self-abnegation in this respect.

To turn to the purely financial contribution to the cause, at the conclusion of the armistice the United States had given credits to the Allies and Russia to the total value of £1,600,000,000. That this assistance is not to be terminated by the passing of hostilities is shown by the advance of £53,000,000 to the various Allies as 'reconstruction loans.' The total American war bill amounted to about £4,400,000,000, and their daily expenditure on their own war-machine by the end of the fighting exceeded even that of Great Britain. To meet this, taxation to the extent of over £1,500,000,000 was levied for the past financial year, representing a per capita contribution of about fifteen pounds, as against seven pounds in 1917 and twenty-eight shillings before the war. This is a heavy burden in a country which pays indirect taxation through the tariff, has over-subscribed four enormous loans (the last amounted to £1,397,809,400), and has given munificently to its own and the allied war charities—not waiting, in many cases, for America's declaration of war to subscribe to the latter. One typical city in the Middle West raised a consolidated fund for war charities for 1918 amounting to a sum of two guineas per head of its population.

In addition to this, we must reckon all the reconstruction work undertaken in France, the succour given to Belgium in the days of American neutrality, the splendid efforts on behalf of our prisoners, and the lavish contributions of ambulances, doctors, nurses, and medical stores to the allied countries. As an example of this kind of aid we may quote a shipment of seven hundred and fifty thousand sweaters sent over at the end of last year by the Red Cross for the destitute inhabitants of the reoccupied portions of allied territory.

Meanwhile in the United States, to support the vast undertaking, there has been such a period of industrial activity and production as is unprecedented. The increased supply of natural products of all kinds, particularly meat, grain, coal, and metals; the exportation of raw and semi-raw materials and finished products; the mobilisation of men, money, and material for the auxiliary services; the creation by the Government of a vast new shipbuilding industry, their taking over of the railways, telephones, telegraphs, and cable systems—all of this represents an effort such as has not been surpassed even by Great Britain, and has brought about, in spite of high prices and heavy taxation, an unequalled condition of general prosperity.

III.

But, great as it was, this material achievement is overshadowed in importance by the other results of America's participation in the war—even as, in the spring of 1917, it was the moral effect of her declaration of war, more than the prospects of actual assistance, that nerved the Allies to yet greater efforts.

In the first place, the United States declaration of war, as has been said, put a moral seal, if any were still lacking, on the allied cause for all the world to see. That a nation by tradition pacific, by policy opposed to intervention in European affairs, by temperament idealistic, by situation sufficiently distant to be able to obtain the proper perspective, and at the same time making enormous profits out of neutrality, should join us, justifies our cause for all peoples for all time. Secondly, the coming to our ranks of the United States, free from dynastic or territorial ambitions, and unconcerned with the old European game of aggressive imperialism, undoubtedly elevated the moral tenor of our war aims. Not that the responsible leaders of the British Empire, France, and the other Allies were pursuing aims of a low moral value; it needed no fourteen points of Mr Wilson to direct the allied cause to the principles of liberty and justice. But there undoubtedly were in all the European countries militarists and junkers who desired a 'strong' peace rather than a permanent peace, the humiliation of Germany and the advancement of their own particular national ambitions rather than a just settlement calculated on the basis of the general welfare of mankind. The accession of the mass of American opinion, directed by such a master-mind as that of the President, to the cause of an equitable and disinterested peace finally weighed down the balance in Europe to the same side.

In saying this I do not wish to elevate the moral tone of American statesmanship above that of the Allies. If the United States was disinterested, it has lost less in lives, property, and money, and gained more in increase of wealth and shipping, from the war than any other combatant. But the outcome of the war means more for America than her elevation to the position of chief creditor of the world, the accumulation of more wealth in that country than has ever been in the hands of a single nation before, and the creation of an American mercantile fleet. It has widened the horizons of the people of the United States, broken down their policy of isolation, and called them to their proper place in the council-chamber of the world.

I was in America for ten months in 1917 and 1918, and visited Washington, New York, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, and several other great cities, saw their naval and military academies, and spent much time in closest touch with army opinion at one of the great military cantonments of the National Army. In that period I saw a remarkable change come over the face of the country. It was not merely that a great acceleration of the war programme took place, and that, in this way, the war was brought home to many people to whom it had before been just copy for their newspapers and scenario for their cinemas. The whole mental attitude of the country seemed to change from one of a rather self-satisfied parochialism to a proper realisation of the spirit and the aims of other nations, and the fitting attitude of the United States in relation to them. They came to see that the mental separation which they had imagined between the Old World and the New was figmentary; that under the menace of German imperialism, if in no other way, they became vitally interested in the affairs of the smallest state in Europe. They acquired what the theologians call the synoptic vision; obtained a world-sense in exchange for their old continent sense; deserted the position of impartial spectator, and came down into the arena to fight—to fight with fresher thews and clearer vision than we, tired by three years of combat and blinded by the dust of turmoil, could hope to maintain.

This change of American political mentality is going to do more for the world in the end than all the splendid fighting of the American soldiers and sailors, than all the output of their army of labour, than all their lavish expenditure of money. It has bound the New World to the Old, and from the resultant co-operation and exchange of ideas there will come a peace of more permanence and a world policy of greater liberality than could have been attained by any purely European settlement.

IV.

Particularly is this rapprochement valuable as regards our own relations with the United States. No true American voice to-day speaks of the British Empire in terms other than those of gratitude and praise. On the anniversary of Trafalgar mass meetings of thirty million Americans passed resolutions of thanks to the British Navy. On the 8th December last, 'Britain's Day,' three hundred mass meetings were held in the great cities, and fourteen hundred other celebrations in the smaller towns, voicing American friendship for the British Empire. American universities, with the assistance of professors from Oxford and Cambridge, are holding courses of British studies. The speakers whom we sent over, from the highest political and clerical dignitaries to the humblest propagandist, were eagerly listened to and enthusiastically applauded. Our soldiers who went to advise the American Army (I speak from experience) were welcomed with an almost overwhelming hospitality.

One of the things which have helped the British cause most in America has been the action of the Sinn Feiners and other Irish extremists. The example of their movements in the cause of freedom during the war has taught Americans what value to set on the liberty-loving professions of these people and their execrations of Britain as an imperialistic tyrant. The old poison of Anglophobia which the disaffected Irish instilled into the minds of true Americans has lost its efficacy; and the future generations of the United States will be taught in their homes and their schools a lesson of friendship for, not dislike of, Britain.

The only divergence of views which has emerged between America and Britain, that on the question of the Freedom of the Seas, is apparent rather than real. Americans understand the justice of our view-point when it is explained to them; and we have misinterpreted their opinion by careless reading of the President's statements, and by our fatal habit of jumping to conclusions of hostility whenever we see expressed any opinion apparently differing from our own. It has always been so between Britain and America. Disputes have generally arisen out of misunderstanding where there was no real ground for quarrel, largely because of our somewhat mixed blessing of a common language. The views of a foreigner (no American is any longer a foreigner in Britain, no Briton in America) we translate and weigh carefully; but both nations are fatally inclined to leap at each other's meaning, because their medium of communication demands no care of analysis and interpretation. Remove this carelessness and the seeds of future misunderstandings are sterilised.

Now, this reconciliation of Great Britain and the United States is of more than sentimental import, and concerns others besides the Anglo-Saxon race. It is of permanent world-importance, because here we have ready-made the basis for a League of Nations. The United States and the British Empire are the two Great Powers which have emerged unexhausted from the war. If they can agree to common action, the rest of the world must follow, if only because of their absolute economic dependence on these two Powers. Our Empire is already a League of Nations, the federated States of America yet another. If we can combine the two in permanent agreement to effective common action, we shall have a combination of the greater part of the world's wealth, energy, and political intelligence from which no other country could stand aloof if invited to join.

And more than making a League of Nations feasible, the present position between Great Britain and the United States makes the League essential. The American people have acquired a new sense of the possibilities of foreign commerce and international finance. To back this they have now a vast merchant fleet and a strong navy. America to-day is the most serious rival for the supremacy of the seas which we have ever had in all our history. If this rivalry is to be fought out in the old manner, the competition will develop into a calamity greater than that of the war. It is essential, too, that we organise, not a selfish trust to protect only our own interests (which would but rouse the sentiment of the rest of the world against us and prolong the era of international hatred), but a true and equal League of Nations. As we have the goodwill, surely we can devise the political machinery for this world-combination to defeat war.

V.

Besides these changes in the position of the United States in the world, the war has produced internal effects in America of far-reaching importance. It has allowed the Americans to put their house in order. It has enabled them to stamp out the menace of the insidious spread of Deutschthum. The hatred of Germany, as I saw it in America, is as great as any I have seen in Europe. This is not, as has been suggested, the mere zeal of the convert, which quickly dies down; it is the outcome of the conviction that Germany stood, and stands for, the absolute antithesis of the American ideal—a conviction strengthened by its gradual and deliberate development, and confirmed in every way by the actions of the Germans in America as well as in the theatres of war.

Furthermore, the war has compelled all the foreign-born to abandon their hyphens and declare themselves as full Americans or as full aliens. Those who have not been for America have been against her. There will no longer be the old indiscriminating toleration of immigration. America, in the words of ex-President Roosevelt, is no longer to be a polyglot boarding-house—it is to be a nation. Two years of war have done more for the Americanisation of the population than all the years of peace since immigration on the large scale began.

The war, too, has brought a more virile meaning to their democratic faith and a sturdier advocacy of its tenets. America is still a pacific country, but it knows how to enforce peace. Its pacifism has lost the touch of Bryan and taken on that of Wilson. 'I am opposed,' said the President, 'not to the feeling of the Pacifists, but to their stupidity. Pacifists do not know how to get peace, but I do.' The same feeling is evident throughout the whole land and every class of citizen. They did not raise their boys to be soldiers, but they are very proud of them now that they are soldiers, and sailors too, and have acquitted themselves so well in these parts. The same depth of conviction that kept America pacific and neutral for so long made her at once so thorough in the prosecution of war and now so determined for an equitable peace. And in the mind of no American does an equitable peace mean an easy peace for Germany.

Finally, America's part in the war has justified her in the eyes of the world, and brought her to that place of respect to which her history and present condition entitle her. She has shown that her God is not the Almighty Dollar; that she is not a land only of sensationalism and materialism; that she is not 'too proud to fight' in the sense in which some of us—in perfect illustration of what I have said of the origin of past misunderstandings between our country and theirs—misinterpreted the phrase. The world has again seen 'a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep,' to the confusion of the enemies of justice and international concord.

It is not true, as has been loosely stated, that the centre of the world's gravity has shifted from the British Isles to America, for Great Britain has emerged from this war relatively as powerful as ever she was in her history. But the centre of gravity has been extended, if such a thing be possible in physics, from a single point to exercise its pull along a line—the chain which binds together the English-speaking nations of the world. That this extension is for the ultimate and general good of the world no one can doubt who has followed American policy during the last two years or seen the temper of the American people as proved by the test of war.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER VIII.

WE drew our chairs closer to the brisk wood-fire, and the colonel began his story.

'You have heard me mention my younger brother Hugh,' he said. 'You never saw him, of course; but his portrait in the dining-room—painted when he was a youngster in the kilt—is his handsome image. The sunny smile which you have seen in it got him into, and out of, more scrapes before he was five-and-twenty than come to most men all their lives. Hugh was rather an enigma. None of our lot, I am sorry to say, has been over-conscious of the value of money; but Hugh had a perfect genius for melting it. What became of it no one, including himself, had the faintest idea. He was of the type people loosely call "generous to a fault," which in many cases spells blind want of thought, and often something a great deal worse. But Hugh wasn't vicious, and he wasn't lazy. Every one liked him, and I kept him from the end of his tether as long as I could. But he could settle to nothing, although he was bursting with vitality. Restlessness was in his blood, and one fine morning in '62 or '63 I saw him off from Aberdeen to Australia in one of the old clippers. He would make his fortune, he told me as we said good-bye. Poor Hugh! I have never seen him since.'

'I thought he died long ago, sir!'

'So did I. He wrote one or two letters, but I lost touch with him. Some one says that although blood is thicker than water, it's often a great deal nastier; but he and I had no quarrel, and I always cherished a warm affection for him. I often tried to trace him, but failed; and, like every one else, I had given him up as dead long ago. But what do you think? Yesterday morning comes this letter from him!' he said, as he produced it from his pocket.

'A letter from Uncle Hugh!'

'His letter, beyond doubt, although the handwriting is weak and shaky. But I'm afraid, from what he says, that he isn't long for this world. I will read it to you, Neil. The beginning deals with sad enough reflections, and is for my own eye. I need not read some of it.'

'I understand, uncle.'

'After these first few sentences, he writes:

"If I have erred, I have paid. I have never been able to 'make good' (an abominable phrase which I have picked up in my wanderings), but I have done nothing that I need be ashamed of. I have neither changed my name nor brought dishonour on it. I have worked hard enough, but I missed my luck once or twice. If I tired and turned my back on an enterprise, my successors invariably scored. Perhaps I hadn't staying-power. Perhaps I am 'a man accurst.' I'm not sure."

'That's Hugh all over,' interpolated the colonel. 'In spite of his intense vitality, he never was "sure." The letter goes on: "The years slipped past, and as I grew older the love of wandering and change and excitement grew stronger in me, becoming part of my blood, necessary as air, familiar as my skin. I have had a few kaleidoscopic experiences. I have feasted and danced at Government Houses, and I have herded with all sorts and conditions of men. I have been a guide in New Zealand; in nitrate; in diamond rushes; after copra in the Pacific; seal-poaching, for the fun of it; an understrapper in a gambling-hell on the Barbary coast (that was the limit!); steward on a China mail-boat; 'on the beach'—literally sleeping on it; a reporter on a Nebraska newspaper. These are a few of my ups and downs, principally downs. And I saw you once, Ewan.

'"When I was working my passage in a 'tramp' (heavens! how many years ago!), she called for coal at Aden. We were moored in the inner harbour, and I was at the joyous task of trimming the bunkers, naked to the waist in a temperature round about one hundred and forty degrees. A troop-ship had just cast off from her moorings near us, and was moving off to the Old Country, when I came up for a breath of fresh air. Just then the band of the trooper crashed into 'Auld Lang Syne,' and at the same moment I caught sight of you waving good-bye to some people on shore at the Union Club. I had a few minutes full of reflections, to say the least of it; but, except on that occasion, I have neither been homesick nor unhappy. A man may chloroform his nature, but he can't change it. There was always the fight for life—the glitter and the tonic of travel—and when roughing it one meets more live men in a month than in years, I fancy, in the ordered grooves of the Old Country.

'"Well, well! Now I am within sight of the end of it all, for I am going to die soon, and I have something to tell you before I am past writing. It concerns a queer incident which happened here lately. 'Here' is a little cottage in a sleepy southern Italian village called Ubriano, and thereby hangs a tale.

'"In West Africa I struck up an acquaintance with an old Banffshire man. He was illiterate, shrewd, and suspicious; but he had a soft side to Scotland, and he took to me. He had a big interest in a tin-mine out there, and gave me a post under him. I slogged at it, and earned a decent salary; and although the place was up a stinking river, and the last word in climate and loneliness, I stuck to my guns and did my job for over two years. Then it did for me. The old boy had been to England, and when he came out again, he found me a very sick man. He did his best for me, hurried me to the coast, gave me a year's salary, and paid my passage here to die in the sun, although he was kind enough to put it that I was getting leave to recuperate. A month did me some good, and I was able to crawl about a little in the open; but I'm nearly finished now. Well, to my yarn!

'"Twice lately I have had a visitor, a tall, good-looking, dark-bearded man, who speaks perfect English, but has a distinctly Southern look. I should say that he has the bearing and the speech of a gentleman, although I thought him a shade too polite. I tolerated him at our first meeting; and as for our second—well, you shall hear. His card proclaimed him to be 'Mr John Wakeford, The Omnivagants' Club, London.' He was an Englishman, he said; but I doubt it, and I count myself a decent judge of nationality. On his first call he was profuse in his apologies, but he had heard that I was ill. He had a villa near Ubriano, and wondered if he could show me any attention, as he feared that I might be lonely. His voice rang kind and honest, and as I was pleased to see a countryman, of course, I made him welcome. He spent an hour with me. He was pleasant enough, I must say; but I thought him a trifle inquisitive. Now and then there would be a reference to England. Did I know it well? Forbes was a Scottish name, was it not? And so on, until his persistence, aided by my inherent aversion from discussing my descent or my career, made me freeze. Also, I had a curious feeling that he was watching me, and keeping something back. He left without unburdening himself, after a polite request that he might call again. I assented, though without warmth, for I was ill and easily exhausted. Next day he called again, and I told him civilly, but without circumlocution, that I was unable to talk much, and therefore regretted that our interview must be a short one. He looked disconcerted for a moment, but recovered himself. His next words surprised me.

'"'Mr Forbes,' he said, 'you are a man of the world, and as I have something of importance to say to you, I do not propose to talk round it. I think that you appreciate direct speech, and in the regrettable state of your health, the less time wasted in unnecessary verbiage the better.'

'"I told him that I entirely agreed with him.

'"'To come to the root of the business, I know and you know that you have something in your possession which may be of great value, but which you cannot turn into money without my help.'

'"A lunatic! This was my first thought; but he was watching me steadily, with no trace of mental derangement in his voice or demeanour.

'"'It is news to me,' I said, 'that I possess anything of value except my life, and I have only a slight hold of that.'

'"He frowned, and there was a brusqueness in his next words which irritated me.

'"'My knowledge is accurate, and you know that I am stating a fact.'

'"I felt an inclination to snub him, but the man's anxious scrutiny of my face aroused my curiosity. A consuming earnestness shone from his dark eyes. I was interested in spite of myself, but all I said was that I wished that he would be a little more explicit, and that I was sure that I could at once convince him that he was mistaking me for some one else.

'"'My telling you what I am,' he continued, 'may help to clear the atmosphere. I am a confidential emissary. At present I cannot name my principals, but I am authorised to offer you handsome, even princely, terms. Let me be frank, Mr Forbes, and give me frankness in return.'

'"'Go on, Mr Wakeford. I promise you frankness.' Madman or crank, I would humour him. It would probably shorten the interview.

'"'We have secret information that you have certain writings. Your presence here'—he paused and repeated the words, his eyes bent on mine—'your presence here is known to my principals. The document which you possess is incomplete, and useless to you; but it is of importance to those for whom I act.'

'"I told him I had not the remotest idea of his meaning.

'"'You know full well that I am speaking of the Leopard's Eye.'

'"The Leopard's Eye! The man obviously had a delusion, but I merely said that I knew nothing and cared less about the eyes of leopards or any other beasts.

'"'You are not speaking the truth,' he replied coolly, with the result that I lost my temper, and ordered him to leave the house at once, unless he wished to be removed by the police.

'"'I put your rudeness and quixotic conduct down to your illness, Mr Forbes,' he said as he rose to go. 'Remember there is a fortune hanging on your decision. Pray think calmly over what I suggest. I shall return in a few days. You require money, and I can, in exchange for the paper, offer you'——

'"At this piece of insolence I fired up again; and, after a pause, he evidently concluded that it would, to put it mildly, be undiplomatic to press me further, at least for the present. He bowed himself out with a grave ambassadorial air, but I didn't like the look in his eye when I ordered him to 'clear.'

'"Now, I have two fixed ideas concerning him—one that he is a liar as to who he is, and the other is that he is telling the truth about the existence of a document on which he wants to lay his hands. I never saw a man who looked more in earnest than this Mr Wakeford, as he calls himself.

'"After he left I thought a good deal about the queer interview, and there gradually dawned on me a recollection, like a curious dream, of hearing when a boy a family tradition about family papers bearing on lost jewels. Am I dreaming? In all likelihood I am, but it may have been worth my while writing you. The Leopard's Eye may be a jewel; but the whole thing, I confess, seems to me to be too fantastic. However, I 'll rummage through my papers when I get back my strength.

'"Well, I have given you my story. A hundred to one there is nothing in it, but you have it for what it is worth.

'"And now I am very tired. This is a good place to die in—blue skies, and blue sea, and quiet—but I would give much for a glimpse of the Glen and a kent face or two there—before I go."

'There is more, Neil,' said the colonel sadly, 'but none of it concerns Hugh's story except the postcript, in which he says that he has given instructions for his papers to be sent to me in the event of his death. And now, what do you make of it?'

'I ought to go to him at once, uncle,' I said without hesitation.

'Just what I intended to ask you. Papers or no papers, mysterious visitors and so on are of little consequence; but Hugh is ill, alone, and among strangers.'

'I will start this afternoon.'

(Continued on page 117.)

THE COCAINE HABIT IN INDIA.

THE coca-plant (Erythroxylon coca) is a flowering shrub cultivated, in several varieties, in Peru, Bolivia, and other parts of South America, in the West Indies, and in Java. It has been grown with some success, experimentally, in Ceylon, Madras, Mysore, and Bengal. The leaves are said to have the property, when masticated, of communicating remarkable sustaining-power. On this account they are chewed by the Peruvian Indian, together with lime or tobacco, or taken in the form of various decoctions. To him they are what betel pan is to the Hindu, kava to the South Sea Islander, and tobacco to mankind in general; and he is credited with a consumption of two to three ounces daily. Among Peruvians over-indulgence is said to be comparatively rare. When it occurs, the effect is much the same as in the case of over-indulgence in opium. The coca-eater loses his appetite, suffers from impaired digestion, and, when not under the influence of the drug, becomes phlegmatic and apathetic. Prior to the war export of coca-leaves was made chiefly to Germany and Holland, for the extraction of the alkaloid, cocaine, which they contain to the extent of ·2 per cent. Darmstadt was one of the main sources of the world's supply of this drug and its derivatives in pre-war days. The alkaloid and its salts are stimulative and restorative. Injected hypodermically or painted externally they produce local anæsthesia, and are much used in minor operations, particularly in ophthalmic and dental surgery. In excessive quantity, whether injected or eaten, the alkaloid and its salts have infinitely more serious effects than the chewing of the leaves of the plant. The drug acts on the spinal, cerebral, and nervous centres, first stimulating, then depressing, and finally paralysing the nerves. A very rapid tolerance is induced, and as much as sixty grains daily may be consumed. The cocaine maniac becomes emaciated, his skin shrunken and pallid, his eyes sunken, and appetite and digestion fail. Sleeplessness is an early and marked feature, insanity a common ending.

In view of its very deleterious effects, cocaine is in most countries recognised as a dangerous drug, and severe restrictions are placed on its sale. In most parts of the British Empire it is dealt with under the regulations relating to poisons. For the last quarter of a century the Government of India has been faced with a difficult problem in the prevention of the disastrous habit of cocaine-eating, which has taken firm hold among a considerable section of the people of our great Eastern dependency. The habit is of comparatively recent origin. The people of India, it is said, were introduced to it some thirty years ago, the place of origin being given as Bhagalpur, in Bihar. Prior to this cocaine was a drug little heard of outside the medical profession. Authentic details are wanting as to how the habit originated; but it is a recognised fact that the majority of its victims labour under the delusion that the drug acts as an aphrodisiac. The habit rapidly spread, to an alarming extent, to Bombay and other parts of the country, its devotees being found chiefly among classes to whom, either by religious tenets or caste rules, the use of stimulants in the form of alcohol and the well-known indigenous intoxicating drugs, opium, charas, ganja, and bhang, is forbidden. The necessity for restrictive action first came to notice in 1900 in Bengal, and evidence of the abuse of the drug rapidly appeared in other provinces. A few years later, in 1903, the High Court of Bombay, for the first time, decided that cocaine was an intoxicating drug within the meaning of the Bombay Abkari Act. This decision brought the drug within the competence of the excise authorities, who are responsible for the sale and the taxation of the indigenous drugs already mentioned. The existing excise laws of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras proved at the time to be adequate to deal with the evil; and restrictions of gradually increasing severity were imposed. Other provinces had to await amendment of the law, which was carried out by local Acts in 1904–6. A general outline of the existing excise regulations governing traffic in the drug is as follows. Local cultivation of the coca-plant and the manufacture of cocaine and its synthetics are absolutely prohibited. Import of these articles by post is prohibited, and their import and export by other means may be effected only by Government officers acting as such in the course of their official duties, by qualified medical practitioners and dentists, and by chemists and druggists licensed to sell the drugs, under permits granted by the authorities. Possession is rigidly restricted, in the case of medical practitioners and dentists, to half an ounce, and one ounce in the case of licensed vendors. Private possession, except under a medical prescription, is prohibited. Imprisonment up to one year or a fine up to two thousand rupees (one hundred and thirty-three pounds), or both, may be inflicted for a first offence, and the penalty may be doubled for a second conviction.

Coincident with the spread of the habit an extensive smuggling trade had arisen. The enormous profits to be earned in the illicit trade quickly induced a complete network of agencies and sub-agencies all over the country. These act as distributors of the drug to the miserable victims of the habit, and are always ready to ply their nefarious trade with new devotees. The inland agencies are in touch with agents at the ports, who are on the look-out for the smuggled drug. Agents of a certain type in Europe can always be found to act as intermediaries for the forwarding of supplies by post or otherwise. The matter of price is no deterrent to the wretched cocaine debauchee whose craving calls for satisfaction. One hundred and fifty rupees (ten pounds) per ounce for cocaine-hydrochloride of an intrinsic value of four rupees (five shillings and fourpence) is no unusual price paid by him to the smuggler. Whole families, from the oldest to the youngest members of both sexes, are known to have become victims of the drug. Crimes against property, in the frenzied efforts of hitherto respectable members of society to satisfy their craving for the drug, are by no means uncommon. The recorded legitimate sales of the drug in the financial year 1912–13 amounted to seventy pounds avoirdupois. In the same year over seven hundred pounds of smuggled drug were seized by excise and customs officers in the course of their duty. No more striking proof of the seriousness of the evil can be adduced. It is not open to serious doubt, however, that large quantities of the drug can be smuggled into the country in many ways, notwithstanding the activities of the Customs Department.

The drastic measures adopted by Government, and the heavy penalties imposed, have, doubtless, not been without their effect in curbing the traffic. The outbreak of war cut off, to a large extent, imports of the drug from enemy countries. To this, probably more than to repressive measures, is due the large decrease noticeable in the number of convictions within the last three years. Much of the smuggled drug was seized on ships of the Austrian Lloyd and other lines trading between Adriatic ports and Bombay. Officers and men found a lucrative source of income in trading the innocent-looking white salt with the agents ashore. The records of the Bombay courts bear witness to the active efforts of the customs and excise officers to stop the nefarious traffic. In the financial year 1912–13, 1240 cocaine cases came before the courts, 539 in 1913–14, 219 in 1914–15, and 100 in 1915–16. A recrudescence of the evil may certainly be anticipated when the channels of trade are reopened, after the war, with Germany and Austria. Now that the cocaine habit has taken firm root, it seems unlikely that the illicit trade in the drug will be put a stop to unless and until some measures are devised, in concert with the Powers, for prohibiting its unauthorised export to India. Should India be represented at the peace conference, it is to be hoped that her representatives will keep this point in view. The country can be saved from a great and growing evil by obtaining the adherence of all countries to the Hague Opium Convention of 1912.

HIS OWN LANGUAGE.

By FREDERICK TILSLEY.

I.

'IT'S either Blighty or the bone-yard for me this time,' said Private Anson, as they lifted him on to the operating-table.

'Blighty,' murmured the American doctor ('attached for duty') reassuringly; 'sure thing.'

'And to think,' continued Private Anson with intense disgust, 'that it took ole Fritz over four years to do this to me. I was beginning to believe that he hadn't a shell what could find me—that I was what you might call imyune—if you understand me?'

'Got you first time,' answered the American doctor.

'But it seems he had one with me name and address on it; so, of course, I got it. Sweating on leave I was, too.'

Private Anson swore competently for a few moments.

'To get a slugging like you got just when you're expecting leave is pretty fierce luck,' said the American doctor sympathetically.

'Me and ole Bill Harris had it between us. Pore ole Bill! you couldn't find what's left of him with a magnerfying-glass. Out since Mons, too. . . . It's me leg, isn't it, doctor?'

'It is.'

'Will it have to come off, doctor?'

'Not if we can keep you this side of Hades with it on, sonny. Now be quiet for a few moments, and don't be scared. I'm just going to push you into dreamland.'

He administered the anæsthetic, and Private Anson slid into unconsciousness.

II.

When he opened his eyes again he was lying on a clean bed in a Nissen hut. Private Anson felt that he should have been comfortable in that bed, but he wasn't. His left leg was aching and burning, and he was desperately thirsty. He tried to alter the position of the troublesome leg, and found that it was fastened down. This annoyed him very much. He swore. Private Anson belonged to the regular army, and when he swore, he did it thoroughly. An angular orderly, with pale eyes, and hair that would certainly get him into trouble with the sergeant-major at an early date, appeared suddenly at the bedside.

'Gimme some water,' said Private Anson in a thick voice.

The orderly blinked at him protestingly. 'Can't,' he answered; 'really can't, you know. Quite impossible, old chap. You are just coming out of an anæsthetic, and water would make you horribly sick—disgustingly sick.' He shuddered. He was a very inexperienced orderly.

'I'll chance that. Gimme some water.'

'Absolutely daren't, old top.'

'Gimme some water, I tell you.'

'Can't—really can't, you know.'

'Well, gimme some beer.'

'It's absolutely against orders to give you anything to drink. I should be crimed—shot at sunrise, and all that sort of thing, you know.'

Private Anson began to swear, and the orderly shuddered again, only much more violently this time.

'I can see,' concluded Private Anson, 'that I shall have to get that water myself.' With a great effort he jerked himself into a sitting position.

The orderly sprang at him and laid gentle hands on his shoulders. 'No! no! no! You mustn't; you really mustn't, old thing. You'll hurt yourself, you know,' he said tragically.

'I'll hurt you if you don't clear off toot sweet!' bellowed Private Anson. He fell back with a groan; and then, remembering that his leg was fastened down, he cursed the hospital and everything in it with much vigour. He was a pugnacious individual at the best of times. In his present condition, dazed with chloroform and pain, a mule was a mild-mannered and thoughtful animal compared with him. It seemed to Private Anson that whoever tied his leg down had taken an unheard-of liberty, and he was not at all the sort of person to stand that kind of thing quietly. He set his teeth and dragged on the fastened leg with all his strength. The orderly uttered a horror-stricken bleat and ran for the sister. In spite of the pain caused him by every movement, Private Anson tugged again. He was very delirious by the time the sister arrived.

'You must be quiet,' said the sister in a firm voice. 'Otherwise you will never get better.'

Under the impression that some one was threatening him, Private Anson swore at her in a loud, clear voice. The orderly blushed, and tried to look as if he hadn't heard; the sister did nothing of the sort. She was a regular, and was used to being sworn at.

'Do you know whom you are talking to?' she asked grimly, and her voice somehow succeeded in penetrating to the befogged brain of Private Anson. He realised dimly that there was a woman present. He declared that he was sorry if he had said anything he should not have said, and asked her in a hoarse voice to forgive him. The sister forgave him freely. With a big sigh of relief he lay back and repeated the offending remarks all over again with great vehemence. And then he remembered that his leg was still fastened down. He started to pull on it again.

'Find the orderly officer, and ask him if he will come here at once,' commanded the sister.

III.

The orderly disappeared. Two minutes later he reappeared short of breath, with the orderly officer at his heels. The orderly officer was a surgeon, and, like all surgeons, he expected to be famous in the near future. He was very kind to Private Anson. He called him 'old boy' twice.

'You must be quiet, old boy,' he said soothingly, speaking with a pronounced democratic accent. 'For your own sake, you must be quiet. If you don't lie perfectly still we shall have to remove your leg. Do you understand me, old boy? Do you realise the importance of perfect quietness?'

Private Anson ought to have been flattered, but he was not. He told the orderly officer to go to a place which, though warmer than Flanders in February, is less muddy. The orderly officer laid his right hand on Private Anson's brow. It was a beautiful hand, slim and white, and muscular. Private Anson tried his very hardest to bite it. He jerked his head suddenly, and his gleaming teeth snapped like a vice, missing the surgeon's little finger by an inch. The orderly officer withdrew his hand with great suddenness, and the most democratic adjective he had yet used. The orderly cried out in alarm. The sister's eyes widened with horror, and her mouth twitched—probably the first outward expression of deep feeling she had indulged in since the South African War.

To offer violence to the hand of a surgeon is a crime which even delirium fails to excuse. The orderly officer wasted no more time on Private Anson after that; words were absolutely useless.

'Give him morphia, sister, and keep him as quiet as you can. Somebody had better stay with him all night. I am afraid it is useless, though. If he hasn't killed himself before morning, that leg will have to come off. It's a pity, too—remarkable operation in many ways—Captain Spencer was most anxious that it should turn out a success. G'night, sister.'

IV.

After a brief struggle, from which the orderly emerged with nothing worse than a very black eye, the sister succeeded in injecting the morphia. For all the apparent effect it had on Private Anson, the morphia might just as well have been water. The orderly was contending against an unusually vigorous attempt to get out of bed, when the padre entered the ward.

The padre was a little, round man, with a red, round face, and big, round glasses. He wore the South African ribbon and a wound-stripe, and had been 'over the top' more than once. Closing the door very gently behind him, he tiptoed down the ward until he reached Private Anson's bed.

'Good-evening, orderly. Is he one of my boys?'

'Couldn't say, sir,' said the orderly, grabbing Private Anson's wrists. 'Haven't had a chance to look yet.'

'What's the matter with him, orderly? He seems very ill.'

The orderly explained. His explanation was frequently interrupted by Private Anson's oft-repeated invitation to 'Come and have it out in a shell-hole, if yer fancy yerselves.'

'And the doctor thinks that if this poor boy can only be kept quiet there is a chance for his leg,' murmured the padre thoughtfully. 'Have you tried to reason with him in his own language, orderly?'

The orderly looked puzzled.

'His own language, sir? He's British, you know—quite British.'

'Quite so, orderly; but he's a Regular soldier, isn't he?'

'Yes, sir—out since Mons, and all the rest of it.'

The padre smiled gently.

'Old soldiers have a language of their own, orderly. Just go and tell the sister I should like to speak to her, will you, please? I'll look after your patient while you are away.'

The moment the orderly had turned his back, the padre glanced stealthily around him and bent over the patient.

Private Anson cursed him impartially, and mentioned several of the things that would happen if ever he caught the padre alone in a shell-hole.

The padre's eyes gleamed.

'Shut yer ruddy mouth,' he hissed, 'and listen to me! These people are doin' their best to save yer ruddy leg, and you, yer ruddy fool, are goin' the right way to lose it. If I was them I wouldn't take any more ruddy trouble with you. I'd cut the ruddy thing off, yer ruddy silly head as well, you ruddy ole wash-out!'

'If we was in a shell-'ole'—— began Private Anson indignantly.

'Yer know more about estaminets,' scoffed the padre. 'All this ruddy fuss over a bad leg, and there's fellows in this same ruddy ward ten times as bad as you not sayin' a word! Bits of kids just out from Blighty, too, most of 'em. Yer oughter be ruddy well ashamed of yerself. Can't stand a bit of pain.'

'Who can't stand a bit of pain?'

'You can't; yer too ruddy windy.'

'Windy? Me! I was out at Mons, I was.'

'So was I—got a tidy ole packet in the leg too; but I didn't make as much ruddy row about it as you're doin', either.'

'I can stand pain with any man,' said Private Anson, and added thoughtfully—'when I want to.'

'Well, I should start wantin' to pretty quick, if I was you. There's a 1918 kid down there, with a ruddy big 'ole in his stummick, laughin' at yer.'

'I'll speak to him in the morning,' said Private Anson severely.

'And what's more'——

'There's nothing more to be said,' interrupted Private Anson with dignity. 'You was out at Mons, I was out at Mons, and you have seen fit to insult me. I don't want any further conversation with you whatever, until I am recovered enough to knock yer ruddy 'ead off. And now I'm going to sleep—good-night to you.'

When the sister arrived the padre was mopping his brow with a large red handkerchief.

'You want me, padre? Good heavens! whatever have you done to him? Hypnotised him? I do believe he's asleep.'

'I've just been speaking to him,' said the padre, with a bland, Oriental smile. 'I spoke to him in his own language. I sincerely hope and believe that he will be all right now. By the way, sister, there's a special service at two o'clock to-morrow afternoon. I do hope your duties will not prevent you from attending. Good-night, sister—good-night.'

ASCENSION NATURAL HISTORY NOTES.

ASCENSION ISLAND was discovered by a Portuguese named João da Nova Gallego on Ascension Day 1501. It remained uninhabited except for occasional visits of pirates until 1815, when the British took possession of it. The island has the unique distinction of being classed as a British warship, known as H.M.S. Ascension, and the routine of the island is the same as on a ship of war. The sea around the island abounds in fish. Many edible varieties are to be caught. Fishing by moonlight off the rocks is most successful, for in the day-time the sea teems with scavenger fish, locally known as blackfish. So sharp are their human-shaped teeth that, no matter how tough a bait may be used, it is nipped off without the angler's even feeling a jerk on the line. The varieties of fish caught at night are locally known as soldiers, bull's-eye, cod, cavally, conger, and crayfish. The soldier resembles a red carp, bull's-eye the John Dory. Mullet are also caught in pools by means of small nets. I have tried to catch them with various baits and flies, using fine trout-tackle, but I have never hooked any. They appear to be the ordinary gray mullet, but never scale over one and a half pounds. When the fry hatch out and come inshore, it is a wonderful sight to see the cavally dashing amongst them, followed themselves by albacore and sharks. So intent on their prey are these fish that they often get stranded on the beach as the huge waves recede. The air on such occasions is alive with innumerable screaming sea-birds, swooping and diving to gorge themselves with fish. Many giant turtle visit the island yearly to lay their eggs. They often weigh over eight hundred pounds, and numbers are caught and kept in ponds to be served out as food rations.

Sea-fowl which frequent the island are frigate-birds, boobies, gannet, and boatswain-birds. They nest on Boatswain-Bird Island, which is seldom visited by any one. It was at one time exploited for guano. Sooty terns visit Ascension periodically in myriads, and their eggs provide a welcome change of diet for the garrison. Partridges, mina-birds, and a few canaries live on the slopes of the hills. The partridge is a francolin, differing from the St Helena bird, which is of Indian origin. They are numerous, and would be more so were it not for the toll of them taken by wild-cats. These cats were at one time domesticated, but through being so long in a wild state have assumed the features of the European wild-cat, save in colour—they are usually black. Very destructive, they kill full-grown fowls, and are most difficult to trap or snare, shooting being the best method of destroying them. Herds of wild-goats likewise roam over the island —probably introduced by the Portuguese; they also are nearly all black in colour. Rabbits are found all over the island, and, strange to say, many of them also are black. It may be that, as with the cats and the goats, their hue has changed to blend with the black colour of the volcanic rocks, and so afford them greater protection from their enemies. There is a herd of donkeys which roam amongst the clinker. They are marked exactly like the wild-ass. Where they originated from I know not, but they are sturdy animals, and when tamed make useful pack-animals. Land-crabs are common on the higher reaches of the island. They are quite fearless, and cause alarm to the new-comer who sees them for the first time; for, when you rest on the hillside after a stiff climb, they sometimes steal quietly out of their holes, and have been known to pinch the leg of the unwary traveller.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE VALUE OF SPORT.

IT all started in a simple way. We were sitting about the hut smoking and reading, when Beefy blew in with the information that he had managed to get the company officer to challenge B Company (our deadly rivals) to a cross-country run next day.

'Are they taking it on?' asked Ginger.

'You bet they are! And I hope we knock lumps off them. They are a lousy lot; always swinging the lead about being top-dogs. It's up to us to squash them.'

'You ought to be pole-axed,' muttered Ginger.

'Why?'

'Haven't we got enough to do without plugging for ten miles through mud, brambles, cows' dung, and water? If you'd develop your old fat head, you'd do better. Cross-country run—confound you!' and he hit Beefy with a barrack pillow.

'Silly ass! You're a book-sucking hog. You want a run to shake your liver up. Every blessed thing that comes up, you veto it. Why can't you follow the crowd?'

'That's for you, with your Clapham instincts and shallow brain. You think Rugger and such like the be-all and end-all of existence. Sport was invented only to keep down your adipose tissue and turn you into a decent citizen. I've got beyond that. Joseph Conrad will do me to-morrow. I'm not on for your "follow the crowd" business.'

All this talk, although it sounds hostile, was not really so. It was that frank byplay so characteristic of the army. Ginger regarded Beefy as an over-healthy animal, only fit for Rugger and philandering; while Beefy held the view that Ginger's physical laziness was a menace to the company and the Empire. In short, Beefy was all sport and Ginger was all books. Each was a champion in that controversy which threatens to remodel our present public-school system.

'Come on, boys,' I said. 'Gather round the fire and let's have this out. Is Beefy right or wrong?'

'He is, and he isn't,' said Billy Greens, looking up from his beautifully kept notebook. 'When he talks about beating B Company I'm with him. But behind it all is that insane idea that games make the superman, and those who won't play are damned. Sport is all right in its own place.'

'Hear, hear, old Pieface!' commented Ginger.

'It's like this, boys,' said Nobby Clarke. 'Beefy is an ass, in the mental sense of the term. And he knows it. He's hanging on to this Games Committee job for all he's worth. His whole reasoning is this: "The company commander is an old Blue. If I (Beefy) can't pull through with my headpiece, I'll pull through with my zest for games." And he'll do it, for the old commandant believes in sportsmen. Beefy will make a jolly good sub., but a rotten general. He will carry out any order, and his rude health might even get him the V.C., but he couldn't give an intelligent order to save his life. He's a prize-fighter, not an officer. After the war you'll see him as a chucker-out at a pub., or throwing cannon-balls about the music-hall stage.'

'That's your rotten Nonconformist creed,' shouted Beefy. 'You got that in one of those suburban schools where they breed lawyers, Radicals, and Socialists. You can't see any good in the public-school system. I'm not a saint, I know; but I do things in the light, and am not afraid to talk about them. You're a measly Covenanter. You couldn't do ten miles at a trot to save your old face. But you can argue the point, and pose as a moralist. I know your type. If games have made me a healthy animal, I rejoice. I can take my punishment. Nobby, you're a ruddy fool.'

'Question!' ejaculated Tosher.

'Oh! Here's this perishing materialist again,' remarked Ginger maliciously.

'These two beauties [Beefy and Ginger] are wash-outs. One's from Oxford; the other's from Cambridge. Oxford has made Ginger into a cock-eyed wowser, and Cambridge has turned Beefy into a base-ball looney. Ginger couldn't sell ham, and Beefy can't write a decent letter. One's all Homer; the other's all beef. Out there [Canada] these fellows don't cut ice. They can't work, and they won't work. You can see them with their tongues hanging out in Calgary saloons, or cow-punching on Armour's Beef-Canning Stations. They ain't soft, but they ain't wise. They're all right in dress-suits doing the fox-trot, but in dungarees—why, they just make me smile. And this prime cup of oxo [Beefy] has got a lien on sport, but I'd get a bush-whacking kid to lick him soft at wrestling, and knock him sick at running. You're all jaw and no push in this back-number island.'

'Now, I wonder if you're right,' said Billy, closing his notebook with a snap and jumping up.

'I guess so.'

'Give him fits, old Pieface!' shouted Ginger.

'What are your qualifications to act as judge?'

'I'm nootral, and they make us wise out West.'

'But you've only seen the froth of things, and not the substance. Ginger isn't Oxford, and Beefy isn't Cambridge. Ten minutes in the Old Country doesn't confer the right to shake us up and blow traditions into smithereens.'

'Tradition's all moonshine, Billy.'

'Perhaps; but all your grain-lumpers and pork-packers come here for wives and knighthoods. You'd sell your soul to sleep in Buckingham Palace, and pawn your trousers to eat with the Cecils.'

'Certainly,' said Tosher, 'if we wanted to push through a twenty-thousand dollar deal.'

'But aren't we sportsmen? That's the point.'

'Sure! But sport won't pay the rent, or win the war, old child. You can't kill Huns with hockey-sticks, or use tennis-balls in a barrage. Horse-sense and push-an'-go is a live scheme. You're real good, real kind; but it makes me tired to see the nootrals selling your grub to the Kaiser, and using your papers to get the plans of the latest push. You ain't wise over here.'

'And what's good about us? Anything?'

'Your soul. It's as clean as the brook, and true as Lincoln. You're fools; but you ain't willing fools. You're old; but yet you're green. This island is a happy hunting-ground for Jews, Germans, and assassins. But we can't see you fall. The Old Land is Our Land. It's the Old Home, Billy, and that's why I'm in. God help the Huns when I go out! I'll go "West" before this land goes "West."—But, say, I've got to go. I'm dining with a real live lord. He wants to see a bucking broncho from the West. Cheerio, boys!' and Tosher stepped out into the night.

'Well, that's the greatest artist Canada has produced,' said Ginger.

'That's the true Imperialism,' shouted Nobby, 'but you don't understand it. All the drivel you got in the Union won't wash in practical politics. Tosher can make rings round you, and'——

'Look here, boys,' I said. 'Let's choke Nobby and Ginger off. The question before the House is sport. We've got to run the other company to-morrow, and it's up to us to see Beefy through. It's a matter of esprit de corps, and we can't allow the other crowd to beat us. Sport is the backbone of the army. A good sportsman is usually a gentleman. All the Rugger men are either dead, wounded, fighting, or training for commissions. If they can't sell night-shirts or soap, they can obey orders, and there's no doubt they played the game in August 1914. Never mind about "after the war." We can leave that to Nobby's crowd. They'll be running the show. We shall be much happier ranching or hoofing it with the Lost Legion. It will be a much better thing to beat the other company to-morrow than to sit here reading all the Socialistic tripe of H. G. Wells or the maudlin political tosh of Morley. D—— it all, there's a war on! If Ginger and Nobby won't turn up to-morrow, then they are rotters, and we should out them.'

'Duck them,' muttered Beefy.

'How the blazes do you know we sha'n't be there to-morrow?' roared Ginger, getting roused.

'You've vetoed the run, haven't you?'

'Have I? Wait and see.'

(Continued on page 127.)

GIPSY LOVE.

HERE in the heart of the town,
Hurry and noise and glare—
Ah! give me the open down,
And the full free air!

Warm is home's glowing fire,
Closing each tiring day;
But give me my heart's desire—
The wind on its way!

Farewell to tumult and strife,
Smoke in a sullen sky—
I'll find me a sweeter life,
Where the swallows fly!

J. M. STUART-YOUNG.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE HEART OF THINGS.

By Henry Leach.

London, Yesterday.

NEVER before had the voyage of a civilian on the seas been followed with greater intensity of interest, a keener consciousness of there being something fateful, of enormous import to the peoples of the world, than when the George Washington—which was once a German ship—steamed east from the United States to France with President Wilson as chief passenger. He was coming to exert influence, and to give counsel for their good, for the happiness of their children, for the better future of the world, to peoples which, flushed with victory and seeming at times even to lose a full sense of ideals, may have needed such moral assistance. And never was the moral dominance of this man better demonstrated than at this time, for, though in previous weeks, the war being won, the celebrations being in progress, and the terms of the conquerors being complacently or exultingly reckoned, there was a disposition in places to ask for the first time who might be this President that he should arrogate to himself the right to make a list of fourteen points for peace, who, indeed, had appointed him to be a ruler and a judge over nations that were victorious, there was a hush when it was known that Woodrow Wilson had embarked. An argosy laden with the full volume of the treasures of civilisation could not have had its progress more closely watched than was that of the George Washington. Day by day were the details of the voyage to Brest reported, not in the old manner of curious detail of a personal kind, but with words that suggested the importance, the high consequence, the fatefulness of this affair. Presidents of the United States do not come to Europe during their term of office. Here was a rule broken, for a tremendous cause. Those who had murmured against what they suggested might be presidential interference with the management of their victory, experienced a strange influence again at the sailing of the Democratic head of the freest State, the one who has spoken most loudly and with the greatest reason and sincerity upon the better ordering of the world after the war for the good of mankind. It seemed to make a difference when it was known that the President was coming. He as no other man stood boldly for the banishment of war; but as he approached European shores victorious peoples, who but a few months before had been in agony with war and had pleaded for the President's assistance in all their idealistic endeavours, were heard to be murmuring of the possibilities of Conscription in permanence among them, the maintenance of grand armies such as had veritably produced the greatest and most horrible war. There seemed to be a hush among these excited peoples as the President approached. A great sincerity was advancing upon something different.

* * *

The circumstances of this voyage were remarkable. Mr Wilson is to all appearances and knowledge a very plain and unromantic man. He is marvellously methodical. He acts upon reason and in the most modern way, and with the most modern devices for his assistance. He cannot be considered as a materialistic man, for he has a soaring idealism above that of other statesmen whom we know; but yet he deals with plain facts and circumstances in a plain and circumstantial way, takes this poor world as he finds it, and exerts himself in a manner that is appropriate to the chief of the Americans. Beyond work and the prosecution of his ideals he has few enthusiasms. He plays golf; they say he does not play it very well. He likes to walk, and to ride in an automobile. In hours of tension he loves solitude and the unhindered working of his own uninfluenced mind. There is something unusual, probably something very great, in a man who thus gives himself to solitude. I do not know what the President eats; I have not inquired when I have been at Washington; but it would not be a surprise to learn that it was plain fare such as any good and simple American might enjoy. I have, indeed, been told that he drinks no wine, and that when first he came to the White House there were certain difficulties as to his preferences in such matters and inconveniences that might be occasioned to his guests. Washington society, however, seems to have found the difficulties not insuperable. Perhaps Mr Wilson has some vices; but if he has them, their exact complexion has not yet been disclosed, even though he has twice passed the fiery ordeal of election for the presidency, and has laid himself open to universal examination and criticism. Now, it is a quality of vice that in certain quantities it often makes for romance. One who is without it is apt to appear to a world that is far from good and pure as too dull and plain and insipid. Thus, when we look upon those stern and yet not ungentle features of the President—the master's mouth, the eyes that pierce beyond, the purposeful set of countenance, a touch of anxiety generally upon it—we sometimes think this is a cold, unattractive man for all his tremendous moral strength and worth. But it is not so; and even if it were, the circumstances of this voyage suddenly transformed the President to the most shining figure of all the hour's romance. The peoples of the earth were not singing songs of joy and satisfaction when he took ship, as but two months before one would have supposed they would. Instead, they were disposed to ask the wherefore and the why; they were perhaps suspicious and somewhat fearful because they engaged in new designs, and some said that they were even disposed to coquet with the principles of the peace as they had laid them down before. In his own country, the flow of American blood having ceased, and the enormously strong position that the United States has gained through the war being guaranteed, there was a disposition to challenge the conduct of the man who had clearly taken a front-line place for himself in American history alongside Washington and Lincoln. Mr Wilson is of the Democratic Party; the Republicans now broke out strongly against him; they questioned the advisability and the right of his travelling to Europe for the Peace Conference. Other American Presidents had not made such voyages during their terms; but then there had not been peace conferences like this in which the whole world —and America with it—was so much concerned. Some accused Mr Wilson of too much reticence in regard to his peace programme. But he pursued his plan in that unswerving and persistent way in which, slowly and surely, with marvellous perspicuity and adroitness, he won over in a solid block to participation in the war the whole American nation, till then a people of factions and racial prejudices, the majority of them averse to any active part in the European struggle. This conversion was in its way one of the most marvellous feats of statesmanship ever accomplished. At that time the newspapers in Britain, France, and other countries sang the praises of the President loudly and with no restraint of epithet. . . . The war went on.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

* * *

Some time later a political offensive, as these things have been called, was begun. Germany and her friends, feeling distress, appealed to the United States; the Allies looked in the same direction for a lead. There had been things that had not worked well and wisely in their own statesmanship, which had been halting and sometimes lacking in moral force. It was feared only that Mr Wilson, when he answered the appeals of the enemy, might not be strong enough, that he might be disposed too much to temper justice with mercy. But among all the statements, the documents, the speeches of the war, the things that men of importance said in that period, for clarity, exactness, force, and a peculiar directness that is distinctly fascinating, there are none like those of this man, who is such a master of plain words. When Germany cringed and pleaded, he told her cold truth. His Note of October 23, simple, sharp statement as it is, has some of the elements of full drama, for there is a gradual rise to a pointed climax, and a final tremendous crash with the word 'surrender,' which had not been used before. The Note opened softly, it increased in volume and in force, and it ended with a passage which will be for ever famous: 'Feeling that the whole peace of the world depends now on plain speaking and straightforward action, the President deems it his duty to say, without any attempt to soften what may seem harsh words, that the nations of the world do not and cannot trust the word of those who have hitherto been the masters of German policy, and to point out once more that, in concluding peace, and attempting to undo the infinite injuries and injustices of this war, the Government of the United States cannot deal with any but veritable representatives of the German people, who have been assured of a genuine constitutional standing as the real rulers of Germany. If it must deal with the military masters and the monarchical autocrats of Germany now, or if it is likely to have to deal with them later, in regard to the international obligations of the German Empire, it must demand not peace negotiations, but surrender. Nothing can be gained by leaving this essential thing unsaid.' That was the end of it. Without a doubt, that influenced strongly the speedy conversion of Germany to democracy. Not many days passed before the Kaiser and his son were refugees in Holland. The peoples again marvelled at the President of the fine, firm words and the clear vision and the moral strength, and they admired him. He was not like the other statesmen. When a formula for peace was needed his famous Fourteen Points were accepted, and the fourteenth was the League of Nations on which Mr Wilson had set his heart and mind as the greatest of all ideals, one that would mean a turning-point in civilisation, the beginning of a new order in a new world, the abolition of the hellish system of war that reduces men to beasts. All then said, 'Yes, a League of Nations would be splendid.' War must be ended for evermore; a further preparation for it was unthinkable. A little more time went on, and then the war was ended. The bells rang, the people made merry, and the politicians took their old tools out of the cupboard again.

And now when the war was won there came a change, as we know, in many things—mostly a happy change. The streets of town were white with light at night; it seemed a wondrous thing. Our daily bread became more palatable. Some irritating restrictions were removed. Man, still with many shackles about him, began to sniff the air of freedom, or thought he did. The war-clouds were dispersed. And then a curious thing happened in regard to Mr Wilson; some of the people, or rather their leaders, began to pick holes in the President and his policy, which now appeared to matter far less. Germany was beaten; her victors were secure; they could do as they liked. The President seemed to dwindle. Some suggested that he interfered too much. There had to be a certain manipulation of his Fourteen Points. There was a disposition, as some said, not to trouble much about the League of Nations, which was perhaps a chimerical scheme. After all, they said, was not war inevitable, had it not always been, and would it not always be? Were there not yellow races coming on that might throw out a desperate challenge to the white? And some even said that, with all its horrors we have come to know so well, war was not all bad. Some commercial elements—profiteers, as many of them are called—and certain politicians and others said so. The old enthusiasms for peace were a little less; flushed with victory, a part of the world seemed half-inclined to forget its better self. The opportunist weakness of faltering human nature—'When the devil was sick, the devil a saint would be; when the devil was well, the devil a saint was he'! The President saw the ideals languishing amidst a new indifference. Now the nations, or some of their leaders, were already whispering of the possibility of future wars, and the need for preparing for them. They considered in some cases that it might not be a good thing to get rid of militarism. There were ideas abroad that Conscription in Britain might hereafter be necessary. About this time the devil was feeling very well. In such circumstances the President, holding hard to his ideals, determined to go to Europe and further his case as best might be done. It was a momentous decision. He would plead for perpetual peace, exert his strength towards the establishment of the League of Nations, show that it was a real, a practical, scheme, and that mankind must adopt that scheme if it would be saved. It appears, on the deepest consideration, that there are only two possible ways in which war can be avoided in the future: one is by such a League of Nations as this, and the other by purely Democratic and Labour government. Failing these, wars must continue—and alas for those who must withstand the horrors of the next!

* * *

It is curious to see how this unmilitary, unroyal civilian has exerted a remarkable moral ascendancy everywhere, how so much of the world looks towards him hopefully and with a deep respect, how he is regarded as no man has been regarded before, and that despite the fact that those who are intimate with him and associated with his affairs and his management of himself declare that he is one of the worst men in the world for the achievement of personal publicity. Those who have been connected with him since he was President of Princeton University and Governor of New Jersey say they cannot remember a single case in which he put himself out to obtain such publicity. He simply will not advertise; he hates the propaganda of self. He dislikes seeing particulars of his personality in print; and at election and other times, when such publicity is highly advantageous, he has turned down innumerable proposals for the advertising of himself. It is said that since he has been President he has seen far fewer correspondents and writers than any of his predecessors; and he himself has declared that in all the descriptions of himself, his work, and his methods that have been published during the last few years he has been able to recognise himself in only a very few. There are two standard ways of describing him. By one, the most general, he is represented as a hard, cold, highly methodical, and dull man of affairs, an up-to-date American governmental machine; by the other he is a dreamer of dreams, who in solitude sees visions and formulates impossible ideals for a new world which he lays before the peoples in impressive documents. What he does and how he does it is rarely told. Thus we find an impression that all the time of the war he was at the White House in Washington, pondering upon problems with Mr Lansing or some other, promulgating Notes to the world, and only occasionally venturing forth into the open country of the States and preaching the points of duty to an anxious but willing people. But if only a little were known of the things he has done that are not permitted to be known, romance would soon begin to glow about this strange, strong man. Upon the walls of the Capitol at Washington there are many fine and expansive pictures depicting incidents of high significance in the history of the country. They tell impressively something of its early struggles with the Indians, the case of the Dutch, the French, and others, and of stirring events by the waters of the Hudson and the Mississippi. In particular there are, among these great mural paintings which will tell to future generations how America was made and how she wrought for her own salvation in the first two centuries of her existence, a number of representations of the strife with the British showing how it established American independence. If the truth of what the President has done is permitted hereafter to be known, it must be impossible for pictures of certain events in which he was intimately and personally concerned to be omitted from those walls of Washington where there will surely be told the story of the raising of the great American Army, its transhipment over the seas, and its gallant fights in France. Here for brief mention is one such presidential action, an account of which was not published in the newspapers, but which is coming to be known. What was reported once in the way of a very simple little paragraph was that the President had left Washington for a trip in the governmental yacht Mayflower. That was in the summer of 1917, when America, in the war, was laying herself hard to the great task before her. There was nothing extraordinary in the proceeding; Presidents often went for trips in the Mayflower. However, this was a time when the President was acting as Commander-in-Chief of the navy, as by the constitution he is, and of the army too. The American Navy was preparing for active service on 'the other side.' A few destroyers had gone in advance, but the big ships, the Dreadnoughts like the New York, the Utah, the Wyoming, and all the rest—a splendid fleet—were still in American waters, but ready now to go. The Mayflower, as she seemed so unpretentiously and tranquilly to steam down the Potomac, was going out to sea to join this prepared fleet. The appointed place was far out, away from sight of land and from the knowledge of most Americans. There the fleet was gathered together; orders for its being so had been issued by the Secretary of the Navy Department. And so on the following afternoon the officers of all the fleet were assembled on the deck of the leading battleship, and there, with no ceremony, no saluting, no form or fancy reception of any kind, the President appeared before them. There were a few things which, as the first American and their leader, he wished to say to them before they went away. He wasted no words; he talked to them simply, plainly, and very directly. He told them that the submarine had to be beaten, and that they had to do it. He wanted from the American Navy not merely a record as good as that of other navies, but a better one, if it were possible to obtain it. He called for action at its best, alike from admirals and from junior officers, and he demanded that all the wits of all the officers of the fleet should be applied with the utmost American intensity to the solution of the submarine problem. He urged upon them that all, regardless of rank or distinction, must work and fight for the common object of victory. They say that that afternoon on the deck of the Dreadnought Woodrow Wilson was on fire, and that he thrilled those naval officers. Afterwards it was suggested to him that the speech ought to be published, but he would have none of it. There were no reporters or photographers there; it was the President's desire that this should be regarded as a private, but an earnest, talk to the men upon whom he laid a great trust. The Mayflower, steaming west again, crept quietly up the Potomac with the President; while the American fleet with a great heart pounded away to the east where was the war. And it is known very well what a fine account it gave of itself, and how the British and American fleets have come by such an admiration and respect for each other as no man would have believed. A picture of that assembly on the battleship must surely be laid upon the walls at Washington.

* * *

The independence, the singularity, of his manner and method are remarkable. He is a law unto himself; and his exactness, his certainty, his consequent force, are like those of no other statesman. In an age when most men seek to gain time by a system of short conversations and to dispense as much as possible with writing, the President believes intensely in the time-saving and efficiency advantages of the written word. When a problem is to be laid before him for his solution, he prefers not to see many people upon it to argue with them, but would have all the facts laid before him in writing. When men would present a case to him, declaring that they could do it so well in no other way, he demands a memorandum first, for the same thing might have been submitted to him before, and to go over old ground would be a waste of time, and nothing is so much abhorred by Mr Wilson as a waste of time. If, after he has seen the memorandum, he considers it would be profitable to see the man, the latter is told of it. When an interview is given he asks that it shall be cut as short as possible, no matter what the circumstances may be, and that conversation shall be limited to facts and nothing but facts. It is always said of the President that he has a veritable passion for facts. So the preliminary courtesies of introduction and the final perorations of farewell are cut out. He uses the telephone very much, and for one particular reason—that the telephone is not an instrument of ceremony. When he has obtained the information he needs, he can terminate the conversation more easily than if it were a personal interview. It is but a case of hanging up the receiver and the trick is done. By such and other economies of time he is able to accomplish an almost incredible amount of work. They say he was directly and personally and actively concerned with every move that was made in the war by the United States, that he studied and was in a varying degree responsible for every plan that was made, that he knew of the service rendered by every officer of high command, that he read every important cablegram that was delivered to the Department of State. When, at a most critical moment, General Pershing unreservedly offered the services of the American Army to Marshal Foch, it was not known or appreciated that it was the President who directed this move. Europe during the war marvelled at the manner in which he so often did the right thing, said just the right word at the right time, that which others had searched for, but could not find. One reason for this is his own sure knowledge and instinct, his true and absolute statesmanship; and another is his unerring calculation of public opinion, which he studies in every possible direction with the greatest thoroughness. He has extracts from the editorials of all the newspapers laid before him or quoted to him, and he has what can best be described as a system of friends. He has hundreds of intimate friends everywhere, chosen for their sense and judgment. He has reckoned up these friends very carefully, ascertained their prejudices, their knowledge, the value of their opinions. When he appeals to them, he knows exactly the worth of their statement or suggestion. These people write to him continually, telling him their news and their views, telling them to him in the plain, succinct way that he prefers, and their assistance to him is of the highest value. Partly from a personal knowledge that has been gathered in his own country, partly from the information of those who know him, one could continue for many pages upon the characteristics of a strange, subtle, and most forceful personality. One could tell how he takes fine care of the health that enables him to do such prodigious work, of his interesting system of life, of his memory, which is the wonder of all officialdom, and all the rest of it. But always it is his force and his originality that impress the most. The other day the venerable Dr Clifford wrote thus: 'Can any one hesitate to regard President Wilson as a gift of God? How opportune his advent, backed by the unstinted resources and whole-hearted devotion of the people of the United States! How keen and sure his vision, incisive his speech, strong his devotion to Democratic principles, and sound and just the foundations he has laid for a clean and abiding peace!' Never did man set himself a grander or more difficult task. Peoples pray that he may prevail.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER IX.

'THE sooner you start the better,' said the colonel approvingly. 'But I have more to tell you. Hugh's reference to a hazy memory of a family tradition kindled a train of thought in me; for the strange thing is that there has existed a tradition in our line concerning lost or stolen jewels. It dates, I believe, from the sixteenth century, and I have something which bears on it. It is in a little, hidden, fireproof safe which is built into the wall opposite, behind those two rows of imitation books. I don't suppose you ever knew of the safe's existence. See!'

He went to the book-shelves, touched a spring, and the dummy books fell outwards, disclosing the door of a little safe. Having taken a bunch of keys from his pocket, he opened the safe door, and from a drawer inside it drew out a long envelope.

'I remember my father, very many years ago, reading the envelope's contents. They made no impression on me at the time, possibly because he assured me that they were valueless curiosities. He and his father before him knew no more of their history than I do—which is precious little. I had forgotten all about them, and never had occasion to look at them until yesterday, when Hugh's letter arrived. All I know is that there was a tradition in the family that a reward for faithful services, a signal favour in the shape of jewels, had been sent long ago by one of the Popes to the then Forbes of Glenciuin, and that the jewels never reached him.'

He drew from the envelope two yellow-stained papers, very thin, and so worn at the edges that they hardly held together. The first one was legible in parts, and its nature was clear. Some of the quaint, faded, spidery characters of a bygone age were not readable, but it was plain that it was an inventory of valuables. It ran thus:

Pax Christi. Given at Saint Mark's . . . ye Fisherman His Ring . . . in Ye Fourthe Yeare . . . faithful servants . . . Glenciuin in ye Northe . . . ane Great Matter concerning our unhappie Realme of Scottland . . . Item Siller Galleon . . . Four and Twentie Great Black Pearles at ye Bulwarkes . . . Five Golde . . . Crucifix Carven and Sett about with Gemms . . . two Cordes . . . jeweld Rosarie to his Ladye . . . Lyon of Scottland on a Shield . . . Crosses of Emirants a lesser Brazen Casquett and ane Great Jewell of ye farthest Inde a Marvell to See Itt and None Other is ye Greate Leppard's Eye.

'The Leopard's Eye!' I exclaimed. 'The man "Wakeford" used the same words. Can it be possible that the old story of the jewels was true?'

'True or not, there is certainly something more than a strange coincidence here.'

'Does the other paper help us?'

'I am afraid not. It looks about as promising as a dried cabbage-leaf. But my eyes are old. Take this magnifying-glass and see if you can make anything of it.'

He opened the other paper and laid it on the table, and I took the glass and bent over it, hoping to find something of interest; but I was disappointed. The paper was covered with damp stains. A few very faint characters showed here and there, but it was plain that for any practical purpose it might as well have been a blank sheet.

'Well?' asked the colonel, after I had scrutinised it.

'The years have done for it, sir. Only the ghosts of a few of the original characters remain. No one will be able to make out a single word of it, I fear.'

I was giving it a farewell look under the glass, when a word at the foot of the paper caught my eye. I gazed so long that the colonel was moved to suggest that my sight was no better than his own.

'One moment, uncle. I don't know what to think. This is remarkable.'

I stared at the paper. My thoughts went back to the night of the fog in Edinburgh, for the words I read were 'Exultabunt Domino,' and in front of the first word was a little Roman cross. They were in tiny, cramped, faded characters, but there was no doubt about them.

'What's the matter, my lad?' asked my uncle. 'Your eyes are jumping out of your head!'

I told him the whole story of the affair in the fog, the red-haired man, the pocket-book left in my rooms, the slip of paper in the imitation cigarette, and the murder of the foreign sailor.

'The unfortunate thing is that I did not copy the paper,' I said ruefully. 'It was not intelligible. I could make out one or two English words, but I was struck by two Latin words at the foot. These were "ossa humiliata." I remember them distinctly. There is a link between that paper and this one. The words in the two papers run thus: "Exultabunt Domino ossa humiliata," which sentence occurs in the Roman Catholic Office of the Dead.'

The colonel had risen and was pacing the room, his face very grave.

'That in itself does not get us very far,' I went on; 'but what impresses me is that the left side of the paper taken from my cabinet was ragged and uneven. Now, the right side of this paper is also ragged, and it may well be that the one in your possession and the one stolen from me in Edinburgh fit into each other to form an intelligible document. If this be so, the men who have the other paper in their possession are searching for the one which will fit it, and give them a key to something.'

'A key!'

'Yes; a key to a hiding-place.'

'It is possible that Hugh has some papers which may throw light on all this. But I wish'—and there was an unusually sombre note in his voice—'I wish that I had never heard a single word about the business. I hope there is no danger in your going to Italy. Don't forget that the contents of the Edinburgh pocket-book were of such importance that it was whisked away next morning as soon as you turned your back. Now, this paper which has lain peacefully for years is resurrected. I have half a mind to throw it into the fire.'

'I beg of you to let me keep it for you meanwhile. Or you can deposit it for safe custody with your bankers.'

He did not answer, but ceased his slow pace up and down the room, and stood looking down into the fire with a troubled frown.

'Neil, I have something else to tell you,' said he. 'I may be an old fool—at my age one sometimes has queer fancies—but when I read Hugh's letter about the dark visitor and his errand, I confess it gave me something to think about. My boy, I believe I am being spied upon. I swear to you that three times lately a dark-looking stranger has been seen by me prowling near the house.'

Instantly I recalled Dr Hall's conversation with me in the Caledonian Hotel. Intensely interested, I begged my uncle to tell me the full story; and I now give his statement as accurately as I can remember it.

(Continued on page 135.)

RUBBISH.

By Doxa Foy.

IT is often said that the waste of one generation proves the wealth of the next. One wonders how our own 'next generation' will fare, as we are leaving very little 'waste' for them to turn to account. The most unpromising materials are being made to yield products of great value, and some of these are so accessible, so easily and economically manufactured, that the development of them is likely to be continued, now the war is over.

The task of 'making bricks without straw' has not proved beyond us, and it may be that our task-masters, Scarcity and Necessity, will, unlike those of the Hebrews in Egypt, one day be the recipients of our deepest gratitude.

Our Victorian grandmothers are often referred to as examples of thrift, but we imagine they would have been somewhat surprised if they had been asked to save from the rubbish-heap their old boots, the 'combings' of their pet dogs, their plum-stones, and nut-shells!

It was considered something of an act of supererogation to save the bones of the joint for soup, instead of throwing them to the dog; and yet we are told nowadays that these bones will provide eighty different by-products, after the cook—and perhaps the dog too!—is done with them!

It will be many years before living becomes easy again, and it may be that we shall never go back to the extravagant, wasteful methods which had grown up with this luxury-loving generation. Be that as it may, it is probable that the development of some of these newly discovered industries will do something towards providing work for the 'unemployed' after the war.

At the best of times the problem of fuel has been a source of anxiety to the poor, and one hopes that the substitute for coal, which even at this time costs under ten shillings a ton to prepare, will not be allowed to slip into abeyance. This substitute is made from pulverised ash-bin refuse, of which ten million tons a year are said to be produced in England. It burns with a good flame, emits very little smoke, and gives out a strong heat.

Straw is now being made to yield most of the substances obtained from coal. Special retorts have been invented for the distillation. The straw is pressed into cubes and heated to about 1000° F. —five times as hot as boiling water! By this means a ton of straw produces, in something less than an hour, nearly twelve thousand cubic feet of gas, six hundred pounds of lampblack, eight gallons of tar, and a large amount of ammonia for fertilising purposes.

Sawdust has hitherto been regarded as a convenient material for packing, but very little use has otherwise been made of it. In the near future, when the demand for small and cheap houses has to be met, sawdust is likely to be exalted to a high place in commercial value. Mixed with clay, it is being made into bricks and tiles, the beauty of which is that they can be cut with a saw, and nails can be driven into them with ease. Indeed, we may expect the whole house to be built of sawdust, for, when mixed with concrete and laid down moist, it makes an excellent flooring material, softer and more elastic to the tread than either ordinary concrete or tiles.

The rubbish-heap has been the source of many romances in the history of commerce. The despised but necessary 'dust-heap' has proved again and again that nothing is 'waste.'

Rubbish-heaps are like men, in that some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them. Among the inherently great were the disfiguring mountains of rubbish which used to surround steelworks, composed of the old and useless linings of the vessels in which the steel was made. They were a veritable nightmare to the manufacturers, till it was suggested that the materials of which the linings were made might prove valuable on the land as fertilisers. Now the demand for 'basic slag,' as it is called, exceeds the supply!

Among the rubbish-heaps which have, in spite of many obstacles, 'achieved greatness' may be mentioned those composed of the refuse known as 'silk waste.' As all who have kept silkworms are aware, this 'waste,' consisting of old cocoons, dead silkworms, and a sticky mass of twigs and leaves, presents a most unpromising material on which to work. Nevertheless, Mr Samuel Cunliffe Lister, a woollen manufacturer, afterwards Lord Masham, succeeded in turning this loathsome mess into fabrics of great beauty and daintiness, after many trials and failures—incidentally making for himself a huge fortune thereby.

As an instance of waste which has had 'greatness thrust upon it' ('notoriety' would perhaps be a better word), hydrochloric acid, from which chlorine gas is made, may be cited.

At the end of the eighteenth century a Frenchman, M. Leblanc, invented a process for making soda from common salt. By this process hydrochloric acid was given off as a waste product. We in these days know only too well the cruel and desolating properties of this gas.

Not realising that the gas was heavier than air, the manufacturers thought to dispose of it by letting it escape through tall chimneys, with the result that all vegetation was destroyed, and life became almost impossible in large areas round the factories. Taller chimneys were built —with the consequence that larger areas were affected. Then some one hit upon the idea of dissolving the hydrochloric acid in water. This water, of course, ultimately reached the rivers, and the outcry increased.

The manufacturers were at their wits' end, when the problem was solved in a remarkable manner, and the hydrochloric acid became a valued source of wealth instead of an unmitigated nuisance.

In 1861 the duty on paper was abolished, with the result that a great demand grew up for books and newspapers. Straw, grass, nettles, wood, and other materials were used for the manufacture of paper, and these must, of necessity, be bleached in some way.

Chlorine gas was then, as now, the best and cheapest bleaching agent known, and it was not long before the hated hydrochloric acid became a valuable and valued by-product.

A present-day instance, which repeats the history of basic slag, is that of the waste-heaps surrounding the Cornish tin-mines. The metal tungsten, used for hardening steel, is obtained from wolfram, an ore which is found associated with tin. Wolfram used to be regarded as a veritable 'wolf in the fold' by the tin-miners. As it was of the same specific gravity as tin, the only means of separating it was by hand. When war broke out wolfram leapt into prominence as one of the most precious ores in the world, and the rubbish-heaps around the Cornish tin-mines became a valuable source of supply. Whereas the smelters once demanded that the tin should not contain more than 2 per cent. of wolfram, now the position is reversed, and the wolfram must not contain more than 2 per cent. of tin.

MR SWEETBREAD'S SURPLICE.

PART II.

I.

IN due course the bishop married Sweetbread and Christabel, and for three years there was naught but bliss at Tittlebury Rectory.

Then that famous young widow, Mrs Doncaster, returned to the Manor House from France, where she had been nursing the wounded. Her beautiful profile, so often depicted in the illustrated press, is familiar to us all. However, those who have actually seen her agree that none of her photographs quite does her justice.

'Do you consider her good-looking?' Christabel asked her husband anxiously at dinner.

'Her nose is at least a quarter of an inch too long,' he answered promptly. 'It's of the kind, too, that grows redder with age.'

'Then you wouldn't like to kiss her?' said Christabel, remembering her husband's notorious exploits.

'I'd rather eat my surplice,' answered Mr Sweetbread emphatically, to Christabel's great joy.

But O'Brien, Mr Sweetbread's hot-headed Irish curate, who often dined with them, was extremely annoyed at this remark. Mrs Doncaster and he had caught sticklebacks together as children in County Tipperary, and she had nursed him when suffering from the shell-shock he acquired while serving as chaplain.

'I don't think rectors should talk about kissing ladies and eating surplices,' he spluttered hotly.

'Is anything the matter with the soup?' questioned Christabel crushingly.

But O'Brien was very much upset, the shell-shock still affecting his nerves, and he repeated his rector's strictures, in confidence, to his friend Miller, curate in the next parish, who told his fiancée, who repeated them to Miss Webber, Christabel's old enemy, who told Mrs Doncaster herself, with ingenious embroideries and appalling exaggerations.

The story was a little more than a fortnight on its zigzag way to Mrs Doncaster.

'Look 'ere, Mr Sweetbread,' said the people's churchwarden, confronting him angrily in the High Street of Tittlebury as the bells were chiming eleven on a windy morning, three weeks afterwards, 'I suppose you're aware as 'ow Mrs Doncaster 'as left your church, and gone over to the Dissentin' chapel?'

'Impossible!' cried Mr Sweetbread, perfectly horrified at the suggestion.

Some time before he had quarrelled with the Dissenting minister, and the dispute between them was now at its hottest, Sweetbread having preached the tenth of a course of sermons entitled, 'Dissenting Ministers as Decoys of the Devil,' and the Dissenting minister being at the same point in his outspoken series, 'Sinners in Surplices.'

'Impossible!' repeated Mr Sweetbread, waving his umbrella indignantly. 'What on earth would Mrs Doncaster go to chapel for?'

'Because of the hawful things you keep sayin' about 'er behind 'er back,' said the churchwarden, his little eyes snapping nastily; 'and if she goes to chapel, all the village will go with 'er. Did you see what the Tittlebury News said about 'er this mornin'?'

'No,' answered Mr Sweetbread nervously.

'The leadin' article said that, besides 'avin' perhaps the very loveliest of the lovely faces for which the district in which the paper circulates is noted, she 'ad won for 'erself himmortal fame. It says she stayed on in the hospital-ship long after the last boat 'ad left, gettin' the wounded soldiers on to rafts, though the Germans was a-firin' at 'er no end. And she ain't conceited about it either, for, when my wife said she ought to get the V.C., she said my wife deserved it more than she did, for it took much more bravery to sit in church a-listenin' to one of your long sermons.'

'The man's intoxicated,' thought Mr Sweetbread, turning his back. Of course, if Mrs Doncaster went to chapel, it would almost ruin him, most of the villagers being her servants or tenants. But surely Mrs Doncaster would never insult her pretty ears, he thought, by listening to the brain-rotting balderdash of that windy word-bag!

However, on his way home he had to pass the Nonconformist minister's garden, where, over the wall, he caught a glimpse of that white-whiskered and usually very dignified gentleman performing a Highland-fling on the lawn, all by himself, evidently in a state of ineffable jubilation.

From that moment Mr Sweetbread began to fear the worst.

Then, as he passed the 'Doncaster Arms,' he imagined he heard a husky voice growl, 'Surplice-eatin' hog!' But perhaps his ears deceived him.

However, as he entered his large, luxurious study, where O'Brien was waiting for him, a suspicion struck him. 'Oh, by the way, O'Brien,' he said, 'do you remember how, in innocent badinage one evening, I made a joke about eating my surplice rather than kiss Mrs Doncaster? It annoyed you, I remember. You weren't mad enough to repeat it to anybody?'

'I was,' admitted O'Brien. 'But it was only one of my friends I told, in confidence.'

'And now it's in every mouth in the parish!

Tell me, sir, what was your text last Sunday morning?'

'"The Tongue is a Fire,"' quoted the curate.

'And didn't it occur to you,' said the rector, with moving gesticulations and most pathetic eloquence—'didn't it strike you that, at that very moment, within the sacred edifice itself, there was a tongue to which the designation of the text might most properly, most appropriately, be applied?'

'Yes, rector, it did.'

'And whose was that tongue?' Mr Sweetbread went on, bringing his reproachful forefinger round so that it bore directly upon the curate.

'Your own, rector,' answered the young man, gazing at him firmly.

'Mine?' cried Mr Sweetbread with a start. 'Mine?'

'Yes. Was it not your tongue that started this scandal about surplice-eating? I wrote that sermon specially for your benefit. I hoped it might do you good.'

Mr Sweetbread's knees almost gave way. 'A curate thinking that one of his sermons might do his rector good!' he gasped, leaning against the mantelpiece. 'Oh Modesty, Modesty, whither hast thou fled?'

For a moment he thought of giving his curate notice; then he remembered Mrs Doncaster's intimacy with him. Perhaps she would come back to church for O'Brien's sake. So he made up his mind, magnanimously, to let the young man off with a reprimand.

'O'Brien,' he said, 'when the bishop sent you here, he warned me that you had a fiery temper, and said I was to teach you to overcome it. I must, therefore, ask you to preach on meekness next Sunday morning. Meekness is the loveliest of all the virtues, especially in a curate. And, by the way, if I catch any of the villagers spreading their vile tittle-tattle about my surplice-eating, I'll thrash them till they yell—yes, till they yell!'

II.

If Mr Sweetbread had carried out his threat, he would have been obliged to castigate the whole of his congregation. The most shocking, fearful, incredible versions of his remark about the surplice were in circulation. If questioned, O'Brien heatedly declined to give details, and every day saw the tale more exaggerated and the villagers more incensed at the affront to their idolised lady. She didn't attend Mr Sweetbread's church next Sunday, or the Sunday following. Nor did any of the parishioners, except half-a-dozen or so. The rest followed Mrs Doncaster to chapel, the prestige of which looked up to such an extent that the minister, at the suggestion of the deacons, started wearing a silk hat on week-days.

On hearing this Mr Sweetbread sent a letter of apology to Mrs Doncaster, but it was returned to him unopened. They met one evening outside the chapel, and she cut him dead; and the gesticulations accompanying his animated, not to say frantic, endeavours being misunderstood by the dispersing Dissenters, he was followed as far as the rectory by a hooting crowd. Next Sunday, besides the occupants of the rectory pew and the still faithful sexton, the congregation consisted of the village idiot—who was also deaf and dumb. A reporter, however—one of those who used to pen ecstatic descriptions of the rector's eloquence—looked in for a moment, and then went out again.

A few mornings after, Mr Sweetbread saw an article in the Tittlebury News, with the following large black headlines: 'THE PARIAH PARSON OF TITTLEBURY. WHY DOESN'T THE BISHOP DISMISS HIM?'

Only six weeks before, the same journal had alluded to him as 'our own eloquent and dearly loved rector.'

'Everybody's against me now,' ruminated Mr Sweetbread mournfully, as he sat over his poached eggs with Christabel—'curate, churchwarden, parishioners, press; everybody except our dear, faithful old sexton, and . . . Christabel . . . Christabel?' Here the rector wasn't quite so sure, for his wife's manner towards him lately had been very odd, especially in the early mornings. 'Christabel,' he asked reproachfully, laying down his fork, 'why do you never kiss me now?'

'Because you love Mrs Doncaster in secret,' she cried, bursting wildly into tears.

'What under heaven makes you think that?' cried Mr Sweetbread.

'Because of the way you rave about her in your sleep. You keep plunging up and down the bed for hours every night, crying out that you're going to eat your surplice for her sake.'

'But, darling,' said her husband, trying to smile, 'that's only this worry acting on my nerves. All great orators are highly strung'——

But she rushed out of the room, in strong hysterics.

The rector collapsed helplessly into his chair. 'Everybody's abandoned me now,' he thought, 'except my dear, loyal old sexton, faithful among the faithless.'

There was a rap at the door, and that faithful man appeared, cap in hand. 'I wants you to do somethin', sir,' he said.

'I'd do anything in the world you want, old friend,' said the rector, with affectionate moisture in his eyes. 'What is it?'

'I want you to 'eat your surplice,' replied the man.

. . . . . .

'Rector's a-goin' off 'is chump,' the sexton narrated afterwards over his beer in the 'Doncaster Arms.' 'I found some damp 'ad got into the surplice cupboard, and I tells rector that afore 'e puts 'is 'n on, it ought to be well 'eated to get the damp out, and then he lets out a yell like a Red Hindian and jumps up, and I bolts into the coal-'ole pretty sharp, I can tell you.'

III.

After lunch the rector screwed up his courage, and determined to make one more effort to appease Mrs Doncaster. He put on his topcoat, and looking round to be sure that his wife was not following him, he took the road leading to the Manor House. As he walked up the long drive the sun was setting in a sea of pale gold, lighting up the bare branches of the ancient trees. Near the house he turned off from the drive, taking the footpath through the shrubbery, the one to the right that leads you past the library windows—it is a little nearer, as is well known. The level rays of the sun struck directly against the panes, and he thought he caught a glimpse of Mrs Doncaster within the room.

'Tell your mistress I want to see her on most urgent business—on a matter of life and death,' he told the butler.

She received him in the library. 'Oh, my dear Mrs Doncaster,' cried the rector, 'this is heart-rending; this is agonising. . . . I must explain.'

He began, and never, even when preaching on occasions when bishops or other patrons of livings happened to be present, had the anguished orator pleaded so eloquently or gesticulated so pathetically as he did then.

Mrs Doncaster commenced to soften—to melt.

'The story I heard must have been exaggerated,' she said, and Mr Sweetbread noticed that there was now a much less angry look in the lovely eyes. 'But what you did say was bad enough. Is it true you said you 'd rather eat your surplice than kiss me?'

'Yes,' confessed the rector, stammering. 'But I didn't mean it. In fact, I—I meant I 'd—I 'd like to do just the opposite, really.'

'But if you didn't mean what you said then, how can you prove you mean what you 're saying now? What could you do to prove it?'

'I 'd do anything in the world to prove to you that I didn't mean it,' protested Mr Sweetbread passionately.

'Words—only words,' she answered, shaking her head.

'Mrs Doncaster,' cried Mr Sweetbread, more passionately still, 'deeds speak louder than words. Why, at this very moment, if you would allow me, I 'd—I 'd '——

She smiled provokingly. 'What would you do?' she whispered.

It was the week after Christmas, and now for the first time he perceived that a tiny sprig of mistletoe still hung from the antique chandelier, and that Mrs Doncaster was standing directly under it with the most alluring, the most inviting, smile that he had ever seen curving feminine lips—and he had seen a good many in his day.

He went a step nearer, and the nearer he came the more entrancingly she smiled, and the more beautifully shone her lips, and the more dazzlingly gleamed her complexion. She seemed to sway towards him. . . . .

'Oh Christabel, forgive me!' said Mr Sweetbread in his heart. 'This is extremely wicked, but it 's for your sake, and for the good of my congregation, and not for any mere personal selfish gratification that I 'm doing this.'

He kissed her.

As he did so great waves of relief and joy swept through his soul. 'This 'll bring her back to church again. . . . This will dish the Dissenting minister. . . . This horrible surplice-eating nightmare is settled at last.'

But, alas! it wasn't. Far from it.

For his lips had not receded more than half-an-inch from hers when there was a terrific, splintering, clattering crash. One of the windows was shivered to pieces.

'It 's an air-raid!' exclaimed Mrs Doncaster.

The rector was staring with horror at a longish, black object that lay on the floor, just beneath the smashed window.

'Is it a bomb?' asked Mrs Doncaster a little fearfully.

'It 's something worse—oh, much worse,' said the rector, waving both his hands in horror.

'Is it poison-gas?' said Mrs Doncaster, recoiling.

'Oh, something a million times worse than that—it 's my wife's umbrella! She must have followed me, and has been watching us through the pane, and has driven the umbrella clean through the glass in her jealousy.'

'Are you all right, mum?' interrupted the alarmed butler, who had been vainly rapping at the door for some time, and now opened it unbidden—he had a poker in his hand. ''As 'e been hattacking of you?'

'No, no! Go away,' said his mistress.

The man withdrew, doubtfully.

'Oh, Mrs Doncaster,' cried poor Mr Sweetbread reproachfully, after a long silence, 'I 'm ruined! Why did you tempt me so?'

'I never gave you the least encouragement, sir!' she exclaimed, in accents of anger and surprise. 'Why, so strongly do I object to your conduct of this afternoon that I intend to report it to the bishop.'

Then Mr Sweetbread picked up his hat and fled.

IV.

It was growing dark outside, and an owl was hooting dismally.

As Mr Sweetbread passed a clump of laurels a man sprang out and confronted him.

It was a clergyman. It was his own curate, O'Brien.

'You traitor! You wouldn't have enjoyed that kiss so much if you had known I was watching you,' said the curate grimly.

'What! was it you who pushed the umbrella through the window?' gasped the rector.

'Yes, of course. Who else would it be?'

'Oh, thank Heaven!' said Mr Sweetbread most fervently. 'Then there is still hope. But what did you do it for? And what were you doing with my wife's umbrella?'

'I didn't know it was hers,' said O'Brien. 'I found it in the post-office this morning. The postmistress said she was sure it was Mrs Doncaster's, as she had just been in. So I brought it along with me. I proposed to Mrs Doncaster yesterday, and she told me to come for a definite answer this afternoon. I was absolutely certain the answer would be "Yes," and I was bursting with happiness. Then I caught sight of you kissing one another—you, of all people! Talk about shell-shock!'

'O'Brien,' said the rector passionately, 'this is heart-rending. . . . This is agonising. . . . I will—I must explain.'

He started, and, with a persuasive eloquence that Demosthenes might have envied, he explained that the kiss had been purely one of formal withdrawal, humiliation, and apology, not one of gratification.

O'Brien was at last convinced and pacified by his rector's eloquence.

'And, O'Brien,' continued the rector earnestly, 'you remember the bishop says in one of his little books that it is a curate's duty, when selecting a wife, to choose not so much one that will be acceptable to himself as one that will be acceptable to his rector and congregation. Oh, my dear colleague, as regards your present proposal, you have my most cordial, official approval. If she became engaged to you, Mrs Doncaster could not, as an Anglican clergyman's future bride, attend that awful Dissenting chapel any longer. She would have to attend her parish church—my church—again. Now, O'Brien, propose to her again, for my sake!'

Without saying a word, O'Brien set off for the Manor House. The rector waited anxiously among the laurels, while the sky gradually filled with stars. An hour passed.

'Acceptances take more time than rejections,' thought the rector hopefully.

Another hour passed; the moon began to rise. Then O'Brien came running down the drive. 'The answer was "Yes,"' he said exultantly.

'My dear O'Brien,' said the rector, almost weeping for joy, 'I thank you from the bottom of my heart. And she's going to come back to my church again?'

'Yes; but she says you must make friends with the Dissenting minister first. She says your quarrel with him is a shocking bad example to the villagers. She says you and he must walk up and down the High Street arm-in-arm some market-day, smiling on one another all the time.'

'Suppose he refuses?'

'He'll not. She's going to give a thumping big donation to his chapel if he makes friends with you.'

'Then I'll make friends with him,' agreed Mr Sweetbread.

When he reached home he found his wife in bed, still weeping.

'Then you don't love her even a little bit?' she said when he had told her jubilantly of the engagement.

'Not a bit, darling.'

'And you have never felt at any time—and don't feel now—the faintest, smallest shadow of a desire to kiss her?'

'I'd rather eat my surplice,' he declared passionately.

I believe that this time he spoke the truth.

THE END.

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS.

AN ELECTRIC-LAMP COOKER.

MOST of us have heard of the hay-box for completing the cooking of food once it has been sufficiently heated over a gas-ring or on a coal-fire; in fact, this device was described in the pages of Chambers's Journal for October 1918. Mr Leoline Edwards, the inventor of a specially prepared cork which gives marvellous buoyancy to life-saving devices, has improved this useful appliance in two directions, so that it not only keeps things warm and completes the process of cooking, but, if so desired, cooks them from the beginning. In the first place, he uses his special cork instead of hay as a heat insulator; in the second, his box has provision for an electric lamp, which acts as a source of heat at an almost negligible cost. Ordinary granulated cork has hitherto been considered the best heat insulator, but Mr Edwards claims even better results from his specially prepared variety. The box is in the form of a cylinder, open at the top, but closed at the bottom, and measuring eighteen inches in diameter and twenty inches in height. It is made of sheet-iron, and inside of it is another and smaller sheet-iron cylinder, also closed at the bottom, but open at the top. The space between the inner and outer cylinders (two inches everywhere) is filled with the specially prepared cork, and the tightly fitting lid is really a circular box, two inches deep, filled with the cork. On the inside of the inner cylinder, near the bottom, is the opening to a short pipe leading to the outside of the box. This pipe will just pass an ordinary electric-lamp holder, in which a carbon lamp can be inserted after the holder has been pushed through the pipe, current being supplied from the nearest lamp-socket by a flexible cord. A carbon lamp is used because in it nearly four times as much electricity is turned into heat as in a metallic filament lamp. What may be called the 'cork-box' can be used without the lamp, if desired, and, so used, is more efficient than the hay-box; or the lamp may be inserted to maintain the heat, thus enabling large joints and considerable quantities of other foods to be cooked in a comparatively short time, as the original temperature is maintained, instead of being gradually reduced. Again, the food, if not too great in quantity, may be put into the box quite uncooked, and the lamp will perform the complete operation of cooking. The lamp rests upon an earthenware plate, the bright surface of which reflects the heat upwards; while a steel disc, supported on legs, serves as a rest for the meat-pan or other cooking-utensil, and protects the lamp. The main features of the appliance are low working-cost and simplicity. If a thirty-two-candle-power lamp is used, only a trifle over one-eighth of a unit per hour is consumed, the cost of which, at one penny a unit (the price charged in many towns for cooking and heating current), is almost negligible, even when cooking goes on for several hours. The lamps are procurable anywhere and at any time; whereas, whenever it is out of order, ordinary electrical cooking apparatus has to be taken to a shop and repaired by a skilled man at considerable expense. Mr Edwards's device should prove very useful in flats and small houses, especially in those where a cooker is required that will do its work without being watched.

MACHINE FOR PICKING COTTON.

One of the latest labour-saving devices hailing from America is a machine for picking cotton. Hitherto cotton has been picked by hand; and when one remembers that many of the pods, or 'bolls,' as they are called, grow near the ground, where the picking of them involves much stooping in a temperature of one hundred degrees in the shade or over, it is easy to understand how valuable is a machine which greatly lightens the toil. The apparatus works on the principle of the well-known vacuum-cleaner, nozzles having a powerful suction being applied to the bolls, which they completely clear of their cotton and seeds. A high-speed centrifugal fan creates the suction in the hose-pipes leading to the nozzles, of which there are five. The cotton, together with leaves, twigs, and other foreign matter sucked up by the nozzles, is drawn into the centre of the fan, and expelled at the periphery into a large pipe, which starts in an upward direction and curves round to the back of the machine, where the cotton is discharged into bags, the heavier foreign matter having been thrown out en route through perforations in the pipe. According to the Scientific American, cleaner cotton is turned out by this machine than that picked by hand, while the amount picked per man is at least four or five times as great. Moreover, no cotton is left on the pods, as compared with an amount ranging up to 50 per cent. when the crop is hand-picked. The suction-fan is driven by a sixteen-horse-power petrol-engine through suitable multiplying gear, the complete apparatus being mounted on a light three-wheeled frame, which can be easily moved about the cotton-fields by the gang of pickers who handle the nozzles.

INGENIOUS COAL-SAVER FOR OPEN FIRES.

When coal is burnt in an open fire most of the heat goes to waste, a large proportion passing up the chimney. If the fireplace is next to an outside wall, some of the heat is lost because it is conducted away to the outer air by the brickwork; in fact, by fixing a boiler at the back of any ordinary grate, another room may be warmed by means of a hot-water radiator without affecting the heating of the first. This system, however, involves structural alterations that can only be carried out with difficulty and at great expense under existing conditions. In order to trap some of the wasted heat in the easiest possible manner, Professor C. Vernon Boys, F.R.S., has devised the apparatus we are about to describe. At each side of the hearth is a vertical cylinder, supported on three legs, and containing a smaller cylinder inside it, the space between the inner and outer tubes being closed at the top and bottom. A steel chamber, fitted into the fireplace above the fire, has a horizontal diaphragm dividing it into an upper and a lower part, this diaphragm being so closely adjusted as to be smoke-tight. From the lower part of the chamber a pipe is led to each cylinder, and the hot gases from the fire, being unable to go straight up the chimney owing to the diaphragm, are compelled to traverse one or other of the two pipes leading into the cylinders. Here they are forced to circulate through the space between the inner and outer tubes by means of suitable baffles, and are finally returned through a pipe to the upper part of the chamber, and thence into the chimney. The main feature of the apparatus is that the cheerful appearance of the open fire is not in any way interfered with; while the temperature of the room, especially in the parts more remote from the fire, is materially increased. It should be noted that the inner tubes of the upright cylinders are open at the top and bottom; hence, when they become heated, a constant current of warmed air issues from the top of each, while cold air enters at the bottom. In like manner, the outsides of the outer tubes also produce ascending currents of warmed air. One advantage of the apparatus, apart from the heat saved, is the fact that it can be easily fitted to almost any fireplace. Again, the passages being more or less constricted compared with the open chimney, less warm air is drawn out of the room and less cold air sucked into it through the cracks in doors and windows. The top covers of the cylinders, together with the inner tubes, lift upward to facilitate cleaning. Recently a series of accurate tests was made under the exclusive supervision of officials of H.M. Office of Works at 29 Abingdon Street, London. Two rooms of the same size, fitted with similar grates, were set apart, the one, No. 22, being equipped with the apparatus, and the other, No. 23, being without it. The quantity of coal used in the two rooms was weighed each day, and the temperature of both was taken at half-hourly intervals. Both were at the same temperature when the fires were simultaneously lighted. It was found in the room containing the apparatus that the increase of temperature was from twice to fully thrice as much as in the other room. Another obvious result was that in Room No. 22 the air was of an almost even temperature, and the parts remotest from the fire were thoroughly warmed. Finally, when the amount of coal apportioned for the tests had been completely consumed in Room No. 23, a steady glowing fire continued long after in Room No. 22. Less accurately observed, but no less satisfactory, results have been obtained in other cases where the apparatus has been installed, as in the offices of the Prime Minister at No. 10 Downing Street, in the National Liberal Club, &c.; and eminent engineers who have seen the device have immediately ordered it for their private use. The cost of the apparatus, it may be added, is very moderate.

COAL AND IRON IN SPITSBERGEN.

A glowing account of the value of the mineral deposits in Spitsbergen was given recently by Mr A. G. Ponting, who was a member of the Scott Antarctic Expedition, and who has lately visited Spitsbergen for the Northern Exploration Company. Seams of coal may be seen at the surface over great areas; while a mountain, fifteen hundred feet in height, and having a length of several miles, appears to be entirely composed of particularly rich iron ore. Indeed, it contains so high a percentage (sixty-five) of iron that small pieces adhere to a magnet. This ore can be mined at the surface and transported direct to ships, and there is said to be enough of it to supply this country for centuries. These conditions easily account for the clause in the Brest-Litovsk Treaty giving the Germans facilities to develop Spitsbergen. Sir Martin Conway, who gave an address on 'The Political Status of Spitsbergen' at the same meeting of the Royal Geographical Society at which Mr Ponting spoke, said that the area containing the mineral wealth of Spitsbergen was recognised as belonging to England throughout the seventeenth century. He also suggested the establishment of reindeer ranches, the protection of the eider duck and the fox, and a close time for walruses extending for fifty years.

DRIED VEGETABLES FOR THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

One of the results of the war, so far as America was concerned, was the establishment on a firm foundation of the dried-vegetable industry, primarily for supplying the troops in France with vegetables in a form that could be easily shipped. The drying-plants consist of machines for peeling or slicing the vegetables, and of drying-rooms in which trays containing the products from the machines are stacked in such a way as to allow of the free circulation of warm, dry air all round them, the air being supplied by huge revolving fans working in conjunction with steam heating-apparatus. Some of the factories are on a very large scale, one concern having ten drying-plants, which, with the growing of the vegetables on adjacent land, involve the employment of thousands of men and women. The vegetables are thoroughly washed before being sent to the machines on endless belt conveyers; in fact, all operations, so far as is possible, are carried out by machinery. Some 65 to 95 per cent. of green vegetables consists of water, which is dried out, leaving light products that will keep for any length of time when packed in cartons of waxed paper or in tin cans. It is claimed for the process that neither the flavour nor the nourishing-power of the vegetables is impaired, while they are far easier and cleaner to handle than garden produce in its natural state. The loss of weight is astonishing, one pound of dried tomatoes, for instance, being equal to twenty pounds of freshly picked tomatoes. It may be added that nothing is wasted at the drying-plants, all parings, tops, and damaged parts being fed to pigs.

OIL-FUEL FOR THE KITCHEN-RANGE.

Towards the end of the war coal was practically unobtainable in Egypt by private individuals, and serious difficulties would have arisen had not the discovery and development of Egyptian oilfields synchronised with the growing shortage of coal. So far as domestic purposes were concerned, however, the petroleum available afforded little relief, owing to the limited quantities of paraffin that could be obtained from it; while attempts to use in lamps and stoves the heavy, thick liquid forming the bulk of the crude oil from the wells were for a time consistently unsuccessful. Fortunately Mr E. C. Bowden-Smith, M.I.Mech.E., of Cairo, has devised a burner for consuming this thick product which can be applied to an ordinary kitchen-range, the heat from the oil-flame taking the place of that from a coal-fire. Moreover, it involves no structural alterations; in fact, the use of coal can be reverted to at any time, or it can even be consumed at the same time as the oil. Compressed air is needed, but this requirement presents no difficulty in Cairo, where there is a system of compressed-air mains for draining the city. According to the description of the burner in The Engineer, the oil flows by gravity to a compressed-air nozzle, where the jet catches it up and atomises it, the result, when the oil is ignited, being a fierce, white, smokeless flame, that is capable of maintaining the full activities of the largest range. The oil gravitates to the burner from a reservoir on the range, where it is kept at a temperature of about one hundred and eighty degrees Fahrenheit. Much less oil is used than coal, the daily records at the Kasr-el-Eini Hospital showing that thirty-two kilos of oil were equal to eighty kilos of coal, while at the Turf Club the relative figures were forty-eight and one hundred and seven. Some allowance must be made for the cost of the compressed air, but the quantity used amounts to only about eighteen cubic feet an hour for a large range, and the cost is said to be only threepence a thousand feet when the air is compressed on a large scale, as it is at Cairo. When it is added that the war prices of coal and oil in Egypt were £E15 and £E6 respectively, it is easy to understand how great a saving was effected by the use of the latter. Whether the system is likely to extend to places where coal is less costly than oil, and where no public compressed-air service exists, is doubtful. It must be remembered, however, that oil-fuel is very clean and easily regulated; hence certain economies can be effected apart from the cost of the fuel. Moreover, even in some parts of this country the type of oil used could be bought before the war for less than double the price of coal.

WATER-POWER IN INDIA.

Coal has been always very costly in parts of India remote from the native coalfields. This applies especially to Bombay, whither it has to be carried by rail from mines more than a thousand miles away. It is not surprising, therefore, that close attention has been given to the possibilities of utilising the heavy rainfall in the adjacent hills for supplying power to the city in the form of electricity. A scheme for this purpose has now been undertaken, and an account of it was given recently in a paper read before the Institution of Civil Engineers by Mr R. B. Joyner. The water is taken from the Western Ghats at a point about forty miles from Bombay and some two thousand feet above it, where a rainfall has been recorded of no less than five hundred and forty-six inches in the year. Any approach to this figure is, however, exceptional, the average being very much lower; while the minimum rainfall recorded in any one year was as low as eighty-two inches. Provision for a continuous supply of water-power all the year round was rendered particularly difficult owing to the fact that the rainy season lasts for only three months; hence enough water has to be stored to maintain the supply for the other nine. Three lakes have been formed by building masonry dams, one of which is close on a hundred feet in height, and extends for one and a half miles. One of the lakes maintains the supply of water during 'breaks' in the monsoon, while the other two have a capacity of ten thousand million cubic feet, or approximately 50 per cent. in excess of the quantity needed to keep the power-station running at its full output during the dry season. These two lakes are joined together by a tunnel a mile long, and the water from them and from the monsoon lake is led through two ducts to a forebay at the top of the great precipitous scarp forming the western boundary of the Deccan plateau. At this point the water enters two steel pipes, each nearly seven feet in diameter, which carry it down some twelve hundred feet, where they deliver it into eight pipes, three and a half feet in diameter, leading to the power-house almost six hundred feet below. The total 'head' of water is seventeen hundred and fifty feet; consequently at the power-house the pressure is enormous, and the pipes have to be one and a quarter inches thick to withstand it. Each pipe supplies water to a Pelton-wheel turbine (a type of water-motor in which one or more jets at high pressure impinge upon specially formed buckets on the periphery of the wheel) capable of developing thirteen thousand five hundred horse-power, making a total of one hundred and eight thousand horse-power for the eight. The Pelton wheels are coupled to huge dynamos for generating electricity for transmission to Bombay, there to be used for lighting the city and working the numerous mills and factories. Power derived from this source will cost less than that from coal, oil, or vegetable spirit; while, after doing its work at the power-house, the water will still be available for irrigation

AN EASILY MADE FIRELESS COOKER.

One objection to the hay-box is the difficulty of preparing it, as both the hay and a box of the correct size must be procured, neither being a standard article in a small home. Then a certain amount of carpentering has to be done before a really satisfactory contrivance can be produced. These objections are entirely eliminated in the fireless cooker recently described by Mr Cornwell Round, M.R.C.S., in Popular Science Siftings, all the materials used being available in nearly every household. Instead of a box, Mr Round uses an ordinary galvanised iron pail as an outer container; while the cooking-utensil consists of an enamelled 'billy-can,' or camp-kettle, having a hinged swing-over handle. The five-pint size is recommended for use with a twelve-inch pail. These portions of the outfit having been procured, fold a number of newspapers into strips having a width equal to the depth of the pail. Wind these strips loosely round the billy-can, and fasten the ends with pins, thus forming a paper tube into which the can will pass easily. This tube should be about a quarter of an inch in thickness, and it need not necessarily be made of paper. Lino or floor-cloth, for instance, forms an excellent alternative, and in that case the ends could be secured by tacks with their points hammered over. Stand the tube upright in the pail, when the top should come level with the rim. Into the bottom of the tube pour sifted ashes until the lid of the billy-can, when the can is resting on them, comes almost to the top of the pail; then cut out a number of paper discs to fit the inside of the tube, and lay them on the ashes. Here, again, lino or floor-cloth would do equally well. The space between the outside of the tube and the inside of the pail is now filled with sifted ashes, paper, lino, or floorcloth rings being laid over the ashes to give a tidy appearance. A cover is prepared by making up in newspapers a circular parcel of sifted ashes of the same diameter as the top of the pail, and three or four inches thick. Although not suggested by Mr Round, either cork, sawdust, or slag-wool, if now obtainable at a low cost, would make excellent alternatives to the ashes. This form of fireless cooker is in every way equal to the hay-box, while being more easily constructed.

Correspondents who wish fuller information regarding new inventions, publications, &c. mentioned here, addresses will be furnished, when possible, provided a stamped and addressed envelope or post-card be sent to the Editor, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER VIII.—continued.

IT was a cold, crisp day, with a keen, but healthy, breeze. The ground, not too hard, was excellent for the show. We were delighted, for there's nothing like a glorious scramble across God's green acres. It cleans the lungs, refreshes the brain, and gives one a zest for the things that matter. I am no marvel at the business, yet in pitting one's strength against a fellow-man in friendly rivalry one does acquire the sporting instinct, which is a fair instinct. And to an officer it does give a sense of values, a ready appreciation of all that is good in human nature.

Our company officer, Captain Bloggs, was delighted with the weather prospect. He was an old Blue, and he did want his 'boys' to knock spots off the other company. And, strange to say, when we turned out in running attire, we found Ginger, Nobby, and Tosher already there. There was a suspicion of malicious fun in Ginger's eyes. I scented something, and said, 'Look here, Beefy, there's some move on. These fellows are grinning like cats.'

'Oh, d—— them! they won't be in my way. They're soft, and out of training'——

Bang! went the pistol just then. We went off. Two hundred men in running-kit make a pretty show. Our school, I may rightly say, were the cream of manhood, chosen Spartans, and a sight for the gods. This was no preparatory-school scramble. These fellows were all in splendid condition, and it was a treat to slog along and watch them. How easily they ambled, limbs and will working in perfect harmony! Hurdles and dikes were taken with an easy bound; no puffing, no exertion, no ungainly slithering on the other side. Just a leap and over. I am quite sure that two hundred Hun cadets could not have done so well. Then we reached the open, the crowd spread out, and the stragglers were more easily marked. These were the elderly men, but right merrily they did their best. They wanted to win. Wasn't that a perfect spirit? And isn't it the basis of our true nature? We may love to be top-dog, but we do prefer to get it off our own bat. If we have been very foolish in worshipping cups, caps, and blazers before the war, still it helped us at Mons, and certainly at Ypres. As I watched these fine fellows sprint by my side something welled into my heart; it was the pride of school, the pride of race, the mysterious something which makes us give our all to keep the old flag flying. I may be no Christian, but I do love my fellow-men and my country.

'Hello! the game's opening,' I muttered on looking ahead. I was a bit behind, for I had been dreaming. Away in the front was Beefy. He was heavy, but a splendid athlete. His staying-power was good, and he had no nerves. With all his faults, Beefy was a sportsman, and if there was one man consumed with the craving for victory, it was he. I saw a long figure slogging steadily by his side. The style caught my fancy, so I pushed on, and found it was Ginger. Close behind was Billy Greens, the parson; and gently dodging by him was Nobby. Where was Tosher? I looked behind. He was dogging me. I smiled, but inwardly. I was just a bit cut. These men were out for 'blood.'

I spurted out of my stride, hell for leather, took a good-sized dike, then pushed hard across a wide meadow. It was good going, and my nerves were all out. This was unwise, but I didn't want Tosher to head me off. On reaching a wood I looked back. He was just behind. With a curse I dashed on, but my foot went plump into a rabbit-hole, and I was violently thrown, wrenching my ankle.

'Are you hurt, old boy?' asked Tosher.

'Yes,' I grunted.

'Looks bad. Wait and I'll get you a bandage.'

He ran to a stream, tore the two arms off his running-shirt, soaked them, came back, and bandaged the now swollen foot.

'You had better go on now, Tosher. I'll hobble home.'

'No, child. I reckon I'll carry you.'

'Get off, man. I'll manage somehow.'

However, it was useless. I was hoisted on his back and carried through the ranks of the grinning stragglers, who shouted, 'Did ums do it—John Brown?'

I did feel an ass.

. . . . . .

Beefy, however, was keeping the flag flying. He saw Ginger, but paid no attention to him. His eye was on Corporal Jason, the leading man of the other company, and a magnificent harrier. This fellow had to be beaten at all costs. He was not 'all out'—his pace was too steady; so Beefy plugged a couple of yards behind him. For four miles this went on, and all the while Ginger ambled as easily as a deer. He was one of those who are natural athletes, and who do not need to train. Nature endows them with amazing reserve power. All the time Ginger was studying the bulldog tenacity of Beefy, the steady plod, the quick eye and brain following Corporal Jason's every move. It was like dog tracking dog; and yet it wasn't. Above the cunning byplay was the soul of esprit de corps. Both were out to win. And both meant to.

They reached a wide stretch of pasture-land. Jason stretched himself and pushed on. Beefy followed, a little blown, yet able to hold. The supreme test was near. Ginger saw Beefy clench his jaws, raise his head, and point out the toes to get the fullest stride on the green-sward. Jason was undoubtedly the better man, but there was that something which kept his rival fighting on.

Ginger commenced to admire Beefy.

At last they reached the open track near the camp. Ahead was the winning-post. There an excited crowd had gathered, including Captain Bloggs, who was fearfully anxious as he watched the struggle between Jason and Beefy.

'Go on, Jason!'

'Stick it, Beefy!'

These cries rent the air, and for a second threw Beefy off guard. Jason made a terrific spurt. With an almost superhuman effort Beefy recovered and levelled up. Close behind was that amazing devil, Ginger, ambling easily. Somehow, no one counted Ginger as being in the piece. He simply looked like a runner-up—nothing more.

'Hell for leather, Jason!'

'Come on, Beefy!'

These were the last cries. Jason made another magnificent leap; the prize seemed his, but his foot slipped on the wet soil, and Beefy shot past.

'You're winning, Beefy! Go hard!'

It looked like that. Then, just ten yards from the tape, all were dumbfounded to see Ginger leap forward like a deer and breast the line three yards ahead of Beefy Jones.

A terrific cheering burst from the spectators, but my heart was sick for poor old Beefy. However, as he burst through the tape he collided with Ginger, and shouted, 'Good, Ginger—we've won—and I'm happy!'

'Yes—the Oxford finish.'

'All right, old cock; come and have a Cambridge bath.'

Ginger used up a whole cake of Sunlight soap.

. . . . . .

That night Billy Greens found Beefy reading a serious-looking book.

'What are you swotting?'

'Oh, one of Ginger's books.'

'What's the subject?'

'"How to be Happy though Intelligent."'

(Continued on page 139.)

THE OLD YEW-TREE.

I STOOD beneath the old yew-tree,
Within the silent shade,
And twilight in its hoary boughs
Dark purple shadows made.

I heard the rustle of its leaves
Above me and around,
And over all the summer air
I heard no other sound.

It sang to me the old, old song
Of ages long ago;
Of life and death and endless love
It whispered soft and low.

'I see the lilies bloom and fade,'
It murmured unto me,
'And many noble rivers flow
To join the distant sea.

'No wonder I am old and sad,
I see so many weep;
Their tears fall on the grass beneath,
Where their beloved sleep.

'I see the glory of the dawn,
The moonbeam's silver ray,
And I alone with time will watch
Till shadows flee away.'

N. L. WALLACE.

 TO CONTRIBUTORS.

1*st*. All communications should be addressed to 'The Editor, Chambers's Journal, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.'

2*nd*. For its return in case of ineligibility, postage-stamps should accompany every manuscript.

3*rd*. To secure their safe return if ineligible, ALL MANUSCRIPTS, whether accompanied by a letter of advice or otherwise, should have the writer's Name and Address written upon them IN FULL.

4*th*. Poetical contributions should invariably be accompanied by a stamped and directed envelope.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

LADY HELEN'S NEURALGIA.

By ROSALINE MASSON.

PART I.

I.

THE telegram came while they were at dinner. Sir Henry held out his hand for it, but the old butler, with a deferential bending of the head, passed him, and presented the salver to Mona.

Sir Henry jerked his eyeglasses off and smiled at his daughter as she took it. 'Really, my dear, you are become the public man of the family.'

Mona Ralston was looking particularly charming that night. Indeed, she was more than pretty; she was an exceptionally beautiful young woman. Her dusky black hair rippled amazingly, and broke into little soft tendrils about her ears, below the gold riband that held it tight to her small head. Her eyes, set wide apart, were of a wonderful amber-brown; and she was dressed in green chiffon, and wore a string of pearls. But the irresistible thing about her was her amazing vitality. She conveyed a sense of mastery over life and all its incidents, including the incident of her own beauty. She relegated that so decidedly to its proper position that one took it at her own estimation, and looked for what was beyond it. And one was not disappointed.

'Daddy,' she said, cocking her head sideways to read the telegram by the shaded light of a candle, 'they want me to go down and speak at Tonborough.'

'Well, my dear?' her father commented placidly.

'I propose to go.'

'Then, I suppose, you will go.'

'They have a big meeting of the Women's Association, it says'—she took up the telegram—'on Wednesday, and both speakers—a woman and a man—have failed them. They've wired to me, and to the candidate. Daddy, it's rather a compliment!' She glowed at him.

'A great compliment, my child; but since your triumphal stumping of the country on my behalf last summer, not to speak of your brilliant organising of your women's'——

'Now, daddy, don't you tease me! I argue quite sensibly when I am on a platform, and I've acquired all my political keenness from you.'

Sir Henry opened the big silver box at his side, and selected a cigar.

'You're a clever little witch, Mona,' he told her; 'but don't overdo it. You'll be very useful at Tonborough, no doubt, and you may go—though, by-the-by, you did not ask my permission. Certainly, you are of age'——

'I am five-and-twenty, dear. In five years I'll have a vote. But I'm always glad of your permission.'

'And generally have it—always have had it, you know. But you also have the family brains.'

'Talking of brains, you know Major Stanhope, don't you? What is he like? Is he a good candidate?'

'Oh, excellent! Stanhope is the sort we need badly. He'll be a real help to the Party—and Heaven knows we need help! He is a man we shall all work for, if the election comes on.'

'I work for principles, not men,' said Mona.

'Quite so. Nevertheless, I foresee that your destiny is shaping itself. When I apply for the Chiltern Hundreds, and settle down to write my reminiscences, you will have to marry a politician, and run him, have a salon, and, if necessary, write his speeches.'

Mona drank her coffee thoughtfully.

'It is a poor look-out for Charlie,' her father added regretfully.

Mona, who had risen, went to meet him as he rose too.

'Darling,' she told him, 'that idea of yours is quite, quite wrong! How often am I to explain to you that Charlie and I are only cousins, and good friends?'

'So you say. And I'm afraid you are to remain so, so far as Charlie is concerned, for the poor chap is the sort of honourable duffer who will never say a word while he has only his pay, and'——

'And neither shall I,' she assured him; and she held up her face to be kissed as he opened the door for her.

Sir Henry followed her out, putting his arm over her shoulder. 'Well, my little girl, it must be as you like; but I wish it were true. I'm sure he's fond of you.'

'Of course he's fond of me! And I'm very fond of him. But not in that way. He is a mere boy! Two years younger than I am! Oh, we shouldn't suit each other at all! How can you think we should? I'll find a wife for Charlie, and I'll be awfully nice to her. Besides, I don't want to marry. I have you.'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

'Indeed you have,' he agreed; 'entirely!' And he turned back to finish his cigar.

II.

Charlie dropped in to lunch next day, and volunteered to see his cousin off at Paddington. He seemed rather subdued.

'I have some news,' he said to Mona; 'but it can wait,' he added, as the servants came in.

'You shall tell me in the taxi,' she announced.

She wasn't very much pleased at his coming, for she wanted to think out her speech—she had a list of headings in a notebook in her bag-purse. But what she had told her father was quite true. Her cousin and she were good friends, and she noticed his preoccupied and serious manner, and as soon as the taxi had started she turned to him. 'Well, Charlie dear?'

'My aunt—Rachel Spencer, you know—is dead.'

'I'm sorry,' she said gently.

It was nice of Charlie to feel so much the death of an aunt he hardly knew. She put her hand on his.

'And she has left me eighteen thousand pounds, and her house and all the stuff in it—pictures and things.'

He clasped her hand in his and held it tight.

'Oh!' said Mona. 'But that's very nice, isn't it, Charlie?'

'It makes a great difference.'

'Yes—it will.'

'You see, there's something I've been always wanting, and—and this may make it—at least, I hope'——

Then Mona remembered what her father had said, and quickly drew her hand away, growing hot and very miserable. For could it be true, after all? Never for a moment had she supposed the idea existed save in her father's imagination.

'Of course it will make a difference; but you won't throw up your profession, will you? It is very sad—her dying, I mean,' she said, rather jerkily.

'Well, I was ten when I saw her last,' he answered honestly. 'You don't mind my telling you what I have been thinking about? It is something that—that is more important to me than anything—my profession or anything else in the world! It is difficult to speak of it. Mona, do you think—you know me so well—that I'm too ordinary a chap for a girl to'——

'Here's Paddington!' she cried. 'Here's my purse. Take my ticket, Charlie!'

When he rejoined her he was looking a little dignified and hurt.

'I don't approve of this sort of thing,' he said gruffly. 'I wonder uncle allows it. Most unwomanly!'

'Dear boy!'

'Jawing on a platform to a crowd of gaping strangers.'

'How rude!'

'Woman's place is'——

'Home,' she finished sweetly.

'Well, so it is! Talking of which, where are you going to stay?'

'With the president of the Women's Association probably.'

'Probably? Don't you even know?'

'They said "hospitality arranged." And a note came this morning to say a motor will meet this train. I know Miss Hammond, the secretary, quite well; she sees to it. Now, get me some papers, like a good boy.'

And then, at the last moment, feeling that, if her dreadful supposition were really true, and her father were right, she had been hard-hearted to the verge of cruelty, she put her head out of the window, and said gently, 'You shall tell me all your—plans—when I return, Charlie, and we can have a nice chat.'

His whole face lit up, and he laid his hand on hers as it rested on the window-sill.

'I will! You're a good soul, Mona darling!'

She sat down in her corner seat, rather agitated. It didn't sound like love. Still, one never knows. Then she took out the notes for her speech, and read them. They came under two headings—'Woman in the Factories' and 'Woman in the Field.' She bit the end of her pencil, and then added a third heading, 'Man in the Home.' It was going to be very telling.

III.

The scenery sped past, little villages and church steeples flashed by, and the telegraph-wires chased each other up and down. Mona watched them, whilst committing several impromptus to memory. It was nearly dark when she reached Tonborough. Mona had expected Miss Hammond, the secretary, to meet her; but there was no one on the platform. Beyond the little entrance, however, she espied a big car standing. She gave up her ticket and went out. The chauffeur touched his hat.

'Is this sent for me—Miss Ralston?' Mona asked, realising she did not know the name of her hostess.

'Yes, miss.'

He opened the door, and she got in. The porter brought her suit-case, and it was put in behind.

'That's all,' said Mona.

'I was to wait for the five-forty-three up-train, miss.'

Mona glanced at the watch on her wrist. It was five-twenty-five.

'Very well,' she said resignedly, and closed her eyes.

She was roused by the approach of the next train. First of all the passengers to come through the gate was a tall man, distinctly seen as he passed the station lamps, and at once recognised by the chauffeur. Mona leaned still farther back as the car door was opened.

The man paused to give an order about his luggage; then, turning to get into the car, gave a slight start of surprise to find Mona in it. He peered into the dark interior, took off his hat, and, on pretence of seeing the luggage carried out, stepped back as if to speak about it to the chauffeur. Mona saw them glance in her direction, and the chauffeur say something, whereat the man nodded comprehension. Then he entered.

'I 'm sorry you 've been kept waiting,' he said, as the car glided out into the soft dark.

'I did not mind in the least,' she assured him.

There was silence for a little.

'He must know who I am,' she thought, 'as he asked the chauffeur. But he doesn't like to betray that he asked.'

The silence continued. It became oppressive.

'I should like the window open, please,' Mona observed.

The man muttered an apology, and opened it.

The silence was resumed.

'I shall have to begin,' Mona said to herself. She began.

'Are you by any chance the prospective candidate?' she inquired.

He gave a quite perceptible start.

'Er—yes—I am.' His tone was formal, and he said no more.

'He 's like Charlie—doesn't approve of women speakers,' Mona thought.

'Is it a long way we have to drive?'

'Seven miles, I believe.'

Mona smiled. Even in a motor, seven miles gives opportunity. She turned to him and began to talk.

He was distinctly irresponsive at first, stiff and prohibitive.

This incited Mona to effort. He melted like a guttering candle in a draught. Before they had gone three miles he was talking to her brilliantly. And all the time he was trying to see her, for her beauty seemed to conquer the darkness, and he knew it was there.

And then they were gliding among overhanging trees, and presently they were there, with lights sparkling from a big entrance, and he helped her out.

There was a moment when they stood together in the hall, while the servants took the luggage and the rug from the car. It was then that he saw her at last, and Mona smiled at him vividly.

'It has been a pleasant drive,' she said. 'I 've been so interested in all you have told me!'

'Oh—good-evening!' said a voice from within.

They both turned. A tall, gray-haired woman was standing in an archway that led to the inner hall.

Mona went towards her. She had to go all the way, for the lady remained awaiting her. She hardly touched the hand Mona gave her, looked her visitor quietly up and down, and left her to greet the man behind her.

'Ah, Reggie—glad to see you!' The hostess moved forward now. Then she glanced over her shoulder at Mona.

'Lady Helen is not well to-night, but she will see you later, Miss Dawson.'

'Ralston,' corrected Mona gently but firmly.

'Oh—ah!—Jane, show Miss—Ralston her room, and let Lady Helen know.—Well, Reggie, come into the library. It 's annoying about Helen; but she 'll be well to-morrow.'

IV.

Mona followed the maid. She did not hear Reginald Stanhope's voice, but was conscious that he was watching her, and was resenting her reception more than she did. Somehow, Mona was feeling happy. It had been, as she said, a pleasant drive. She liked the candidate—she was sure her father would like him; she must ask him to come and see them. He would like to be asked to come and see her father. She wondered who the rude woman was. Really, it was rather awkward to stay with people you didn't know, and who didn't know you. It had always been pleasant before.

She was shown into a very small room, where there was no fire, and the housemaid put down her dressing-bag on the floor and hurried away.

Mona, used to affluence and deference, looked round.

'Really!' she said to herself. She opened her dressing-bag and scattered about some of its contents.

Then the housemaid came in with her leather suit-case, and was about to vanish again, when she caught sight of the silver brushes and bottles Mona had unpacked, and the fur coat she had thrown off. The maid seemed impressed.

'Shall I—unstrap it?' she asked, looking down at the suit-case.

'Yes, please; and would you light the fire? And what time is dinner?' asked Mona, as she watched her light it, and handed her her keys. The maid looked surprised.

'Dinner?' she asked. She took the keys, and looked at them, and then from Mona to the suit-case, and back at the keys again.

'Yes—don't they—isn't there—dinner?'

'Oh yes!—the family dine at eight.'

The fire crackled up, and the maid deftly put away the few things Mona had brought, laid out her evening frock, and left her.

'"Pretty odd people," as Pepys would have said,' Mona told herself. 'And as it is only a quarter-past six, they might have sent me a cup of tea—they must know I couldn't have got one on the journey. And I wish I knew their name, and who they are. It is really a little unceremonious of Miss Hammond. However!'

She took off her travelling-dress, slipped on her white-silk dressing-gown, and sat down by the fire.

'I fancy he speaks well,' she thought. 'I suppose I shall come first.'

There was a tap at the door, and an elderly maid looked in.

'Her ladyship would like you to come now,' she said.

'Oh!—but I'm afraid I'm undressed,' said Mona. The woman looked at her with marked disapproval, and said nothing. 'And I think I must ask you her ladyship's name,' said Mona, smiling.

'Lady Helen Chowton,' she said severely.

'Oh—it is she who is ill, is it not?'

'She is indisposed; and she is waiting for you,' the woman answered.

'Does she want to see me before dinner? Oh, well, I'll come as I am, if she is in her room; or shall I dress first?'

The woman seemed amazed. She looked Mona up and down, and then turned and looked at the dress on the bed. It was the green chiffon, chosen because it packed into small space.

'Her ladyship is waiting,' she remarked, and opened the door.

(Continued on page 152.)

EX AQUA OMNIA.

By C. E. Benson.

GENERAL GEORGE MONCK, first Duke of Albemarle, came so near to being a great man that he is generally accounted one to this day. The nearest approach to greatness Christopher Monck, second Duke of Albemarle, and last of that stock, could ever claim was being the son of his father. He is also notable for having been instrumental in floating, quite literally, a successful treasure-quest company, but the element of greatness attaching to the undertaking was not an attribute of the duke.

In 1660 little Christopher, aged seven, was granted the title of Earl of Torrington, which he retained until the general's death in 1670, when he dutifully stepped into his father's shoes, and most loyally placed his services and his titles at the disposal of King Charles II. His Majesty accepted his services, restored him his titles, made him a Knight of the Garter, and three years later promoted him to be colonel of a foot regiment, presumably on the principle of 'like father, like son.' From that day young Albemarle flourished like a courtier, and won honours and promotion, one of his most noteworthy exploits being a quarrel with Monmouth, which did him no particular harm with Charles, and less than no harm with Charles's next-of-kin.

At the age of twenty-eight Christopher became joint Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Wiltshire, and this appointment a little later brought him into collision with Monmouth once more. When 'King' Monmouth landed, Christopher forthwith raised the neighbouring militia and advanced to check him. Monmouth summoned him to lay down his arms, and Christopher returned a loyal defiance. After they had crowed at each other for some time, Monmouth advanced, and Christopher retreated, first slowly, then expeditiously, then at a run. It is reasonable to suggest that had his father been in command, the Monmouth rebellion would have experienced a first and probably a final check; still, in fairness to Christopher, it must be admitted that he did good service to King James's cause by keeping a strong force of militia in the field, and so hampering Monmouth's movements. Afterwards he merited the D.S.O.—by issuing proclamations.

Turning from his martial exploits, we find that at the mature age of twenty-nine years Christopher's talents did or did not secure for him the Chancellorship of Cambridge University. In any case, for some reason, he did hold that august position. Also, he was made Recorder of Colchester and a Lord of Trade and Foreign Plantations. This last appointment, together with his parentage, constitutes his chief claim to the immortality of the Dictionary of National Biography. True, he was entrusted with the carrying of the sceptre with the dove at the Coronation of James II. This, the first gracious and delicate sign of the favour of the new monarch, did him no harm, and he survived the ordeal. The last honour conferred was of different metal. On 26th November 1687 he was made Governor-General of Jamaica. This was unkind. He did not survive. It killed him out of hand, and with him died the Monck-Albemarle dukedom.

Albemarle's appointment as a Lord of Trade brought him in contact with a character of real interest, one William Phipps, of New England. Phipps's origin is metaphorically, and possibly literally, obscure. His father is alleged to have been a gunsmith, some say a blacksmith. Nevertheless his cousin, Constantine Phipps, was Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and founder of the noble house of Mulgrave and Normanby. A plausible explanation is that some gentlemen, who, finding the sanctity and the religious tolerance of the Stuart restoration oppressive, emigrated to America, were compelled to take to humble occupations to earn a subsistence. William Phipps himself started life as a ship's carpenter.

Phipps was an austere Puritan. He was, however, by no means a Stylites. He did not seek to separate himself from things of the earth, earthy, especially if there were any chance of finding 'dust' in the earth. On the contrary, as befitted a man of seafaring education, he kept his weather-eye very wide open. In the course of time he became a merchant captain of Boston City, now the hub of the universe, and took advantage of his social rise to enter into matrimony, combined with filthy lucre.

Freed from the necessity of working hard for a competence, Phipps devoted his leisure and his energy to a scheme which presumably had been maturing in his brain for some time—to wit, the salving of sunken treasure. He is credited with having invented a diving-bell, if not with being the inventor of the diving-bell. If this be true, it is certain that it was not on ascertaining the constituents of the bottom of Boston Harbour that his business-like ambition was intent. Spanish galleons had been lost in the waters that wash the Spanish Main, and Phipps felt that, could he but locate one at a reasonable depth, it would not be his fault if his fortune were not made.

To this end he made an expedition to the Bahamas, which, though fruitless of its immediate object, was fruitful in experience, besides putting him on the track of richer and really existent treasure. Finding his own resources inadequate for such ventures, he boldly proceeded to England and laid his case before the powers that were, one of whom was Albemarle. The chronicler, who in respect of Phipps was a hero-worshipper after the heart of Thomas Carlyle, hath it that the Bostonian's magnificent presence and convincing manner completely won the duke. The more prosaic and more probable explanation is that Albemarle was hard up—desperately so; the complaint was common enough during the days of the Stuart restoration. He determined to 'plunge.' That way—at the bottom of the sea—lay salvation. Accordingly he recommended Phipps to King James. King James provided a frigate, the Rose Algier, and a scratch crew, and so the venture began.

Even to-day a treasure-quest with a scratch crew would not be wholly devoid of risk; in the times of Captain Kidd it was a desperate undertaking. Phipps's men found themselves with a vessel well found and ready equipped to their hand, and very little but their captain to stand between them and the attractive life of gentlemen of fortune. They deliberated accordingly, and deliberation would soon have been translated into action but for the sudden intervention of authority—authority in the shape of several feet of exasperated bone and muscle, armed with the divinity that doth hedge a captain and the strength of a Hercules. When it came to man-handling Phipps had not many superiors, and a few minutes sufficed to bring the ringleaders to reason, tempered with unconsciousness. It is averred that Phipps quelled this mutiny with his fists alone, but that so practical a man should have overlooked the persuasive powers of a belaying-pin is unlikely.

The second mutiny was more formidable. The snake had been scotched, not killed.

Phipps had anchored by a desert island to careen and clean ship, and so forth. In spite of his former experience, he trustfully sent the men ashore for a well-earned holiday, whilst he and his friends remained in charge of the frigate. The men took their guns with them to protect themselves against the savages—who were not there—and to shoot game for the pot. The game they had marked down were the captain and his friends. In case of resistance they were to be murdered out of hand; in the event of submission they were to be marooned. In either case the mutineers were to sail joyously away under the Jolly Roger.

The seraph Abdiel, 'faithful found among the faithless, faithful only he,' was on this occasion impersonated by the carpenter. The crew suspected him, and would no doubt have knocked him on the head with the others; but, fortunately for him, they esteemed a carpenter of more value than a captain, forgetting that, though any one of them could steer a course, not one could set one. They therefore took this much-prized carpenter into their confidence, but they kept a close eye on him nevertheless.

Now that the long-planned mutiny was on the verge of execution, the time for action had come. The carpenter simulated an attack of colic—it may not have been all simulation under the circumstances—and this necessitated a visit to the captain's medicine-chest. Once below decks and out of sight of the conspirators, he lost no time in informing Phipps of what was toward.

Phipps made no sign. He let the men go ashore unhindered. On landing, their actions were curious—so curious as of themselves to have excited suspicion. With clumsy confidence they made a camp on the beach, where no camp was required, right under the guns of the frigate, and put it in some state of defence, though no defence was needed. Having completed these prudent preparations, with characteristic foresight they went away in a body, leaving the camp unguarded.

Phipps gave them a fair start. Then, when they were well out of sight and hearing, he slipped overboard and swam ashore. On reaching the camp, he proceeded to draw their teeth. Whether he contented himself with merely drawing the charges of their guns and carrying off their spare ammunition, or whether he took a boat and ferried away the camp defences, is immaterial. Suffice it that he put the mutiny out of action.

He then brought his ship broadside on to the camp.

In the evening the embryo mutineers returned for their evening meal, preparatory to carrying the vessel, and were met with a surprise calculated to take away their appetite and substitute acute-indigestion. Instead of a helpless ship they found themselves confronted by an ugly row of muzzles, whilst a thundering challenge warned them that their captain was very much alive to the situation. In a voice that consorted well with his huge frame, Phipps announced that the tables were now turned, and that he and his friends intended to maroon them. The mutineers did not require to be told that the silent cannon would speak on slight provocation in tones even more sonorous and uncompromising. Instantly they fell on their knees and cried out, with unconscious humour, that they were betrayed. Eventually they were pardoned and taken on board.

That Phipps, after two mutinies, should have run such a risk would be inexplicable were it not clear that he did so to avoid one far more serious. Only his friends and he had been left on board the ship, so that, even if he had enough hands left to work the vessel—which is doubtful—it may be taken for granted that they were mostly landsmen, and not of a capacity to do so. Moreover, on those seas in those days there were perils other than those of the deep which made the full complement of a ship's company something of a necessity. Accordingly he resolved to hazard the danger of sailing with a twice mutinous crew, in preference to essaying a voyage with an inadequate company of inexperienced men, with all its horrid possibilities of suffering and privation through the act of God, and of battle, murder, and sudden death through the act of man. At the first port—Jamaica—he discharged the mutineers, and, engaging the minimum number of seamen consistent with safety, made his way home.

Such bludgeonings of chance might have shaken a less constant nature, but Phipps lost neither heart nor hope. He just told his story, nothing extenuating. It was a story to rouse generous sympathy, and Albemarle behaved generously. He opened a fund, and headed it with a handsome subscription. Several other gentlemen followed suit.

> Are there not
> Two points in the adventure of a diver—
> One when, a beggar, he prepares to plunge;
> One when, a prince, he rises with his pearl?

It would not be too much to assume that a good many of the subscribers, including the duke himself, were financially embarrassed and risked 'plunging.' It is curious to note that in the subsequent proceedings the man who did the least work got the most money, and the men who did the most work got the least money—if, indeed, they got any money at all.

For one reason or another the subscription list filled quickly, and very soon the Albemarle-Phipps Company, Limited, was in being, and the Phipps portion of it westward-bound with a carefully selected crew. Phipps had previously marked down the whereabouts of a likely wreck, and it was not long before he located the vessel. It was unsafe to attempt operations from the ship itself, and accordingly a large 'dug-out,' capable of holding fifteen or twenty men, was fashioned out of the trunk of a cotton-tree, and moored over the spot. It is uncertain whether any apparatus was at any time used during this expedition; in any case, the preliminary exploration was carried out by Indians, with no other equipment than their natural powers.

The first results were disheartening—old cannon, curious weeds, and so forth—and even Phipps began to give way to depression. The crew were sorry for him—sincerely sorry; and the following incident shows that they entertained a real affection.

One day, as the captain was sitting gloomily in his cabin, the men approached to present him with a singularly beautiful sea-feather. Phipps had not come out to look for sea-feathers, but he received the men with kindly courtesy. All at once something attracted his eyes to the cabin floor. The crew had brought him something more than a sea-feather.

It was a 'sow' of silver, the first-fruits of a treasure totalling approximately three hundred thousand pounds, retrieved by the Indian divers, the men who did the most part of the practical salvage. Effodiuntur opes, irritamenta malorum. Effodiuntur is scarcely applicable to deep-sea salvage; but the recovered treasures of the deep provoked ills none the less. Phipps found himself with a ship absolutely under his command, a staunch and well-affected crew at his disposal, and a king's ransom in his hold. The temptation must have been great. That it did not assail him is unthinkable; that he resisted it wholly is certain. Not so the men.

When a bad crew mutiny matters are serious; when a good crew become disaffected, they are doubly so. On the former occasions Phipps had only to deal with a company of irresolute wastrels; this time he was in mortal peril at the hands of men—men scarcely less resolute than himself. Violence could only end in destruction, and Phipps—his Puritan training stood him in good stead—appealed to a Higher Power. Strengthened by prayer, he summoned the hands, and at length, by dint of promise and entreaty, succeeded in dissuading them from their purpose.

There is perhaps a shadow—an ugly, ill-defined shadow—of an excuse for the crew. They were probably more worldly wise than the simple-minded Bostonian, for all his shrewdness. They may have recognised that if they did not, there and then, secure their just remuneration for services rendered, in some degree proportionate to the profits of the expedition, they were little likely to see a penny of it. Accordingly they may have resolved to > Make assurance double sure,

> And take a bond of fate.

Poor Phipps! He was to learn there were worse thieves at home in high places.

Of the three hundred thousand pounds, Phipps received either twenty thousand pounds or sixteen thousand pounds. (He was, however, handsomely knighted, 27th June 1687.) Albemarle took either ninety thousand pounds or sixty thousand pounds (and had a medal struck), and presumably the other subscribers got their share. Still, there remains the possibility of a large balance unaccounted for.

Incidentally King James had a medal struck, commemorating the recovery of the treasure.

The Albemarle medal is sufficiently rare to be something of a curiosity. The inscription, which is for the most part in abbreviated Latin, runs, being interpreted, thus: 'Christopher Albemarle, Lieutenant-General and Governor-General of Jamaica;' and below are the letters 'G.B.F.,' signifying that George Burgess made it. The head is a profile of a typical nobleman of the Court of King James II., with a full-flowing wig falling to his shoulders, which are clad in armour, indicative of his military rank. On the reverse is a figure of Neptune and the inscription: 'Ex aqua omnia' ('All things are derived from water').

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

CHAPTER X.

ABOUT the beginning of February, the colonel, having come home, at the fall of dusk, from an afternoon after woodcock, went into the gunroom in the eastern wing, and through the window which looks out to the north—that is, to the back of the house—saw a stranger. He paid little attention to him at the moment, thinking that he was probably some one from the village who had been on business at the back entrance, for the man went away towards the offices behind the western wing.

Two or three days afterwards the colonel was walking, about noon, through the spruce-belts on the slopes behind the house. He had come to the wood's edge, when he saw the same man about a hundred and fifty yards away, moving leisurely along the highroad, and now and then, as the colonel thought, glancing towards the house. My uncle watched the man's progress along the road until he disappeared round a bend, when the old gentleman left the belt and entered The Bield by a back entrance. Out of curiosity, he got his field-glasses, and from behind a curtain of an upstairs window took a look at the stranger. The glasses revealed a bearded, stooping figure of medium height, with a suggestion of age or tiredness in its gait. The man's clothes were well-worn, if not actually shabby; and although the day was one of biting cold, he wore no overcoat. His face was very dark, with a suggestion of pallor in it; and while he was too far off for my uncle to get a distinct portrait of him, his impression was that he was olive-skinned, dark-bearded, and (as the colonel put it) 'Jewish-looking.'

His movements riveted my uncle's attention. The stranger, after passing the house, turned and stood watching it for some minutes from under the trees which border the road, every now and then looking round him. A passer-by would have put him down as some one with the time and the inclination to idle in the enjoyment of fresh air and a country road. But the glasses showed my uncle that the man's glance around him was cautious, and often repeated. He was watching the house intently, and keeping a wary eye about him. Presently he got well under cover of the trees, and all that the colonel could then make out was the brim of his slouch-hat. There he remained quietly, watching; and my uncle, having made up his mind to have a look at him at close quarters, came downstairs and walked briskly down the avenue and out to the road. There was no one to be seen; and although the colonel went past the spot where the stranger had been standing, to his astonishmont there was not a sign of him. But there were distinct footprints of large, broad, hobnailed boots, the right one showing, in the centre of the sole, the clear imprint of a triangular patch.

These incidents did not at the time impress themselves on the colonel. Indeed, he almost forgot about them until two nights afterwards. He had retired to his bedroom about twelve o'clock. The night was quiet and windless, the moon drifting clear of a few clouds. The colonel had not lit his candle, and was standing looking through the window at the beauty of the night, when he thought he saw a movement near the edge of the wood. Instantly he slipped back behind the curtain and kept an eye on the spot. In a minute or two a man came cautiously forward, gliding noiselessly from behind one tree to another until he reached the edge of the wood, where he stood motionless in the shadow. On the alert, the colonel at once came downstairs on tiptoe to the 'Laird's Room.' There he crept quickly and quietly to the window, and peered cautiously below the blind. The man was standing not three yards from him, but the strip of window below the blind was too narrow to let his face be seen. For a few seconds the prowler stood still. Then he came close to the window. The colonel could hear a faint sound, and caught a glimpse, he thought, of one of the man's hands near the window-sill. The blind was one of the patent 'fly-up' sort. The colonel suddenly jerked the cord, and instantly the blind flew up to the top, and the two men faced each other. The midnight visitor was the same man who had been seen twice already near the house!

'I must admit,' said the colonel, 'that the fellow behaved with extraordinary coolness. I could not see what he was doing at the window, but he put something in his pocket, pulled his hat over his eyes, and doubled back to the edge of the wood. There—would you believe it?—he raised his hat in a farewell salute—a polite enough gesture, if a little florid. Then he turned and vanished swiftly among the trees. I roused the house and went to the lodge for Angus, and the two of us, with a gun, in case of accidents, went all round the place. But we heard and saw nothing. Next morning we examined the path outside my room window, and there we found footprints identical with those which I saw under the tree on the roadside. But that was not all. On the woodwork of the window were scrawled in chalk the words, "I FRUGATORI." I think they are Italian, and mean "The Searchers," or something like that. Unfortunately the rain next morning washed them out.'

'Extraordinary!' said I. 'Surely a man such as you describe would have been noticed and easily traced in a quiet neighbourhood like this.'

'So one would imagine; and, as a matter of fact, two or three people think that they saw a stranger, though not in the evening. But they cannot swear to his appearance, and from the moment he gave me his adieu there has been no trace of him.'

'Did you tell the police?'

'I did; but, of course, I could make no charge. The Chief-Constable telephoned a description to all the police-stations, and sent a plain-clothes man to the district. All the likely trains were watched, but to no purpose. However, as nothing had happened, the incidents did not disquiet me, although I was puzzled by the remarkable failure of the police to hear of any one answering to the fellow's description. I had almost dismissed the whole thing from my mind when Hugh's story arrived; and now you come with yours.'

'I feel certain that the two are connected. Uncle Hugh may be too ill to look through his papers. They may be stolen from him. It is imperative that I lose no time in starting for Italy. I'll telegraph Uncle Hugh at once. I'll pick up a few necessaries in Edinburgh on my way South.'

'I wish I could go with you, Neil; but I do not feel quite equal to the journey. If you can bring Hugh here or to this country alive, do so. But you may be too late.'

We discussed the business until the luncheon-hour, when Dr Hall joined us. After luncheon I went down the avenue with the doctor, who was, I think, a little anxious about his patient.

'How do you think the colonel is looking?' he asked me. 'Your visit has brightened him a good deal. I'm glad to say that, since I saw you in Edinburgh, he has not once referred to his mysterious visitor.'

'I think he is looking remarkably well,' I said. 'But he told me about the dark-bearded man, and I believe that he is under no delusion. I am convinced that there is some one watching the house.'

'Well, I can't fathom it. The colonel is certain that he has seen this person, and although he can describe him, nobody else seems to have seen any one remotely resembling him in the district. In a quiet place like the Glen such a thing is almost incredible.'

'But the footprints.'

'They prove nothing, except that somebody had been there recently. But whose footprints?'

'The prints left by the man the second time my uncle saw him are identical with those found after his third visit.'

The doctor thought for a little. 'It is a pity that there have been no exact and methodical investigations. The path behind the house was not examined until the next morning. Were there casts taken of the footprints?'

'No. There was no great cause for uneasiness, and it was not thought worth while.'

'A pity! Big, broad, hobnailed boots with a distinct triangular patch on the right sole ought to be traceable. But it's a queer story. So far as I can see into the business, the only other solution is that ghosts still walk.'

'Ghosts don't write on walls.'

'They are credited with performing more astounding feats—walking through doors, for instance. But I don't follow you. I never heard of any writing.'

'Why, the last time the watcher was here the colonel surprised him in the very act of writing something on the woodwork of the window-sill.'

'Come, this is something definite. We may make something of it. I withdraw the ghost theory,' he said with a smile. 'I have not seen the colonel for some days, and have heard nothing of this. What sort of writing is it?'

'The words were I Frugatori, which, the colonel thinks, is Italian for "The Searchers," or something of that nature. They were scrawled in chalk on the window-sill, but a shower of rain an hour or two afterwards obliterated them.'

'I have heard, of course, of Italian secret societies, but I always understood that their aims were political. My acquaintance with them is limited to their lurid adventures in railway novels—long-haired Anarchists, throne-destroyers, ruffians with bombs in their pockets, and all that sort of thing. The idea of their being in this out-of-the-world place is preposterous. The man is probably crazy. What on earth can they be hunting for?'

I hesitated. The doctor must have noticed this, for he said at once, 'Pray acquit me of any desire to enter into family affairs. But it is possible that I may be of some use to you. Criminology has long been a hobby of mine, and, apart from any help I can give in trying to unravel the mystery, I have a great regard for the colonel. You may count on my services, such as they are. Besides, I shall be here, on the spot, and you probably cannot remain indefinitely.'

'We are very greatly indebted to you, doctor. The colonel has already told me of your kindness and attention to him. In confidence, there is a queer family story dating from many years ago. I can't tell you more. Indeed, I ought not to have said so much without the colonel's permission. But I see no reason why he should not tell you himself. Of course, he does not wish the matter to reach the public.'

'Naturally. It would probably be garbled beyond recognition; and, in any event, publicity would serve no purpose. I will respect your confidence.' He stood for a minute or two smoking in silence. Then, 'By George!' he exclaimed, with sudden animation. 'Now that I remember, twice I have seen an Italian here; at least, to me he was unmistakably Italian in type. The first time I saw him was on the road three or four miles west. He was carrying a melodeon. The second time was in front of my house some days ago, when he was playing his misnamed instrument. He looked down on his luck, and I gave him a copper or two. I haven't seen him since.'

'How long ago is it since you saw him last?'

'About a fortnight, but I cannot say exactly. There are dozens of tramp "musicians" on the road, and if it is a disguise, it is simple and ingenious. He was an elderly man, tanned by exposure, woefully out-at-elbows, with shaggy dark hair and beard. I wish I had thought of this mendicant musician sooner. I could have sent a message to the police to watch him. Indeed, it may still be of importance, and I think I shall telephone to the Chief-Constable's office from my house at once, if I have your permission.'

'By all means.'

'It seems a curious position. I gather that the colonel has information which may be of value to other people.'

'Or perhaps to himself.'

'Or, as you say, to himself. But surely—of course, I am in ignorance of the whole situation—surely it would be easy to meet these people and have the whole thing, whatever it is, straightened out. It is intolerable to be spied on.'

'No doubt in an ordinary question, let us say, of competing interests the rational solution would be to reconcile them; but this is no ordinary affair. We suspect we have to deal with scoundrels, although we do not know who, or what, or where they are. To compromise might be to compound a felony.'

'Were I in your shoes, dealing with dangerous men, I should consult Scotland Yard,' said the doctor with decision.

'There may be dark designs, but there has been no actual crime committed. Our story is bald enough. It is that an unknown man has been prowling round a quiet country house in the North of Scotland, and that we think his object is to steal something. That, of course, is pure conjecture. Still, I am inclined to urge the colonel to act as you suggest.'

'I should not hesitate. Scotland Yard may not be able to work miracles, but it has amazing knowledge, and I shall be surprised if it does not know a good deal about the gentlemen who call themselves "The Searchers," if such a body exists.' He held out his hand. 'I am sorry I must leave you, but I have to make a long run into the country to see a patient. Count on my help; and if I think, as a medical man, that your presence here is necessary, I will telegraph you at once.'

I thanked him, and he went off on his rounds. I hastened back to the house to do my packing, for I had not much time in which to catch the train.

My uncle handed me a generous sum by way of travelling expenses, with instructions to telegraph him if I required more. He came with me to the station, where I sent off a telegram to Keene-Leslie asking him to meet me in London. It also concerned Mr Wakeford of the Omnivagants' Club.

'I'm an old crock, Neil, and I must stay where I am; but I would give much to be able to go with you,' said the colonel. 'Bring Hugh here if you can, and take care of yourself. I have a queer feeling that you may be going into danger.'

I rallied him on his forebodings, and the old man said no more; but the warm grip of his hand on mine told me, as no words could, his feelings when he gave me good-bye.

The bright delicacy of the morning had faded. The sky was slowly lowering. Far up, above the valley, a thin curtain of haze—herald of a shower—dulled the keen edge of the sky-line; and a southerly wind sprang up, driving the distant rain nearer. Where, in the morning, the outlines of the mountain-ridges had been picked out with precision in the clear light, misty pennants now trailed in the wind from every spur. The rain began to drum steadily on the window. My last glimpse of the Glen was a blurred picture of rapidly massing clouds and spectral woods, with Ben Muichdhui and Braeriach brooding beneath their cowls over the mist-filled valley, like gloomy visionaries.

(Continued on page 149.)

LAKE TITICACA.

LAKE TITICACA is, I suppose, one of the most wonderful, though one of the least known, of great fresh-water lakes. From it can be seen the whole of one of the main 'cordilleras' of the Andes, beginning with Sorata, and ending with Illimani. At sunset the scene is beautiful, the waters brilliantly blue, and the after-glow tinting all the snow-peaked mountains a soft pale pink. Sorata and Illimani are both twenty-one thousand feet high. Illimani in shape resembles Fujiyama, and is Bolivia's finest mountain. It appears in the shield on the Bolivian flag, also on the five and ten cent pieces.

The Indians are supposed to be Roman Catholics, yet they still believe that Sorata is haunted by a spirit; and in the evening small saucers containing maize and rice are put at the foot of the mountain for its refreshment. Some of the Indians know their way up the mountain, but none of them will act as guide. The spirit, it is said, does not like strangers, and any one escorting them will be punished by failure of his crops. So those desirous of climbing the mountain have had to bring out Swiss guides. The Indians go all over the lake in their balsas, or reed boats, always keeping close to the edge, as sudden squalls are liable to arise, and their light craft would promptly capsize. The water is so cold that no one—not even a strong swimmer—stands a chance, as cramp sets in almost at once.

All round the shore are small villages, the largest of these being Puno, on the Peruvian side. Steamers belonging to an English company ply from Puno, across to Guaqui, in Bolivia. The biggest of these, the Inca, is about six hundred tons. Steamers leave Puno at nightfall, and arrive in Bolivia early next morning; and any one who has the energy to get up about six o'clock enjoys a lovely view. The clear, cold, blue water, the range of lofty snow-clad mountains, and the Indians paddling about in their balsas, with square rush sails, make a sight not to be forgotten. The air being so rarefied (the lake is nearly thirteen thousand feet above sea-level), all outlines are sharply defined, and shadows nearly black. The Incas used to be sun-worshippers; and no wonder, for when the sun is shining the scene is glorious. On a cloudy day, however, all looks desolate and dreary; the waters turn leaden and the snow appears blue.

Puno used to be the most important town before the railways were built, but now its population is decreasing rapidly. It is a most melancholy sight to see street after street of desolate houses, some beginning to fall to pieces. The paving-stones are overgrown with moss and grass. Guaqui, the Bolivian port, is just a collection of a few houses, a custom-house, a railway yard, and workshops. The old Indian village of Guaqui is about three kilometres inland.

Copacabana is where the famous miracle-working Virgin is to be found. She chose the town herself, so the legend goes. Her maker was an Indian who lived in Sucre, and she dates back to the sixteenth century. She lived quite contentedly in Sucre for some years, but after a while a great many misfortunes befell the city; and one of the priests had a vision, in which she appeared and asked to be taken somewhere else. Cochabamba was tried first, but suited her no better; so she was at once removed to Copacabana, where a special church was built in her honour, and there she rests content. The church in Copacabana has several silver altars; the high altar is especially beautiful, being beaten out in a rose design. Our Lady of Copacabana is on a swivel pedestal. Most of the year she faces her own chapel, but on her great festival she is turned and faces the main church. All the vessels are of solid silver, most of them beautifully worked. Her own private chapel is most interesting. In one corner are piles of crutches left by the people who have been cured by her. Her robes blaze with jewels, given her by the devout for having had their petitions granted them. But the story goes that a good many of these gems are glass, the originals having been sold by the priests. I believe the figure (which is just a metre high) is made of wood, but the man who made it must have been a genius, as the face really looks as if it were alive. The face is very dark, with black hair. No wonder the credulous Indian believes she moves and speaks, so wonderful is that face!

In August is the special pilgrimage to Copacabana, and Indians come from all over the country, some walking fifty or sixty miles. I never went to the actual pilgrimage, as so many Indians assemble, and they are so dirty and unhygienic that smallpox invariably breaks out. One can always recognise the people who have been on the pilgrimage, as they all wear a small rosette made of pop-corn. The corn is popped in an unusual way; a small hole is dug in the sand, which gets so heated by the sun that the corn pops itself.

Lake Titicaca has only one outlet, the Desaguadero River, which has a quaint way of sometimes flowing from Titicaca to Poopo, and sometimes vice versâ; whichever lake is the fuller empties itself into the other. When the river leaves Titicaca it passes through a narrow gorge a couple of miles long, which suddenly broadens out into a shallow lake, with a deep shifting channel. Except in the channel, the water is not more than two or three feet deep, and in some places it is less. Rushes (totara), from which the Indians make their boats, grow thickly everywhere. They grow about four feet long, and are very tough. They make quite good boats, but soon get water-logged. Wild duck abound, but the sportsman does not get any 'sport,' as they are quite tame, never having seen a gun. There are two small, flat-bottomed paddle-boats which used to go between the two lakes and carry the copper ore from Corocoro, but now the railway has tapped that country. It takes about a day to cross the shallow lake, and soundings have to be taken, as the channel is always changing. Afterwards the river becomes narrow, with high banks on each side, till it reaches Poopo, which is too shallow for anything but row-boats. It is a most weird sensation to be on the river when it is changing its direction of flowing. We could not make any headway at all, but dropped our anchor and waited for the current to settle.

There are a great many beautiful little islands on Lake Titicaca, but the two largest are the most famous. One is called the Island of the Sun, the other the Island of the Moon; they get their names from the old Inca temples on them. There is nothing of interest on the Island of the Sun except what is called the Inca's Bath; but how he bathed in it is a mystery, as it is only about three feet long and two feet wide. On the other island the ruins of the Moon's temple are still to be seen, but they are not very interesting, being just a collection of very small rooms. There is a little winding path which leads from the temple to the highest point in the island, where, on the face of the rocks, there is a cat's face, with a sacrificial stone in front of it. Whether the face is a freak of nature or was carved there by the Incas is a much-discussed point. On this island, as on most, there is not much vegetation—just what the Indians cultivate and some coarse grass. But on the Island of the Sun the flowers and the trees are beautiful. What grows best there is barley, potatoes, and kinua (quinoa). When ripe kinua grain turns a blood red, which improves the barren landscape wonderfully.

There are no native trees; but wild olive, eucalyptus, and weeping willow do well—better than any others. Round most of the churches there are groves of wild olive. The lake is shrinking considerably in size, evaporation being so great. Tiahuanaco, the old Inca capital, used to be a port, and now it is twenty kilometres inland. There is supposed to be untold wealth buried in those blue waters. When the Incas found out what robbers the Spaniards were, 'tis said, they collected all their gold, made it into a huge chain, and threw it into the lake. Some still believe the legend, and many treasure-seekers have sought in vain for the Inca's Chain.

JOHN BROWN.

CONFESSIONS OF A NEW ARMY CADET.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D., and the Doctor; &c.

CHAPTER IX.—JOHN BROWN'S LETTERS.

DEAR SIR,—We are specialists in pedigrees, family crests, and armorial bearings. Since the raising of the New Army we have furnished no fewer than 25,385 officers with Family Trees and correct Escutcheons. We have innumerable requests daily for similar services.

The success of our scheme has been most gratifying. Hundreds of our clients have secured Staff appointments and married society ladies through our labours.

We have now decided to open our field to include all Military Cadets, and would draw your attention to the importance of your name (Brown) and its ancestral greatness.

Our work is divided into various periods. For example, a Family Tree dating from the Norman Period costs £5, 5s. 0d.; the Tudor Period, £4, 4s. 0d.; Stewart Period, £3, 3s. 0d.; and the Lloyd George Period, 10s. 6d.

We have discovered that your ancestor, Harold de Vere Browne, landed at Hastings as an Esquire to the Duc de Polonski, a warrior in the service of William the Conqueror.

We shall, therefore, be pleased to complete your genealogical tree.

TERMS—CASH.

Yours respectfully,
DODGEM & DODGEM,
Pedigree Merchants.

. . . . . .

DEAR SIR,—May we draw your attention to the use of our Bureau as a means of meeting desirable and highly recommended ladies with a view to matrimony? In the past year we have successfully negotiated over three hundred happy unions between officers and our clients. At present we have the following on our lists:

(1) Society Lady, young, beautiful, no means, but willing to meet a gentleman with £10,000 a year.

(2) Widow, middle class, age 40, income £150, desires to meet quiet, respectable young man.

(3) Actress, charming and beautiful, desires to wed wealthy man who does not object to visitors.

(4) Barmaid, 25, good-looking, capital £50, wishes to marry Sergeant-Major (Life Guards preferred).

These are just a few of our clients. Should you be interested, we shall be pleased to arrange an interview, or to send photos prior to the meeting.

Interview, £1. Successful Contract, £10.

TERMS—SPOT CASH.

Yours faithfully,
LENSKY & TROTIN,
Matrimonial Agency, Ltd

. . . . . .

DEAR SIR,—We beg to enclose our catalogue, patterns, and book of letters from satisfied clients. We have supplied uniforms to Raisuli, Li Hung Chang, and King Dinizulu.

Our stock is the finest in town. Cut excellent, and finish superb. We are the people.

Owing to officers' accounts being 'overdrawn,' our terms are CASH WITH ORDER.—Yours, &c.,
DO-ALL & DO-EM,
Military Tailors.

. . . . . .

VILLA PETITE, WASHOUT-ON-SEA.

DEAR SIR,—My sister and I are two well-known society ladies, anxious to help our country. Since 1914 we have made it our duty to look after canaries and pet-birds belonging to Officers of the Old Army. The high cost of feeding-stuffs has, however, compelled us to appeal for subscriptions in aid of this great work.

We have, therefore, decided to make our aim ONE MILLION SIXPENCES.

Your sixpence will be gratefully accepted.—Yours sincerely, MAUDE SLIPPEM.

P.S.—Please send stamped addressed envelope for your receipt.

. . . . . .

RECRUITING OFFICE, SLOWTOWN, LANCS.

JOHN BROWN,—You are hereby instructed to report for Army Service on May 24th. As this is the seventh notice sent you, your failure to comply will entail a warrant for your arrest.

JOHN MUDDLE-MEN, Lieut.,
Recruiting Officer.

RUSTIC MANOR, BERKS.

MY DEAREST BOY,—I have been worrying a lot about you since the rainy weather started. I hope your boots are not letting in, and that you have not got a cold. I wired Harrods to-day to send you a Chest-Warmer, felt soles, and a box of Gregory Powder.

I am glad to hear that you have got a clergyman in your hut, and that you go with him so often to Communion. And I am sure you will not waste your leisure hours with those brainless girls who are always luring young men into wicked paths.

The rector called to-day, and I asked him what books I should send you. He suggested Good Words, Life of David Livingstone, and the Parish Magazine. I have sent them off.

I was quite shocked to hear you had a Radical in your hut. I didn't know Radicals got commissions. There must be corruption somewhere, and I am going to write to The Times.

When do you expect to get a Brigade?

I think that is all just now. Oh, I forgot. Take a spoonful of the Gregory's every morning before breakfast. Your dear father did that for twenty years.

Lots of love to you, my own dear boy, from YOUR LOVING MOTHER.

. . . . . .

SWEETVILLE.

MY DEAREST JOHNNIE,—Why have you stayed away so long? Is it because I had to entertain my two Australian friends? Surely that is unreasonable. Now, I am not so jealous as you are. For example, Marjory Clarke and her sister Hilda have told me of the interesting afternoon you all had together in the Picture-House. I was so pleased to hear you were in such good company. But, a week later, I was very sorry to learn that you and Beefy had been silly again, sporting about with two low-class girls in the local hotel. You are such a puzzle. Yet I can't help liking you. Do come over on Saturday. There's a good boy!—Your loving ADELA.

(Continued on page 156.)

PRIVATE ELIOT.

By INNES LOGAN, Author of On the King's Service: Inward Glimpses of Men-at-Arms, &c.

I.

AN icy blast swept the little group of Nissen huts, and one of the sleepers round the stove stirred uneasily on the floor. An officer who had given up the attempt to sleep leaned forward from the bench on which he sat and dropped another fragment of wood into the struggling fire, felt for his cigarette-case, and, with a slight gesture of annoyance, desisted, remembering it was empty. Round the stove lay a dozen others with their hands deep-thrust into their breeches-pockets, and their heads propped on respirator or haversack. One, on his back, snored heavily at irregular intervals: another, set against the bench with his head sunk on his chest, slipped over sideways every now and again, and righted himself wearily. Two sat by the table, their faces pillowed on their arms. A solitary candle, guttering on the table, was the only light in the cheerless place. In the huts around the men of the battalion lay close, crowded together for warmth.

Private Eliot, on sentry duty, halted at the end of his beat and looked eastward. He saw beyond the infrequent flashes of the guns the slow, pale light of a bitter March dawn creeping over the long ridges of Picardy. Far off a bugle blew, faint but clear; and, as though in answer to a signal, a heavy battery half a mile in front ponderously blasted off a score of rounds. In the lines of huts set high on that stark upland the sleepers moved and muttered.

To the sentry standing there the distant bugle-call had something ethereal and elfin-like in it. It was the voice of romance, of longing and remembrance. His face, turned to the distances, showed haggard in the chill shadows of the reluctant dawn. Its long outline, the drooping moustache wet with the dews of the night, was the face of a thinker, of a man who brooded; and the long, sensitive fingers gripping the rifle-butt told the same tale. Old emotions, dulled by the drab round of endless tasks, desires firmly held in check, became clamant within him. His thoughts flew swiftly to the day long ago when he had first known in its urgency the profound desire for the individual tenderness of home—so long ago, when, standing on guard over the sleeping camp at Barry, he had watched, on just such a morning as this, the Scotch express thunder by, a stream of orange light, to the distant city where his loved ones lay. He sighed, and, turning, resumed his march.

Over the rise to the right a motor-bicycle came into view, so suddenly that the brown figure bent low over its handle-bars seemed to rise out of the soil itself. It was being driven at a tremendous pace; the explosions from its exhaust merged into a continuous roaring noise. The water in the pools on the muddy road flew before its tearing approach. Opposite the camp it swerved, and bumping and rattling over the uneven ground, came to rest near the sentry. Its rider was drenched in mud. On one cheek, inflamed from the blow of a stone, a thin trickle of blood had dried to a rusty-brown. Straddle-legged across his cycle, he asked for the sentry's battalion. Private Eliot, without a word, pointed to the hut where the officers were sleeping. The despatch-rider, dismounting, walked quickly over, knocked at the door, and entered.

II.

Inside the hut the candle had died out in a mass of grease on the table, and the dim dawn could not yet penetrate the blanket hanging over the window. The officer seated on the bench was still nursing the fire. He struck a match, and walking across the hut, pulled down the blanket, and turned to the adjutant. 'Donald,' he called loudly, 'a message from Brigade.' A tall boy lying on the floor raised himself on his elbow, and then stiffly stumbled to his feet. He took the small oblong envelope, looked round for his helmet, failed to see it, and walked out of the hut bareheaded. He shivered as the piercing wind caught his chilled blood, and Private Eliot, wheeling at the moment, caught a fleeting glimpse of his young, weary face turned questioningly to the line. The adjutant entered the commanding officer's hut, almost immediately came out again, and disappeared behind the row of huts. An orderly crossed the open space, then another, walking quickly, adjusting helmets as they went. Armed men began to pour from the huts. They mustered on the road in methodical haste. Private Eliot was relieved, and fell in with his company.

In his heart was still the sensitiveness and the longing of his rare hour of solitude, and they found expression in a black mood of passionate reaction from his surroundings. The rush of memories wakened by the distant bugle-call had broken loose the surgent desire, so long sternly repressed, for the end of it all—so long repressed, but in his lonely vigil growing, mastering him, only waiting for the touch that should open the gates. And the magic touch had come in the bugle's note. In such an instant came the sudden summons that he face the issue at once, in its acutest form of imminent peril, perhaps death. There emerged into sharpest collision his personality and the immediate necessity. He loathed all this—loathed it with soul and body; loathed the discipline, the perpetual orders, the mud and the lice, the mutilation and the bloodshed. He rebelled furiously against it all. His heart cried out that it was intolerable, no longer to be endured. If he were killed, what did it matter to them, these men round him? Why did that man Davidson spit like that? And he wished the fellow behind would stop swearing—he was sick of blasphemy. It did matter supremely to his wife. For her it would mean lifelong loneliness and the unequal burden of their children. But to him—he knew about it; he knew, had seen it a score of times. 'Poor Eliot's gone,' they would say. 'Eliot gone? That's bad luck. Married, wasn't he?' And then next day, or the day after, they would forget all about him. That was war, a selfish, degrading thing. And in England they talked and talked. Easy for well-groomed old gentlemen to speak of fighting to a finish. When it meant the finish of yourself, most likely, it was different. He did wish that fellow Davidson would stop spitting. And why on earth didn't he have those teeth of his seen to when he was at home on leave the other day? He hadn't had leave for nine months; and now all leave was stopped, they said.

The colonel's ringing voice called the battalion to attention, and the long column, marching by platoons, began to swing off down the road.

III.

As they marched they advanced into the fringes of battle, with signs familiar enough to these old campaigners, and yet increasingly with features which puzzled and surprised. The long, rather high ridge towards which they were now advancing was under continuous shell-fire; but the white or dark clouds of smoke that tufted its summit and sides showed a lack of concentration or plan in the shelling which perplexed them. It seemed difficult at times to be sure whether the ridge was being shelled by their own guns or the enemy's. Could it be that the artillery on neither side was certain where its front line lay? Their own artillery through which they passed were, at all events, now firing but little; and the sustained clamour of the guns that had come to them distantly the previous day had died away into spasmodic outbursts from isolated batteries, and the more persistent booming of the long guns farther back. They met batteries moving under orders rearwards, passed ammunition-dumps deserted of all life, and, as the hour wore on, realised, with all an infantry's ironical (and often unfair) bitterness in such an event, that the whole line of artillery was evacuating its gun positions and moving back. Rumour passed from lip to lip. It was said that the enemy had broken through to the south, and was already far behind their right flank.

The leading platoon swung to the left, and struck into a lane leading across country to a village. As they approached, a shell burst fairly on the cross-roads, and another and yet another whizzed overhead to explode with tremendous effect among the buildings. The men turned their heads to the noise, or tilted their steel helmets to catch any flying stones or fragments, as their temperament or the mood of the moment led them. The usual jester, the 'comic' of the platoon, successfully made the inevitable joke. The officers held themselves erect, and walked steadily on. The battalion turned to the right at the cross-roads, cleared the village, and halted.

IV.

As Private Eliot looked round, leaning on his rifle, he saw the medical officer and the chaplain standing together a few yards from him. They were poring over a map, marking points on it with a pencil. The stretcher-bearer sergeant, a brave man wearing the Military Medal with clasp, stood just behind, on his face the expression of the whimsical boredom he usually assumed (and apparently felt) on those occasions. Eliot gloomed at them. He resented their preoccupation. He resented anybody taking an interest in the matter at all. 'Eye-wash!' That's what the army was. Filth and eye-wash, mud and misery, and pretending to be 'cheery.'

An R.A.M.C. officer strode up and joined the others over their map. He had a pale, thin face, which the shadow of the steel helmet made disproportionately small; and from his broad shoulders to his lean flanks and shapely hands and feet, he moved with grace and lightness. Never well, often weary beyond measure, his wiry frame held a spirit of unconquerable resolve; and, amid the sordid rigours of war, his lofty idealism, endlessly employed, but never exhausted, in the labours and the perils of the front line, gleamed and burned, a guiding star to many. Eliot could hear his voice—they had folded up the map—but what he said only in part. 'Think of it—the fate of civilisation in the balance—and we're in it, man; we're in it. Greatest moment in history for centuries—all in the balance—good or evil—to be decided by us —by these fellows there!'

These words, which were spoken with a kind of subdued passion, seemed to snap some cord in the private soldier's brain. What discipline, habit, comradeship, the ringing tones of their colonel had done for the other men, these words, spoken so quietly, but with such fervour, did for him. His mind, singularly sensitive in these hours to impression, saw, as in a flash, the vision, and caught fire. His spirit leaped to it. It restored his soul. A grim memory, that had held him in its grasp throughout the march, of a man in his platoon whom he had recently seen die—his legs blown off, one at the knee, the other at the hip—was lifted from him. A shell whooped overhead, and plunged into a house behind. It failed to burst, and the platoon commander, turning, caught Private Eliot's eye, and smiled. Eliot smiled back. Even Davidson, reflectively chewing a blade of grass with a rather bovine expression on his face, not irrelevant to his occupation and his habitual state of mind, now seemed to him, at least, a homely and harmless creature, whom one might despise, but without resentment. Eliot surveyed the battlefield with a keen glance. He was master of himself. Neither routine, the soldier's school, nor fatalism, his frequent refuge, would be called on to support his spirit that day. When they marched again, Private Eliot bore himself proudly.

V.

A German aeroplane dropped swiftly out of the sky from the north, came very low, circled once above the battalion, and sped off home. The company commander stepped to the side of the road to speak to the adjutant, and the men heard him say, 'Dig in here—just over the rise? Very good.'

A moment later the company sergeant-major came down the line. 'Now there is no one between us and the enemy. That ridge is lost. They may be on us at any moment. Don't you worry about that. That's the commanding officer's job. Your job is to DIG!' He snapped out his words, and moved off, a fine figure of a man.

They had reached a sunken road running up to the top of the rise. The remains of an artillery-dump, half-a-dozen howitzer-shells, and a score of eighteen-pounders lay scattered by the roadside; to their immediate left a battery was still firing regularly, and, in reply, German 4·2's were crashing on to the empty ground between the battery and the road. The battalion spread right and left under orders, and began to dig. Eliot threw himself into the work, using his entrenching-tool fiercely.

He worked so hard that he was unaware of his platoon commander's presence till he heard him speaking. 'Private Eliot, the intelligence officer wants six men to go out on patrol with the snipers. I want you to go with him.' The little group fell in quickly, and got their orders. Their instructions were to advance cautiously in couples; to obtain contact with the enemy if possible, without fighting unless necessary; to obtain all possible information; and to be back at a certain time. Eliot had as companion a tall corporal, a gamekeeper in civil life. Two by two scattering, they moved off down the hill into the valley below.

Eliot and his companion slipped cautiously into a small group of battered farm buildings. The yard was empty. Keeping close to the wall of the steading, the corporal leading, they walked towards the other side. Eliot, glancing quickly everywhere, suddenly felt his heart grow cold. The barrel of a rifle was protruding from the door of the broken cow-shed, across the yard, twenty feet away. Like lightning he threw his rifle to his shoulder and fired through the doorway, and then leapt for the opening. As he fired the flash of the German's gun blazed out, and even as Eliot sprang he was conscious of the corporal, without a sound, sinking slowly to the ground, his rifle clattering on the cobbles as he fell. When Eliot reached the door the German fired again; the bullet went wide by an inch, and the Scotsman was in the shed. For a second he could see nothing in the half-light filtering through the holes in roof and wall of the sordid place; then straight ahead of him he saw the German, with his back to the farther wall, tearing at the bolt of his rifle. He was making a kind of snarling noise, the sound of a man in an extremity of anger or of fear; but in an instant Private Eliot was across the floor. In the dim light, as he thrust, he was aware of glaring eyes and lips drawn back, of murder in the eyes that glared—and of murder in his own heart; but even in that fraction of time of deadly knowledge that it was his life or the other's, the event was taken swiftly out of his hands. With a blasting roar the roof flew apart in a red blaze of flame. Eliot, stunned, thrown back across to the wall, saw through the choking dust the light of the open sky broad on his enemy. He looked into a mouth wide open, jaw sagging, and above the jaw saw nothing at all. Face and head were gone, sheared off as though by a giant knife. By some freak of balancing, the body stood upright for a moment, then slowly heeled over and sprawled full length on the floor. Private Eliot, as though from a distance, heard his own gasping intake of breath, felt himself slipping sideways down the wall, tried to recover himself, failed, and passed swiftly into darkness and oblivion.

VI.

When he came to himself he was lying where he had fallen. His throat was full of the acrid taste of brick-dust and explosive. His confused mind struggled to remember, and slowly the picture of the past came back to him, at first in fragments like a picture-puzzle, then in fuller measure, till all was clear and in its place at last. He lay with his head propped at a sharp angle against the wall, dully aware that he was in pain. With an effort he moved, and agony took possession of him. He steeled himself to it, and moved again. Raising himself on his hands, back thrust against the wall, he looked, and saw that his leg was torn and bleeding. He broke open his field-dressing and bound it on the wound as well as he could, then rested a while. With patient labour he sought to rise to his feet, clinging to the rude planks of the gaping wall, and at last succeeded. He stood, trembling with the cost of the effort, and then moved towards the door, a step at a time. He reached it at last.

Private Eliot stood in the doorway and looked across the yard. The corporal lay drawn together on the cobbles, motionless. Eliot started out to reach him, keeping close to the wall, against which he frequently rested. The journey seemed endless to him, but at length he stood beside the huddled form. He stooped, and with an effort, clinging the while to the lower flap of the stable door, turned it over. The corporal was dead. A tiny hole over his heart told why. Private Eliot unbuttoned the breast-pockets and pulled out the pay-book and a bundle of letters. A photograph of a child, a boy of three or so, fell to the ground, and he stooped to recover it, almost overbalanced, and with difficulty pulled himself erect. At a second attempt he succeeded. He put pay-book, letters, and photograph in his pocket, with a grim thought that, for all the chance they had of getting to the battalion, they might as well have been left where they were. He paused, looking down, then shook out his handkerchief and laid it gently across the dead man's calm face. He crept painfully on his way again.

When they had left the battalion the corporal and he had not come straight forward, but had crossed diagonally, in obedience to the order that the scouts were to scatter along the battalion front. Eliot, halting as he reached the corner, knew that he could be no great distance from the line. He knew also that he was very near to collapse, and that if he had to give in he would be found by the enemy or not found at all. The swell in the rise facing him concealed the line, but he thought it must be just beyond, just out of sight. He prepared himself to make the attempt.

But as he did so he stiffened, standing for a moment very still. He had remembered that he had taken no identification from the German lying dead in the shed—and he ought not to go back without one. They would want to know his age, regiment and division, and so on. It was his duty to go back. He cursed his folly, the folly of an unpractical man turned soldier. After all, no one need know. He had been wounded by a shell, not in hand-to-hand fighting. No one need ever know. But—it was his duty to go back.

Private Eliot turned and painfully retraced his steps. He crept along the wall and round the farmyard; he entered the shed, and made his way round to the sprawling figure, stooped, and fumbled. A few minutes later he emerged, and began his slow progression round the wall. He felt stronger now, with the false strength of growing fever. The courtyard moved up and down strangely before his eyes. It seemed now larger, now smaller. Once it became enormous, then diminished again absurdly. It seemed no bigger than a box. A Doll's House. Wasn't there a play called that? Of course; and he had given it to his little girl. No; that was a real doll's house, not the play. As he reached the corner his strength went from him, and he fell on hands and knees. He began to crawl feebly towards the line.

He became conscious in some dim fashion, as he crawled, that he was in a depression or fold in the slope, and that this appeared to run upwards. He would keep to that. There seemed to be a machine-gun firing bursts from his left over his head—or two. He could not be sure. He had to rest very often; and once, as he lay prone on his face, he felt something trickling into his mouth, something warm, with a peculiar sweet taste. He rubbed his face with the back of his hand and looked. It was blood. He must have been hit on the head too. He hadn't known that. He got on his hands and knees again, and crawled on, weakly.

VII.

Private Eliot reached at length a little cup in the ground near the top of the slope, where the long fold came to an end. He lay for long, then essayed feebly to climb its lip. Three times he tried, and at the third failure lay exhausted. His shoulders suddenly shook with suppressed laughter. What was that story about Bruce and the spider? Seven times the old spider tried. Mustn't be beaten by a spider. His light-headedness was more prolonged now, and the intervals of intelligence shorter. He raised himself to try again, and for the fourth time failed. It wasn't spiders, it was bees, anyway. He remembered how they used to drift in at the schoolroom window, bringing with them the sharp fragrance of the wild thyme on the Border hills. He got on all-fours again, and this time, with the last effort of his failing strength, succeeded in raising his head to the top. He could see the trench a hundred yards away. He made a supreme effort to keep his hold, and his thoughts clear. He tried to shout, and could not. And as the darkness closed in on his mind again his arms went from under him, and falling over on his side, he slid slowly downward into the hollow of the cup, and lay still.

He waked to the stars shining down clearly from a great expanse of sky. He lay staring upwards, without pain or any distress of mind. He was very tired, that was all, and sleep would be unspeakably welcome. How easy it was—this that men dreaded so! If only those at home could know how easy it was!

He heard quick steps and a familiar voice; saw in the starlight a face near his; recognised Davidson, who had once annoyed him about something—what was it?—years ago.

'There you are, chum. Spotted you when you looked over, but no one allowed across in daylight because of that machine-gun over there.' Davidson jerked his thumb outwards. 'Gently now; gently does it.' Stooping, he gathered Private Eliot in his powerful arms, rose easily with his burden, and breasting the rim of the cup, strode strongly towards the British line.

'ALSO RANS.'

If no one ever reads us,
And no one ever writes
A critic word that speeds us,
A friendly that delights;
If people in the papers
Should never quote our names,
Reviewers light no tapers
On altars that are Fame's;
If we must die unheeded,
As we have lived unknown,
Less even than the weeded
In gardens of Renown:

What of it?—as we stumble
Through death on heaven's gate,
We shall be brave, though humble,
Awed, yet importunate.
'Do You—do You know better?'
We shall make haste to ask;
'Know we have loved both letter
And spirit of our task?
Your light past understanding
Was ours in our degree;
Dark to the world's demanding,
But plain for us to see.
We, too, have known art's glory,
If not creation's flow!' . . .
And God will hear our story,
The Giver say, 'I know.'

V. H. F.

Printed and Published by W. & R. Chambers, Limited, London and Edinburgh.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

CECIL RHODES.

SOME PERSONAL REMINISCENCES.

By Sir HENRY LUCY.

I.

I MADE the acquaintance of Cecil Rhodes at a breakfast-party given in the parliamentary session of 1892 by Mr Munro-Ferguson, not yet G.C.M.S., or dreaming of occupying the important post of Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia. The guest of the morning arrived late, and chanced to drop into an empty chair by which I was seated. This happy accident was the opportunity of establishing a friendship which, with increasing warmth, lasted to the day of his too early death.

Two years later my wife and I paid a visit to the Cape. On the arrival of the steamer we were greeted by the aide-de-camp of Sir Henry Loch, Governor of Cape Colony, who was the bearer of a letter of warm welcome and of invitation to lunch on the following day at his Excellency's country quarters a short distance out of Cape Town. Among the guests was Cecil Rhodes. Again favoured by fortune, I found myself seated on one side of him, my wife on the other. In the course of conversation he told us that his country residence, Groote Schuur, was in process of renovation, adding that, if we did not mind the discomfort of the presence of workmen about the premises, he hoped we would be his guests during our stay at the Cape. We were doubly grateful for the proffered hospitality. Primarily, it offered opportunity of closer intimacy with a fascinating personality. In the second place, it delivered us from the depressing circumstances of hotel life in sun-baked Cape Town.

Rhodes had been fortunate in finding within a mile or two of Cape Town an old Dutch house set at the foot of Table Mountain, in the lovely suburb of Rondebosch. Originally, as its name (Dutch for the Great Barn) implies, it had been a granary. It was plainly and strongly built; the architect, under Rhodes's personal supervision, greatly improved it by raising it in height a storey, and extending its base by the addition of a wing. Rhodes's ambition was to furnish the old mansion in the style suitable to its age. He was ever on the look-out for old furniture, whether to be found in Dutch homesteads in South Africa or in salerooms in London. I have a pleasant recollection of a wardrobe in the bedroom where we slept, a massive structure in black oak, severely simple in design, a silver lock and silver hinges glistening on its dark surface. As we had been forewarned, the builders were in possession, and the living-rooms were limited to a couple of bedrooms, a dining-room, and the library. Our host slept in a hut in the garden at the back of the house, giving up the only bedrooms to his guests. Among the passengers on the Castle Liner was Horace Plunkett, an Irish member, Unionist in politics, patriotic by instinct and practice. I spoke of him to Rhodes, who forthwith called upon him, and insisted on his joining us at Groote Schuur. Not more loath to leave his hotel than we had been, Sir Horace (as he now is) by his company added greatly to the pleasure of the house-party.

Two years after our visit Groote Schuur was destroyed by fire, and with it many of its garnered treasures. The calamity wounded Cecil Rhodes sorely. There were particular associations that endeared the place to him. It was a home of his own making, upon which, amid pressing business of imperial scope, he had lavished much money, infinite thought and personal trouble. He was not, however, a man idly to lament an irreparable misfortune. He rebuilt the place on its original lines, and, with sublime prophetic faith in the country's destiny, bequeathed it on his death for the use of the Premier of South Africa. Dr Jameson occupied Groote Schuur after Rhodes's death until General Botha, first Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa (the fulfilment of Rhodes's vision), entered it as his official residence in 1910.

II.

Another matter Rhodes found time to deal with during a flying visit to London was a project to do honour to the gallant Britons who died with Major Wilson (December 5, 1893) when Lobengula turned at bay at the Shangani River and fought his pursuers. The bodies were found where they had fallen, rifle in hand. By direction of Rhodes, the remains were collected, and carried a distance of two hundred miles to be buried at 'World's View,' in the Matoppo Hills, in the neighbourhood of one of the prehistoric ruins that are among the marvels of

 [All Rights Reserved.]

South Africa. His desire was that these heroic fellows should have a memorial worthy of their deeds. He conceived the idea of building round their place of common sepulture a stout wall, setting within it medallions in basso-rilievo containing portraits of the heroes, each with his name inscribed below. He commissioned an eminent London sculptor to work out this unique memorial, which was in due time set up in its appointed place.

When the great Matabele king died, after his flight from Bulawayo, his three boys were left without provision and with few friends. It speaks volumes for the reputation Cecil Rhodes had established with the savage tribe he vanquished, that the first thought of the orphaned children's guardians turned to the great white chief at Cape Town. Escorted by two or three of the old king's men, Lobengula's children made their way to Cape Town, and presented themselves in Rhodes's doorway. He immediately took them in, gave them rooms, and undertook to provide for them. He had an idea, the realisation of which would, he believed, be attended by perfect happiness for the lads. He was at the time having a portion of the far-reaching land round Groote Schuur laid out for specimens of the wild animals to be found in Africa. He told me he would have the boys trained up to take charge of these Zoological Gardens, work for which both their instincts and their aptitude promised to qualify them. I never heard how the project fared, but it is certain Rhodes would make permanent provision for the orphans of his ancient foeman.

He was even prouder of his library than of his old furniture or the blue hydrangeas that glorified his garden and gave him special pleasure. He was always buying books. Amid the pressure of his vast business, political and commercial, he found time for reading only by sitting up late at night, a habit which did not prevent his taking an hour's ride at six o'clock in the morning. His favourite study was the lives and works of the Roman emperors. He bought every book he could hear of bearing on this wide subject. He had a rare collection of their portraits on coins or engravings, and many manuscripts specially copied from originals at the Vatican and other libraries of Rome. The fascination 'imperial Cæsar dead and turned to clay' had for the founder of Rhodesia was complete, perhaps significant.

When I returned to London after visiting the Cape, people who heard I had been the guest of the financial magnate said, not without suspicion of envy, 'You must have got some good tips.' As a matter of fact, neither goldfields nor diamond-mines were mentioned in our many intimate conversations. Yes, there was an exception. Rhodes occasionally referred to the reputed site of Solomon's mines, whence he brought a handful of particles of gold, displayed on a plate in his library. But it was the regal state of King Solomon that interested him, not his possession of gold-mines, which, compared with the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa established and controlled by Rhodes, were insignificant. In general society, gathered in a London house to do him honour, he was frigidly taciturn. Seated after dinner on the stoep at Groote Schuur, with the moon shining in a blue sky almost as brightly as the sun over London town, he talked by the hour about ancient Rome and its warrior emperors.

One other subject on which he talked—attractive as being imperial in its interests—was preferential tariffs between the Mother Country and the Colonies and between the Colonies themselves. Speaking at Grahamstown in 1903, Dr Jameson stated that the fiscal policy recommended by Mr Chamberlain (at the time a subject of rancorous political controversy) was fifteen years earlier proposed by Cecil Rhodes. I am not aware of any general scheme of preferential tariffs promulgated by him. He certainly did contemplate something of the kind as applicable to Cape Colony. He showed me correspondence in progress with the Canadian Premier, having in view the establishment of a bargain between the two colonies designed for mutual profit. Canada was to admit Cape wine on a preferential tariff, Cape Colony importing Canadian wood at an exceptionally low tariff.

III.

Rhodes had a dinner-party every night of our stay at Groote Schuur, giving us the opportunity of making the acquaintance of the principal personages in public life at the Cape. On one occasion came Dr Jameson, fresh from Matabeleland, where there had been trouble with Lobengula. At the time, unconscious of a destiny that would bring him a Privy-Councillorship, a C.B., and a baronetcy, he was known to his friends and the public—the terms were identical—as 'Doctor Jim.' In the course of conversation at dinner he privily told me how much he suffered from the constriction of a starched collar, worn after months of sartorial freedom on the veld.

When, in the autumn of this same year, 1894, Jameson accompanied Rhodes on a visit to England, Rhodes brought him to luncheon with us. The arrangement was characteristic of the greater man. Abundant in his own hospitality, he avoided London society, hated going out either to luncheon or to dinner. Invited to Ashley Gardens, he telegraphed (his private correspondence was largely conducted by telegraph): 'Don't ask anybody else, and I 'll bring Jameson.' So it was arranged, and we had a delightful two hours listening to these two empire-makers in the freedom of unfettered conversation. Then, as at our first meeting, I was struck with the innate simplicity of Jameson, his amazing unconsciousness of merit or distinction above the average man. An affectionate confidence existed between him and his comrade in the battle of life in South Africa. To the hour of his own death, 'Doctor Jim' silently mourned the too early cutting off of Cecil Rhodes. It is pleasant to think that they sleep together in everlasting rest on the lofty height of the Matoppos, which looks far over the veld of Rhodesia. Loyal to each other during life, in death they are not divided.

I noticed with some surprise that when Rhodes was making up his list for a dinner-party (we were never more than eight or ten all told) the name of Sir Henry Loch did not seem to occur to him. The fact is that the two men, though socially on friendly terms, were not altogether at one. Rhodes wanted too much, and was impatient of restraint, gently but firmly applied by the hand of the Governor. Loch was at that time in a most delicate and difficult position, which he mastered with native tact and finesse. He found himself between the devil and the deep sea, represented by the crafty Kruger and the overmastering Englishman, bent on realising his dream of a line of British territory running from the Cape to Cairo.

Rhodes told me he never trod the streets of London in his recurring visits without thinking of the time when he drove through them to take ship for the Cape. He was sent out to South Africa as the last resource against the advance of consumption. On one occasion he called on the doctor in whose charge he had been. The astonished man, regarding the sturdy figure, ruddy countenance, and bright eyes of the Premier of Cape Colony, turned over his old books, and showed him an entry in which Cecil Rhodes was written down with circumstance as a hopeless case of consumption. The Cape and the whole of South Africa owe much to the energy and the ability of Cecil Rhodes. Per contra, to the splendid South African climate was due the lengthening of his life.

With all his hard exterior to the world at large, his imperious manner, and his habitual stand-offishness to society magnates, Cecil Rhodes had a heart tender as a woman's. I remember one morning at breakfast at Groote Schuur finding him in painfully depressed mood. I thought something serious had happened in State affairs concerning the Cape Government, or that there was bad news from Matabeleland, where, at the moment, Lobengula was in flight. After a while he told me that his butler had had a very bad night, with blood-spitting and other evidence of consumption. This was premonition of failure of cherished hopes. The young man was the son of an old parishioner of Rhodes's father. He had found his way to the Cape, as many go thither, in an advanced stage of consumption. Rhodes, who knew nothing about him except that he came from his own home, took charge of him, sent him up-country to the health-restoring veld, kept him there till he had made a cure, took him into his service, and finally advanced him to a position of high trust in his household. Now he threatened to break down, and tears stood in his master's eyes as he told the story, and made careful preparations for his revisiting the veld.

IV.

Cecil Rhodes and Jameson visited London together just a year before the Raid. They stayed at the Burlington Hotel, of which costly hostelry Rhodes, in his imperial fashion, engaged a whole wing, with private entrance. If he cared to reflect on the topic, he might have consoled himself with the conviction that he was the only denizen of a London hotel whose dinner was served on silver plate. That was a detail due rather to a sense of propriety on the part of the landlord than to Rhodes's personal requirement. A man of the simplest tastes, wanting little here below at dinner-time, he wanted that little good and well cooked, with a moderate allowance of the best wine, for which he had a delicate palate. Overwhelmed with invitations to dinners, big and little, he declined all, dining every night in his own rooms, always with Jameson. Rochfort Maguire was present on most nights, and two, or at most four, friends made up the small party. For Jameson Rhodes privately expressed boundless confidence and an esteem that bordered on affection. The only time they were separated during their stay in London was from a Friday to a Monday, when Jameson went down to Sandringham, the guest of Edward, Prince of Wales.

There was a delightful touch of comedy in Rhodes's explanation of his failure at the last moment to countermand his lieutenant's foray. I remember well the twinkle in his eye when one day, at Groote Schuur, conversation turned upon the different course events might have taken in Matabeleland if a particular message from Sir Henry Loch had duly reached Jameson. Lord Ripon, then at the Colonial Office, urged by strong protests made by Labouchere and others in the House of Commons, cabled to the High Commissioner of South Africa an order forbidding the Chartered Company's expeditionary force to engage in armed conflict with Lobengula. Sir Henry Loch sent on the message. When at length it reached Jameson, Lobengula's army had been defeated, and the king was already in flight. The delay was most regrettable; but somehow or other, as Jameson officially explained, the telegraph-wire had broken down, and before foot-messengers could reach the invading force all was over.

The South African Committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances attendant on the Raid met in February 1897. The Prince of Wales, an early comer at the first sitting, had a unique experience. He was kept waiting three-quarters of an hour whilst the committee debated in private on matters of procedure. He bore the ordeal with genial good-humour, resting his folded hands on his walking-stick, and occasionally chatting with his neighbours right and left. As he remarked to one of them, the last time he had been in that part of the hall was in attendance at the Tichborne trial. The Grand Committee-Room in which the committee sat is built on the site of the old Court of Queen's Bench, in which forty-five years ago opened the trial at bar of the Claimant.

A modern annexe of Westminster Hall, the Grand Committee-Room where Rhodes was practically on his trial is approached by a mean staircase. The only decoration of its walls whilst the committee conducted its inquiry was a colossal map of Africa—that map of which (spread out before him on smaller scale in his room at Groote Schuur) Cecil Rhodes, with a rapid sweep of his hand from the Cape to Cairo, had said to me little more than two years earlier, 'I mean to paint it red from here to here.'

Throughout the bad three-quarters of an hour's waiting Rhodes sat bolt-upright at the end of a bench immediately behind counsel. Never at the height of his prosperity had I seen him looking so well. He was slighter, both in figure and in face, the change bringing into greater prominence his massive head and lofty brow. He did not speak to any one, and for the most part looked straight ahead. Occasionally his eyes glanced round the crowd to his right, but ever returned to the big map on the wall to his left. When called to the witness chair, he found himself in a curiously awkward position. He was seated at a small table, facing not his interrogators, but the shorthand clerk. After a while he, in accordance with habit, took the direction of affairs in his own hand, turned his chair round, and so fronted the benevolent visage of Sir William Harcourt. At the outset he was undoubtedly nervous, reading his statement at a pace that made some passages unintelligible. Fortunately it was printed, and copies were in the hands of the committee, who closely followed the reading. When it came to cross-examination he went to the other extreme, his answers being so long in coming that Harcourt occasionally passed on to another question without receiving a reply to its predecessor.

After a day's experience of the procedure and such surroundings, Rhodes grew so much at home that at luncheon-time he drank his bottled stout under the eyes of the envious committee, and munched a ham sandwich as he explained to them his policy in South Africa. The restless movements, the nervous tension of the face, the long pauses in his replies all disappeared. He became quite chatty, occasionally confidential.

V.

During the progress of the inquiry the illustrated papers were full of portraits of Cecil Rhodes strangely differing in appearance. An additional bond of sympathy existed between him and Lord Rosebery in the fact that each had strong objection to sitting for his portrait before either easel or camera. The consequence was that the illustrated papers were fain to pick up anything they could get purporting to be a portrait of the hero of the hour. The best portrait of Rhodes hangs, with its face to the wall, in the studio of an English R.A. Yielding to the wishes of a friend, he consented to sit for his portrait, and the commission was given to Luke Fildes. It happened to be a period of unusual storm and stress, which, acting upon a temper not constitutionally placid, brought Rhodes to the studio day after day in increasingly irascible mood. He addressed the artist in tones and terms unfamiliar to an R.A. He pettishly declined to follow directions as to where he should sit, declaring that if Fildes could not paint him as he pleased to station himself, he must leave it alone. One day Fildes, at the end of the tether of his patience, decided to leave it alone. He quietly informed his imperious visitor that he would decline to receive him any more. Rhodes, somewhat to his astonishment, was politely conducted to the door, with assurance that it would not again be opened for him. This was rather a costly reprisal on the part of the artist, since it meant forfeiture of the exceptionally handsome fee named in the commission, and the portrait was so nearly finished that it would not have taken long to complete.

London hostesses almost literally fought for Rhodes's presence at their parties. On one occasion I met him at a house in Portland Place. Among the circle of well-known people was Henry Stanley, for whom the occasion must have had a melancholy interest. Not many years had passed since he was the lion of London, the drawing-rooms of happy hostesses who had captured him for an evening being crammed with worshippers. I have vivid recollection of seeing him, just home from his discovery of Emin Pasha, at a party given by Sir John Pender in Horace Walpole's old house in Arlington Street. The room was crowded with the best-known people in London. Just before midnight the late king of the Belgians, who was among the company, gave his arm to Lady Pender to conduct her to the supper-room. Close behind in the procession walked Stanley, his head almost up to the shoulders of the king. It was upon him that all eyes were fixed. There were many kings, but only one Stanley. On this subsequent night Stanley moved about the crowded room in Portland Place almost unnoticed, all eyes being bent on the modest figure and bravely smiling face of the much-bored Cape Premier.

During a later visit to London in the summer of 1899 Rhodes and Kitchener saw a good deal of each other, renewing and strengthening former acquaintance. Both had in ordinary social relations a great gift of reticence. In each other's company they were voluble. A couple of years earlier they had forgathered at Cairo. An officer at whose quarters they frequently met gave me a graphic account of how they spent one night there, as he put it, 'sprawling on the floor, grabbing at Africa.' Their host was the happy possessor of one of the largest and most nearly up-to-date maps of Africa. This was spread on the floor, Kitchener and Rhodes going down on their knees and tracing their several proposed routes, Kitchener coming down from the Soudan, Rhodes advancing from the south, till, meeting, they made the way clear from Cape to Cairo. When the Sirdar captured Khartoum, one of his earliest telegraphic messages was despatched to Rhodes, with inquiry, 'How are you?'

Public interest in Cecil Rhodes, dormant since Dr Jameson 'upset his apple-cart,' revived by his sick-bed. People were glad to know that King Edward, who never forgot to do a kind thing, personally communicated by cable with the sick and wearied Titan. It was curious to note how fatalistic Rhodes's relatives were on the subject. His brother and sister were both certain he would come safely out of the wrestling-bout with death. Eight months before he was beaten in the struggle I met Colonel Rhodes at a country-house party. He was en route for Cairo, where he had tryst with his brother. They were bound for Khartoum, and Cecil intended to return to the Cape by the eastern route, touching at Zanzibar. Colonel Rhodes told me that when, early in the autumn of 1901, his brother arrived from the Cape, there were symptoms of heart-disease that gave great concern. A quiet stay in Scotland pulled him together; and when, at the end of October in that year, he set out for a leisurely journey to Egypt, he was quite a new man.

'Cecil,' Colonel Rhodes said, 'doesn't mean to die till he has completed his project of connecting Cape Town with Cairo by railway and telegraph. When he has made up his mind to do a certain thing, he generally sees it through.'

Nothing in the life of Cecil Rhodes more sharply struck the public than the provision in his will directing his entombment. The picture of the funeral procession making its way northward over the South African veld till it reached the mighty Rhodesian mountain he had selected for his mausoleum created a profound impression. An old friend and colleague of the South African magnate told me an interesting story in connection with this episode. Rhodes drew from the Bible the inspiration that found realisation in his magnificent burial-place. He was a constant reader of the Old Testament, particularly delighting in the Book of Job. He frequently, more especially when depressed by overwork or bowed down by extreme anxiety, quoted Job's lament that he had not died in infancy: 'For now should I have lien down and been quiet; I should have slept; then had I been at rest with kings and counsellors of the earth, which built up waste places for themselves.'

The varied quotation given in the margin of the Revised Version is 'built solitary piles.' This idea of the kings and counsellors of the earth lying in majestic loneliness on hill-tops fascinated Rhodes. He carried out the idea with peculiar appropriateness, taking his last sleep on a hill-top commanding far-reaching views of the vast territory he had added to the Empire.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XI.

THE more I knitted my brows over the events of the last few days, the more was I convinced of the existence of a link between the three mysterious men, the red-haired impostor in Edinburgh, the visitor to Hugh Forbes in Italy, and the prowler at The Bield. Filled with restless impatience, I must have plucked out my watch every quarter of an hour of the journey, but at long last I reached Waverley Station, and hurried to Jura Street. There I found a telegram from Keene-Leslie asking me to breakfast with him in his rooms next day.

Reaching London early next morning, I went straight to Tony's address, where I found breakfast waiting and my host absorbing the morning paper.

'What's in the wind, Neil?' he asked after greetings, as we sat down to kidneys and bacon.

I told him my story: Hugh Forbes's letter to the colonel; the visitor 'Wakeford' at Ubriano; the mysterious prowler at The Bield; the extraordinary linking up of the words 'Exultabunt Domino' in the faded paper at The Bield with 'ossa humiliata' in the one concealed in the cigarette by the man calling himself M'Nair.

'This promises well,' exclaimed Tony. 'Let me tell you that there is nobody called Wakeford who is a member of the Omnivagants' Club. When I got your telegram I went straight to the secretary of the club—an old friend of mine—and found out that there never has been one of that name a member of the club since its formation fifteen years ago. The secretary took the trouble to go through the annual lists.'

'So that the mission to Hugh Forbes in Italy was of such a character that the emissary used a false name.'

'Palpably. Of course, that in itself does not label him a criminal; but putting the story together, it looks to me as though Mr "Wakeford" is on the track of the paper, and wants it badly. . . . The Leopard's Eye! It may be a jewel, but we won't jump to conclusions.'

He went to a desk, and from a pigeon-hole took out a neat bundle of documents, untied it, and selected two papers.

'This will interest you, Neil,' he said, as he opened one of them. 'It is from Scotland Yard, short and to the point. It tells me that the finger-print taken from your shirt-front is not one on the books—that is, the Habitual Criminals Register of New Scotland Yard. There they have a little collection of over two hundred and fifty thousand prints, and a system of classification as nearly perfect as can be imagined. You may take it that the owner of the fingers is not a known criminal. As for "The Searchers," the name may be a blind. If any such organisation exists, I don't see why it should advertise its movements by chalking up its name when out on the prowl, unless by this it hopes to terrorise the colonel.'

He took up the other paper.

'Here is a memorandum regarding the secret societies known to the authorities. There is no end to them. They are nearly all of Continental origin. The record ranges from full-blooded, stick-at-nothing Anarchists to mutual-aid-to-thieving clubs. They have all sorts of names, some high-sounding, some fantastic, others merely grotesque, from "The Brothers of the Violet Crown" to "The Spotted Kangaroos." Some are semi-political. All reek with rascality. Most of them are under surveillance, and know it.'

He ran his eye down the list. 'So far as I can tell, "The Searchers" (assuming that I Frugatori stands for that) are unknown, at least under that name. But I'll get into communication with my Scotland Yard friend, and fix up a meeting with him. You have six hours before the boat-train starts.'

He went to the phone, and in a few minutes came back to tell me that a meeting had been arranged for eleven o'clock. In the interval I gave him the facts again carefully and exhaustively, while he took notes and familiarised himself with the whole story. At the end of an hour his grasp of the details astonished me.

At 'The Yard' I was introduced to a little, mild-looking gentleman wearing gold-rimmed spectacles, who might have passed for the secretary of a charitable institution. He greeted Tony as an old friend, and heard all we had to say, taking notes, and now and then putting a question.

'A curious story,' he said. 'There is a gang—some of them Italian—in whom we are much interested. We suspect them—inter alia—of forgery of Italian bank-notes. They are the same—at least, I think so—as the lot who engineered the Linovada Syndicate and the Plymouth Mail robbery.'

'A clever business!' said Keene-Leslie.

'Undoubtedly their leaders are men of brains, and they have command of money. But although they have a catholic taste in crime, I scarcely think that they are in this search for a document.'

'What about the Leopard's Eye?'

'It sounds like a jewel, but I never heard of it. However, queer things happen, and I am in hopes that we may round up this gang one of these days. We have no direct evidence, but I may tell you that a suspected house near London is being watched.'

'London?' said I. 'That doesn't look as if they were interested in an out-of-the-way Italian village.'

'From what I know of the gang we are after, they would hasten to Patagonia if they could bring off a coup. By the way, Mr Forbes, are you going alone to Italy?'

'That is my intention.'

He gave a glance at Tony.

'You may be in danger. If "The Searchers" and the gang are one and the same, they will stick at nothing. In any event, Mr "Wakeford" may still be on the alert. I will give you an introduction to the Chief of Police at Naples. You may require it.' He wrote a few words on the back of a card and handed it to me.

The rest of the interview concerned details for his notes, and soon Tony and I were out in the drizzle in Westminster.

We had not gone more than a dozen yards when he said, 'You are not going to Italy alone, Neil. I'm going with you. What say you?'

'I should like it above all things. But are you free?'

'More free than I'll be for months. As a matter of fact, I thought of going North for some fishing, but in this climate'—he pointed to the sodden streets—'the idea of Italy appeals to me. Why not? I'll pack in a trice, have some lunch, and then "see Naples and live!"'

The prospect of his help and company delighted me. We lunched together, Tony talking as gaily as a schoolboy on the first day of the holidays; and an hour afterwards we boarded the boat-train.

Dull and dispiriting weather all the way from Charing Cross, a rough Channel passage, and an icy wind made the warmth of the railway-carriage at Boulogne most welcome.

Paris left behind, the journey was drab enough—monotonous regiments of poplars, characterless country, and sluggish streams. Now and again we roared through busy towns, the green of their jalousies relieving the predominant gray. The blue Lake of Bourget, speckled with white sails in the afternoon sun, heralded our approach to Italy. Then night absorbed colour and form again as we climbed the Alps towards the frontier.

Past Mont Cenis we slid down into Italy in a setting of tumbling streams, hill farms, and red-tiled campaniles, to the dull and fertile Plain of Lombardy. The bright Ligurian coast was a relief to the eye; and after a night of roaring tunnels and asphyxiating smoke came Leghorn, and with it, in a miraculously clear morning, came my first view of the real Italy—sea and sky of deep sapphire; the delicate lines and colouring of the fishing-towns; the Maremma with its lovely desolation, in its robes of cyclamen, narcissus, and tall asphodel, its only signs of life the skin-clad shepherds with their giant white pecorajo dogs at their heels, watching herds of goats and sheep cropping lentisk and cytisus. Then the old Laurentian forest, lair of wild-boar and buffalo, led us into the brooding melancholy of the Roman Campagna. Here were ruined villa and temple, and many an ancient tower, and in the distance, floating in mid-air like a gigantic bubble, the great dome of St Peter's. These left behind, the dark, wolf-haunted mountains of the Abruzzi accompanied us to Naples.

The train service in Italy is as good as in this country; but, to our annoyance, we found that there had been some dislocation on the line, and it was past midnight when we got to Castellamare di Stabia. Chafing at the delay, we hurried to the Piazza, and having chartered a trap, took our seats behind a handsome cetturino, who was clad point-device in smart brown boots and English-looking clothes. I had often heard of the excellence and the speed of Italian horses, but the only notable features of our beast were its picturesque nodding crest of plumes, and its neck-chain of blue beads to ward off the evil eye. Whether the driver could not or would not hurry I cannot tell, but, to my disgust, the trap rumbled along tediously, the Rosinante in the shafts apparently half-asleep, except when she suspected the slightest ascent in the road. These she picked out with the uncanny precision of a spirit-level, and crawled up them at a snail's pace.

The road climbed, and dipped, and climbed again, winding through the gray-green of ancient olive-groves, beyond them a vignette of hills, faint in the half-light of the morning. Had I been travelling for pleasure I could have enjoyed every yard of the road—the sleeping rose-coloured villages, the fields of poppies and bright-eyed flowers, the delicate green of the terraced vineyards, green and silver olives, the ripening early figs, orange-groves, and the torches of the chestnuts. The atmosphere was of perpetual spring, a faint shimmer in the air deepening into purple on the distant mountains, and below us a sea of darkest blue.

But in my impatient mood the sound of the leisurely hoof-beats ticking off the precious seconds was nothing short of maddening. I knew no Italian beyond a few words, and to my 'Avanti! avanti!' the driver's invariable answer was a placid 'Benissimo!' and an illusory flourish of his whip, accompanied by a disarming smile and a glimpse of white teeth. Inwardly I was fuming, and wondering for the thousandth time if I should be in time to see my uncle Hugh alive. However, there was nothing for it but to cultivate patience.

Soon the rim of the hills became tinged with a faint radiance; on the soft morning air came subtle aromatic scents from the woods. The sun awoke and cut a burnished track on the sea. It struck the olive-groves, searching out the trees and the roofs of the houses and claiming them from the shadows; strode up the hills, disengaging their tranquil details from the vague distances; and steadily mounting over the fairest sea in the world, unveiled the blue-black splendour of the sky.

'Guardate, signore! Come è carino! Una bellezza!' said the driver as we rounded a bend on the crest of the ascent, and on the breast of the slope towards the sea we saw, close at hand, a white campanile, and a cluster of houses sleeping around its base.

(Continued on page 168.)

GOLD.

By R. MORDAUNT.

GOLD is the standard of currency almost all over the world. The first English monarch to issue gold coins was Henry III., who in 1257 coined a penny of fine gold and ordered it to be current for twenty pence; though the real consecutive English gold coinage commenced in the year 1347, when Edward III. was king.

The name sovereign was first given to a gold coin issued by Henry VIII. about 1500. It remained in circulation until the reign of Charles II., when it was superseded by the guinea. From that date, 1660, the coin varied until 1817, when the sovereign was finally decided upon. On the obverse side it bore the head of George III., and on the reverse a representation of St George and the Dragon, which, parenthetically, was engraved by an Italian, Signor Istrucci. Parliament fixed the standard and the value, but the statute was repealed, though in substance re-enacted, by the Coinage Act of 1870, which is law to-day, and forms the basis of our monometallic system of currency.

The yellow metal, as gold is termed, is found in both reef and alluvium, principally the former. Not much is obtained in England; there are a few small mines in North Wales. The largest and richest gold-mines are in Africa, in the Transvaal—the Rand Mines. Australia possesses valuable gold-mines, as also do Canada and India. Russia is one of the oldest gold-yielding countries in the world. Mexico produces gold; and the metal is won in smaller quantities in other countries. Madagascar, under the French, has exported gold for many years. Germany does not possess any gold-mines, nor have any ever been discovered in her colonies.

The British Empire produces more gold than any other country in the world. In 1917 we obtained from our mines in different parts of the world 13,324,759 ounces, value £56,498,873, out of the total world's production of 20,756,384 ounces, value £88,083,123. So that our contribution was about 64 per cent. of the world's supply.

In its natural state, gold is nearly always found associated with other metals, such as silver, lead, copper, &c.; hence the process of extraction is a complex business. The general method of winning gold from free-milling ore consists of crushing the ore in stamp-batteries to the required degree of fineness, and passing the pulverised ore over copper plates covered with mercury. The gold, 'freed' by crushing, is caught and amalgamates with the mercury, whilst the uncaught particles of gold and the pulp pass over the plates into V-shaped launders, whence they are conveyed to machines and undergo separation or concentration preparatory to further treatment, or are treated direct by what is called the cyanide process. The gold and quicksilver remaining on the plates is called 'amalgam.' This is collected and subjected to great heat, when the mercury vaporises and escapes into a condenser, and the gold is left behind in lumps. It is then melted down and cast into bars, ready for use.

It may seem that gold is hardly topical at the moment. But it is. The war's influence on prices has affected the gold-mining industry throughout the world to such an extent that gold ore, payable to mine in pre-war days, has now become unprofitable to treat. Some little time ago, representatives of the world's gold-producing countries formed a committee to make representations to the Government on the matter. While the standard price of gold has remained stationary at four pounds five shillings per fine ounce, everything connected with the winning and working of gold has increased in cost—plant, machinery, tools, stores, wages, &c. With the mining of all other metals, an increase in the price of the metals themselves has met the enhanced working costs. But not so in the case of gold. There has been no compensating influence in the way of an increased price paid for the metal to set off against the great increase in the cost of its production.

It has been said that during the war the only thing in the world that has not increased in price is gold.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer appointed a committee to inquire into the matter. It consisted of well-known men; and after an exhaustive inquiry, in which the Empire's most expert authorities on currency, finance, and gold-mining put forward opinions, it was decided that nothing could be done to aid the industry, as that would tend to produce an increase in the price of all other commodities. The Gold Committee asked for aid by way of a subsidy or a bonus on production, more especially to low-grade mines. In the Transvaal there are many large properties working at as low as threepence per ton profit. Some are merely paying expenses, and it is a well-known fact that they have been kept working for patriotic reasons. It is the same with many Australian mines. The decision of the Treasury Committee not to advise the Government to help low-grade mines and offer some encouragement to the industry may have a serious influence on the Empire's production of gold. Indeed, the result of the inquiry is sufficiently disappointing to create the possibility of further negotiations; and more may be heard of what is now known as 'The Gold Question.'

LADY HELEN'S NEURALGIA.

PART II.

MONA was shown into a large room next door, of which hers was the dressing-room. In the bed, sitting up eagerly, with her fair hair falling over the lace and ribbons of her night-dress, and her slender bare arms showing white against the pink silken quilt, was a very young girl, her timid blue eyes fixed on the door. When she saw Mona, wrapped in a white-silk dressing-gown, and smiling at the adventure of her reception, the girl's face lost its look of anxiety, and she gave a cry of delight.

'Oh, you're nice!' she said. 'You're lovely—and quite young!'

'Well, I'm not so young as you are,' Mona said, laughing.

The girl wrinkled her forehead, like a perplexed baby. She looked very small in the big carved bed in the big room, and she was blue and white and gold, like a piece of Dresden china, and almost of transparent fairness.

'No—I'm far too young, am I not? And every one else is so—— Go away, Thomson. We sha'n't require you.'

The elderly maid seemed unwilling.

'Go away!' said the girl. 'I'll ring.'

She waited till the door was closed.

'That's right,' she said, settling back on the pillows. 'You needn't begin at once, need you? I should like to talk.'

'What about?' asked Mona. 'But, first, Lady

Helen, please tell me the name of my hostess. It seems absurd; but the fact is, no one has told me.'

'Oh! Do you mean my aunt? She is Mrs Chowton.'

It conveyed nothing to Mona, so she said nothing.

'I never expected you to look like that,' the girl said. 'What a pretty dressing-gown! Mine are all so ugly.'

'What did you expect me to look like?' Mona asked. 'Very fierce and strong-minded?'

'Well, it is strong-minded to have a profession, isn't it?—I mean, as you're a lady. I didn't expect you to be a lady.'

Mona laughed outright. 'So that explains it,' she murmured.

'Are you married?'

'No!'

'Are you going to be married?'

'No!'

'Well'—Lady Helen folded her hands—'I am.' Her big blue eyes filled with tears.

Mona became serious.

'Oh, you poor little thing!' she cried involuntarily.

'And—I'm not exactly sure to whom,' Lady Helen added.

Mona's face changed. She laughed. 'That's awkward!' she admitted.

Lady Helen turned her blue eyes on Mona reproachfully.

'Don't laugh at me, Miss—— By-the-by, what is your name?'

'Ralston.'

'Miss Ralston. You look so nice, and I like to talk to you. You see, going about as you do, you must know a good deal. You must hear so much gossip! Do you rub many people?'

'What?'

'Have you many patients, I mean?' Lady Helen asked politely.

'I have no patients—I don't understand you,' Mona cried, bewildered.

Lady Helen raised herself on her elbow. 'You are a masseuse, aren't you?'

'No!'

'Then who are you?'

'I am Miss Ralston. My father is Sir Henry Ralston, the Member for Brompton.'

'And why are you here?'

'To address to-morrow's meeting, I understand,' Mona answered with dignity.

Lady Helen stared at her for two minutes without speaking; then she sank back into the pillows and laughed till she cried. Mona maintained her dignity for a few moments, and then she began to laugh too.

'They've mistaken you for the masseuse! I asked for one. I said I had neuralgia,' gasped the girl.

'But—was the car not sent for me?'

'No—for—for a visitor—and the masseuse!'

'But—was I not expected here?'

'No! Never heard of you—or of the meeting!'

Mona thought furiously for a minute. 'Then—where have I gone? I mean, where has the masseuse gone?'

'Why, don't you see? She must have gone where you were expected. Where was that?'

'I don't know. They said hospitality was arranged for—by the president. I expected some one would meet me. I got into the car.'

'Delicious!' cried Lady Helen.

'It is not delicious at all. I must go.'

'You can't. I'm just beginning to love you. I want a friend.'

'But what is the masseuse doing—at the president's, whoever she is?—Oh! that must have been her! I saw a girl with a bag at the station, and she got into a little open car—it must have been sent for me! Oh, this explains everything! I thought your aunt—Mrs Chowton—rather—not very'——

'No, she wouldn't be.' Her niece nodded comprehendingly. 'Now, sit down. You can't possibly go to-night. And I'm in such trouble. You may be the means of averting a tragedy, if you'll just sit down and listen. I suppose, as you speak on platforms, you are a Suffragist, and strong-minded, and have views, and that kind of thing?'

'Yes,' said Mona vaguely. 'But I must go, Lady Helen—and my things are all unpacked'——

'Then what, I ask you, is the use of all your views if you won't help a fellow-woman? Sit down!'

Mona's troubled eyes turned to her.

'Do you approve of marrying without love?' added Lady Helen.

'Certainly not!—at least'——

'But you do approve of marriage?'

'Of course!—at least'——

'Yes, that is how I feel. So I will marry the other.'

'I'm afraid I don't understand.'

'Ah! if I had a mother, she would understand. She died when I was six. I can hardly remember her.'

'And your aunt has brought you up?'

'Very badly. She doesn't love me a bit. All of this belongs to me'—the girl waved her hand round—'and I hate it all, because it has prevented any one loving me. At least'——

'Well?' Mona was deeply interested.

'Well'—the girl half-turned her head away, and pleated the lace of the pillow idly with her hand—'some one does; but my having all this was what prevented him from asking me. So I thought he didn't care, and I was angry and miserable, and I said I'd marry the man downstairs.'

'The man downstairs?' Mona's eyes opened wide.

'Yes. He is my cousin—at least, we call him so; but he is only my aunt's nephew. Oh, I don't mind him. He's very kind to me. But he's forty, and I'm not one-and-twenty till next month. Aunt wants me to, because it would keep the property in the family. She said he would probably ask me to-night, so I pretended to be ill, and sent for you.'

Mona waived aside superfluous details.

'Do you mean Major Stanhope?' she asked.

The girl turned her averted face, and looked at her.

'Yes. How did you know his name?'

'Of course I know his name! He is the candidate. He is speaking to-morrow.'

'Oh, is he? Then he made this visit to me to suit his professional engagements! That is how it would always be. His horrid old politics first, and me second!'

'But, Lady Helen, he—he is very high-minded—very clever. Do you quite realise'——

'How do you know?'

'I drove from the station with him.'

'Oh!'

There was a pause. The two girls looked at one another. They were both rather flushed.

Far away somewhere below, a gong sounded.

Mona sprang up. 'Is that dinner? And I'm not even dressed!'

Lady Helen looked troubled; then she gave a nervous little laugh.

'My aunt doesn't expect you,' she said. 'I'd better be truthful. You see, you're the masseuse.'

'But, you see, I'm not.' Mona got up with a smile, but she wore what her father called her grande dame air. 'I shall have to send down and explain to your aunt, and apologise for having'——

'Nothing of the kind! I know my aunt. She'll be rude to you. And I'm mistress of this house; at least, I shall be when I'm one-and-twenty, and that is next month. And—and I've had a letter—from the other one. He has come into an inheritance—he—I think I'll wait before giving Major Stanhope his answer; though, by-the-by, he hasn't asked me for one. I must wait. What would you advise?'

'I think, Lady Helen, since you consult me, that you are treating Major Stanhope very badly.'

'Oh!'

'I am perfectly certain he is not the sort of man who would want to marry you against your will.'

'Of course you came here to speak for him,' Lady Helen said reflectively.

Mona stopped abruptly, and regarded her.

'And I thought you came to rub me. I don't want to treat him badly,' she added; 'but he won't care! He thinks he is doing it for my sake. I know aunt has made him think that. She has pointed out that I'm rather pitiful and alone, and need to be taken care of, and he doesn't mind undertaking the charge because—well, you see, there are compensations. Politics is an expensive profession.'

'That is a horrid insinuation!' Mona cried, her big amber eyes flashing. 'You are accusing him of marrying for money.'

'Well! he can't see anything else in me—how lovely you look when you're angry!—he, so clever and brilliant, as you say, and I've never been educated! You should have seen my governesses! He has known me always, and thinks of me as a child. I rather bore him. He has never once said he cared for me. He is absorbed in politics. I don't suppose he even knows whether I'm pretty or plain.' She stopped, and looked at Mona.

Suddenly Mona remembered the moment when the candidate and she stepped from the darkness into the lighted hall downstairs, and his changed expression as he turned and saw her. She blushed vividly under Lady Helen's questioning eyes.

'I don't think I like Major Stanhope,' she said, 'if what you say is true. He cannot be a man of high principles. But perhaps you are mistaken in thinking he—he is a party to your aunt's designs?'

'Very likely,' said the girl indifferently. 'But, in any case, my aunt will carry them out. The fact is, I'm afraid of her. There! She has dominated me all my life. I know if I go downstairs I'll accept him, whether he proposes to me or not. And Charlie'——

'Charlie?'

'Yes, I told you—Charlie Foster'——

'Charlie Foster! Captain Foster of the —th Hussars?'

'Yes.'

'He is my cousin!'

'Your cousin! Are you Mona? Oh, he's often told me about you! No wonder I loved you at sight!'

All at once Mona remembered Charlie's half-made confession in the taxi, and what had been her interpretation of it. Again she flushed vividly, and again it was under Lady Helen's questioning eyes. The younger girl's expression changed. She put out a tremulous hand, and touched Mona's.

'You are very lovely, dear,' she said slowly. 'Beside you, I am like a snowdrop by a rose!'

Mona took the little hand in her firm grasp. 'Charlie told me about you,' she said. 'He is breaking his heart for love of you! I will help you'——

There was a knock at the door, which neither of them heeded, and the elderly maid entered the room. 'Please, your ladyship, your dinner'—— she began.

'Miss Ralston will dine with me, up here. Send two trays,' Lady Helen said quickly. 'Her rubbing has done my neuralgia ever so much good,' she added, looking triumphantly at Mona.

It was eleven o'clock when Mona Ralston returned to her own room, where the fire was almost out, and the green chiffon dress still lay spread on the bed. She was committed to a plot that was of her own making, but she was by no means clear as to her motives, save that they were mixed.

'I hate that aunt—and little Helen is a darling; but she isn't fit to manage her own life. Then there 's Charlie—poor boy!—and—and I don't think Major Stanhope can know—and I wonder what he thought of my non-appearance to-night, and what he 'll think of my speech to-morrow!'

(Continued on page 172.)

ASIA'S MOST FAMOUS TREASURE-HOARD.

THERE are very few stories about hoards of hidden treasure that do not stir the imagination, and the recital of them has sometimes led to exciting and perilous adventures in search of the concealed wealth. There is one such story that has always held the imagination of almost all Asia in thrall. From Yokohama to far-off Khiva, from Bokhara and Samarcand to Basrah, from Urga in north Mongolia to Bangalore in southern India, the tradition of this cache of the kings of an empire of long ago still inflames the imagination of the story-tellers and their listeners in the towns of Asia. That there is some truth in this six-hundred-years-old tradition has recently been established by facts, as will be told later.

When we take into consideration the gold, silver, and jewels lying in the graves of kings and emperors long dead, the valuables concealed in the ruins of the cities of central Asia buried under the white desert sand, where but five hundred years ago all was green and life went on busily, and the treasure left in forgotten mountain temples, central and southern Asia may be said to be the tomb of lost millions.

The greatest and most famous of these reputed treasure-hoards is that buried in the tombs of the great khans or emperors of the Mongols—that formidable military race which poured out of middle Asia early in the thirteenth century, and ravaged eastern and central Europe from Dantzic, on the Baltic, to the Adriatic. Now, during the past few years many large precious stones, including turquoises from the Syr Daria—one of central Asia's great rivers, where turquoises were obtained for the Court of the khans—together with thirteenth and fourteenth century Asiatic ornaments, rare jewellery, and pieces of Tatar-worked gold, have been coming out of the state of Nepaul into Indian bazaars, without any adequate explanation as to their source.

Some years ago a few similar articles of ancient Asiatic workmanship and a quantity of rubies and other precious stones were sold in Bokhara by two men of Yarkand, and passed ultimately into the collection of the Tsar of Russia. In each instance the goldwork and the precious stones came from the long-lost tombs of the once mighty khans of the Mongols, for the two men of Yarkand had chanced on the place of sepulchre and treasure.

The story they related, as vouched for by Russian authorities in Bokhara, reads like a chapter out of the Arabian Nights' Entertainment. The two men belonged to a caravan trading between Yarkand and the towns that fringe the great desert of salt and sand that forms part of eastern Turkestan. They soon quarrelled with the headsman, however, and set out on their return to their native place—Yarkand.

On the fourth morning they lost the track among the defiles of the mountains, and after wandering for two days they happened on a trail that was hewn out of the solid rock, and was only wide enough for two men to pass abreast. After travelling for some time along this deep and gloomy defile, they found it led them into a little, rocky, arid valley. Here they saw a number of huge images in a row before a heavily sculptured doorway. Beyond the square open portal lay a cavern, in which was a series of tombs, each filled with many objects of immense value. They averred that they saw of precious stones alone more than sixty camels could carry. It is interesting to note here that medieval Chinese historians and travellers, when touching on the burial of the great khans, mention the enormous wealth of gold and silver and jewels utilised to adorn the tombs.

The two traders brought off as much treasure as they could carry, but had to throw practically all of it away in the effort to save their lives before they found succour and regained the caravan route to Yarkand. They made careful observation of the trail, however, and left heaps of stones to mark it. On reaching their native town, they resolved to sell the few remaining articles in Bokhara, where a higher price was obtainable than in their native town, and after a few days proceeded to that city by way of Kashgar and Khodjend, taking advantage, for safety's sake, of a caravan going thither. Here, in Bokhara, that most picturesque town of central Asia, they came in contact, when in the bazaar, with an adventurous Englishman, H. Spaulding, who for some years had been engaged in exploration in Ferghana and Turkestan.

Spaulding, who at once recognised that the goldwork they were selling was of ancient Tatar origin, won their confidence, and to him the two men related their tale. It appealed to him with invincible force, and he had little trouble in organising an expedition, though the two men were with difficulty persuaded to return with him. By this time the rumour had run through Bokhara that the treasures of the Mongols, about which all central Asia had been dreaming for centuries, had been discovered, and Spaulding fully realised that his expedition was in danger of being attacked on its way back. Despite this knowledge, however, he determined to proceed.

It is known that the route he took was one of the old and now wholly unused caravan trails between China and western Asia. The tombs of the great khans, five in number, are said by the Russian authorities who interviewed the two traders to lie north-east of the Kashmir border, on the way to Khotan from Yarkand. Whether Spaulding reached them we do not yet know. It is believed that he and his men died in or hard by the desert. In the bazaars of Samarcand and Kashgar it was whispered that he had penetrated to the tombs, secured part of the treasure, and had been murdered with his men on the verge of the desert, the murderers making for refuge in Nepaul.

Certain it is that since Spaulding's disappearance the jewels and the goldwork of the Mongols have found their way into India out of Nepaul.

And so this quest for the Mongols' treasures ended in both success and failure.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER X.—MAKING UP WITH ADELA.

ADELA'S last letter certainly made me feel a silly ass. Somehow, it upset my usual happy trend of thought. I couldn't work, and my soul was torn with conflicting emotions. One moment I hated her; the next I loved her. Then the Devil would whisper in my ear, 'What has she got to do with it, John Brown? Sow your wild oats. Have your fun. Everybody 's doin' it.'

Privately speaking, Adela was right; but this righteousness annoyed me. She wasn't my sister or my mater, and yet she was giving me fits for having a bit of fun. Still, Adela was sweet. She had a way with her. The attraction was both physical and spiritual. She had that sort of healthy figure which makes a student of eugenics stop in the street and mutter, 'Here 's the model girl!' Adela was also a ripping hockey-player, and one of the best at tennis. When men saw her knocking about with a racquet she seemed irresistible. They wanted to know her—wanted to kiss her. And she liked a bit of fun; but she wasn't a fool. A girl who can live in a country parish without getting a sticky label on her name must be rather decent.

Somehow, she balanced my emotions. After indulging in sloppy things for a time, she would say, 'Come on, John; don't be decadent. Let 's talk.' Then we separated our chairs, smoked cigarettes, and chatted away about Kipling, Galsworthy, Hardy, Byron, and Shelley. Adela could talk. In the country she had found time to think. Her observations were so very shrewd and sane that I often said to myself, 'This girl would make a topping wife and mother.' I pictured her with rosy-cheeked kiddies playing in a garden. You needn't say that was silly. The best people do it.

And yet she had dropped me (pro tem.) for those Australians.

However, affection will out. I wanted to see Adela again; and Beefy wanted to see her sister. You see, Beefy was a little bored kissing barmaids, and longed for something more congenial. As a matter of fact, Beefy was commencing to think. This was a revolution.

'Come on, John. Jump on. We 'll go and see somebody decent to-day,' he said.

Away we went, and in twenty minutes Adela and I were alone in the lovely conservatory overlooking a beautiful country-side. And didn't Adela look well! She had such a nice short skirt which showed her dainty ankles. But it was in her face and eyes I found rest and consolation.

Adela was clean.

'Have a smoke, John. They 're State Express,' she said, pushing the box over. 'And here 's a cup of white coffee.' This tempting beverage was served in a charming cup. As she passed it I touched her hand—accidentally, of course. I was thrilled. 'Now, Johnnie,' she said very quietly, 'let 's have this thing out. I hate being bad friends, and I don't like to hear my pals being discussed by cooks and kitchen-maids.'

'You 're jealous,' I said maliciously.

'I 'm jealous for your uniform, not for you. My brother has the D.S.O., and he wouldn't make an ass of himself—least of all in a local hotel. You haven't learnt wisdom, old boy.'

'Well, you 're to blame. Why did you toddle off with those Australians?'

'What a babe you are! You and Beefy must have a weak kink. Can't we see other people? And don't you think you 're just a little presumptuous?'

'Perhaps. But I didn't break any commandments, I can assure you.'

'You don't need to break a commandment to be a fool. People don't judge by the great things. They sum you up from little things. When they find cadets hobnobbing with barmaids, and fooling around with chorus-girls, they think and talk a lot.'

'Oh, be a sport, for Heaven's sake! One would think you were at a Dorcas society,' I said, getting rattled.

'Very well, Johnnie, if you're going to be rude, and not man enough to face things out, you can go. Men may be scarce, but girls at least have a sense of decency and pride.'

'Awfully sorry, old girl. Really, I didn't mean to be nasty. But, you know, you are making a song about it. I'm really sorry, or I shouldn't be here. I've been dying to come all the time. I vowed I would never see you again. But here I am. It's all you!'

She smiled. She was a woman, after all. (Between you and me, Adela was a bit soft on your humble.)

'You'll never do it again, will you?'

'Never—honest Injun!'

'Very well, you're pardoned. And here's a kiss.'

'You're a sport, Adela. But what about those other fellows?'

'The Australians?'

'Yes.'

'They're very nice people. When they want to come here, they can do so. It isn't for you to decide. Cheeky boy!'

'Then you can't be my special charmer.'

'Who wants to be? Do you imagine we girls are going to allow you to label us "Special" or "One of the Crowd"? Johnnie, you're the limit!'

'That's my ultimatum!'

'You're a silly kid. If you met those two Australians, you would be charmed. We have got to give hospitality to our relatives.'

'Oh, then, they're related?'

'Yes—very old friends of the family.'

'That makes a difference, Adela.'

'Still, they're interesting, although they're relatives. I'm just longing to see them again. You may come, too, and guard me if you like.'

'I won't!'

'Oh!'

'Do you think, Adela, I'm going to play second fiddle to your bush-whacking cousins? Not at all! There's always the barmaid for me.'

'Really, I despair of you. You're as narrow as can be. But I'm going to be loyal to my friends.'

'All right, Adela; I'm off,' I said, getting up in a theatrical way. I didn't really mean to go. I wanted to test her. But I was so amazed at her cool acceptance of my dramatic exit that I repeated, 'Adela, I'm off,' and went to the door.

She followed me out, quietly helped me on with my coat, and, just as I picked up my hat, she burst out laughing.

'What are you laughing at?'

'You—you silly boy.'

'Oh!'

'If I showed you the photo of the Australians, the joke would be apparent.'

'Well, show it to me,' I said, rejoiced at finding any excuse to stay.

'Very well. Off with your coat!'

I took it off.

'Now, come in here;' and she led the way to the drawing-room. We stepped across to the mantelpiece, and she lifted a photo. 'There's the two Australians,' she said, with a grin.

I looked at the photo of two beautiful Australian girls in nursing-uniform, and muttered, 'By Jove, what charming girls!'

'Are you satisfied now, old King Jealousy?'

'Yes; but why didn't you tell me when you wrote the letter?'

'Why?'

'Yes.'

'For a very womanly reason.'

'What is it?' I ejaculated, a little annoyed.

'These girls are so handsome, I couldn't afford to take risks. Don't you know that old music-hall song?'

'What?'

'"Never Introduce your Donah to a Pal."'

'Oh, that's it, is it? You were afraid of their collaring Beefy and me.'

'Yes, old boy; I'm like you—jealous.'

'You needn't have worried, Adela I really like you.'

'Do you, Johnnie?' she eagerly exclaimed.

'Yes,' I answered.

As her head got mixed up with my khaki sleeves I heard her muttering, 'Don't be a silly ass again—John Brown.'

(Continued on page 176.)

TANK B 2 4 1 1.

By JACK SPUR.

I.

HIS commission bore the name of Henry Alfred Grafton, but to his brother-officers in the 'Tanks' he was always 'The Count.'

He earned his nickname this way. He had come to us from the Rifle Brigade, and in appearance was a big-boned, typical-looking Englishman. We took to him all right, though we never felt that we knew him in the same way as we knew our other fellow-subs. For one thing, he was no good at games. Then he was a teetotaler, and, worst of all, a glutton for work. Of course, some of us had to work, and, if he preferred it, it was no business of ours.

Soon after Grafton joined us Charlie Sommers came back from leave, and he and I went down to the mess together. Grafton was standing in the anteroom when Sommers and I entered.

'You haven't met Grafton, Charlie,' I said. 'Let me introduce you.'

The two looked at each other; then Sommers gave a hearty laugh.

'Grafton, did you say? Why, this is "Graf," an old school chum of mine.—How do, Graf? I didn't even know you'd joined up;' and he shook hands warmly with our latest sub.

I thought Grafton changed colour on seeing Sommers, and he gave my friend a meaning look. Anyway, Sommers said no more. Several of us had heard his remark, and asked him about Grafton, but he gave us no information.

Afterwards, however, it came out that Grafton's name had been Grafenstein, and that his father, a naturalised German, on the outbreak of war had changed his name to Grafton.

Grafton and Sommers had been chums at school, and they remained so in the service, but the rest of us held aloof. Sommers used to call him Graf, and as Graf is German for 'count,' as subs. will, we christened him 'The Count.'

He took it all in good part, and when he was chaffed about his German descent, took no offence, and expressed no feeling one way or the other. Grafton went over in the same big draft that Sommers and I went in, and we settled down to our work together. We were sitting in our quarters one night, just before the big push at St Quentin, when Grafton's name was mentioned, and one or two of the fellows began discussing him.

'It's a bally silly idea,' said young Travers, 'giving a fellow like him the command of a tank. Once a German, always a German! He'll hop over to his pals one of these fine days and make them a present of a nice new landship. Then, when they've cottoned to the idea and improved on it, we shall be boosted out by an army of Boche tanks.'

'Rot!' replied Sommers. 'You're talking through your hat, my boy. I've known old Graf for years, and I'll bet you a pony he's all right.'

'Don't tell me,' persisted Travers. 'Why, the very fact of his changing his name gives him away. I'll bet, if he gets a chance, he'll'—— and then he paused, for the object of our conversation stepped into the room. He couldn't have helped overhearing what we were saying, for none of us was exactly whispering. He stepped up to Travers, whom he looked squarely in the face.

'He'll what?' he asked.

Travers looked foolish for a moment, then with an obstinate set of the jaws replied, 'I contend that a man with German blood in him, when in a corner, can't be trusted to play the game. He will remember that he is of the nation, his old sympathies will revive, and he'll be more likely to stand by the country of his descent than by that of his adoption.'

'The Count,' as he generally did, listened quite calmly.

'Travers,' he replied, 'suppose your father, disgusted with England, had left it when quite a young man, had gone to Germany, settled, married, and become naturalised there. Suppose you, as the son, had been educated there, imbibed German ideals, played German games, read German literature, and become convinced of the purity of German foreign policy. Suppose, also, that you had only occasionally visited England, and spoke the language imperfectly—I ask you, would your sympathies be with England or with Germany in this struggle?'

'With England, emphatically!'

'But suppose, further, that you hoped some day to—er—marry a lady belonging to the land of your adoption?'

'My dear chap, if my father had emigrated to Timbuctoo, and I had been born in the Brazils, of a Tartar mother, I should remain English to my finger-tips!'

The Count smiled. 'Well, after all,' he said, 'England is not Germany. You may be right.' And he disappeared through the door.

Sommers turned angrily upon Travers. 'I say,' he growled, 'it's an infernal shame to bait old Graf so. He's a white man all through; that I'm sure of.'

'We shall see,' retorted Travers; and so the matter dropped.

II.

In the push that followed the tanks played a very important part, and much of the initial success was due to them. The Germans cut down the carriages of field-guns to get a low trajectory against the tanks; but even when they made their surprise counter-attack upon us, though they knocked a good many tanks out, we flattered ourselves that they could not capture one intact, and therefore wouldn't have our model to serve them as a pattern to manufacture from. That idea was, however, rudely dispelled a few days later. Things had gone pretty badly with us, and tanks, instead of heading an advance, had now to protect a retreat.

An ugly rumour began to circulate. One of our tanks, getting into a warm corner, had pulled up; then for some reason or other it had gone straight on, right into a whole battalion of the enemy, and had disappeared without firing a shot. The number of the tank was B 2411, and it was the one of which Grafton was in command. The rumour gave rise to a considerable amount of heated comment; but, like everything else in war-time, the subject was soon dropped and forgotten. Nor should we have thought any more about it if it hadn't been for a curious accident.

On the evening that we recaptured Bapaume, Sommers and one or two more of us were standing talking amidst the ruins, when suddenly, from nowhere, as it seemed, a crump came hurtling over us. We heard the whir-r-r, and threw ourselves on the ground before the crash came. A mighty rush of air swept by us, and then we looked up cautiously and felt ourselves to see if any of us were a corner short. No; we were all right, except——

'Hallo!' cried Sommers; 'where's Henderson?'

We looked round. Poor Willie Henderson! He had completely disappeared. Not a vestige of him, not a badge, not a button remained; and we looked at each other with solemn faces, the same thought in all our minds.

He had been blown to pieces!

No sooner were we convinced of the fact, and had got upon our feet again, than a hollow voice was heard saying, 'I say, you fellows, can't some of you help me out of this confounded hole?'

We all jumped. The voice was undoubtedly Henderson's, and it seemed to come from under our very feet. Sommers solved the mystery. He looked round, and saw a smashed wooden trap that opened into a cellar beneath the house in front of which we were standing. It was clear Henderson had been blown, or had fallen, through.

In a few minutes we had procured a light, descended, and found our friend, bruised, but otherwise unhurt. The rush of air caused by the crump had blown him down into the cellar. We were helping him out, when a groan from one corner of the cellar drew our attention.

'Hallo! there's another fellow here!' said Sommers. 'Perhaps it's a Boche.'

A search showed us a figure huddled up in a corner, and in five minutes we had him out too. Getting him into the daylight, we saw he wore the remnants of a khaki uniform, and that he had a sergeant's stripes.

'And, look, he's one of ours!' said Henderson, pointing to the tank badge on his arm; 'and it's—yes—no—why, it's Sergeant Smithers, who disappeared with poor old Grafton.'

Smithers tried to speak, but couldn't. In a few minutes we had him on a stretcher, and a doctor was attending to his hurts, which were not serious. He was merely exhausted. In a couple of hours he was comfortably waiting to be taken back to a base hospital, and Sommers, Travers, Henderson, myself, and one or two others were sitting round him to listen to his tale.

III.

'It's soon told,' said Smithers. 'I was taken prisoner on 24th March, and have been kept at work by the Huns just behind their front ever since. I've been half-starved, and worked almost to death. I was in Bapaume yesterday, helping to load motor-lorries till I fainted with hunger and weakness, when a ginger-headed sergeant—pray Heaven I may one day meet him face to face!—simply kicked me down into the cellar where you found me, and told me to lie there and rot. I did lie there, and felt so weak and ill that if you gentlemen hadn't rescued me I should have died there.'

'Nice people, these Huns,' said Travers grimly. 'I hope, now Grafton has got amongst his friends, he'll feel comfortable. I suppose he's all right, Smithers.'

The sergeant's eyes flashed.

'Mr Grafton, sir,' he cried vehemently, half-sitting up, 'if ever a man deserved the V.C., it was Mr Grafton.'

'It is rumoured that he voluntarily went over to the Boche,' suggested Travers softly.

'Whoever said so is—I say, speaks falsely;' and Smithers sank back on his stretcher.

'Tell us what happened,' said Sommers gently.

'It was this way, sir. As you know, on the 24th we all got separated, and some of us were well ahead of the others. Our tank must have been leading by a good way when we got a slanting hit. I don't exactly know what happened, but we found our steering-gear was knocked out. We could go ahead, but we couldn't turn, neither could we stop, and so the old crab went straight on, right into a whole battalion of Boches, who simply smothered us with rifle and machine-gun fire. We could have dropped out ourselves and got back safely when we were first hit, and at the time I suggested doing so to Mr Grafton, but he turned to me in surprise, then burst out laughing.

'"What! abandon the old thing?" says he. "Make a present of it to the Huns? I don't think; and I'm surprised at you, Smithers, for hinting at such a thing. We've got our guns intact, and we shall have the opportunity of our lives directly." And so we did. No sooner had Lieutenant Grafton convinced himself that the tank was out of control than he waited his chance, and when we were well in amongst the enemy he let fly until we had not a single round of ammo. left. We drove on, well in rear of the Germans, till we practically ran into the base of a small hill, and there we jammed. In an instant a hundred Boches swarmed round us and tried to force an entrance, but Mr Grafton emptied his revolver amongst 'em, and then, telling us to lay hold of spanners, hammers, or anything, he leapt out and laid about him with a small crowbar.

'I can tell you, gentlemen, we left our mark on the Boche, but it was no good. In a few minutes Mr Grafton, myself, and Tommy Hunter were the only ones alive, and we should have been bayoneted if an officer had not come up and literally booted back the men attacking us. He told us in English to put up our hands at once or it would be the worse for us; but even then Mr Grafton defied him, and told him to shoot us down as they had shot the women and children at Louvain. The officer gave an order to his men, who leapt upon us and secured our arms. Then the officer, who had been joined by several others, got into the tank and had a look round. They could not make things out, apparently; so the first one who had come up returned to us and asked us our names and ranks, and then said to Mr Grafton, "You were in charge, I suppose?"

'"I was."

'"And you thoroughly understand the machine?"

'"Thoroughly."

'"And could explain everything to me?"

'"Yes."

'"Well, we're very anxious to know all about these tanks. Tell us, and we will spare your life."

'Mr Grafton laughed in his face and said, "Do you expect me to accept such a vile offer? I refuse absolutely."

'The officer turned savagely upon him. "Wait," says he. "Before I shoot you, these fellows"—pointing to Tommy and me—"shall be bayoneted before your eyes."

'At this Mr Grafton turned pale and seemed to hesitate, while the German grinned like a devil and lit a cigarette.

'"It wouldn't be 'playing the game,' as you sporting fools say, to sacrifice these;" and he nodded again towards us.

'"If I do as you want, will you give these men their liberty?" asked Mr Grafton.

'"Yes."

'"And me my life?"

'"Certainly; and a good deal more if you play your cards properly."

'I thought I saw a meaning glance pass between them, and I cried out, "Don't consider us, sir. Let these devils do their worst. We're not afraid to die;" on which the German officer hit me on the mouth with the back of his hand. I tried to break away from the men who held me, but it was no good. I told that brute what I thought of him, but I was punched and kicked till I shut up.

'Mr Grafton took no notice of me, but said quietly to the officer, "I will do what you want on one condition. I will explain everything—but only to your general and his staff. If you don't agree to that, do your worst."

'The German looked him straight in the eyes. "I am an engineer officer," he said. "I may be present, of course?"

'"Certainly; that is one of my conditions."

'And then we waited. At Mr Grafton's request, Tommy and I were marched out of earshot, and Mr Grafton talked and smoked with the German officer. Presently a tall, old, gray-headed devil of a German general, several crosses and things on his long frock-coat, came up, and with him about a dozen others—staff officers, I should say, for they were all great swells, and several had eyeglasses and showy uniforms. There was a great deal of saluting and jawing, and Mr Grafton talked to them all. Then they walked round the tank, and we could see Mr Grafton pointing out this and that, while Tommy and I cursed him under our breath. Then Mr Grafton, the general, and five or six officers all went inside, and for about five minutes we saw nothing. Afterwards Mr Grafton came to the door and beckoned the others, as though he wanted them to observe something. He disappeared, and in another second there was a blinding flash, a terrific report, and the tank, Mr Grafton, and all those German officers in and near it were blown into a thousand bits. Tommy and I were a good fifty yards away, and were knocked over by the explosion. When we recovered we looked round, and there was a torn and ruined mass of metal, and one or two tattered groaning forms, in the remains of swagger uniforms, lying around. The rest, every mother's son of them, had been blown to Kingdom Come.'

Sommers gave a long-drawn 'Ah!' when Smithers finished speaking.

'It was Graf's own idea,' he said softly. 'He told me about it. A dynamite charge hidden in the bottom of the tank and operated electrically by a push-button. He told me he had fitted one to his own tank, and had written home recommending them to be fitted to all tanks, so that they could be blown up in case of danger of capture. Poor old Graf! He was a gallant gentleman.'

'Sommers, I misjudged your friend,' said Travers, and his voice was a little husky. 'I apologise. Have you a match?' and lighting a cigarette, he walked off.

The rest of us went our several ways, and for my part I wondered whether, placed as 'The Count' had been, I should have had the pluck to act as he had done.

YOUTH AND AGE.

BRIGHT poppies dance amidst the yellow corn,
A lark is singing in the cloudless sky,
As through the fields, this radiant summer morn,
We wander hand-in-hand—just you and I.
'Oh love, dear love, how fair the world to-day!'
So trills the lark; so our glad hearts do say.

'Life has its shadows!' thus croaks one who leans
Upon his scythe amid the waving corn.
'Ah me, life is so dreary!' she who gleans
Behind him moans, this beauteous summer morn.
Shall we believe them, sweetheart, dear one?—Nay,
For, love, we find life, oh! so bright to-day.

'Youth is the time for laughter, age for sighs,
They tell us as we pass them singing by;
We gaze into each other's dancing eyes,
Then upward toward the cloudless azure sky.
Oh love, dear love, how bright the world to-day!
And yet they moan, 'The gold must turn to gray.'

B. DUNBAR DEY.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

LOVERS' LUCK.

A STORY OF THE MALTA HOSPITALS.

By ALBERT G. MACKINNON.

CHAPTER I.—A STRANGE MEETING.

'FEGS! My lieutenant!'

Jock M'Gowan was never more surprised in his life. The place of meeting was certainly a very strange one. It was loneliness personified. Duejra, the classical home of the Cyclops, looked weird enough to harbour any monster, and made one feel that the child-like race of long ago had not required any very great gift of the imagination to see in it the haunt of that mythical one-eyed giant. Sitting in an ambulance-chair, placed on a ledge of rock, was a figure swathed in bandages, pensive, and looking into the sad bay of shadows at his feet.

Jock hastened forward, and then, steadying himself on his crutches, saluted.

'M'Gowan, is that you? Well, it was always your way to turn up at the unexpected moment. But I certainly did not anticipate meeting any of my company at this Land's End,' was the response.

'Weel, sir, I recognised ye by the cut o' yer heid an' shoulders. I didna expect to find ye here. Ye see, I'm a patient in Malta, an' oor Scotch chaplain arranged to tak' a lot o' us ower to Gozo for the day, an' we hae driven the length o' the island. The ithers are ower there, but I took a daunner roond to hae a look at the bay.'

'I see you are just as inquisitive as ever,' laughed Lieutenant Reid. 'And this time you are rewarded by discovering the one-eyed monster in his native lair.'

Jock, with a sympathetic glance, had already taken in that it was just about half of his old officer that was left. One leg was missing, only the stump of one arm remained, and one eye was gone. The sight made him very sad, but he was too true a gentleman to betray his feelings.

'I heard, sir, hoo ye had saved oor fellows by throwin' yer coat on the bomb an' tryin' to smother it, an' hoo ye had got hit a' ower; but I'm richt gled to see that ye hae plenty o' speerit left.'

'I do not know about that, M'Gowan. You have got me at ebb-tide. There is not much life remaining. That is why the surgeon has ordered me away to this quiet spot, out of sight of people, that I may grow accustomed to the fact that in the future I must be a burden to everybody. He was quite right. It is not easy to bring one's mind to it.'

'There 's nae fear o' that, sir. Yer wounds are things to be prood o', an' I 'm thinkin' yer freen's 'll spoil ye when they get the chance.'

'To tell you the truth, M'Gowan, I have few friends. But sit down on that rock and have a crack. I shall never be your officer again, so we will dispense with all formalities. Your company is cheering, for I was feeling pretty low down. My nerves have had a bad shake, and I suppose the doctor thinks I should not talk much, but I shall enjoy a chat with you. I heard you were on the island, and doing your bit to keep everybody about you cheery. For putting real spirit into the men you were always worth far more than all the "tots" served out to them.'

'It 's easy to pass alang a cheery word, sir; an' a lauch is no that deeficult to raise, provided ye choose the richt time.'

'Yes, there is a great deal in that. I think it is Shakespeare who says, "A jest's prosperity lies in the ear of him that hears it; never in the tongue of him that makes it." You have a sense of atmosphere, M'Gowan. Perhaps that is why you have turned up here. I was just picturing my future as dark as that pool down there.'

'If I were you, sir, I wud look at that high pinnacle o' rock oot there, an' note hoo it tooers up oot o' the black depths until the blaze o' sunshine croons its head wi' glory.'

'You mean the General's Rock. Yes, it rises three hundred feet sheer out of the water. So you would make it a silent sermon showing how I should rise above my troubles. It is an excellent object-lesson, I assure you, M'Gowan.'

'Ay, the Cobbler o' Arrochar cud sit verra comfortably on its tap, an' rest his feet on the cliffs here.'

'Capital idea! That takes a little of the terror out of the scene, for one would certainly much rather meet a cobbler than a Cyclops,' laughed the lieutenant, and Jock did not lag in joining in.

'You have cheered me up already. And now, as you have two hands, I will trouble you to light me a cigarette, and help yourself to one out of the box.'

M'Gowan willingly performed the little service.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

He had deft fingers for handling a match in a breeze, and for a few moments the two wounded men exchanged whiffs of smoke in lieu of ideas.

'I am afraid I am beginning to look at that gloomy pool again,' began the lieutenant. 'I can see no future before me, and what I feel most of all is the thought of being dependent on others. For my old job I needed both arms and legs. I was a surveyor, and had to do a good deal of riding. I shall have to turn to something else, though what I shall ever be able to do for a living I cannot see. Besides, I have a widowed aunt to support. I had a good prospect before me; but all that is gone now.'

'Ay, it's gey hard, sir,' was Jock's sympathetic comment.

'Yes, when one talks glibly about sacrifice, one little thinks what it means when it has to be drawn out through a lifetime. In fact, M'Gowan, I may as well tell you what has put me into the dumps to-day, for I want you to do me a favour.'

'I'll dae that, sir, wi' a' my hairt.'

'I was engaged to a Miss Gertrude Glover. Her mother, who is naturally very ambitious for her beautiful daughter, was opposed to our marriage, even when I had the prospect of, at least, a comfortable home. Now that I have nothing to offer, she has put my duty clearly before me. By a strange chance she and her daughter are on their way to Egypt, and their boat has put in to Malta. Mrs Glover knows that I am here, though I am not sure that Gertrude does, and I have just received a letter from the mother to-day, asking me to break off the engagement. Sir Edward Baird, a rich man, who is on their ship, is very anxious to marry Gertrude, and her mother says that it is my duty to free her, as of course I cannot possibly marry her now, and the girl's future must not be ruined. What answer could I give to that request?'

'Ye're in a gey deeficult position, sir, I admit; but I think the young leddy ocht to be consulted. After a', it's her life that's affected,' Jock answered with deliberation.

'But supposing the mother is watching her so carefully that it will be impossible to get any word to her? Mrs Glover is a very smart woman of the world, and it would be a clever brain that would outwit her. Besides, what is the use? Gertrude and I can never be any more to each other, and it would only be increasing the pain to consult her. I have already offered my life to my country, and now I must yield up something even more precious.'

There were tears in Jock's eyes as he listened, for he had a wonderful depth of sentiment in his being. 'Ay, it's a bigger sacrifice than yer life that ye are asked to mak' noo, sir,' he replied. 'But, hoosomever, ye may not be alane in it. I still think the young leddy shud hae her say i' the maitter. Ye're takkin' for granted ower readily that she hasna a bit o' the soldier in her, tae. Supposin' she prefers to stick to ye, I think ye ocht to gie her the chance.'

Lieutenant Reid smiled. 'You are a sly doctor, M'Gowan,' he said. 'You prescribe the medicine your patient wants. Of course I should like to consult her; and if we met, I believe she would vow never to leave me. She is that kind of girl. She has got plenty of grit, and would laugh at all opposition. But, then, would that not be selfish on my part, and really unfair to her? I cannot provide for her. The best I could do would be just to keep her above the poverty-line. No; I have written a letter to her mother renouncing my engagement. I should like you to take it with you back to Valetta and get it sent on board the P. and O. liner. Here is a shilling to give a messenger for taking it to the ship.'

'But ye maun see the young leddy hersel',' persisted Jock.

'I should like to, no doubt, even if it was for a last farewell; but I am afraid that it cannot be managed. Her mother would never let her come. I am also sure that she is guarding her carefully, so that she may not learn that I am here. No message that I sent would ever reach her, so that any attempt that I might make would be quite futile.'

'I'm no sae sure o' that. I hae ta'en on pretty deeficult jobs in my time, an' though I'm on crutches, I wudna think muckle o' mysel' if I cudna get to leeward o' the auld leddy. I'll manage it, sir, if ye'll leave the maitter in my haunds.'

'What! a meeting with Gertrude?' exclaimed the wounded officer, allowing the delight of his heart unchecked expression.

'Weel, sir, it's only but richt. If she approves o' ye giein' her up, then yer conscience is clear. If she doesna—weel, believe me, though things look a bit dark, a wumman wull find a wey oot.'

'M'Gowan, you are the most cheering individual I ever came across, though a bit of a tempter too. I am not sure that it is quite fair to Gertrude to ask her to see me.'

'Let her be the judge o' that,' interposed Jock.

'Very well, have it your own way this time; but I am afraid that you will not get past the watch-dog,' laughed the lieutenant, as, in answer to a distant whistle, Jock rose to go.

During the rest of his day in Gozo Jock was very silent. He was deep in thought, evolving plots and plans. He had taken on an adventure, and had promised success before he saw a way through.

On the journey back the party visited the great unroofed temple called the 'Giants' Tower.' Jock was too abstracted in thought to take in all that the chaplain told them, as he pointed to the doorway with its massive stones, each eighteen feet high and five wide. How these had been placed there if there were no giants in those days was a mystery. The whole style of these remains, the chaplain explained, had nothing either Grecian or Roman about it. They belonged to an earlier period. It was clearly a Pyraitheion, a place for worshipping the sun. These huge masses of stone were the birthplace of the word 'cyclopean.' The chaplain ended his address by asking if any one could suggest how these great blocks could have been placed there without cranes.

'I hae got it!' suddenly exclaimed Jock. Then, as all eyes turned to him, he grew red. He had just hit on a plan for outwitting Mrs Glover. 'Oh, I didna mean onythin' in regard to this temple, sir,' he stammered, as he felt the chaplain's eyes on him; 'but I juist remembered that to-morrow was the 1st o' June.'

That was a discovery that meant everything for Jock, and he laughed to himself to think how it opened a way of springing a surprise on the vigilant mother.

When he reached his hospital he sought the orderly-room. He was on the best of terms with the clerks there, and he asked the loan of a typewriter for a few minutes. With it he wrote a short note to Sir Edward Baird, offering to have unveiled for the inspection of himself and a small party of friends the famous tapestries in the Cathedral Church of St John's. He signed himself 'The Custodian.'

'Sir Edward wull never ken that they are unveiled in ony case on the 1st o' June, an', thinkin' that it is bein' done especially for him, he 'll come, an' ye may be sure wull bring Mrs and Miss Glover wi' him; an' if I dinna manage to get a word wi' her there it 'll no be my fault,' he said to himself as he despatched the letter by special messenger to the liner.

Of course, he had to get leave from the medical officer; but Jock had already earned privileges in the hospital, and when he explained that 'it was a verra delicate maitter affectin' the happiness o' twa lives,' the request was granted with a smile.

At the hour he had appointed next day Jock was in the church, impatiently watching the door from his chair. His vigil was not prolonged; his bait had been taken. Five strangers sauntered in. Their leader was a big, rather bumptious-looking man.

'Yes, there are the tapestries unveiled for us,' said Sir Edward, pointing to the artistic relics which on that day were unbared for all eyes. 'It is very good of the authorities to give us this special opportunity of viewing them.'

Jock soon picked out Mrs Glover and her daughter. The mother had allowed Gertrude to accompany them at Sir Edward's urgent request. She had learned that Lieutenant Reid was safe in Gozo, and that there was no chance of meeting him, so she was off her guard.

Jock watched his opportunity, and chose a moment when Miss Glover was near him, the others having walked on ahead. Then, rising on his crutches, he intentionally slipped and fell on the floor. In a moment she ran to his assistance.

'Tak' that,' was the astonished greeting the girl received, as she stooped over the fallen man, while he shoved a pencilled note into her hand. 'Dinna let onybody see ye readin' it, for it is aboot Lieutenant Reid, who is in Gozo the noo. Gie me yer answer afore ye leave the church. Noo awa' wi' ye, afore they suspect.'

Jock had got on to his feet, and Gertrude Glover, who had grasped something of his meaning, obeyed his commands. She slipped into a side-chapel, and there read what Jock had written. He told her how he would take her to Gozo that very afternoon to see her lover, and mentioned a trysting-place where he would have a carriage waiting to drive to Marfa.

He watched for his reply, and when she smiled and nodded to him, he rose and went out, for he had much to arrange.

CHAPTER II.—A STRANGER DISCOVERY.

JOCK had a way of 'wangling' things, and before he returned to the hospital he had managed to secure two seats in an empty motor-ambulance that was running down to Marfa at the very hour he had mentioned.

'That saves nearly twa 'oors. I 'll hae Miss Glover back for dinner on her ship, an' her mither may never miss her,' he soliloquised with eminent satisfaction. 'Lieutenant Reid wull hae got my 'phone message to meet us at Migiaro at half-past three. I 'll gie them an 'oor to themsel's, an' we 'll be hame by seeven o'clock. It 's weel planned, I maun admit.'

But Jock had other duties awaiting him in his ward. During his absence a Scottish soldier, badly wounded, had been brought in.

'Sandy M'Cracken, is that you?' he exclaimed, as he recognised an old friend.

'Ay, what 's left o' me, Jock. I 'm richt gled to see ye. It mak's the place hame-like, an' I feel mair comfortable to think I hae a freen'.'

'If I can dae onythin' for ye, Sandy, ye can coont on my services.'

'Weel, maybe ye can. I hae had an awfu' experience. Sit doun, an' I 'll tell ye. Perhaps ye remember Major Ashmore. I was his servant, an' a better maister ye cudna hae. He had heaps o' money, an' was gey generous, an' I wud hae done onythin' for him. The day we made oor chairge everythin' seemed to gang wrang. We took the first line o' Bulgar trenches easy eneuch, an' we shud hae stayed there; but on we went, an' cleared them oot o' their second line. Then they let us hae a barrage richt on the spot. It was fair awfu'. There was nae place to shelter, an' the shells cam' droppin' richt in beside us. Ye see, they kenned the range to an inch. It was naethin' but pure murder to remain. Sae we got the order to fa' back. I had lost sicht o' the major, an' it wasna until we returned that a wounded mon crawled in an' told us he was lyin' badly smashed in a shell-hole quite close to the enemy's line, an' that he was callin' for me. It was broad daylicht noo, an' I knew it was mair than madness to risk it; but I got anither chap to come wi' me, an' takkin' a stretcher, we went ower the tap. My companion, puir fellow! soon got laid oot; but I cairried on, for I remembered a' that the major had done for me. It was a miracle hoo I managed to dodge the bullets. Ane got me in the shoulder, but I never thocht o' it at the time. At last I fund the shell-hole, an' there was the major—an awfu' sicht. Pairt o' his jaw was cairried awa', an' he cudna talk richt. Ane o' his airms was a' smashed. It nearly made me sick to look at him.

'"I knew ye wud come," he said. "Ye're the richt sort, M'Cracken."

'"I'll try an' tak' ye in, sir," I said, forgettin' that I was losin' bluid fast, an' cudna hae moved him wi'oot help. He tried to smile.

'"Ye canna dae that," he said. "I'm ower far gane for help noo; but there is ae thing ye maun dae for me, an' I know ye wull, even though ye risk yer life. I hae committed a terrible sin, an' I canna leave the warld wi'oot tryin' to pit maitters richt. I inherited a' my uncle's money, for I was his only relative. That's hoo I hae been sae rich. But he left a wull, which I fund ae day by accident, and I wasna honest eneuch to tell ony ane. If ye can tak' it tae my lawyer, an' tell him I said ye were to be weel paid for it, he micht be able to trace the richtful heir. Quick noo, for I am gettin' verra weak. Pit yer haund inside my tunic, an' ye'll find a locket hangin' by a chain roond my neck. Tak' it aff an' open it."

'Weel, I did what he said, an' I took oot the locket a' richt, but hoo to open it was the deeficulty.

'"Quick! Gie it to me, an' I'll show ye," he gasped.

'I pit it intil his only haund, but it had nae pooer left, an' he let it drop to the grund. Then he gave me sic a look. I'll remember it a' my days, it was sae fu' o' despair.

'"Quick! Quick!" he gasped again.

'I picked up the locket an' did my best to find the spring, but it was nae use. He watched me until his eyes glazed, an' I could juist hear him murmur, "Quick!" Then he pegged oot.

'By this time I was gey far gone mysel', sae I determined to wait where I was until nicht. I gied up tryin' to open that locket, an' I pit it into my pocket, an' then I think I maun hae slipped aff intil unconsciousness. When I cam' to it was dark, an' I started to crawl back. It seemed a terrible length, but I had almost got in when the Bulgars pit ower a few shells. Ane burst near me, an' I got some o' the splinters in my leg, an' I knew nae mair until I fund mysel' in hospital. They brocht me on to Malta, an' I'm feelin' better noo; but I canna get the sicht o' the major oot o' my mind, or his last words, "Quick! Quick!" It was gey frichtsome.'

'What like was the locket?' asked Jock, his curiosity aroused by the strange story.

'Ye can see for yersel', for I hae it in that bag on the shelf there,' was the response. 'My conscience 'll no be easy until I cairry oot the major's last wish. Try yer haund, mon, an' see if ye can open it. There 's somethin' inside o' importance.'

Jock was not slow to obey the request, but though he fumbled with his fingers, the locket stubbornly refused to betray its secret. 'I'm awfu' sorry that I maun gang the noo, for I hae ither important business, but if ye dinna mind I'll tak' the locket wi' me, an' in my leisure try an' discover hoo to open it.'

'Ay, I 'll be gled if ye'll dae that,' Sandy replied.

Jock had already taken his commanding officer into the secret of his coming afternoon's exploit, and when he set off he was wished the best of luck on his errand. 'Life would be dull in this hospital without our irrepressible Jock,' said that officer to a friend, with a laugh, 'so he must have his way. He is an exception to all rules. Besides, it is good for his health to have excitement. He would mope if his surplus energy did not find some vent.'

Miss Glover was at the trysting-place, and she and Jock had the inside of the ambulance-motor to themselves. The other men crowded the outside seat in order to leave them alone, for Jock had imparted more than a hint of what was on hand, and suggested the necessity of his breaking gently to Miss Glover the condition of Lieutenant Reid. He was anxious, also, to sound her feelings, and discover whether she was likely to prove loyal to his beloved officer.

'Ye wull see him greatly changed,' he said. 'But we maun be thankfu' that he is spared to ye.'

'Oh Jock, I am so overjoyed at the thought of seeing him again that, just so long as it is himself, I shall not mind what he is like. Mother said that the last word received from Salonika about him was that he was in a dying condition. I was so anxious to try to go on there and see him, but mother said that, even if I did get permission, it was no use.'

Jock remained silent, not without a secret joy that he was getting even with 'the auld leddy.' 'He wull require carefu' nursin'. Somebody like yersel' ocht to look after him. He tells me he has nae freen's,' probed Jock.

'Oh, but you know we are engaged, and it will be my duty to care for my poor dear,' declared the girl. 'I want nothing more in life than just to be allowed to nurse him.'

'I'm richt gled to hear ye say that,' exclaimed Jock with warmth of feeling. 'He deserves the verra best, and,' he added with a twinkle in his eye, 'I think he is likely to get it. Of course, there micht be deeficulties in the wey o' yer mairrage. He tells me he's no verra weel-aff, an' a leddy like you maun hae things graund.'

'Jock, I shall not care if he hasn't a penny. I am strong and well educated, and in these days girls can work for their living. I will make enough to support the two of us.'

'Bravely spoken, an' it does my hairt guid to hear ye say it. But maybe yer mither michtna look at things in the same licht.'

'Yes, I know mother must be thought of. I'll not deny there are difficulties, Jock; but see how, thanks to you, we are overcoming the first one, which seemed so insurmountable—that of seeing him. We will trust the rest to lovers' luck.'

When they reached Marfa a boat was waiting to take them across to Migiaro, and a strong side breeze made them skim over the strait like a bird. In an ambulance-chair on the opposite pier sat Lieutenant Reid. So far as was possible he had his wounds hidden, and he wore his old well-groomed air and carried himself in a manner that showed how within the mutilated body breathed an indomitable spirit.

'Noo I'll leave ye for an 'oor to yersel's,' said Jock considerately. 'That'll gie ye time for a guid crack. Then we maun stairt for hame.'

With these words he moved away on his crutches to find a sheltered nook, behind some rocks, out of earshot.

To put in the time he pulled out of his pocket the locket, and began to try anew to find its secret spring.

'It's fair puzzlin',' he murmured as his attempts proved in vain.

All of a sudden the locket opened in his hand, it almost seemed of its own accord.

'I'll tak' guid care noo no to shut ye, for ye hae been waur to haundle than the maist stubborn oyster,' was Jock's apostrophe to the mysterious trinket.

Then he looked curiously at what lay revealed before him.

On one side was an old-fashioned photograph of a lady; on the other, in very small but clear writing, was: 'The Last Will and Testament of Joseph Ashmore. With the exception of ten thousand pounds to my nephew, Harold Ashmore, I leave and bequeath all my property to the one lady I ever loved, or to her heirs—Miss Julia Graham of Ardnish, whose photograph is also enclosed in this locket. I estimate my property at two hundred thousand pounds. Signed, Joseph Ashmore.'

'This tak's ane's breath awa'. What a fortune! Nae wonder the major had some'at on his conscience. Maybe, hooever, he wasna altogether to blame, for it's a gey funny place to pit a wull, an' if he had as muckle trouble in openin' this locket as I hae had, it micht hae been years afore he discovered it. We'll gie him the benefit o' the doot.'

Then Jock began to scrutinise the photograph. 'I hae seen that face afore. It's michty familiar; an' yet I canna remember ony wumman like it. Yet those eyes, that nose, an' that chin reca' some one. Fegs! I hae it noo! It's the image o' the lieutenant. It maun be some relation o' his. I'll awa' an' see. This is gettin' gey excitin'.'

Since Jock had taken to crutches he had never covered ground so quickly. He swayed perilously as he moved over the uneven rocks, and he rounded the corner as if he were first in a race. He pulled up breathless beside the two lovers, just as the officer was saying, 'Gertrude, it is not fair to you. I cannot ask you to be my wife. I have nothing to offer. I wonder why Jock did not hand the letter I gave him to your mother.'

Then both looked up startled, for there was Jock making frantic efforts to steady himself on his crutches. 'Dae ye ken wha that is?' he said abruptly, thrusting the open locket before Lieutenant Reid.

The latter put out his hand to take it, but Jock drew it back hurriedly. 'Na, ye dinna,' he exclaimed. 'I'll not let the uncanny thing oot o' my haunds, or it micht shut, an' we micht never get it open again. Look at it frae whaur ye are, an' tell me wha it is.'

'Why, that's my mother,' replied Reid in surprise.

'I was thinkin' sae,' ejaculated Jock, with hilarious triumph in his tone. 'Mon, I congratulate ye. Ye're a millionaire—leastweys, ye wud be ane in America. Joseph Ashmore has left yer mither a big fortune, an' I think ye ainee telt me that yer mither was deid, an' that ye were the only child.'

'Yes, that is true. I have heard her speak of Ashmore as an old lover, who had made a great deal of money, and who had never married. Really there seems to be something in this,' answered the officer, echoing in his voice the exuberance of the other.

'Ay, it mak's the wey easy for ye,' said Jock. 'Mrs Glover wull gie ye her blessin' noo, an' I'll no require to haund her yer letter. Here it is back.—An' ye'll be excused, miss, if ye're late the nicht. Seein' that the wind has gane doun, I doot that we canna be back afore eicht o'clock, sae it's a real bit o' Lovers' Luck.'

A HOLIDAY IN EAST AFRICA.

I HAD five hours after my leave was granted to pack my kit, guns, and chop-boxes (sixty pound head-loads), take out a big-game license, and get on board the B.I.S.N. Company's steamer leaving at 5 P.M. for Lamu, an old Arab and Portuguese port, one hundred and forty miles north of Mombasa, where I was stationed.

There is no big game to equal elephant for sport, because of their cunning and extraordinary sense of smell. Like nearly all African game, elephants are nomadic. As necessity or desire for a change of diet compels them, herds are known to travel as much as a hundred miles. Their nightly range is usually from ten to twelve miles. Small herds frequent the coast-belt as far as Port Durnford, and commit depredations on coco-nut plantations. The coast species is not so fine a beast, and seldom carries a tusk heavier than ninety pounds weight; whereas tusks from Uganda, and from German East Africa that was, have been brought to the coast weighing over two hundred pounds each.

At daybreak the sand-dunes of Shella Point, under which lies buried an old Arab town, were distinctly visible; and soon after we passed the partially submerged ruins of an old Portuguese chapel on a coral-reef, off which we anchored. Lamu Island lies inland about two miles up the creek, and is covered with coco-nut palms. Mangrove bark (used for tanning purposes), ivory, rubber, and cattle are the principal exports. The inhabitants show their mixed Negroid, Persian, and Arab origin. The women, when walking in the narrow streets, are attended by their servants carrying a small canopy to screen them. This coloured cotton sheet is supported by four thin sticks, and is similar to those with which they swathe their bodies.

Having lunched with the Provincial Commissioner, I engaged native porters and a small dhow to take me up the creeks. After sailing about twelve miles, we put in at a village approached through a winding mangrove swamp. Here I spent the night in a room of the headman's hut, at the same time requesting him to send out runners for khabar (news). Before sunrise I was out and bagged a couple of antelope and a guinea-fowl for the pot, and the same evening, with a tame native tracker in tow, marched three miles, spending the night in a large shamba (Swahili term for a native cultivation). Abdulla, my guide, was a stocky-built Bajoon, belonging to a tribe of mixed slave and Arab descent, which gave him intelligence above his native bushcraft. His head was shaven, probably with a potsherd of bottle-glass, and as his whole travelling-kit consisted only of a stick, two loin-cloths, and a fibre-bag containing a few millet-cakes, I was enabled to load him with my mosquito-net, ground-sheet, water-bottle, some meat, and other impedimenta. Before retiring I warned my guide to shake my foot if he heard anything on the move. He awakened me at 1 A.M., and we immediately moved off. It was good going, except for half-buried tree and bush stumps. The elephants were about half a mile away, on the opposite edge of the shamba. The tricky night-breezes and dim light prevented me from entering the thicket; so, choosing a vantage-point, we waited for them to break cover. From the screaming and other noises we gathered that there were three males, and evidently they had found some tit-bit such as the fruit of the rubber-bushes. They fed on till about 4 A.M., and then made off silently into the forest on the way to water. Male elephants are seldom found feeding together with the cows.

We trekked back to camp, and after breakfast I took my water-bottle and rifle, a Jeffry ·404 bolt action, handed my double-barrelled ·450 to Abdulla, and off we marched up the forest-ridge in a half-circle, facing the monsoon in order to pick up any fresh spoor. After a two-mile tramp, we came on the tracks of a lone elephant, which Abdulla pronounced to be a rogue and a pest to the cultivators, but which appeared to me to be a female. A heavy fine is inflicted by the authorities for shooting a cow-elephant, and the tusks of males weighing less than thirty pounds each are confiscated. I hesitated to follow it up, as the footprints were nearly circular, instead of oval, and only about twelve inches across, whereas the spoor of a good bull is over twenty inches long. With the size of the spoor generally corresponds the size of the tusk, and I fully expected that the tusks of the animal would be small. When dried out they proved to be only forty and forty-two pounds respectively.

All I could get out of my guide was, 'Wanamume labuda;' literally, 'Male, perhaps.' However, as he seemed keen, I followed. After two miles of dodging thick bush, we came on the droppings, into which Abdulla inserted his big-toe to test the heat. He concluded that the elephant was not far off, and would soon halt to take his siesta. Within the hour we found him lying flat on the ground asleep—an unusual occurrence. One ear was fanning the air to his trunk, so that, even in his sleep, he could get the scent of any human intruder. I hesitated to shoot, as he was head on, and, so far as I could see, the tusks appeared undersized; but as my guide whispered, 'Shoot, sir; it is a male,' I got into position, dropped on one knee in order to get the sights of my rifle in line with his chest and heart, and fired. He was soon up and standing, broadside on, bewildered. I gave him another bullet behind the shoulder, which sent him crashing ahead about thirty yards, where he fell.

I dived into the thick jungle to give him his quietus, but before I could get far he was up again and coming towards me, so I beat it back to the open spot. As he charged from the bush, his head with trunk raised and ears spread, he appeared like some gargantuan slate-coloured butterfly. I gave him a snap-shot above the trunk, which steadied him up, and then I headed across his front.

Elephants have poor sight, and are unable to turn quickly; but, unfortunately, when about ten yards from him I tripped over a creeper and came down. He had staggered some distance ahead, standing side on to me as if listening. I lay fumbling quietly with the bolt of my rifle, and soon managed, with the help of a thorn, to get the sand out and work the bolt back. Whilst I was thus occupied the elephant had moved off into the bush, evidently very sick. Following, I went close up behind him, ready to finish him off with a bullet in the base of the skull; but he was swaying and unable to move off, although he tried to raise his forefeet alternately. I saw his game was up, and in a few minutes he fell sideways, with a groan, against a tree, which smashed under him. His stumpy tail raised, and his legs extended singly, he died like a horse. I crawled aboard and enjoyed a pipe of Boer tobacco. Abdulla had sprinted early in the game when the elephant got up and charged. Evidently he heard him fall the second time; for, after shouts and repeated assurances that the elephant was dead, he haltingly emerged from the bush. His first remark was, 'True, he is dead; and wasn't he fierce?' After he had viewed the trophy, I sent him to the village for an axe with which to chop out the tusks.

My experience is that a sportsman should never run away from a rhino or an elephant. In the forest there are always cat's-claw and 'wait-a-bit' thorn to hold you, and creepers and grass to throw you. An elephant will pick you out of a tree and smash you against it, or dance on you, and jab you with his tusks to vary the performance. When charged by an elephant have your gun ready, and give a holding-up shot at close quarters in the head, the shoulder, or the chest; then dodge, and give him another between the eye and the ear, or in the leg. The brain-shot is, however, the only one that is really effective, but the brain cavity is very small in proportion to the size of the head. With a heart-shot an elephant will travel a long distance.

The tusks of a cow-elephant are soft ivory, called Vilaiti by Indian merchants, literally meaning 'European.' They rarely exceed thirty pounds each in weight, and are used for making billiard-balls and ivory carvings. I have known a pair to fetch a pound value per pound weight in the Mombasa ivory auction sale.

Abdulla turned up later with my kit and axe, accompanied by a bunch of Wa-boni men and women. The people of this bush tribe are the hereditary slaves of the Galla and Somali tribes, who levy tribute from them. They were all practically nude, and the women, although emaciated, carried their possessions on their backs, supported by a thong suspended from their foreheads. In exchange for the meat the men were willing to chop out the tusks, and as this job would take them till sundown, I determined to spend the night on the spot.

Before commencing to cut up the elephant, the chief of the party and the other males gathered round, the former standing at its head. With his arms extended, this high-priest of the forest howled forth his incantations with song and speech to the god of the forest and the elephants, much to Abdulla's amusement. He, like myself, understood little of their gibberish, although he explained, with native cunning, that the chief was extolling my virtues as a hunter.

Whilst two of them hacked away at the tusks, which with great skill they extracted undamaged from the osseous spongy mass that surrounded them in a curve upward from the jaw to the top of the head, the others removed sections of the hide and slabs of the flesh, which the women cut into strips like biltong, and festooned with red the branches of the trees and poles cut for the purpose. The meat attracted swarms of flies. The tribesmen varied the monotony of the task by gorging pieces of the meat raw. Their feast of roasted meat extended well into the night, so much so that next day they appeared stupefied from the effects, and their stomachs were distended, not the smallest crease being left. Two were quite ill owing to their gluttony, and on being consulted, having no medicines with me, I suggested tree-climbing as a cure.

I pitched my camp well out of range of the stench, preferring the company of prowling hyenas. My supper consisted of a piece of the thick part of the trunk toasted on a stick, which, although slightly elastic, was very nutritious, and tasted somewhat like Bovril. One bullet had grazed the base of the heart, another had ploughed through it, and large intestinal worms had entered, rendering it unfit for my consumption. The hollows of the tusks, which extended to half their length, were filled with a pale-pink fleshy mass, which fell out like small duplicate tusks when the parchment-like cap was removed from the bases. The ivory at the sealed ends was as thin as an egg-shell, and the skin enveloping the tusks protected them from the bony walls of the caverns.

There was much suppressed excitement when these fleshy interiors were removed, and Abdulla and I were not permitted to see what ceremony was performed when the Wa-boni buried them, if buried they were. It is probable that they treated them for purposes of witchcraft.

I had one of the feet kept for me, the meat, like that of the rhino, being a delicacy. The method of preparation is to seal the foot intact with clay at the chopped-off end, then to place it in a hole scooped out of the centre of a termite ant-heap; bush is next piled over and around, and kept burning for a few hours, when the foot is removed, roasted to a turn.

It is somewhat anomalous that the game-killing tribes of the back-blocks of the British East Africa Protectorate are allowed practically the unrestricted killing of elephants, while the European sportsman is only permitted to kill two male elephants on a sportsman's license, which costs seven hundred and fifty rupees (fifty pounds). No person may purchase or have in his possession any ivory excepting that obtained under a game license. The result is that ivory has been extensively smuggled out of the country to the benefit of the neighbouring territories—German East Africa, the Italian Protectorate, and Abyssinia.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XII.

IT was very early when we entered the little village. Nobody was astir, and there was an exasperating delay before our man contrived to rouse the padrone at the modest inn. When at last we got admittance, we found that he could speak a little English, and I was most thankful to hear, in answer to my anxious inquiry, that he knew about the sick English gentleman. 'Si! Si! He is ill truly, but he is no worse.' This was good news, and I was much relieved.

It was too early as yet to present myself, but while we breakfasted sounds of life came from the street—men and women going to early Mass, the thin musical jangle of goat-bells, the trundling of carts or barrows piled with black olives, fish, and frutta di mare. Peasants, wearing their coats as cloaks, and carrying long-handled spades, were going to their day's work; and everywhere was the smell of roasting coffee, mingled with the indescribable, unforgettable odour that clings at all hours and seasons to an Italian village.

We hurried through breakfast, and the padrone (who no doubt put us down as mad Englishmen who chose to travel at unearthly hours) showed us the way to a clean and picturesque villino on the outskirts of the village. A little, elderly Italian woman, with a red coiffure and a villager's black-and-white dress, was standing in the doorway, and as soon as she saw us came forward with a low bow.

'Il signore desires to see the Signor Forbesi,' she said when I had introduced Tony and myself. 'Benissimo! Il signore telegraphed, non è vero? The Signor Forbesi has expected him tanto, tanto!'

'I am not too late, then?'

'Grazie a Dio, no!' But she shook her head, and her little black eyes filled with tears. 'Il signore ees varee weak—debolissimo—and he is lonely.'

'Has he no friends? No visitors?'

'Sissignore! Il dottore and sometimes il reverendo, the parocco, and once or twice a stranger. Madonna mia! it is doloroso, for he is so gentle and kind. Now, per fortuna, he sleeps. It would be better, forse, not to waken him. The repose refreshes him, for he tires easily . . . si stanca facilmente. Friends of the Signor Forbesi are welcome, and he told me that you would come. Sant' Antonio! What a pleasure for him! Che piacere!'

'Is he fit to go a journey?'

'Nossignore! Perdio, he will never voyage again—except once.' She crossed herself. 'The doctor had not the heart to tell me so, but I know, and I think the Signor Forbesi, he knows too. He wished to see La Scozia, where he was a boy, once again; but'—she broke off with a sad gesture—'the signore will see him for himself, when he is awake.'

She led the way inside the cottage to a little room embellished with earthenware figures of saints and paper roses from the last Festa. Marietta was her name, she told me, taking me all in with her little, shrewd, black eyes, and making friendly essays in small-talk, in her quaint and kindly diction. She knew a little English; she had been for a year, when she was young, in America. She had come to the village long time ago—tanto tempo fa!—fifteen years ago, when her husband—poverino—had been carried to the Campo Santo. She hailed from Padova. Padovani still love i campi loro—their own fields—ma che vuole? She had been left this casaccia, so here she came, and here she remained. A quiet spot—tranquillo—and far from the world with its trouble; but trouble cannot be avoided, and no one is happy, salvo i matti ed i morti—except the crazy and the dead. And so the good soul went on making conversation, until she thought it time to see the sick man, when she left us for a few minutes.

Tony suggested that I ought to interview my uncle Hugh alone, and I agreed. On Marietta's return she led me along the passage to a sunlit room, where Hugh Forbes lay propped up on a couch, holding out a thin hand in welcome. His smile was the ghost of the one in the portrait at Glen Ciuin which I knew so well, and a glance at him told me that he was nearly done with the business of this world.

'You are Neil,' he said, his hand in mine. He spoke slowly and with difficulty. 'It is good to see you.'

'And you, uncle?' I said as cheerfully as I could, but with a weight on my heart. 'Uncle Ewan sent me to bring you home.'

He shook his head. 'I'm past it. I'm breaking the doctor's orders by talking, but tell me all about Ewan and the old place.'

A tearing cough shook him.

'Promise me not to talk meanwhile,' I said. He nodded, and his clasp of my hand tightened as I began to tell him of the colonel and the North Country. He lay quite still, listening, a smile on his worn face. I was anxious not to weary him, and was relieved when, after half-an-hour, Marietta's light knock sounded on the door. She came to tell us that the doctor was coming down the village street.

The doctor—a pleasant gentleman—was very glad to see me, as his patient had been buoyed up by my telegram, and disappointed because of the delay in my arrival. He was with the patient for a few minutes only, and when he came out from the sickroom his first words were to forbid me to allow my uncle to speak.

'But I have something of great importance to discuss with him, doctor,' I explained.

'I have given him a sleeping-draught, and when he wakens you may talk to him. But on no account must the Signor Forbes utter a word. Hæmorrhage, you understand! Caspita! It would be most dangerous. He may write a few words if there is anything of such importance as to warrant this, but a few only. Per Bacco! to exhaust him would mean that he might not rally again. He has wonderful spirit, but, as you no doubt see for yourself, the end is, at the outside, only a matter of a few days. It would be wise to give him the afternoon to himself.'

He promised to call again in the evening, and left me after once more counselling me to avoid tiring or exciting the invalid.

Tony and I went back to the inn, and in the afternoon set out to explore the neighbourhood. We were amply rewarded. The village was a quiet little Noah's Ark of a place, off the beaten track, unspoiled by sprawling hotels and an excess of villadom. Every turn of the road in that beautiful spot delighted both the eye and the heart. There the gray rock was clad with rich soil, which gave lavish thank-offering to the sun in lemon-groves, in orange-gardens, in walnut-trees fresh in their early leafage, in dark cypresses, the whole tessellated with vivid patches of flowers; while the volcanic hills, in the sun's alchemy, glowed with the sheen and lustre of the grape.

Cliffs, honeycombed by green caves, fell to a sea placid as the sky, blue as the speedwell, save where its fringe crumbled into dazzling white on the shining curve of the sand. A winding cliff-path invited us, and half-way down it we turned aside to rest in the shade of a clump of trees. A few brown sails, far out, flecked the blue floor of the sea; but there was only one craft near. It was a little launch, painted light green with a white line, and had just shot round a bend in the bay. Its clean, lithe lines and its long lateen yard and raking spar drew our admiration as it ran into a cove, and a tall man in white stepped out of it on to the tiny landing-stage. The half-dozen Southern oarsmen, almost as dark as Arabs, and as wiry, bent again to the oars, and the beautiful little craft slipped through the water like a witch, and disappeared round the bend.

The man came up the cliff-path and passed within a dozen yards of us. Absorbed in thought, he did not look in our direction; and even if he had, I doubt if he would have noticed us lying in the shade. He was very tall and lithe, with the suggestion of strength and ease in his movements. Presently he halted, and having lit a cigarette, took off his straw hat to fan himself. His face was a handsome and refined one, and the whole man—the small, well-poised head, the lean flank, the clean lines of his spare figure, the swing of his easy stride—recalled some well-bred, highly-strung animal. His clothes, of some white stuff, were well cut and English. His eyes were dark and heavy-lidded, and a carefully pointed, little dark beard could not spoil the line of an eloquent-looking jaw. He swung up the path and disappeared from view.

We lingered a while, and then Tony went back to the inn, while I hastened to the cottage, feeling rather guilty, to find that my uncle Hugh was still asleep. But Marietta had a piece of information. The signor with the dark beard—so!—she pointed her brown fingers from her chin—Signor Vachifordi—had just called. He wished to see her lodger, but she had refused. He had offered her money; but no! She refused! When she told him that the signore's nephew was here, he said nothing, and went away quickly. Had not the signore met him?

'Signor Wakeford? A tall man, Marietta?' I asked, trying to keep excitement out of my voice.

'Even taller than you, signore, wearing a straw hat, and dressed all' inglese.'

I dashed out, and ran down the dusty road to the cliff-path. The green launch was slipping round the bend, and the sun glanced on the white straw hat of a tall man in the stern. I was too late, but I had seen 'Mr Wakeford,' and I thought that I should know him again. I hurried to the inn, where I found Tony, and told him that the man in white was none other than 'Mr Wakeford,' and that his launch had taken him round the point.

'This is luck, and something after my own heart. You must, of course, go back to the house. Your uncle is at death's door. Meanwhile I'll try to make Wakeford's acquaintance. He'll likely return. Anyhow, he can't be far away, seeing he comes and goes in a launch. Have no fears. I'll come back here and report progress, and carefully avoid any interest in you or your movements. Off you go, while I do a little thinking.'

I hastened to the house, and waited until later in the evening, when the sick man awoke. He was very weak, and his big blue eyes burned in their hollows, but his mind was alert. When I broached the subject of his letter he nodded in comprehension, and pointed to a little cabinet. I handed him paper and pencil, and he wrote with painful care: 'In the box are all my papers. Keys under my pillow. Will show you them to-morrow.'

Keeping the doctor's injunctions in mind, I did not talk much, but sat beside his couch and read aloud from a copy of an English newspaper which I had bought at Naples. The doctor paid another visit in the evening, but could say no more than that the signore was no worse. Not wishing to leave him, I got Marietta to make a shake-down for me in a little annexe where I could rest within easy call of him. She, good soul, promised to look into the sick-room now and then while I rested. The fresh air had made me drowsy, and I fell into a light sleep. Twice I woke and went into his room on tiptoe, but he was sleeping peacefully, and his breathing was less laboured. Soon I dozed off again, to waken with a vague feeling that I had heard something moving. It was now in the small hours, and the faint early light revealed a tired-looking figure by the table beside the open window. A couple of strides brought me to its side. It was Hugh Forbes, and when I touched him I knew that the wanderer had found Home. He lay with his head resting on an arm thrown across the table, as naturally as in sleep. Death had claimed him gently.

(Continued on page 181.)

RECENT EXCAVATIONS AND ARCHÆOLOGICAL RESEARCHES IN ITALY.

By Ivan Lavretsky.

NOTWITHSTANDING the war and its inevitable drain upon the material and intellectual resources of the nation, there has been practically no diminution in the zeal and the enthusiasm of Italian archæologists, no serious interruption in the various fields of archæological activity. In fact, the work of excavation and restoration has continued as in normal times.

At Pompeii the work of excavation, under the direction of Professor Spinazzola, is going on as usual, and new and interesting discoveries are constantly being unearthed. Unfortunately the results of these excavations are made public only at irregular intervals. The last official report on Pompeii appeared in September 1914. There is reason to believe, however, that a new report will be published shortly. Remarkable treasures have been brought to light recently in the Strada dell'Abbondanza (Abundance Street). The latest discovery—the house of a great personage, one Trebio Valente—is of particular interest. The house can now be seen with its tablinum entire, whilst the peristyle with triclinium in the garden was found in an unusually good state of preservation. The excavations in the peristyle disclosed four human skeletons buried beneath the ruins of a portico. The position in which they were discovered revealed the manner in which these four unfortunate human beings met their death. It appears that they were endeavouring to make their escape by pressing close to the wall in order to avoid the mass of cinders and falling ashes which had already obstructed the central garden; but when they arrived at the south-east corner of the peristyle, the roof of the portico, not being able to support the weight of cinders, fell, suffocating and entombing two of the fugitives beneath the ruins. One of these, in a sitting posture, with body and head erect, was a woman, as was recognisable by the gold ear-rings found on a level with the head; on her finger were two gold rings. She appears to have been hurled against her companion, who had fallen on his hands and knees. The third skeleton is that of an adult in a stooping posture; on one of the fingers of the right hand there was an iron ring set with an artistically engraved representation of a raven. The fourth skeleton, apparently that of a youth, was found facing the wall.

Other new discoveries at Pompeii comprise a fullonica (fullery) and an adjoining residence, in which is to be seen a beautiful coloured relief representing the combat of Achilles with Hector.

As at Pompeii, the excavations at Ostia (near Rome) have been conducted on a large scale, and the results, thanks to the indefatigable labours of the late Dante Vaglieri and his assistant, Dr Guido Calzo, have been of the highest importance and interest. Whilst Pompeii gives to the world the remains of an elegant town of villas and sumptuous buildings, the new explorations near the mouth of the Tiber (Ostia) reveal to us a strictly commercial city, where, better than anywhere else, one may trace the inner aspects of the life of the Roman people in their better times. At present the excavations at Ostia are largely in connection with the systematisation of territory already exposed to view. A fact particularly worthy of note is that the Italian Government, through the purchase recently of the immense Aldobrandini estate, has secured at Ostia for future investigations the ownership of land comprising the largest and best part of the area as yet unexplored.

In other localities of the province of Rome archæological research also continues. Finished, it is true, are the explorations (still recent) at Velletri, where the remains of a Volscian temple were discovered; likewise those at Licenza, near the alleged villa of Horace, and those of Lanuvium, Palestrina (ancient Præneste), and of the temple of Jupiter Latialis on Monte Cavo. But, on the other hand, the excavations at Cære, which have been vigorously prosecuted on behalf of the Government by Signor Mangarelli for the past eight years, are still being pushed forward with praiseworthy zeal. The important results which have been obtained here, however, owing to the unfortunate lack of published reports, are as yet practically unknown outside a very limited circle.

The Etruscan problem, the old problem which still torments the wits of those who would like to have explained the origin and the nature of that superb civilisation so closely connected with that of Rome, will find, perhaps, its solution at the point of the pick at Cære or at Veii, when it has been found possible to extend to the surrounding territory the explorations which thus far have been confined to these two ancient necropoli. Whilst the excavations at Veii were temporarily interrupted owing to the fact that the inspectors directing them were under arms at the front, archæological progress, nevertheless, continued in these regions through the unceasing activity of the general superintendent, Professor Coltini.

At Ravenna recent excavations in connection with the restoration and reconstruction of the historical church of Sant' Agata have also yielded interesting and unexpectedly valuable archæological material. The excavations, which were under the general supervision and direction of the Superintendent of Monuments, extended over the entire space of the ancient quadriportico, the site, it appears, of a vast tomb, or burial-place, comprising numerous strata, the lowest of which belongs to the age of Theodoric (fifth century). It has been possible to trace clearly the entire plan of the structure, and the investigation, furthermore, has confirmed previous inferences and observations concerning the system of earth sepulture. Especially gratifying to the archæological student is the fact that a wealth of epigraphic material has also been unearthed. Numerous inscriptions bear the Consular indication and date, and some refer to personages of distinction who held important official positions. Amongst other objects, there is a metrical inscription, which constitutes a notable literary record. From the intermediate stratum was also recovered a large quantity of ceramics, whose artistic value is of the highest order. The collection includes thirteenth and fourteenth century pottery of all forms and sizes, and graffiti, painted and glazed, showing figured representations, with the emblems of Porto, San Vitale, and Classe. Many are intact or in a good state of preservation; others, however, which were in fragments, have been put together again with great patience and artistic skill by the Canon of Sant' Agata, Father Bignardi. Especially notable in the collection are numerous Faenza bowls and an amatory lance with a musical rebus motto, which, for its singularity, is destined to be one of the most curious and precious specimens in the Ravenna Museum, where the collection has been placed. A full report of the Ravenna excavations, with a description of the various objects discovered, will be published in due course by the Royal Lincei Academy. Meanwhile the work of restoration and reconstruction is progressing rapidly. The façade of Sant' Agata, together with the walls and the principal cornice, has been completed for some time. There still remains the reconstruction of the piazzale, or square (the site of the ancient atrium), the surrounding wall, and the campanile. One might add that if the church itself were in a city less rich in artistic treasures than Ravenna it would attract great attention on the part of visitors, and, indeed, would be considered a rarity. The church of Sant' Agata is filled with secrets and is alive with memories. From the early Romans to the rude Justinians; from the mosaic, still visible in the apse, to the painting of Luca Longhi; from the marble which records the name of Boëtius, to the epigraph which commemorates the Prefect Leone; from the miracle of Archbishop Giovanni, who witnessed the protecting angel's heavenward flight, to the pious exhumation of Cardinal Aldobrandini—art, history, and legend have left here in this church their imperishable mark.

The Picenum, which has recently revealed so much to us through the excavations conducted there by Professor Dall' Osso, has, during the past year, spoken its latest word at Fabriano, where, amongst other objects discovered, were the remains of a well-preserved ancient chariot, which is now in the hands of Professor Rocci, an expert restorer, for reconstruction.

New excavations, undertaken since the war began, are notably those at Como and at Este, near Padua. The Como excavations, which are under the direction of Signor Patroni, are intended to complete the discovery of the Porta Romana which was unearthed by the Societa Archæologica Comense (the Como Archæological Society) whilst excavations were being made for the foundations of the new Palazzo degli Studi. This gate was the principal portal of the ancient wall of Roman Como, towards Milan—an immense gateway flanked by two octagonal towers.

About the middle of May 1917 were recommenced at Este the excavations in the so-called Deserto district, on ground connected with the Arco di Sant' Antonio. It is confidently expected that when these researches have been completed the Atestino Museum will be enriched by a quantity of archæological material analogous to the fine collection of votive objects discovered in 1880–87 in the neighbouring Baratella.

At Bologna they have recommenced the work of excavation (begun in 1887 and continued until 1889) near the Giardino Margherita, outside the Porta Castiglione. The object of this investigation is to ascertain the extent of the Etruscan necropolis at the south-east of the city, and to discover eventually precious objects similar to those found during previous excavations.

In Rome, at the northern extremity of the Volkonsky-Campanari villa (Via S. Croce di Gerusalemme and Via S. Quintino) a beautiful series of Roman sepulchral monuments has lately been discovered. According to Roman law, the sepulture of the ashes of cremated bodies was not permitted within the walls of the city. These tombs, as was customary, extend along a public road. This was the ancient road which ran from the neighbourhood of the Colosseum, following a similar road to the present Via Labicana, near the church at SS. Pietro and Marcellino and the Via Merulana, and ending at the republican wall, the so-called wall of Servius Tullius. Entrance to the funereal cells was gained by means of frequent rectangular openings like windows. The cells are vaulted, and contain urns with the ashes of the cremated dead. On the façade of the wall are sculptured in relief the figures—busts, smaller than life-size—of the deceased, bearing the engraved funereal inscription and the names of the freedmen of Quistia and Clodia families. The excavations are being pushed forward under the direction of the Ministry of Public Instruction. It appears that the tombs extend under the villa Volkonsky-Campanari as far as the Via Merulana.

At Berceto, in the Upper Parmese Apennines, on the great Roman road trodden by so many armies, imperial and papal, a few miles from the Cisa Pass, majestically rises the very ancient monumental church of S. Moderanno. In the first chapel to the right, dedicated to Saint Burchard (who was of noble English origin, and was Bishop of Würzburg from 742 to 751), is to be seen—or was to be seen formerly—a modest painting representing two monks. Recently the Archbishop of Parma, Mgr. Conforti, in the course of some researches, had this painting removed from its position at the back of the chapel, whereupon a large arch was revealed, and behind that was discovered the sepulchre of Saint Burchard, with the inscription: 'Carolus Imperator fecit hoc opus S. Brochard MCCCLV.' This inscription is engraved on a triangular slab, of Carrara marble (like the tomb itself), with the imperial eagle in the upper corner. The capitals on which the stone arch rests show an angel's head on one side, and on the other an eagle, indicating that the tomb of the saint was thus placed under civic protection—this being customary in the case of the sepulchral slabs of medieval tombs. The tomb, which measures 1·35 metres in height by 1·55 metres in length, was constructed by order of the Bohemian prince, afterwards Emperor Charles IV. Inside the sarcophagus was placed the leaden casket, which was removed in the time of Bishop Nembrini, and exposed to the faithful on the altar. This sarcophagus bears two inscriptions. The first, in Gothic characters, says that on the 18th of June 1355 the serenissimo Prince and Lord, Charles, King of the Romans and King of Bohemia, whilst sojourning at the city of Berceto, in the presence of numerous nobles, bishops, dukes, and counts (whose names are specified), had the sepulchre of Saint Burchard opened, and that they found the bones of the saint reposing in a leaden casket. The other inscription, which is on the top of the sarcophagus, says that 'Bertrando Rossi, count and lord of Berceto, in 1501 (Maximilian reigning), after restoring the temple, transferred to this chapel and had placed on the altar the coffin of Saint Burchard which was constructed by the Emperor Charles.'

Considerable historical importance is attached to this discovery, in addition to its archæological interest. History tells us that Saint Burchard was chosen Bishop of Würzburg by Saint Boniface, martyr; that he was the latter's worthy companion in the apostolate of Germany; and that, in the year 752, he had a large share in deposing Childeric III. and electing Pepin as King of France, during the Pontificate of Zacharias.

LADY HELEN'S NEURALGIA.

PART III.

I.

THE meeting was crowded. It was market-day and a half-holiday in Tonborough, and the afternoon was cold and wet. Both facts lent success to the meeting, and inside the town-hall the atmosphere was overpowering. All the windows were shut, and, though it was but three o'clock and broad daylight, all the gases were lit. Every inch of room was occupied, save the platform.

As the minute-hand of the clock below the gallery passed the hour, the door on the left of the platform opened to admit the Mayor of Tonborough, accompanied by eight ladies and four men, and the meeting broke into vociferous applause. The ascent to the platform, by rickety steps at the side, was managed with trepidation and care. The candidate was waved by the Mayor to a chair on his left, and handed an elderly lady, who was the president of the Women's Association, to the chair next him.

The rest of the platform party all tried to sit in the second row. The Mayor glanced at the two vacant chairs on his right, and then over his shoulder at the crowded row behind him. There seemed to be some altercation and remonstrance going on there, and a young woman was pushed forward into the chair of honour on the Mayor's right, and looked round her with an expression of hopeless agony. She was dressed in a long blue-serge cloak, and she clasped in her lap a shabby brown-leather bag. The Mayor rose, and, during the applause that followed, no one noticed a ninth woman enter by the platform door, and stand in the shadow at the side of the platform, behind the rickety staircase.

The clock pointed to the half-hour before the opening remarks from the chair were concluded. 'I will now call upon Miss Ralston to address the meeting,' he said, after his peroration, and, bowing and smiling affably at the girl on his right, he heavily resumed his seat.

The girl let her bag roll off her lap. It fell on the front of the platform, bounded thence over the edge, and landed on the bent head of the local reporter, who sat writing at a table just below. It opened as it landed, and a tin box was shot out. From it descended a mighty shower of white powder, which covered the reporter. He rose with a yell. The platform started up, and the girl was seen to seize the Mayor's arm and talk to him excitedly. The reporter kicked her bag under his table, dusted himself vigorously, and resumed his seat; while the Mayor appeared to be arguing with the agitated lady holding his arm. The meeting was much diverted, and the murmur through the hall evolved into laughter and clapping of hands and scraping of feet. No one noticed the woman who stood behind the platform step quickly and gracefully up the rickety stair, along the back behind the crowded chairs, and come swiftly through them to the front, just at the moment the girl holding on to the Mayor dropped his arm and burst into tears.

Mona Ralston wore a dress of some black diaphanous material, which mingled indefinably with touches of old lace in the bodice; and round her throat was a string of pearls, with a small diamond pendant that caught the light from every gas-jet in the hall. Her black hat was so ultra-modern in its form that none would have dared to wear it save a woman as beautiful as Mona.

She gave the weeping girl a look of sympathy, and slipped between her and the audience. A sudden dead silence fell on the meeting. Mona smiled at it comprehensively.

'Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen!'

Captain Stanhope, who had been looking much irritated, started and leant forward, gazing at the speaker across the portly Mayor, who had remained standing in his astonishment.

It was some moments before that dignitary remembered to sit down; but, almost before he had done so, Mona had captured the meeting.

II.

'It all arose from our secretary—our dear, indefatigable secretary—being ill. We really depend on her; and she was so sorry!' the president explained in the anteroom after.

'It didn't matter about me,' Mona replied graciously; 'but I was so sorry for that poor girl. Where is she?'

'Gone, I think. The stupid little thing! We thought her very—well—inefficient at dinner last night. She scarcely spoke. And she would take her bag to the meeting!—said all her things were in it. We thought she meant her speech. Who was she, I wonder? I am not clear yet. And you stayed at the hotel, did you not?'

'Only since this morning,' Mona told her, avoiding Major Stanhope's eye.

She had cycled to the hotel after her early morning cup of tea, firmly refusing further hospitality, and leaving without seeing any one save Lady Helen.

'Most uncomfortable! I can't tell you how I regret having missed the pleasure of your visit. And must you really go this afternoon?'

'I am afraid I must,' Mona answered. 'I must catch the five-forty train.'

Was it possible she just glanced at Major Stanhope under her lashes as she said it?

He took her travelling-cloak from her and held it.

'May I see you off?'

They walked side by side along the principal street of Tonborough.

'Your speech—I thought it admirable,' Mona said, breaking the silence.

'My speech!' He turned to her gladly. 'I felt ashamed to speak after you. You are a born orator, Miss Ralston. You played on that audience as a musician plays on his instrument. And what a point you made about Australia! And to say women shouldn't be in Parliament!'

Mona laughed. 'Oh, we are a stage in advance, are we? So short a time ago it was, "And to think women aren't allowed a vote!"'

Stanhope made a movement of impatience.

They turned into a side-street, where advertisement hoardings and sounds of shunting trains betrayed proximity to the station.

'Lady Helen is to meet me,' said Mona in a casual voice.

'Oh! Is she coming to see you off?'

Stanhope found it impossible to say anything about last night's adventure, but he frowned and flushed with annoyance and shame as he remembered it.

'No; she is coming with me.' Mona looked at him sideways, under lowered lids.

'Coming with you?' he repeated.

'Yes. I hope she will pay us a nice long visit.'

'Oh—I am glad! That is good of you, Miss Ralston! But—how—I mean—er—er'——

Then Mona looked him full in the face.

'Yes, I am carrying her off,' she said cheerfully.

It was a conventional phrase, but it implied much.

'I am very glad,' Stanhope repeated. 'My little cousin needs a friend.'

'I am sure she has one in you,' Mona said, innocently and pleasantly.

'I hope so,' he answered, with equal innocence; 'but a man can do so little.'

'Sometimes he can do everything.'

It was his turn to look at her furtively, to gauge her meaning. And as he glanced a wave of incredulity passed over him. Could it be possible that only yesterday he had been considering that, if his little cousin Helen wanted to escape by marrying him, they might both of them do worse; and had reasoned with himself that he was very fond of her and she was miserable, and that marrying her would open out the prospects of political life? No; it had been only a chivalrous idea—he had never really meant it seriously. He had always held marriage on a higher level than that, thank God!

Men have curious hallucinations about themselves.

'You made friends with Helen last night?' he asked Mona. 'That was why you—deserted us?'

'Great friends! She is very sweet.'

'Yes,' he agreed; 'I am very fond of Helen. She is like a young sister to me. Poor child!'

Mona smiled. Then she put a further test.

'I really felt as if I knew her before—though this is actually the first time we have met. You see, my cousin, Charlie Foster'—— She hesitated prettily, and looked at him with her beautiful eyes.

'Yes?' he asked eagerly.

She laughed and shrugged her shoulders. 'Ah, well,' she said, 'there is nothing settled; they are both very young. But Charlie is a dear boy; he is like a young brother to me.' She smiled demurely.

III.

They entered the station, to be met at the entrance by Lady Helen, her blue eyes wide with excitement, and her white motor-veil flowing and wreathing itself round her face, so that she looked like one of Sir Joshua Reynolds's baby angels among its clouds.

'I thought you were never coming—but I took the only car—they can't follow—and I brought only this bag, as you told me, and yours from the hotel, and—and—oh!'

She suddenly saw Major Stanhope.

'I hear you are going with Miss Ralston,' he said, taking her little hand and smiling down at her with kindly and paternal aspect.

'Are you coming too?' she asked.

'I haven't been invited, I'm afraid. I wish I were.'

'You must come and see us,' Mona told him, 'when you are in town. My father will like to meet you. Indeed, I brought a message from him.'

The train came in as she spoke.

'And may I come?' he asked, bending over her and piloting her as the passengers passed out, and they threaded their way through. The station-master, recognising Lady Helen and Major Stanhope, hurried up and indicated an empty carriage. The ladies got in, and Major Stanhope shut the door and leant on it. Mona took out her notebook and stood behind Helen, writing something.

'I think I ought to come, too—just to see to your luggage and so on,' said Major Stanhope with sudden inspiration.

'No, thank you, Reggie. We want to talk. And we haven't any luggage to speak of, either of us; mine is to be sent on. And that reminds me; you might go and break it to aunt that I've gone, will you?'

'My dear child!—I'——

'Oh, you needn't mind. You've always been a favourite. You'll soothe her.'

'And, Major Stanhope, another thing,' said Mona, coming forward, and taking Helen's place at the window. 'Would you send this telegram for me?' She handed him a leaf from her notebook. He took it.

'And may I come?' he repeated, looking straight into her eyes.

'Yes, you may.'

The green flag waved, and the train began to move. Reginald Stanhope stood bareheaded, watching it as it steamed out of the station.

Lady Helen looked curiously at her new friend when Mona turned from the window.

'What was the telegram?' she asked.

'To Charlie, to ask him to dinner to-morrow night.'

The little piece of white and blue and gold Dresden china became pink and blue and gold.

'Mona,' she said—'I must call you Mona, you know—are you really interested in politics, or are you just pretending?'

Mona laughed. 'What a little goose it is!' she cried. 'Yes; I'm really interested in politics. But you don't know what politics means.'

'Then there's my last scruple removed,' said Helen. 'Aunt has found my letter by now!' she added; and she bit her little lace handkerchief and looked out of the window, and rippled over with uncontrollable laughter.

THE END.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XI.—BLASE-BONES FROM SANDWURSE.

SANDWURSE is a very wonderful place. It has produced some exalted men, but, like all institutions, it occasionally throws out a prig. This doesn't happen very often, but when it occurs the specimen is a real one. And it was the bad fortune of our hitherto happy platoon to be saddled with one of the species. Our top-hole platoon officer, Lieutenant Blessem, was found fit for duty, and departed, amid the tears of our hut. We loved that man. He was so kind, so considerate, so interested, and he wasn't a sneak. Even Ginger admired him, and that was a compliment from our platoon highbrow. Lieutenant Blase-Bones then blew in.

We saw him approach the hut from our window. What a gorgeous Nut—all brilliantine, brown polish, and brasso!

'Some lad!' muttered Ginger, scenting trouble.

'He looks as if he couldn't help it,' I remarked.

'Looks a ruddy ass,' mumbled Beefy.

Then the door banged, and the sergeant-major shouted, 'Stand to your beds!'

We sprang to attention, and Blase-Bones entered as if he were the conqueror of Bagdad, Berlin, and Timbuctoo. He had a monocle—of course.

'This hut looks like a beah-garden. Open that windah theah,' he said, looking at me.

I obeyed. Twelve months in the ranks had taught me a lot.

'Whose bed is this?' he said, on arriving at Ginger's doss-house.

I must own it looked the bally limit. But even the old commandant had never checked it. The C.O.'s view was that we were there to train and be educated, not wearied with pipeclay and eye-wash.

'It's mine, sir,' answered Ginger.

'Clean it up. Look smart!'

With a groan, Ginger leisurely commenced to bundle H. G. Wells, Conrad, Hocking, Browning, and Zola into a long-suffering box.

'Are these your boots?' Blase-Bones asked Tosher.

'Guess they are,' said the Canadian casually.

'"Sir," when you speak to an officer.'

Tosher grinned. Fortunately this levity went unnoticed. And then Blase-Bones arrived at Billy Greens' doss. Billy, as you know, was a parson, highly strung, very nervous, and afraid of all military mandarins. We, who knew him, loved him; for Billy was the biggest-hearted man ever made. We shielded him from a good deal of trouble, and we were shocked when the new platoon officer, realising Billy's nervousness, pounced on him. Here was a chance to show off, and impress the hut that the new platoon commander was a mighty smart fellow!

'Is this your bed?' he asked.

'Y-e-s, sir,' said Billy, his hands twitching.

'Most untidy! What an example! How can you expect to be an officer?'

'I've never been checked be-fore, sir.'

'Hold your tongue! Tidy it up.—And, I say, sergeant-major.'

'Yes, sir.'

'Inspect this hut in an hour's time and report to me.'

'Very good, sir.'

Off he went, swinging his cane in a brainless manner, and leaving behind him a well of hate and scorn. This man had in ten minutes smashed our happy home, and given us a prospect of h—— for the next two months.

'Old Army!' said Ginger ironically, as the door banged.

'No, Ginger; he's the fag-end of the system, but he isn't a patch on the other good fellows,' I answered.

'He's a prize prig, anyway. He's out for trouble; but I fancy we can do him in.'

'Sure thing,' grunted Tosher.

'He's only a boy—a foolish boy,' commented Billy, who was indeed a most tolerant man.

'I'll tell you what he is,' remarked Beefy. 'He's a ruddy inefficient swine, chucked out of some crack battalion.'

And that was about right!

Next day he had us all up for a lecture.

'You know, you fellows need a lot of bucking up. Of course, I can see that, being New Army men, you're a bit handicapped. And I think it's an awful pity, don't you know, that you couldn't have gone to Sandwurse. However, it's my good fortune to be in command.' (How he loved that word!) 'If you will pay attention to me, I hope to pull you through.'

'God help us!' mumbled Ginger, who was at the back.

'What's that?' inquired Blase-Bones.

'I was just saying, sir, how much you'd help us.'

'I see—I see,' he muttered, but quite convinced that Ginger was pulling his leg. However, he had a face of brass, and continued: 'I want your huts smartened up. They ought to be like a ship's deck, with everything in order. And there's too much "fug," too many d—— novels lying around. I saw one yesterday by that beastly fellow, H. G. Wells. If you feel you want to read, get Kipling and the Morning Post.'

'Do you permit the Daily News, sir?' inquired Nobby, in such a humble (but assumed) manner that Blase-Bones thought Nobby was actually appealing to his profound knowledge.

'Certainly not! But I should be awfully pleased to write you out a list of papers and books, if you care to have it. I'm sure they would help you to understand the war. Another thing! I addressed one man yesterday, and he did not say "sir" when replying. This must not occur again. It's rotten bad form, and I won't have it! Won't have it! Dismiss!'

Ginger rose with a groan. All his Oxford Imperialism had vanished. He wanted to be a murderer and a revolutionary. We took him to the canteen and gave him a drink. He recovered!

'Say, boys, I reckon we've got to get busy,' said Tosher that evening.

'Your proposition?' demanded Ginger.

'Anything from slicing to lynching. I guess the world ain't any the richer for that production.'

'We'll catch him, duck him, and d—— the consequences.'

'Tar and feather him,' suggested Beefy.

'I think you are all very stupid,' remarked Billy. 'Why should you worry yourselves about an atom? He can't go too far. The company officer will see to that. Give him a full rope and he'll hang himself.' Billy Greens was afraid of revolt.

'Well, boys, I'm a lawyer,' submitted Nobby. 'This man may be an ass; but he's got the Manual of Military Law behind him, and don't forget it. We're in the army, don't you know, and this youth would come out top-dog. Again, I'm too jolly lazy to entertain the thought of getting chucked for my commission, and sent back to do orderly man. Therefore, I say, give him rope, and, as the padre says, he'll hang himself.'

'Meantime we suffer,' commented Ginger.

'That suffering, old chap, is not as bad as fighting the Boche.'

'Isn't it?'

'Let's vote for Nobby's idea,' I said. 'We don't want to make bally fools of ourselves. Besides, there's the reputation of the school, and the old commandant. I don't think we ought to let the Old Man down. He's been good to us.'

'That's right, John! That's right!' exclaimed the padre, glad to think a budding mutiny was being quelled.

'Oh, very well. We'll study the brute,' concluded Ginger, recalling the lecture on psychology.

For the next fortnight we had a dog's life. The company commander, who was a real good chap, didn't notice it. He was such a perfect sport and gentleman that he concluded his new officer was the same. Billy and I, however, threw our influence into the scales of neutrality, for Tosher and Ginger, when roused, were of violent temper. They were such good pals that we were not a little afraid of their rapidly fraying temper.

At last the storm-clouds burst.

At morning parade Blase-Bones was inspecting the platoon. He was in a bad mood. When he reached Ginger he remarked, 'What do you mean by coming out with such shocking boots?'

'It was wet yesterday, sir. I've tried to polish them. I've done my best.'

'Your best is not my best. Understand?'

'No, sir.'

'You're insolent.'

'No, sir. I'm endeavouring to understand you.'

'I know your type. Enough!'

'I shall feel much obliged, sir, if you will cease to be personal.'

'Take his name, sergeant-major.'

Ginger was mad.

'There's dust on your belt. Why?' Blase-Bones asked Tosher.

'I'm real sorry,' answered the Canadian.

'"Sir," when you answer me.'

'You ain't wise, boy.'

'Silence!—Take his name.'

Tosher's hands quivered; then he stood still, his face pale with suppressed anger.

I went through that morning's drill sick as a dog. And the only solution I could discover was that Blase-Bones was either an idiot or mad. But that didn't alter the plight of Ginger or Tosher. I trembled to think what might happen. Being cadets, a high code of discipline was expected of them, and this had been observed under our former platoon commander. Indeed, our platoon had the highest marks in examinations and sports. Yet this awful prig had smashed it all up. If I was sorry for Ginger and Tosher, I was more sorry for the commandant. This affair would break the Old Man's heart. However, I did not know that the colonel had already weighed Blase-Bones up. He was a shrewd judge of character, a man of stern moods, but a just C.O. and a gentleman.

Finally, he understood Canadians.

(Continued on page 186.)

TO THE FOXGLOVE.

O STATELY foxglove, queen of Devon's flowers!
Regal, yet modest, in thy bracken bowers;
With thee for ever doth my heart and mind
Associate the murmurings left behind
In those dear woods of Devon, where I dreamed
Of things celestial, and a world redeemed.

Thy tall, straight stems, with richly clustered bells
Of purple blooms all blazing down the dells,
Do give enchantment to the scene around,
And furnish bees with happy hunting-ground.
Reared amid beauty, thy charm doth exceed
The choicest flower that's seen in grove or mead.

Thron'd in the woods, O Devon's stately queen,
Adding to June's already perfect scene,
Where'er I go thy memory with me stays,
Still harking back to glorious summer days;
And when to sordid cares I must return,
For thee, O foxglove, will my soul still yearn!

HASLEHURST GREAVES.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE HEART OF THINGS.

By Henry Leach.

London, Yesterday.

THE war being won, peace being in the making, various nations of the earth enduring the conditions of violent revolution, the world seething with intense unrest, and all looking forward to the future with a glowing hope, but yet with a deeply discomforting apprehension —was there ever a time so critical for man?— there is a pleasant disposition in sundry places to reflect in odd moments on the manner in which the greatest of wars was won. Now, it seems to many of us that the test of speculative or imaginary elimination of the most forceful factors leaves the eventually victorious Allies with some fair prospect of success in every case—but one. If the British Navy had been taken out of the set of pieces, or had lost its place in it, then truly the whole system to which it belonged must have collapsed, and Germany must have wreaked her will disastrously upon humanity. This is universally admitted —by the enemy, as well as by all the victors. It is a self-evident proposition. Therefore, while it can never really be said, and should not be said, that any one country specially won the war, which was won by the closely concerted action of all of them, each exerting its own indispensable influence, it is nevertheless true that the British Navy had far more to do with the winning than anything else; and in that sense it certainly did win the war, and won it, as one might say, in a dozen different ways. This navy is the thing that an island people, seafarers all their time, have built up through ages, whose power, seeming to be consummated at Trafalgar, now rose to a far higher distinction and brilliance of achievement. And, fittingly, with the war won, this navy had for itself the most dramatic scene of all the war, a spectacle of conquest, remembrance and full recognition of which will be everlasting. Stories of battles may shrink, the efforts and the achievements of politicians may be (and probably will be) enormously discounted, other war affairs and factors may come to seem of less and less account, but the story of how the British Fleet sailed out one night and brought the German Navy back captive to the waters of the Forth is one that will not lessen. Its marvel will increase; for even now those few privileged who witnessed the scene find that its wonder and its majesty grow in their minds. The reality is better appreciated now than when it lay before them. That was the greatest scene, the greatest incident, of the war, or any war. It was so wonderfully symbolical. It showed the strength of Britain, and signified the supreme factor in the achievement of the victory. In a thousand years from now the story of how the British Fleet went out to meet the Germans at an appointed place for their surrender and brought them in will be told with a certain dramatic sparkle as it has been to-day, and perhaps in books it will be told with yet more detail and more vigour. If that is agreed upon, a few extra notes—after-remembrances—upon the event may be allowed. They are those of an eye-witness, for it happened that the present writer had the special privilege of spending some days and nights on a first-class British battleship at that time, and was there at the going out of the British Fleet alone, and its coming in again with the German battleships in custody. He saw it all from H.M.S. Benbow, one of the best ships of the First Battle Squadron.

* * *

On the day before the surrender, when the German squadron—some seventy ships—was making its most melancholy voyage westward from Wilhelmshaven to an appointed place, a peculiar placidity pervaded the Grand Fleet. There was the sense of something tremendous pending, which was yet not tremendous, of a victory coming which was no victory of an ordinary or even an extraordinary naval sort. There was little to do in the way of preparation, for the fleet is always ready. A number of instructions were issued from the Queen Elizabeth by Admiral Beatty. King George and Queen Mary visited the fleet, which was happy and complacent. When night fell, high up in the Firth of Forth, there were some who paced the decks of the Benbow, watching the twinkling of signals from the different ships, tracing gray forms, looking over to the lights of Rosyth, and fancying they could still make out (as they had done in the dusk) the lines of the pathetic figure of a fighting-ship whose day is done—so pathetic, as those realise who have for a moment glanced upon the picture of the

 [All Rights Reserved.]

Téméraire as Turner painted it—the original Dreadnought, which of necessity had here to remain while all her brood went out for this amazing victory. But it was all mostly quiet and dark. We turned in, thinking. . . . By arrangement I had a call at half-past 2 A.M., and in the barely three hours that had elapsed a considerable change had taken place. There was a general stir. Chains were rattling, signals twinkling from every ship. Half-an-hour later 'I W' was signalled, and the business of weighing anchor began. The destroyers, in the van of what would be the most remarkable procession of battleships ever known, were already spurting away to sea some miles ahead; the light-cruiser squadrons and others of the forward units were pursuing them. Soon it would be the Benbow's turn; and a little before four, with no loud commands, no hauling in of gangways, no whistling, scarcely any new sound at all, one felt instinctively the sense of motion—hardly more than instinctively, for these battleships with turbines do their work with a mysterious stillness. The changing relative positions of the lights about afforded the only convincing evidence. But three cables ahead of the Benbow was the Emperor of India; the Iron Duke was three cables aft. Thus in a silent solemnity and in single file did this mighty host of warships move down the Firth of Forth on this dark morning. They were as close together as they dared be; each could easily have hailed the ship ahead or astern. Yet they said on the bridge that from first to last this line of ships of the Grand Fleet extended for some six-and-fifty miles!

* * *

There were many things done in the navy during the war which could not be, and never were, described. We now witnessed some of them. The paravanes were put out. Now, the paravane, about which there was never so much as a whisper until the Germans were beaten, is a war invention. It is something like a big iron fish, as we might say, ten or twelve feet long at a guess, and from davits one is cast into the sea on each side of the ship for'ard. If well and successfully thrown, the good paravane then swims along smoothly some thirty feet below the surface and a little distance from the side of the ship, being fastened to a steel line attached to the bows, and thus towed. The paravane is a mine-catcher. For various reasons, the risk of a warship striking a mine dead on is small; the infernal thing may come in contact with the ship's side, and there is the danger. But now as it floats its under-fastenings come into contact with this paravane's line, and they slip and are guided along it until the mine meets the paravane. At this critical moment its fastening arrangements are guided with a pleasing certainty to the business part of the paravane, which has an appreciable resemblance to the jaws of a well-equipped shark. The mouth of the machine contains the sharpest of teeth, which, thanks to the natural forces applied, cut the fastening and send the mine adrift. About five o'clock the paravanes of the Benbow, and presumably those of the other ships at about the same time, were put out. Port paravane was at first a little stupid, and after much improper wriggling in the water, had to be taken up and swung out again ere it would swim properly, as a good paravane should. This is but one small detail—though a very useful one, since it is probable that it saved many ships—of things that they knew and practised in the navy during the war that few friends and no enemy ever heard about.

* * *

It was a still, dark night, a little chilly. The moon should have been nearly at the full, but was closed in by cloudy masses. Better was this for the contemplation of the many lights of different colours marking the 'gates' in the Forth, the booms, the guiding-lines among the mines. On the bridge, some time previously, I had seen the order given for 'Raise steam for full speed as soon as possible,' and here it was at many knots already, the whole line of the Grand Fleet, the mightiest armada by far that the world has known, threading its way through these precarious channels. On the distant shore to starboard there was a brilliant compact array of many bright lights, reminding old sea-voyagers of casinos and the like at gay resorts, in times of peace, as seen from the sea at night. Through the glasses could be seen many parallel rows of small inlets, with wharves attached, just like an extensive series of ocean stables. But here was mystery, for the lights were many and at the full, although the place was desolate, and there was no life about. 'Yes,' said the commander, 'there are the nests of the destroyers, but the birds have flown. Those nests are now all empty for the first time since the war began.' Of course, the said birds which had thus flown were at the head of our advancing line.

* * *

An order came to the Benbow, as to all the other ships of the fleet, from 'Q.E.'—which is navally short for the flagship Queen Elizabeth—that she should prepare for action! What is more, the order meant exactly what it said; we were not at manœuvres now, and armistice is not peace. Hence a creepy feeling in certain places. There was a general bustle everywhere, and this preparation for battle was quite an impressive thing. The order given positively contemplated the contingency that soon the guns might have to shoot against the enemy. Decks were cleared. The day before I had heard a captain and a rear-admiral discussing the possibilities. 'Well,' said the captain, 'of course it seems all very well arranged, but I cannot quite understand those poor devils. . . .' 'My old friend,' rejoined the rear-admiral, 'governments and surrenders are well enough, no doubt; but one can hardly believe those fellows can chuck it up just like this. Why . . .' He further expressed his inability to believe. That was the cause of the order to prepare—a certain possibility, as one might say. The guns were manned and the shells were set at hand, with the cages down to the magazine in the smoothest working form. Benbow and all the rest could then have fired a broadside. Thus prepared, the tremendous line, very straight, steamed on. Out on wider waters the time came for a new formation, the development of two columns in single line ahead, parallel to each other, instead of the one long, plain, straight line that had forged its way out from the Forth. So there was doubling in and out, and presently there was the full grand spectacle of these twin-lines, though one, according to arrangement, had spread six miles away to port, and on the dim gray horizon could only just be seen. Here in great array were all the battle squadrons, light-cruiser squadrons, the linking ships for the passing of signals and so forth, and the five vessels of what was known as the Sixth Battle Squadron, which comprised the American battleships. These parallel lines of steel and strength made the cage in which the German Fleet, on its surrender, was to be enclosed. It was ready.

* * *

A fog which had hung over the waters of the Firth and the North Sea for nearly a week lifted that morning for the first time. The circumstance helped some cranky sceptics to believe more than they used to do that if God was concerned in the war at all, He was at least with Britain, and thus He blessed her navy on the day of the consummation of its glory with all the sunshine that generous heavens could bestow. To some minds it seemed almost a miraculous thing. The fog had appeared settled and certain right up to the previous night, and alas for the tragedy that it would have been if the greatest surrender in history could not have been seen at all, and had just had to be assumed and accepted as officially announced! But this morning the sun shone delightfully upon a smooth sea. A wide spread of blue with amethyst and saffron, tints of red and opal bronze, filled the sky above. It was anticipated that, according to arrangements, our leading ships would be in touch with the Germans shortly after nine o'clock, the exact spot for this historic meeting being charted at lat. 56 deg. 11 min. N., long. 1 deg. 20 min. W. It is not a custom of the navy to display emotion, but admirals, captains, and others had some difficulty in concealing curiosity when the time came for the Germans to be visible. Presently we became aware that the units ahead had really seen these surrendering German warships, that the enemy did thus positively and meekly surrender, that they had been taken into the custody of the Grand Fleet. Every gaze strained away beyond the port bow whence the surrenderers must come towards us. They came. It was true. We could see them. They rose in the horizon mist like ships of fancy. Out there on the limit of vision there hung a thick even stripe of this white cloud, and beyond it was the other Grand Fleet line, which for the present, six miles away, was invisible. It was in this fleecy setting that the Germans must appear, and one knew they were there when the Cardiff, sent out in advance to meet them and lead them in, was seen, marked by the sausage balloon she had flying above her. Then one by one we slowly made out the hulls of the German warcraft. Sun-rays bore upon them, and the ships appeared like small, straight lines, a little whiter than the surroundings, while it seemed that the glistening light was focused on a spot on each, making it shine like a speck of burnished bronze. This was our first vision of this fleet, which, with toil and pride and menace, the Kaiser's Germany had diligently constructed through a generation, and this was its first visit in large measure to our shores. Between our Grand Fleet lines in the appointed way sailed this German Navy; we, steaming still for the time being in the contrary direction, soon had a full sight of it. At the head of the German line was the Seidlitz, the Moltke, the Hindenburg, the Derfflinger, and the Von der Tann; and then there followed the bigger ships, with the Friedrich der Grosse flying the admiral's flag at the head of them. Followed the German cruisers, some way behind; then the destroyers. There is no need for names or particulars, as here one seeks only to convey a few impressions, the main facts having long ago and thoroughly been reported everywhere. Each of the Germans was still flying the German flag with the eagle in the centre of the black cross. It was the last sign of a lost independence and dignity, and its time was short. Such and so docile did that line of the German Fleet appear, as it laboured along, that an enemy with keen remembrance might yet feel a touch of pity for its appalling humiliation. Presently the Germans were all completely within the case of ships prepared for them, and, this being so, an order was signalled from 'Q.E.' to the two lines of the Grand Fleet to 'alter course sixteen points by divisions'—which simply meant that each squadron should turn right about and bring itself to point for home, thus sailing with the captives and not away from them. With a beautiful precision was this movement made.

* * *

Slowly then all sailed towards the Scottish shore—slowly, we say, for the Germans could make no more than twelve knots, and once or twice the Grand Fleet, despite restraint, was moving too quickly for them. Up in the sky there loomed a big British airship. It hovered over the captives, came low down to them sometimes, and nose first, as if, in keen curiosity, it were peering hard into these strange craft engaged upon so doleful an adventure. When mind and emotions had gathered as much of this remarkable spectacle as was within the capacity of human limit, another was presented which in its way created even more wonder and more awe. The Grand Fleet slowed a little, and the Benbow found herself abreast of the tail of the captive line, which consisted of the vast company of destroyers. The tableau was presented suddenly and unexpectedly; it was amazing. Here were the forty-nine German destroyers (a fiftieth having been sunk by a mine on her way across the North Sea), and three times as many of the British kind wrapped themselves about them, crept close to them, shepherded them so wonderfully. And with those two hundred vessels all compact it seemed veritably that the ocean was spattered completely over with them, and an admiral of long experience turned to admit to one who was standing by that even he had seen nothing like it, and felt that impossibilities were now achieved. So all steamed towards Largo Bay, on the north side of the Firth, where it had been determined anchorage should be taken and the Germans boarded. On the Grand Fleet the early emotion had given way to complacency. There was a little private and personal signalling, when high officers felt constrained to pass a sentimental thought to friends on other ships. 'Does this not take you back to old times and sweet memories?' was such a signal that either came to the Benbow or left her—one forgets which it was. For with the remembrance of many naval adventures, fine successes, and great displays, this was an hour for thoughts—thoughts of the past. Another perfectly shaped manœuvre, and the line on each side was halved in length and made into a double line for greater compactness. By this a better view was to be gained of the full extent of the grand armada, and the wonder of it all increased.

* * *

The end approached. Orders bearing on it had to be given, and the flagship 'Q.E.' came to be a more continual consideration. Hoisted now at her peak was the ensign flown by the Lion at the Battle of Jutland, part of which was shot away. At half-past twelve Admiral Beatty made a signal that will be historic: 'The German flag is to be hauled down at sunset to-day, and is not to be hoisted again without my permission.' This order, the mark of victory, set another emotion running. Now, as the place of anchorage was approached, 'Q.E.,' in all her pride, authority, and majesty, came out of the line, and as the war-vessels passed her by, the ship's company of each in turn, led sometimes by officers standing on the turrets, in enthusiasm gave ringing cheers for the admiral who could be seen standing on his deck and raising his cap for thanks. . . . At last at anchorage. A square was made round the captives, and now we came close to them, and all details could be plainly seen. British officers and men contemplated them, admiring the lines and seeming quality of such as the Derfflinger and the Hindenburg, and murmuring that they were too good for this—but there it was, and had to be, and must. Two or three of our aeroplanes flew up, capering in the air above the captives. Once or twice an aeroplane seemed to skim the very decks of a German vessel; it would glide just above the water, and leap over the German at the critical moment. A big red sun was setting amid coppery vapours. At three minutes to four it was officially set, and at that moment the German ensigns were to be hauled down, and not sent up again 'without permission.' It was another of the tragic moments. The Benbow had been made responsible for the König Albert—each German ship thus having a special custodian—and so from the Benbow I watched for this German flag to fall. The moment came, and it seemed to drop suddenly, almost with a jerk, like a stone. So fell a dream. And the British officers who shortly afterwards boarded the German ships said that never in life in any circumstances had they seen a set of men so thoroughly despondent as the German officers. Their dejection was utter and complete; they seemed overwhelmed by the humiliation of their position. Yet they were sufficiently courteous.

* * *

One thing only remained to make a solemn and fitting end to a day that for ever will be marked in history as that of a strange and most marvellous naval achievement, better symbolical than any other of the fall of an empire and the triumph of right and justice. Admiral Sir David Beatty was not wanting in the true instinct. Thanks had to be given. From the flagship he signalled: 'It is my intention to hold a service of thanksgiving at six o'clock to-day for the victory which Almighty God has vouchsafed His Majesty's arms, and every ship is recommended to do the same.' The crews and the marines were informed that there was no compulsion to attend, but they also did not lack in thought and feeling. . . . It was dark; it was quiet and still. Only a few twinkling lights were visible on the ships about. The padre, in his surplice, came on deck at six o'clock and took his customary place for'ard, with Captain Waistell on his right, beneath the long, parallel barrels of a pair of gigantic thirteen-and-a-half-inch guns. Officers stood behind the padre and the captain; sailors, marines, and others, with the ship's band, spread round in a half-circle, with the heavy mass of a gun-turret behind them. We read the hymns by the faint light of a few electric bulbs. Above, a few stars had begun to sparkle in the firmament. An intense solemnity pressed upon this company.

> Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven,
> To His feet thy tribute bring—beginning of the first hymn that was sung. The music spread over the waters; the Germans would hear this thanksgiving from all the ships that now surrounded them. A prayer, and another hymn ending:

> But, lo! there breaks a yet more glorious day;
> The saints triumphant rise in bright array:
> The King of Glory passes on His way.
> Alleluia!

One verse from the National Anthem, and then dispersal. 'Der Tag!' . . . 'Deutschland über Alles!' And so this was to be the tragic finish of it all! . . . It does not appear from a consideration of things that we should by very much reduce the British Navy.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE dead man's papers were easily found, for the key of the little cabinet, as he had written, was under his pillow. Before awakening old Marietta, I opened the cabinet and took possession of its contents. With the man Wakeford in the neighbourhood, I determined to lose no time. After securing the papers I roused Marietta, who, in the intervals of tears, helped me to make a thorough search of the room. We found nothing beyond a few personal belongings. Having locked the door, I left the cottage, and made my way in the radiant hush of the morning through the quiet street to the inn. Tony was in bed, but soon joined me in an examination of the papers. Most of them related to ordinary matters of business—jottings regarding his West African affairs and a small balance in the Credito Italiano at Naples, addresses, letters, memoranda, and so on; but among them was a sealed envelope. It was endorsed in my uncle's handwriting, thus: 'Referred to in my letter to E., and found by me two days later when arranging my affairs.—H. F.' Eagerly I slit open the envelope and drew out the enclosure. It was a single sheet of paper, and when I unfolded it my pulse quickened, for its right edge was serrated, and the first words which caught my eye were two at the foot—'† Exultabunt Domino.'

Here was a discovery! The only decipherable words in the old paper at The Bield were the same as those in the paper before us. They were in exactly the same position, and were preceded by the same little Roman cross. Careless, easy-going Hugh Forbes had preserved, probably through sentiment, his copy of the old family paper, the other half of which was presumably in the possession of 'The Searchers.' The letters, as in the paper stolen from my cabinet in Jura Street, were strung together without punctuation; but the writing was legible, and it was easy to arrive approximately at the words. For the reader's convenience, these are separated in the copy of the paper given below. This paper is innocent-looking enough, but over it men have schemed, plotted, lied, and betrayed, and through its lure been struck out of this life:

Anno Redemptoris.
Y^e^ month Aprile. . . . From Gleann Ciuin His house. . . .
Houres to Y^e^ Learg Ghruamach Itts North Jawes & in other
Houres from Itts Jawes to Y^e^ Saddle and High^st^ P^t^ of Y^e^ Pass. . . . Now First throe track till yow do come neare lyeth among Greate Monta
a Toyle to enconter
Strike to Y^e^ Heart
Sron na Leirg
ontill yow do come
Itt runeth but no
ane neybour Wa
Salute oure Three trustie friends anent these I did fullie in from Y^e^ tail
no more † Exultabunt Domino

Several Gaelic words were easily picked out—namely, 'Gleann Ciuin,' 'Sron na Leirg,' and 'Learg Ghruamach.' The first is, of course, the name of my native Glen, in which stands The Bield. Sron na Leirg is the great hill, nearly four thousand feet high, which mounts guard at the north of the Pass, and looks down between Braeriach and Ben Muichdhui to Glen Dee. The third is the Larig Ghru' ('The Forbidding Pass') which links the Spey Valley with the Mar country and Deeside, and climbs toilsomely up the highest mountain mass in Britain, through the wild recesses of the Cairngorms.

It was plain that the writing was part of instructions regarding something; but, alas! it was equally plain that it was useless without the other part. Time and again we read it, backward and forward, from top to bottom and vice versâ, but to no purpose. 'Strike to Y^e^ Heart.' 'Salute oure Three trustie friends.' Whose heart was to be struck at? Who were the three trusty friends?

'A duplicate of what once was written on the faded paper at The Bield,' said Tony. 'This is what Wakeford wants, and what he won't get, if we can help it.'

'Have you seen him?'

'Not yet. But I had a chat with some of the boatmen, and I've found out that he is coming back to-day. I'll contrive to strike up an acquaintance with him somehow or other.

Leave that to me. He has a villa near here, and with a bit of luck I 'll get inside it.'

'And then?'

'Await developments. Wakeford seems to be an interesting specimen, rich and generous—"ha molti quattrini e le mani bucate" ("plenty of money and the hands perforated"), so one of his boatmen told me. I shall be a simple-minded English tourist—a Mr John Robinson—chasing the sun. He may offer me hospitality, especially if he is out for information regarding the man who has just died. In case he knows that we arrived here together, my story will be that I struck up a casual acquaintance with you in the train. All I know about you is your name, and that you came to see a friend who was ill, and who has died since you arrived. I shall not even attend the funeral, so that Wakeford may not suspect that we have anything in common. Of course, he may be a wary bird, and show no inclination for my society. We shall see.'

The safe keeping of the paper was then discussed, and we decided to post an exact copy to Tony's address in London, and another to the colonel at The Bield. The personal documents I put into my suit-case, but the precious paper demanded more than ordinary precautions. We determined to take no risks. Having added another sheet to the paper's wrapping, I took off my right boot, put the document in the middle of the sole, and then pulled the boot on again, resolved that there the paper should remain except at night, when it would be under my pillow. Short of my murder or abduction, the safe conduct of the paper was assured, and in any event the posted copies would be duly delivered.

In the forenoon I had to make arrangements for Hugh Forbes's funeral on the morrow. Tony did not accompany me. From that moment we played the parts of casual hotel acquaintances, our arrangement being that, if he had anything to tell me, he would find ways and means of doing so, either by slipping me a note or seeing me in my room late in the evening. Looking round the dozing village, I was inclined, after I left Tony, to scout the idea of being watched; but I took his counsel and kept a sharp look-out for strangers as I made my way back to the house with the precious paper in my boot.

There I learned from Marietta that no one had called except the doctor and the parocco—the village priest; and after I had completed the arrangements and given Marietta generous payment for her kindness to the dead man, I came back to the inn.

Tony had disappeared early in the day to begin his investigations. 'Don't worry about me, Neil,' were his parting words. 'I 'm used to playing a "lone hand." I 'll report in due course, and if I 'm delayed I 'll let you know my movements.' The hours passed, and as there was no sign of him, I felt a little uneasy on his account; but later in the day a note came from him. It ran: 'I 'm not wasting time. Meet me at Bertolini's, Naples, to-morrow evening; and if I don't appear, go straight to London, where I shall join you.'

Much relieved (for I had a thorough belief in Tony's courage and acumen), I went to bed early, after having locked my room door, put the paper under my pillow, and laid my revolver within easy reach. Notwithstanding these precautions, I spent a restless, watchful night—quite unnecessarily, for, beyond the audible slumber of the padrone, not a sound came from the house. But I rose vaguely uneasy, determined to meet Tony in Naples with the least possible delay.

An English clergyman from Castellamare, the doctor, a couple of brown boatmen who used to row the invalid out in the bay, old Marietta, and myself were present when Hugh Forbes was laid to rest in the little, sunlit graveyard. Half-an-hour later I was ready to start for Naples, and after many tearful adieux and invocations to the Saints on my behalf from Marietta, I said good-bye to the little paradise of colour and sunshine.

(Continued on page 198.)

ST DUNSTAN'S AND THE BLINDED SOLDIER.

By An Officer-Pupil.

I.

AMONG all the institutions in existence for the re-education of men broken in the war, there is none with a more cheerful 'atmosphere, none with more self-reliant and confident inhabitants, than St Dunstan's, the hostel for blinded soldiers and sailors, in Regent's Park, London—'next door to the Zoo,' as some of the facetious pupils will tell the visitor. There is no suggestion of darkness or doom about the place; anything less like the valley of the shadow it would be difficult to imagine.

St Dunstan's in its present form is the creation of Sir Arthur Pearson and the National Institute for the Blind, of which he is the president and the inspiration. By practical experience Sir Arthur knows all about blindness. In the prime of life, and at the height of a career of great business achievement, he lost his sight. What would have been a tragedy for lesser men he has converted into a personal triumph over a misfortune of a most distressing kind, and into a means of the most valuable service in the cause of the blind community generally. When he himself became a citizen of the kingdom of the blind, he found that what was wanted there was a revolution, and he proceeded to head one, and to carry it through. The principle he worked on was that what blind people needed was not pity and charity; it was just what other people wanted—namely, education and training adapted to their peculiar circumstances, and, after that, opportunity to put the results of their training on the market at a price which would yield the wherewithal to live in decency and comfort.

When war broke out the National Institute for the Blind, which had comparatively lately become the leading organisation of its kind in this country, assumed responsibility for the care and the re-education of all members of the forces whose eyesight should be damaged or destroyed in action. The house known as St Dunstan's was handed over to Sir Arthur by its owner, Mr Otto Kahn, the well-known American financier, for the duration of the war. The work grew rapidly. Workrooms and classrooms have been erected in the spacious grounds of the house, which is now the headquarters of a large and populous establishment, with annexes in several parts of London, and convalescent establishments in Brighton and elsewhere. For the accommodation of officers there are two large houses in Portland Place, one of these having been lent by its owner, Sir John Stirling Maxwell. The officers reside at Portland Place, and pursue their studies at St Dunstan's, side-by-side with their comrades of the ranks.

II.

The plan of re-education follows three main lines. The pupil devotes himself to (1) learning to be blind; (2) elementary study of what the schoolmen call 'the humanities;' and (3) vocational training—that is, the acquisition of a craft or a profession.

To begin with, it has to be remembered that the man newly blinded is very much like a little child; the common, trivial things of life he has to learn all over again; he has even to learn to walk. This part of his new education begins, indeed, before he is on his feet. It begins with a visit in hospital from Sir Arthur, who tells the patient about St Dunstan's, about what other fellows are doing there, and about the infinite possibilities of life for a blind man. Sir Arthur speaks as one having authority. He is able not merely to enunciate precepts, but to show an example. By the end of the first interview the blind man finds life changed and wearing a new aspect. For the first time he is able to contemplate the future not only with fortitude, but with hope also. He finds, moreover, that, in some curious and perfectly definite way, any worries regarding finance and the welfare of his dependants, if he has any, have disappeared. Sir Arthur realises that a man newly blinded must be relieved of sordid cares if he is to make good under the new conditions.

It is difficult to describe the state of mind of the man newly blinded. This, of course, varies according to the nature of the individual. One man is crushed; another, more stoical, takes his punishment with grim resignation; a third, of an imaginative and sensitive temperament, is haunted and tortured by visions of an awful future. There is one feeling which is shared in greater or lesser intensity by all. This is the feeling of loneliness. Cut off from the sight of familiar things, the patient feels himself alone and in a new and terrible world. Like a stricken animal, he has a strong desire to creep away into hiding and to face his fate alone, with no spectators. This feeling of loneliness is not lessened, but is accentuated, by his arrival, say, in London, where sounds and smells arouse old memories and bring home to him in the most poignant manner the extent of his loss. Yet solitude is denied to him by the nature of his case. He is dependent on others for the trivialities of everyday life. The constant necessity which he is under to put his needs into words irritates and depresses him. Longing to be left to wrestle alone with the evil that has befallen him, his physical dependence galls him. The fact that those who attend him in hospital are zealous to do his bidding and to anticipate his needs does not help, in the initial stages, to reduce the sense of impotence and dependence.

It is while he is in this supersensitive frame of mind that there occurs the episode of the watch. In the course of his first interview with Sir Arthur the patient is presented with a watch, on whose dial the hours are so marked that the time can be told by touch. When his visitor has departed, leaving him interested but sceptical regarding the possibilities which life still holds for one like him, the blind man remembers the watch. He pulls it from under his pillow. Yes, it is true, he can read the time. Thank Heaven, there is one thing he can do for himself, one thing less to worry other people about! He feels somewhat like a child who, amid strange surroundings, discovers a familiar and a valued toy. And the newly blinded man resembles a child in a strange world. The episode of the watch is important. It marks a definite stage in the progress of the blind man's education. It marks also the dawn of independence, the first promise of relief from the eternal rôle of the suppliant. There are many other stages in the process of learning to be blind. These are reached and passed rapidly when, once clear of hospital, the man takes up life at St Dunstan's. The atmosphere of that place—an atmosphere of activity, bustle, and cheerful noise—soon dispels, or at all events mitigates, the sense of loneliness. The new-comer, finding that every hour of the day has its lesson or its task or its recreation, finding that other fellows in like case to his own are cheery, and busy, and full of hopes and plans for the future, regains his sense of proportion, finds out the course of study which best suits him, and settles down to learn life all over again, not now in the spirit of desperate resignation which at one time seemed the best that he could hope to attain to, but in the certain knowledge that the job is worth doing, and that he is fit for it.

III.

The curriculum at St Dunstan's includes two subjects that are compulsory. These are the reading and writing of Braille and the use of the ordinary typewriter. A thorough knowledge of these two subjects is essential for the man who desires to adopt a profession. It is a valuable possession for the craftsman who intends to conduct a business of his own, and it has obvious advantages as affording a means of recreation and culture, and as enabling the blind man to communicate with his friends by correspondence. Braille and typewriting are the first steps in the liberal education provided at St Dunstan's, or in what we have called the study of the humanities. After all, to teach a man to read is a great matter. Has not Carlyle described this as the highest function of a university? Braille is a system of embossed writing which can be read by touch. The characters of the alphabet, numerals, punctuation-marks, &c. are represented by raised dots, one to six in number, arranged in certain relative positions. There is no intellectual difficulty in the way of acquiring a theoretical knowledge of this system; indeed, since many of its rules are arbitrary, a good memory is perhaps a more valuable aid to the student than highly developed reasoning faculties. In order, however, to become expert and rapid readers, most men require patient and prolonged practice. It is a case of training the touch so that the fingers readily recognise the embossed characters; the reader has, so to speak, to put his eyes into the tips of his fingers. Personal experience would suggest that the horny-handed son of toil, or, at all events, the artisan who has been accustomed to the skilful use of tools, has, in the matter of Braille, a definite advantage over the person of more clerkly training, whose fingers have been used for tasks no more subtle than the holding of a pen or the fastening of a collar-stud. Some of the ladies who teach Braille have occasional experiences of the most gratifying kind. For example, one may have allotted to her a lad who, judged by normal standards, must be considered illiterate. His dialect alone seems to impose a hopeless barrier between teacher and pupil. Yet in the course of a month or two this unpromising subject may not only master the system, but may also develop a literary interest in what he reads. The gratifying aspect of such a case is that there has been introduced to the delights and the consolations of literature one who, in ordinary circumstances, might have lived and died in ignorance of anything more inspiring than police-court and sporting reports. The delights and the consolations of literature are more valuable to the blind than to any other class of people, and to provide the blind man with the means of access to these is to do him an inestimable service. Here it should be mentioned that the National Institute for the Blind and the National Library for the Blind possess large numbers of books printed in Braille, covering a wide range of literary interest. The contents of these libraries are at the service of all graduates of St Dunstan's.

The more strictly utilitarian accomplishment of typewriting is taught in the most thorough manner. The method does not vary much from that employed in the recognised schools where typewriting is taught, but in the case of the blind man personal tuition is essential, and great patience is demanded on the part of both teacher and pupil. A very substantial inducement is held out to the student, for, when he has passed a test in speed and accuracy of typing, he is presented with a first-class Remington typewriter. A certain number of St Dunstan's men acquire a knowledge of Braille shorthand, and supplementing this with very high technical skill as typists, qualify as correspondence clerks and secretaries. In these cases what we have called the liberal education impinges upon the vocational training which we now propose to describe.

Before we pass on to that subject, however, reference should be made to some of the other activities of St Dunstan's which are in the nature of what are called, in the language of the young ladies' seminary, 'the polite accomplishments.'

Every man who has a talent for music is encouraged to develop it under competent tuition. For this reason one may hear in every respite from work sounds, pleasant and unpleasant, of vocalists, pianists, violinists, and the blowers of brazen instruments practising with ardour. The care of the body is also attended to. The most popular form of recreation is perhaps rowing, for the pursuit of which admirable facilities exist close at hand in Regent's Park. The rag-time band, the amateur opera company, the dances which are held once or twice a week, the racing crews, the tug-o'-war teams, and so on are all recognised as valuable institutions in the life of a society whose members are striving towards the goal of normality.

IV.

Among the occupations for which complete training is provided at St Dunstan's are massage, poultry-farming, carpentry, telephone-operating, boot-repairing, basket-making, rug-making, and netting.

Students of massage go through the regular course and pass the recognised examinations. The course is a long and stiff one, and it is matter for satisfaction that up to date the failures before the examining body have been nil. The blind masseur is, as has been proved, quite as efficient as his sighted colleague practising this art. St Dunstan's has provided masseurs to several of the military hospitals, and their services have given complete satisfaction. There are also a number of St Dunstan's masseurs in private practice in London and elsewhere. These men make good incomes, and massage ranks high among the occupations suitable for the blind.

Poultry-keeping is taught at St Dunstan's by experts and on the most approved lines. As an occupation poultry-farming appeals strongly to officers and men who have been accustomed to life in the open air. In addition to acquiring a sound theoretical knowledge of the care and management of poultry, the St Dunstan's farmer learns to distinguish breeds and birds by touch, to weigh fowls in his hands, to handle eggs, and to make pens and runs. He is taught also how, by taste, smell, and touch, to ascertain the composition and the value of foods. When he has completed his course and has satisfied the examiners, the St Dunstan's poultry-farmer is set up in business with a suitable place and an adequate stock of birds. It may have been noticed that one of the passengers on board the Galway Castle, when she was torpedoed, was a South African corporal, who was homeward bound from St Dunstan's with all his stock for the establishment of a poultry-farm. Luckily both the corporal and his mother, who was accompanying him, were saved, but all his pretty chickens were destroyed at one fell swoop.

Telephone-operating may seem a strange vocation for a blind man. As a matter of fact, it is quite easily learned by men of intelligence, and many great business houses employ St Dunstan's men in charge of their private exchanges. Boot-repairing, carpentry, rug-making, and basket-weaving are all industries at which the blind man may earn a modest living. The cobbler's shop is probably the most fascinating sight at St Dunstan's. All visitors are amazed at the deftness and the speed which are shown by these blind workmen, and by the certainty with which they go about their tasks. Netting does not rank as an industry, but it is taught and encouraged as a pleasant occupation for idle hours. Hammocks, fruit-nets, and various net-bags are manufactured at St Dunstan's, and these meet with a ready sale. Some of the occupations mentioned are supplementary one to another. The poultry-farmer has his carpenter's shop, from which he can turn out articles of commercial value; the boot-repairer may also do a good deal as a basket-weaver or a rug-maker; and the netting of hammocks, &c., provides a pleasant and profitable occupation for the employment of odd half-hours which would otherwise be wasted in idle moping.

In connection with all the subjects taught there is a system of tests or examinations. The principle is that every workman turned out by the institution should be competent. Scamped or second-rate work is not tolerated, for it is recognised that only through complete efficiency can the blind worker hope to hold his own against sighted competition. It would be easy to exploit the blinded hero as a commercial speculation, but any tendency towards that sort of thing is sternly discountenanced. One result is that when the authorities want a place for a telephone-operator, or a shorthand-typist, or a masseur, they go into the market with a clear knowledge that they can deliver the goods they promise.

An interesting feature of the instruction given at St Dunstan's consists in the employment, as teachers, of men who have themselves been blinded in the war. Pupils who show special aptitude for such work are given employment as instructors of their comrades. The blind teacher has proved a success from the technical point of view; his moral value as a stimulus to his pupils is obvious.

v.

Very important work is performed by the After Care Department. This department keeps in touch with St Dunstan's men after they have gone out into the world. It supplies at cost price to those who require them the raw materials of their industry, and it markets for them the finished article. A vigilant eye is kept on the work as it comes in for disposal, and should a fault appear, it is at once pointed out to the workman. Should the fault persist, an expert is sent to visit the man, to explain wherein his work is defective, and to show him how to regain perfect execution. Experience proves that a fault once established in the work of a blind man is very difficult to eradicate; hence the need of vigilant supervision and immediate correction where necessary. In many other directions the After Care Department exercises a beneficent influence. Its work will go on long after the war is over. It is designed to persist during the life-time of him who shall prove to be the last surviving pupil of St Dunstan's.

A considerable number of those who pass through St Dunstan's are able, with the aid of what they learn there, to resume the business or professional careers which they abandoned at the call of the country. Evidence accumulates of the success achieved by these pupils, both officers and men. By former students St Dunstan's is already represented in the law and the Church, and through its masseurs it is closely associated with medicine. It is probable that in the future its representation in the learned professions will grow. The range of its influence extends throughout all parts of the Empire, and in Canada particularly there is a very active After Care organisation under the direction of a former pupil, resident in the Dominion. A number of soldiers of several Allied States are or have been among its pupils, so that the reputation of St Dunstan's may be said to be world-wide.

Life at St Dunstan's has its humorous side. A famous story of the early days is concerned with an adventure which befell a young officer student while dining down town at a well-known hotel. In the true spirit of St Dunstan's, he disdained assistance in making his way downstairs, but he had miscalculated the number of steps, with the result that he took the last flight at a bound, and arrived full tilt in the arms of a dignified hall-porter. 'Very sorry, porter,' he explained apologetically. 'You see, I'm blind.' 'I see, sir,' murmured the dignified one in a confidential tone; 'but we can't have you here in that condition. I'll call a taxi and send you home.' An incident of recent occurrence is remarkable in another way. An officer homeward bound from St Dunstan's to Portland Place was making his way across Regent's Park through a dense fog, which had paralysed traffic, but did not, naturally, affect him. He heard approaching the halting steps of some wayfarer who obviously was in difficulties. The blinded officer hailed the unknown with a cheery 'Who goes there?' and dismally through the fog came the response, 'British officer on leave from France, fed up and lost in London.' There followed a brief colloquy, and then the St Dunstan's officer took the sighted comrade by the arm, guided him through the park and across the Marylebone Road, and there gave him his route to the haven where he fain would be. The incident suggests an addendum to the Scriptural speculation as to the consequences that ensue when the blind act as leaders of the blind.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XI.—continued.

GINGER and Tosher, with an escort, of which I formed part, were before the colonel. The Old Man, I could see, was pained and sad. This was the first real 'dust-up' in the school. Blase-Bones gave his evidence. Then the colonel sorrowfully raised his head and quietly asked, 'Well, men, what have you got to say?'

'I regret, sir, having committed a breach of discipline, but the officers in my own regiment never addressed me in such a manner. Lieutenant Blase-Bones apparently has a contempt for the New Army. I belong to the First Hundred Thousand, and I decline to be treated in this way. The commission is nothing to me, sir, and I desire to be returned to my battalion. This officer has not heard a shot fired in the war.' Thus Ginger.

Blase-Bones turned ghastly white.

'Is that all you have to say?' inquired the 'com.'

'Yes, sir.'

'And your defence?' he asked Tosher.

'I'm just real sorry, colonel, to waste your time. But since this foolish boy blew into our shack, there's been nothing but cursing and muttered revolution. Why, sir, we were the happiest bunch of kids in the British Army when Old Bobby Blessem was boss of the show.'

'You mean Lieutenant Blessem, I presume,' said the colonel, correcting him.

'I guess you're right, colonel; but you know in the Western world we talk free and mean no offence.'

'I quite understand,' answered the C.O. tactfully. 'Go on.' There was a twinkle in the corner of the C.O.'s eye.

'I'm a Canadian, sir. I'm here to give the Old Land a lift against these blasted Huns. But I ain't here to be knocked around by flannel-headed hobos.'

'Just a minute, Johnson,' said the colonel. 'I am asking for your defence, and as a future officer you must realise that expressions of opinion have no bearing on the case. You are charged with dirty equipment and insolence. Please keep to the first.'

'Sure, sir! My belt was clean as it was for the Prince o' Wales's inspection in France. What's good enough for the son of a king is good enough for any two-pipped child in this institooshun. As for insolence, I reckon we Canadians ain't out to grovel at the feet of snobs, though we don't mind givin' a "sir" now and again to a white man like yourself.'

'But don't you see that a young officer, unacquainted with the Canadian temperament, might misinterpret your attitude?'

'Maybe, colonel; but it's up to you to educate this child. I'm no chicken in the fighting business. Out West I make ten thousand dollars a year. Seems to me that your old machinery's all wrong. And I guess you can't do me in so long as these things are hanging around my figure,' concluded Tosher, throwing the Military Medal and the D.C.M. on the table.

Blase-Bones was trembling. I felt sorry for the ass.

There was a strange silence in the room for a couple of minutes. The colonel was outwardly studying conduct-sheets, but in reality he was weighing up in his own mind how he could maintain justice without letting an officer down in front of the rank and file. It was an awkward position. Much depended on his decision. He knew there was a whole Canadian Government behind Tosher, and a House of Commons behind Ginger. He also knew that if he muddled the issue, the War Office might promptly lift him out of his job. The commandant, as one of the old school, was nobly striving to bring the Manual of Military Law into line with the blunt (but honest) democracy of the New Army and the Canadian Force.

At last he looked up at Ginger and inquired, 'Will you take my punishment?'

'Yes, sir.' Ginger had complete confidence in the C.O.

'And you?' he asked Tosher.

'I guess I will, colonel, if it doesn't mean time in a stone-breakin' institooshun.'

'Very well! In my opinion there's been a great lack of tact on the part of your officer, just as there has been a great lack of sense on your part. It is not for you to reply on parade. If you have a grievance, come to me. I'm paid to keep everybody in order. I'm going to punish you for that. If there is no discipline, there is no army. You, as future officers, must realise that. Both of you will be confined to camp for a week. Understand?'

'Yes, sir.'

'But,' said the colonel, 'I request your platoon commander to apologise to you here in my presence. You are good soldiers. You have both been honoured by the King. Your officer has no right to cast aspersions on the New Army, and to conduct his work in a manner calculated to stir hostility. I won't have it.—Please apologise, Mr Blase-Bones.'

'I'm—exceedingly sorry. I'm afraid I've made a—mistake. I hope you will pardon me,' muttered the crestfallen subaltern.

'Fall out, men,' said the C.O. kindly.

We were marched out, Ginger and Tosher quite well pleased with the colonel's verdict.

The C.O. knew his job.

That night Colonel Eat-All went to his quarters weary and worn. The affair had made him most unhappy. He was rather afraid of what the Canadian might do. However, on opening the door of his hut, he was surprised to see a beautiful bowl of red roses standing on the table. He called his servant and asked where they came from.

'Don't know, sir. When I came back after tea they were there.'

'That's all, thank you.'

The colonel went forward and picked up the bunch of flowers. There was a tiny label attached. On the label he read: 'To our Dear Old Colonel—from two Defaulters.'

Something fell on the old man's hand. It was a tear.

. . . . . .

'Battalion Orders [A week later].

'Lieutenant Blase-Bones, having left to re-join his unit, is struck off the strength of the Battalion.'

(Verb. sap.)

(Continued on page 207.)

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS.

STEEL SOLDIERS FOR FRONT-LINE TRENCHES.

IF the war had lasted much longer, there is little doubt that we should have witnessed attempts to employ what may be termed automatic soldiers for the defence of front-line trenches. Many inventors were working with this object in view when the armistice put an end (it is to be hoped permanently) to any need for such devices. Among these inventors was a Danish engineer, who has patented an automatic fighting-machine for the defence of trenches, which was illustrated lately in Popular Science Siftings. The device consists of an outer stationary cylinder, telescoping into which is another with a domed top, both being of shell-proof steel. When out of action the dome of the inner cylinder is level with the ground. If a position has to be defended it is made to rise eighteen inches, thus appearing above the top of the trench, and machine-guns in the dome pointing at different angles begin firing in the direction from which the enemy is approaching. The domes are capable of rotating through a short arc, so as to cover the entire field in front of them. These automatic soldiers are spaced about three yards apart, and they can be worked by wireless from several miles behind the firing-line. Trials with the device are said to have given very promising results.

THE 'BABY' TANK.

It has long been known that the tank played an important rôle in the victory of the Allies on the Western front, this being especially true of the 'whippet' tanks of the British and the Renault tanks of the French. The latter were also largely used by the American Army, and an illustrated description of a Renault or 'baby' tank recently appeared in an American journal. In general the construction is similar to that of the earlier and larger tanks, the body, which is about thirteen feet in length, with a width of three feet, having the usual caterpillar belt on each side. At the forward end is a seat for the pilot, whose legs project into the low front, where there are pedals for working the brake, the clutch, and the accelerator, the steering and gear levers being worked by the hands. Just in front of the pilot's face are slits one-eighth of an inch wide for him to see through, these being in a hinged door that can be raised if desired. Behind and above him is a revolving turret, under which the gunner sits on a broad leather strap, and works a machine or quick-firing gun. Some of these tanks, it may be noted, have been fitted with a short-barrel seventy-five-millimetre (three-inch) gun. Observation slits are also provided for the gunner, who can swing himself round with the turret and fire in any direction. A door over the pilot's legs forms the entrance to the tank, and there is an emergency exit in the back of the turret. The hindpart of the body accommodates the motor, the radiator, the tanks, and the reduction gear. Steering is effected by disconnecting one caterpillar belt or allowing the clutch to slip, when the other belt slews the tank round. Speeds up to seven miles an hour are obtainable. These tanks will negotiate shell-holes, and pass through water as much as three feet deep; while they are said to be capable of climbing inclines of something like fifty degrees with the horizontal. Their weight in fighting-trim is about seven tons.

BUTTERFLY'S STRANGE PROTECTIVE DEVICES.

A wonderful collection of Australian insects has been formed by Mr F. P. Dodd, of Kuranda, Queensland, who has also made a careful study of the habits of many of the eight thousand specimens he and his sons have got together. Everylady's Journal describes this collection in a series of articles, one of which contains the following interesting account of a rare butterfly, which, throughout the various stages of its existence, is endowed by nature with strange protective devices. 'Liphyra brassolis [Mr Dodd had the honour of revealing this particular butterfly to the entomological world] begins by being an uncommon caterpillar. Instead of a soft, flexible skin, it has a hard, rigid, shell-like covering; and instead of living on green leaves, it feeds on the larvæ of the deeply interesting green tree-ant. Into the nest Brassolis walks uninvited, and, clamping itself to the floor to protect its soft underparts, it is safe, for the ants' thin, sharp mandibles cannot penetrate the tough skin of the intruder. . . . When its time comes to change into a chrysalis it effects another very unusual performance by detaching itself from its outer skin and snuggling up inside it, so that if you pick the skin up and shake it, it rattles like an acorn with a loose kernel. But perhaps the most extraordinary feature of Brassolis is the manner in which it is protected in its next stage. When the perfect insect breaks out of its prison, it is a tender, helpless object. Here is the chance for revenge, and the ants hasten to take it out of the stranger. But what is this? A butterfly that is white instead of a rich brown and black! The truth is that Nature has powdered not only the wings but the legs, face, horns, and vulnerable parts of the body with an outer covering of white scales that are loose, but somewhat adhesive, and stick to the ants' horns (antennæ), legs, and jaws, so they are soon in a sorry and ridiculous plight. They hobble ludicrously about, opening and closing their now feathery-looking jaws; and by the time they have cleared their antennæ, jaws, and legs of this clogging material, their apparently helpless victim has negotiated the passage, found the exit, and attached itself to some projecting twig till its wings have lengthened and hardened enough to carry it. The protecting scales, which have so marvellously served their purpose, and are no longer required, fly off at the first few strokes of the wings, and the king of all butterflies—as regards life-history—flits away in its garb of rich brown and velvety black.'

FISH STOPPED BY ELECTRIC CURRENTS.

Where rivers from which fish are taken in large quantities are used for irrigation, as on the Pacific coast of North America, a huge loss takes place through millions of the young fish passing into the irrigation channels and thence on to the land. It is true that the difficulty can be got over by the use of gratings or screens, but this plan only cures one ill to introduce another—the need for frequent removal from the screens of weeds, leaves, and other débris. Recently, however, an electric arrangement has been invented by Mr H. T. Burkey, of Tulsa, Oklahoma, whereby the fish are stopped without putting any obstructions in the irrigation intakes. It was found that by placing a metal plate or rod at each side of a channel and passing an alternating electric current between them, the intervening water became highly charged with electricity. One pair of such electrodes alone is not entirely effective; but several pairs placed at intervals, with electric currents progressively increasing in strength, completely stop the fish from getting past. Presumably the fish, finding the shocks grow stronger and stronger as they proceed, are at length induced to turn back. The amount of current used is very small, and the cost of working the apparatus almost negligible when compared with the saving in fish.

AGRICULTURAL RAILWAYS.

Among the many problems recently investigated by the Ministry of Reconstruction is that of transport in rural districts, the need for adequate means of carrying agricultural produce and passengers between villages and the nearest railway stations having been emphasised in the replies from county councils and other public bodies to a circular letter sent out by Dr Addison asking their views on reconstruction matters. After careful study of the requirements and the available transport systems, the department concerned has recommended a network of light rail tracks with a two-foot 'gauge,' and these, as they are designed to foster agriculture, have been given the appropriate name of 'Agrails.' To some people, rails only two feet apart may seem to form too small a track to serve any useful purpose. Such is by no means the case, however, many small railways used in factories and for carrying out important works being of two feet gauge, while hundreds of miles of this width have been employed for military purposes at the various 'fronts.' Passengers have been carried for years past on railways having much narrower gauges. The agrails are to be laid by the sides of roads, where these are wide enough, or over ditches, so as to reduce to a minimum the amount of land required. Single lines are proposed, with frequent passing loops, and a speed of twenty miles an hour is suggested. Where electricity is available, it will probably be used for traction on the principle of the electric tram. In other parts steam or oil motors will be employed, and on branches to the various farms the trucks may be hauled by horses. Some form of container that can be loaded at the farm and easily transferred to ordinary railway trucks is almost certain to form part of the scheme, while the introduction of vehicles adaptable to either agrails or roads is not improbable. Presumably the system will be self-supporting, while at the same time lowering the cost of transport and expediting deliveries. Military material is being utilised at Biggleswade by the Board of Agriculture for an experimental scheme on the above lines.

BEECH-NUTS AS A SOURCE OF FOOD.

A great shortage of edible oils and fats is still prevalent in Holland, and to help in easing the position, school children have been employed in gathering beech-nuts, from which considerable quantities of oil can be obtained. In addition, the cake coming from the filter-presses makes excellent cattle food. According to the Zutphen Gazette, the recently appointed Dutch Minister of Agriculture estimated the quantity of nuts available at over two thousand two hundred tons, from which nearly four hundred tons of oil could be extracted. The children were to be paid at the rate of about twopence farthing for every pound of nuts; while the owners of the land were to receive 5 per cent. of this amount as compensation, and to have a prior claim to purchase at a fixed rate the cattle cake made from nuts gathered on their property.

THE GRAND CANAL OF CHINA TO BE PUT IN ORDER.

Most of us have learnt something about the Grand Canal of China in our youth, and know that it is by far the longest in the world, extending as it does from Hangchow to Tientsin (the port of Peking), a distance of nearly one thousand miles, and crossing on the way two of the world's largest rivers—the Hoang-ho and the Yangtse-kiang. For about one hundred and thirty miles north of the latter river the canal is still navigable, but thence to Tientsin it has become choked with mud, and is generally derelict. A project is now on foot to reconstruct the northern sections, and this work is to be done gradually as funds are available. For the time being only about one and a quarter million pounds can be devoted to the work, which in the first instance is to consist of putting in order a section one hundred miles in length. The carrying out of the project has been entrusted to American engineers.

WHITE-PAINTED TANKS ECONOMISE PETROL.

Owing to the high price of petrol, the loss from evaporation has become an appreciable item in the cost of this commodity when large quantities are stored in tanks. The British Red Cross Society, being extensive users of petrol for their ambulance-cars, and desirous of studying economy, have made numerous experiments with a view to minimising this wastage. As is well known, the loss by evaporation varies with the temperature, and one way of reducing it is to sink the tanks into the ground. In this position, however, it was found that rapid corrosion soon led to the formation of small holes, through which leakage took place. Experiments were then carried out to ascertain what was the best method of securing a minimum temperature for surface tanks. With this end in view a number of steel tanks, one covered with tin-plate, and each of the others painted a different colour, were placed at a distance of three feet from a powerful electric arc light. The rise in temperature after fifteen minutes was carefully noted. The tin-plate gave the best result, the difference in temperature being only 18·4 degrees; next came aluminium paint with 19·7, and then white paint with 21·9. At the other end of the scale dark green gave a difference of 38·9 degrees, and black 52·6 degrees. The general conclusion arrived at was that white paint would prove the most satisfactory, having due regard to comparative cost and efficiency.

FROM THE EARTH TO THE MOON.

The speed of a shell when leaving the muzzle of a gun of ordinary dimensions ranges up to three thousand feet, or considerably over half a mile, per second. What was the muzzle velocity of the shells fired into Paris in the spring of last year is not accurately known, but it is believed to have been about a mile per second. According to an article in the Journal of the Royal Artillery by Major J. Maitland-Addison, a shell with a muzzle velocity of five miles a second, if fired at the correct angle, would become an attendant satellite of the earth, going round it in a little under one and a half hours. Should the speed be increased to seven miles a second, the shell would go off into space altogether, and presumably could be sent to the moon, à la Jules Verne, if it were correctly aimed.

A BOON TO THE IMPORTER AND EXPORTER.

Again and again have British consuls urged upon those engaged in foreign trade the importance of preparing catalogues in which prices and quantities are quoted in the currency, weights, and measures of the countries with which it is sought to do business. The labour involved and the time expended in the preparation of such catalogues have hitherto been great deterrents to many traders; but the publication of the first volume of Mr James Robertson's Dictionary for International Commercial Quotations makes every difficulty vanish, and reduces the time and labour involved to an almost negligible quantity so far as the countries of Europe are concerned. With this set of tables before him, even the office-boy can at once ascertain the equivalent of, say, three shillings and eightpence half-penny or thirty-five shillings and elevenpence in the coinage of any European country at any likely rate of exchange; with this volume on her desk, the junior typist can almost instantaneously translate the British price per yard into francs per metre, the price per hundredweight into roubles per pood, the price per gallon into kroner per litre, and so on. The translation of foreign rates into their British equivalents can be effected just as readily, so that the importer is benefited quite as much as the exporter. In both cases ample provision is made for fluctuations in exchange, and an absolutely reliable method of checking the results obtained is given. We understand that two similar volumes dealing with America and the East respectively are in active preparation; also waistcoat-pocket abridgments adapted for use in individual countries. Provided with these tables, which are a miracle of ingenuity and of patient, persevering industry, the British trader dealing with foreign countries can give a quotation or compile his price-lists in the money, weights, and measures of the foreigner with ease, accuracy, and quickness; the commercial traveller abroad can with equal facility quote on the spot to any prospective purchaser of his wares; while both can readily interpret quotations expressed in a currency not their own.

AFFORESTATION.

That a well-planned and properly co-ordinated scheme of afforestation on a large scale should at once be undertaken in this country is a commonplace with those who realise the amount the nation is losing every year through its neglect of forestry. The essential features of such a scheme are well set forth in a little book on Afforestation written by Mr John Boyd, Crown Forester. He indicates the necessary preliminary measures to be taken; shows how agriculture and forestry may work into each other's hands, as it were, to their mutual benefit; and discusses with adequate knowledge the vexed question of game. He also offers valuable practical suggestions on 'various problems which are bound to arise in connection with the inauguration of any scheme of afforestation—questions as to where planting operations should commence, of altitude, shelter, and aspect, and soil quality;' he shows how the natural herbage of an area may be used as a reliable index of its tree-bearing capabilities, and rounds off a most useful little manual with a series of notes on the varieties of trees best adapted for different localities, altitudes, and meteorological conditions.

To Correspondents who wish fuller information regarding new inventions, publications, &c. mentioned here, addresses will be furnished, when possible, provided a stamped and addressed envelope or post-card be sent to the Editor, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.

JAGTAP'S FINESSE.

By Arbory Glyndon.

'IF it be the will of the gods that I die before you, will you marry again?' This was the question which Doraiungum Pillai put to his wife one evening when lowering clouds and bellowing cattle proclaimed a stormy night to follow. And Sivagami, with true feminine instinct, parried the question with another: 'If I die before you, will you marry again?' The obligation of courtesy rested with Doraiungum, who was sincerely attached to his wife, and he declared that if it should be his cruel fate to become a widower, he would remain one to the end of his days. Sivagami made a similar promise, because she loved her husband faithfully, and so the compact was sealed with mutual understanding and honest intention.

Now, the couple were in the spring of life and comely in appearance. They were satisfied in the knowledge that they had been educated in English schools and belonged to the progressive section of their community. Hence Doraiungum's solicitude, for, according to Hindu custom and usage, there are three inflexible rules which determine the conjugal outlook of an orthodox Hindu woman: she cannot choose her husband; she may not remain unmarried; and once married, she may not marry again. But Sivagami had disregarded the law of widowhood three years ago. She had been left a widow in her eighth year, and Doraiungum became her second husband when she was seventeen and he twenty-two years old. He was spoken of as a fortunate man. His lands in Chitorpatti were wide, and yielded a desirable income; his wife was handsome and intelligent. Certain it is that they were contented, for the wall of love was built high around them. It was not with Doraiungum as with so many other men of his caste. As a rule, the Hindu marries, not for companionship in his destiny of pleasure and pain, but to acquire a slave who will bear him children and be subservient to his rule.

The prosperous and happy pair lacked just one thing—the gods had not pronounced their benison on the comfortable home. But why should they despair? Without doubt Doraiungum would have a son to take charge of his obsequies, and make easy his passage to the other world when the time came for him to perform the journey. He was regular in his pilgrimages to the shrine of the powerful god Subramaniya at Palni. On occasion he would dress in orange-red clothes, put ashes on his face, shoulder his kavadi or offering of milk or fish, and set out, preceded by a man with a bell and another with a tom-tom, to seek the blessing of the deity. For Subramaniya is an autocrat, and he who would approach him must do so in the guise of a beggar, in all humbleness and humiliation, to make his votive offering. Sivagami, too, had made her vows to the great Venkata Rama at the temple of Tirupati; and who is there greater to supplicate for progeny? Surely their united prayers and offerings would obtain for them the gift of children.

But there is no happiness for man! We are reminded constantly of the capricious lease on which we hold life. Time sweeps us along in its swift-flowing stream, and sooner or later we meet the barque which is to carry us out to the Great Beyond where, perhaps, our joys and aspirations are of a higher and purer order. We can only conjecture; the gods alone know—and they will not tell. Happiness may endure for a season, but sorrow comes surely as night follows day. It is all Karma, the law of cause and effect, the rule and order of our fate. Suddenly Doraiungum sickened of a fever, and a few days later died, in the month of Karttika, about the time of the Dipavali, or Feast of Lamps.

Sivagami was left with a goodly share of this world's possessions and a face and form of much beauty to bemoan the early departure of her dear husband. Her grief was real and deep. She forbore from the loud expressions of frenzied sorrow enjoined by custom and tradition, and her conduct gave rise to much scandalous chit-chat amongst the neighbours, who complained that she was so grossly stupid that 'she had not a word to say, but only wept.' His people came to burn the body, but Sivagami would not permit them to do so. She desired, she said, to keep watch over the corpse until nothing but the bones remained, and then to have them with her while she lived, for she was still his faithful wife. In this matter she was obdurate. She had a pit made at a reasonable distance from the house, into which the body was removed with tender care, and she took up her abode near by in a raised structure, such as the watchers of fields sit in at night to scare away birds and beasts. When the disintegrating forces of nature had done their work, and only the bones were left, Sivagami gathered them together and brought them to her house, and went through the ceremony of purification after contamination by the dead. All men wished to marry her, but none would she have. She still wore her little gold tahli, the ornament which is a sign of marriage with Hindu ladies, and she said to all, pointing to the bones, 'I have a husband.' Truly, Sivagami was a faithful wife!

Now, rumours of Sivagami's beauty spread far, and when the Raja of Bundipura heard them he greatly desired that she should enter his zenana. To that end he selected from among his most reliable retainers an envoy, and loaded him with costly presents for the lady. The Court astrologers were consulted, and they fixed an auspicious day during the Pongol festival, which celebrates the winter solstice. Accordingly on that day—about a year after Doraiungum's death—the envoy set out to express the royal sentiments. But the astrologers must have erred in their calculations, as they sometimes do, for the envoy met with the same reply as others had received. Pointing to the bones, Sivagami said, 'I have a husband.' The envoy returned abashed, but his account of her beauty so infatuated the Raja that he determined to pay court in person. And thus it came about that in the palace at Bundipura there was much commotion over the preparations for a long journey to Chitorpatti, in the Dakshinapatha or Southern Country, where the widow resided.

In the Raja's employ was a man who abused even the permission some men have to be ugly. His name was Jagtap. He was a wizened but astute little creature, one of the multitude of sycophants in Oriental Courts, and what he lacked in appearance he made up for in cunning. Jagtap was unmarried, and he saw no reason why he should not be mated to a rich woman, if he mated at all. Here wealth and beauty were found together. The combination was alluring; for what is more to be desired in this world than a beautiful wife to welcome you home, and her money to keep you company when you are out of it?

Jagtap approached the Raja with his petition: 'Maharaj, your slave would like to see this woman.'

The Raja was amused. 'What is the use of your going?' he asked. 'You are a pauper. You have nothing to boast of but your face, and that is an unenviable possession.'

'True, Maharaj,' replied Jagtap; 'but it is my face. It was not made for me, perhaps; but I have lived with it for forty years and know its faults, and, such as it is, I have learned to endure it. I have no thought of marriage, but merely wish to look upon this wonderful woman who lives with her husband's bones, and, if the great king will permit his slave to go with him, I shall also see another country.'

The Raja thereupon agreed.

Jagtap retired to his house to formulate his plan of action, for the passing idea had developed into a fixed purpose, and he knew, from what he had heard, that it would be necessary to resort to finesse to win the widow. In the evening he told his mother to put up a bundle of rice and condiments against the journey, which was to begin on the morrow. That night he spent some hours away from home, on a secret mission; and on the following day, with his bundle of rice and a mysterious basket, he set out in the Raja's retinue for the widow's country.

They duly arrived at their destination, and began negotiations on behalf of the Raja's suit. Valuable presents were offered, and refused; praises of the Raja and his virtues, arguments setting forth the felicity of such a union, all fell on deaf ears. And it was equally futile when the Raja pressed his suit in person. Sivagami was true to her bones, and would not permit him to take their place.

Meanwhile Jagtap had kept discreetly out of the way. When the royal train left Chitorpatti a few days later, carrying away the disappointed and chagrined suitor, it left Jagtap behind; and that evening he visited the woman's house for the first time, accompanied by his mysterious basket. He had timed himself to arrive when it was dusk. He asked Sivagami's father for a night's shelter, as he was a weary stranger from the north, on his way to the great Subramaniya's shrine at Palni. The request was granted, and food was placed before him and a sleeping-mat provided.

Jagtap partook of the food, and after spreading the mat, opened his basket and extracted therefrom the greater portion of a human skeleton, which he placed beside him, reverently and with many deep sighs.

Sivagami's father was astounded. 'What is the meaning of this?' he asked.

Jagtap replied that they were the bones of his dear wife; they went wherever he went.

'Appa, appa,' exclaimed the old man, 'this is wonderful! My daughter keeps the bones of her late husband; look for yourself.'

Then said Jagtap, 'I promised my wife that I would never marry again if she died before me;' and Sivagami declared, 'I made just such a promise to my husband.'

After this exchange of confidences the family retired to rest, but Jagtap kept awake. At midnight, when all were asleep, he stealthily entered the women's quarter and cautiously removed the bones which were lying beside Sivagami. Then he gathered together the bones he had brought with him, and, carrying both sets, groped his way in the dark to the kitchen, in the most retired part of the house, and quite out of view of strangers. There, near the hearth in the south-west corner, which is known as the side of the god of fire, he placed both skeletons, and returned to his mat, chuckling over the success of his adventure.

Early in the morning he awakened the household with the violence of his grief. 'My wife is not here. Where has she gone?' wailed Jagtap. Sivagami also discovered her loss, and began weeping. The other people of the house searched, and found the two skeletons together near the hearth. Then fresh lamentations broke out because female bones were found lying near male bones.

There was a great uproar. Jagtap left the house proclaiming loudly to the neighbours that his wife's bones had been decoyed by Sivagami's husband's bones. But he returned in a couple of hours and informed the family that he had visited a darsana (a man who gets inspired), and from him learnt that the bones had fallen in love with each other at the command of Yama, the god of the dead, who was displeased with the absurd promises of the living parties; and the darsana was of opinion that in the circumstances it was fitting that the husband of the wife's bones and the wife of the husband's bones should marry, so that together they might propitiate the deity. The suggestion was odious, Sivagami said frankly. Jagtap tried all his powers of persuasion. 'I have been true to my wife,' he said, 'withstanding many overtures of marriage; you have been true to your husband; but the gods have married them and mocked us. Why should we repine any longer? We are both people of deep affections, and your constancy and beauty have turned my liver to water. Let us marry and live for each other, leaving our dead partners to their ghostly affections. It is our Karma; let us enjoy the blessings of the gods, who have thus brought us together.'

When persuasion failed, Jagtap threatened. He would seek justice in a court of law, and then the good name of Doraiungum Pillai would be disgraced for ever. The hearth was nearer to Sivagami's apartment than to Jagtap's couch; both skeletons were found there; so what clearer proof could be had that he had been wronged by her husband? There was ample ground for legal proceedings, which would necessitate the employment of vakils, or Indian lawyers, who would swallow all the money that Sivagami possessed.

Such arguments were unanswerable, and so Jagtap obtained by a simple ruse what the Raja of Bundipura, with all his wealth, was unable to procure.

 TO CONTRIBUTORS.

1*st.* All communications should be addressed to 'The Editor, Chambers's Journal, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.'

2*nd.* For its return in case of ineligibility, postage-stamps should accompany every manuscript.

3*rd.* To secure their safe return if ineligible, ALL MANUSCRIPTS, whether accompanied by a letter of advice or otherwise, should have the writer's Name and Address written upon them IN FULL.

4*th.* Poetical contributions should invariably be accompanied by a stamped and directed envelope.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE BLOWER OF BUBBLES.

By ARTHUR BEVERLEY BAXTER, Author of Mr Craighouse of New York, Satirist; The Man who Scoffed; &c.

PART I.

I.

SNOW was falling in Sloane Square, quarrelling with rain as it fell. Lamps were gleaming sulkily in Sloane Square, as though they resented being made to work on such a night, and had more than a notion to down tools and go out of business altogether. Motor-cars were passing through Sloane Square, with glaring lights, sliding and skidding like inebriated dragons; and the clattering hoofs of horses drawing vagabond cabs sounded annoyingly loud in the damp-charged air of Sloane Square.

It was Christmas Eve in Sloane Square, and the match-woman, the vender of newspapers, and the impossible road-sweeper were all exacting the largesse of passers-by, who felt that the sixpenny generosity of a single night atoned for a year's indifference to their lot. People were wishing each other a merry Christmas in Sloane Square, as they struggled along under ungainly parcels. The muffin-man was doing an enormous trade.

And I looked from my window and prayed for Aladdin's Lamp or the Magic Carpet, that I might place a thousand miles between myself and Sloane Square.

There was a knock at the door.

'Enter the Slave of the Lamp,' said I, and the door opened to admit—my landlady, Mrs Mulvaney.

'Will you be dining in?' she said. Her Irish accent hardly helped the illusion of the all-potent slave.

'And why not?' I asked.

'Ach, nothing, sor. I only thought' ——

'An unwomanly thing to do, Mrs Mulvaney.'

'You're afther being a strange one, dining alone on Christmas Eve.'

'Then join me, Mrs Mulvaney.'

I swear she blushed, and I felt more than a little envious of the nature which could convert such a vinegary attempt at condescension into a gallantry.

'F'what would I be doing, taking dinner wid a child like you?'

I was twenty-five, but Mrs Mulvaney looked on all men as equally immature.

'And have you not got no friends?' she went on, but I stopped her with a gesture.

'Thank Heaven—no!' I said. 'I am one of intellectuality's hermits. An educated man in London is like the bell-cow of the herd—a thing apart.'

'You're a great fool, I'm afther thinking.'

'The foolish always damn the wise,' I answered, with an attempt at epigrammatic misquotation.

Mrs Mulvaney heaved a sigh. Its very forcefulness recalled the nautical meaning of the verb.

'You'd be a sight happier outside,' she said. 'Holy Mary knows I wouldn't be driving you into the streets, but I'm worried you'd get cross wid yourself at home.'

To get rid of her, I put on my coat and went out. Perhaps she was right; things would have been intolerable at home. Home! Such a travesty of the word! The sickly lamplight of Sloane Square was preferable.

'Merry Christmas, guv'nor!' said the road-sweeper.

'Merry fiddlesticks!' I growled, and gave him sixpence. I tried to avoid the vender of newspapers, but he spotted my fur collar with the instinct of a mendicant, handing me a paper and his blessing.

''Appy Christmas, milord!' said he.

I paid him a shilling for his diplomacy.

Thinking to escape the match-woman, I altered my course, but with the intuition of her sex she contrived to put herself directly in my path.

'It's a cauld nicht,' she moaned, in a rickety, quavering Scottish voice—'a cauld, wintry nicht. Ye'll be haein' a wee box o' matches, aw'm thinkin'?'

I gave her twopence for them, and she shivered with cold as her skinny fingers clutched the coins. I can think of no excuse for my parsimony except the fact that I didn't need the wretched box—matches were not yet a luxury of the very exclusive.

Yes—in all Sloane Square, on that damp and foggy Christmas Eve in the year 1913, I doubt if a more morose, self-satisfied, cynical human being plunged into the mists than I. I was unhappy, and revelled in my very unhappiness.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

If it had been in my power, I would have sent a cloud of gloom into every home and over each hearth in London. There was something splendid, something classical, in my melancholy; it was like Hamlet's, but greater than Hamlet's, for he knew the reason of his mood, while mine was born of an intangible superiority to my day!

It is not easy, even now, to write of those days. The figure that crosses the screen of memory reminds me of Chevy Slyme—a debt-paying, respectable Chevy Slyme, forsooth!—but just as sulkily swaggering, just as superior, and not quite so human; for Chevy, at least, inspired the friendship of Mr Tigg.

II.

Unconsciously following the bus route, I emerged eventually on Piccadilly, and was jostled and ogled and blessed and cursed with the greatest heartiness. Somewhere near Bond Street I collided heavily with a young man who was trying to negotiate the crowd and at the same time lose nothing of the shop windows' display.

'A thousand devils!' I muttered, recoiling from the impact.

'A thousand pardons!' he said, raising his hat. The graceful lilt of his voice was peculiarly reminiscent; his smooth brow and silky fair hair were both familiar and elusive.

'One moment'—— He gazed into my face with a searching look, keeping his hat poised in the air as if the better to concentrate his thoughts. 'Not the Pest?' he said.

I nodded, and, if the truth be told, felt not a little pleased at the sound of the old nom d'école earned when I was at Westminster.

'And how,' I said, 'is the Blower of Bubbles?'

For answer he replaced his hat at a rakish angle and shook my hand with both his for what seemed a full minute, the crowd parting good-naturedly like a wave encircling a rock.

'My dear old Pest,' he said, 'we shall dine together.'

'I'm sorry, but'——

'There is a perfectly vile restaurant half-a-mile from here, that has the best violinist and the worst cook in London.'

'My dear chap'——

'Of all the luck! Think of my running into you on Christmas Eve!'

And just then I noticed that we were no longer standing still, but proceeding up a side-street, arm-in-arm, while his disengaged hand indicated the passing scene as if it were the most gorgeous bazaar of the Orient. He spoke with extraordinary rapidity, except in uttering certain words, when he would make a slurring pause, as a singer will let a note melt into a pianissimo, then race on again with renewed vigour. It was a fascinating trick of speech, and, added to the subtle inflections of his voice, never failed to startle one into the closest attention.

I turned to him once with some remark on my lips, and noticed that his eyes were dancing with merriment.

'What is it, Pest?' he cried. 'Out with it!'

I smiled gloomily; but still it was a smile.

'Why,' I said, 'aren't the lamps in Sloane Square bright like these?'

He didn't answer. Probably he knew the truth would have hurt.

III.

What a hole to dine in on Christmas Eve! Such waiters—such guests—such food—such wine!

I believe the proprietor owned three such establishments, each, in a triumph of irony, called 'Arcadia.' The very linen of the waiters drooped disconsolately, and the whole place reeked of cabbage and wet umbrellas. My spirits, which had risen momentarily from their classic depths, sank like the sands of an egg-timer.

'My dear fellow,' I said, 'you can't mean to dine here?'

An oily waiter ambled up to us and wrung his hands in a paroxysm of welcome.

'Your tabil, Meester Norman,' he said in some nondescript foreign dialect, 'iss ready.'

Good heavens! The Blower of Bubbles had even ordered dinner in advance! With the feelings of an unwilling martyr, I followed my friend and his escort past tawdry millinery saleswomen, dining in state with their knights-errant of the haberdashery stores; by a table where a woman was gazing admiringly at a man with a face as expressionless as a pumpkin; through a lane of chattering, laughing, rasping denizens of the London that is neither West End nor East End—of people whose clothes, faces, and voices merged into a positive debauch of mediocrity.

When we were seated and had ordered something from the waiter, I turned to Basil Norman for an explanation.

'What is it?' I asked. 'An affair with a seamstress, or are you just looking for "copy"?'

He laughed and lit a cigarette.

'Pest,' he said, 'this is a caprice of mine, a tit-bit for my vanity. You would have chosen the "Trocadero" or the "Ritz," with all the tyranny of Olympian and largessed waiters with whom it is impossible to attain the least pretence of equality. I prefer "Arcadia," where I am something of a patron saint, and am even consulted by the proprietor.'

'You play to humble audiences.'

'Quietly, Pest—the proprietor might hear you. He is a very Magog for dignity, I assure you, in spite of his asthma.'

'I gather, then, that you are a regular diner here?'

'Hardly that. But I am a little more consistent than most of his patrons. To be candid'—he leaned towards me as if it were a secret of the first magnitude—'it's his cook.'

'His what?'

'His cook. Really, I'm afraid he's hardly first class.'

'I am certain of it.'

'He would have made an admirable medieval Jesuit, but—as a matter of fact, I wonder Steinburg'——

'The proprietor?'

'Yes. I don't know why he keeps him on. He says the fellow has a couple of blind children, and if he were dismissed under a cloud he would have trouble in securing employment. But that's not business. The fellow's an ass, isn't he?'

Whereupon his face beamed with delight, and his gray eyes twinkled like diamonds. My comment on the matter was stifled by the arrival of hors-d'œuvre. I had no idea that one tray could hold such a variety of unpalatable things. At the table next to us a woman laughed boisterously, her shoulders, which were fat and formless, vibrating like blanc-mange.

'Ah!' said Basil Norman; 'Klotz has arrived.'

He indicated a low platform, where a dingy pianist, pimply of countenance and long of hair, was strumming the barbaric discords that always accompany the tuning of stringed instruments. A violinist, with his back towards us, was strangling his instrument into submission; while a cellist, possessed of enormous eyebrows and a superb immobility of pasty-facial expressionlessness, sat by his cello as though he had been lured there under false pretences, and had no intention of taking any part in the proceedings—unless forced to do so by a writ of habeas-corpus. A fourth musician, who seemed all shirt and collar, blew fitfully into a flute, as if he realised it was an irrelevant thing, and was trying to rouse it to a sense of responsibility.

'Which,' I asked, 'is Klotz?'

As I spoke the violinist turned about and caught my host's eye. They both bowed—Norman cordially; the musician, I thought, with restraint. The fellow stood out as a man apart from his accomplices; his high forehead and dreamy eyes were those of an artist, though a receding chin robbed his face of strength. He was the type one sees so often—able to touch, but never grasp, the cup of success.

'Klotz,' said Norman, 'is superb. He has the touch of the artist about him. His tone is not always good, and sometimes he scratches; but when he is at his best he does big things. So many people can perform at music—just as so many write at words—but Klotz plays with colour. His art has all the charm of a day in April. He will caress a phrase according to his mood, like a mother crooning to her child. To know how to hesitate before a note in a melody, as a worshipper hesitates at the entrance to a shrine, is Art, and an Art that cannot be taught. It is so with painters, writers, musicians—they must have that sense of colour, that instinct that brings each subtle nuance of expression into being.'

I began to feel bored.

Suddenly the orchestra became animated and burst into a waltz, one of your ageless, rhythmic compositions, that might have been the very first or the very last waltz ever written. Supported by wailing strings and the irrelevant flute, the enjoyment of the diners took on fresh impetus. The lady with the shoulders became a vibrating obbligato. The pumpkin-faced man beamed fatuous delight, an electric light behind him giving the odd effect that he was illuminated inside like a Hallowe'en figure. A girl, who might have been pretty if she hadn't rouged, took a puff from her toilet-case and powdered her nose. She felt that the evening was commencing. Over the whole scene my melancholy brooded as a ghostly presence. To me it seemed like the dominant seventh in a chord of surfeiting commonplaceness; once it was heard, the whole pitch of the evening would alter to another key.

Fortunately the dominant seventh remained unheard.

The waltz stopped, and we turned our undivided attention to dinner.

'Klotz,' said my host, pouring me a glass of wine, 'should have made a mark, but'——

'Damn Klotz!'

'That has been done, Pest. The Bricklayers' Union, or something equally æsthetic, took exception to him for some reason or other, and prevailed upon its sister-cabal to debar him from the big orchestras. To offend your Union, dear boy, is to accomplish the total eclipse of your future. Even genius to-day is subject to regulations. Klotz is in a worse position than a clerk with a Board School education trying to secure employment in a London bank.'

'Confound it!' I said, 'there must be some spheres reserved for gentlemen.'

His twinkling eyes steadied, and a dreamy look crept into them. 'Pest,' he murmured, 'some day England is going to thank God for the gentlemen—who were educated at Board Schools. Listen!—the cellist is playing Saint-Saëns.'

Dinner—or the mess of foodstuffs dignified by the name—was almost finished when Klotz, the violinist, started one of the rare melodies which Wagner permitted himself—the Song to the Evening Star.

It was being beautifully played—even I would have admitted that—but I could not account for the troubled look that crept into my companion's face, driving the gaiety and the whimsicality from it like a cloud obscuring the sunlight.

'Klotz,' he said anxiously, 'is in great sorrow.'

'How the deuce,' I muttered, with a feeling of creepiness stealing over me, 'can you tell that? Do you read it in his face?'

He shook his head. 'Listen!' he said; 'can't you hear it? Can't you feel the tears in it?'

And in spite of myself I remained silent, held irresistibly by the double fascination of the German's artistry and the sense of mystery engendered by Norman. The last sob of the G string quivered to its finish, and the crowd applauded perfunctorily, then applied themselves to the more essential things of life—food, wine, and noise.

Rousing myself from the reverie into which I had fallen, I turned to Norman, and found his chair vacated. I started. He had reached the platform, and was talking earnestly to the violinist. Half-contemptuous and half-interested, I watched the pantomime as they talked. Norman's hands were emphasising some point, and every gesture was a pleasure to the eye; the musician was protesting, but with steadily abating determination. Then the scene came to a climax, and the German disappeared.

Holding the violin in his arms, Basil Norman mounted the platform, the fingers of his left hand picking quiet, pizzicato notes from the strings.

'My friends'—— His voice travelled like sound on the ocean at twilight; the room subsided into silence, and diners craned their necks to see him. The woman with the shoulders brought them to a standstill, like an electric fan that had lost its current.

'My friends'—what a charming voice the fellow had!—'I do not want to bring a note of sorrow into your happiness. You are here, like my companion and myself, for enjoyment; but Herr Klotz . . . his wife is very ill; she is perhaps dying; and, my friends, it is very hard that he should play while his wife is dying . . . on Christmas Eve . . . in a strange country. You are English, and I know you are kind. I have sent him home, and promised that I would take his place, as well as I can take the place of such an artist. For you who work so hard, it is not fair to spoil your happiness on this of all nights—but you will forgive me? Good!'

And his face had a whimsical, tender look.

A murmur of sympathy rose from the crowd, then died away as he raised the violin in his hands and brought from it a tone that breathed over them like a benediction. It was Gounod's 'Ave Maria,' and the pianist's fingers were mothering the keys as they had not done since his ambition evaporated like a cloud on a summer day.

It was exquisite—haunting. It was a prayer to Mary, but a prayer sung in a field of daisies and violets. There was sorrow in it, but it was the grief of a girl over a shattered dream. It was mature artistry, yet was born of sunshine and throbbed with the primrose sweetness of youth. It touched one like the face of a beautiful child.

Still caressing the violin, he repeated the 'Ave Maria,' whistling a unison. With almost any one else it would have been commonplace; with him it was a sound more pleasing than any flute, and only accentuated his sense of emancipation from the thrall of years. He played 'Still wie die Nacht,' 'Old King Wenceslaus,' 'Méditation' from Thaïs, 'Intermezzo' of Mascagni; and whatever he did, or however hackneyed the piece, he surrounded it with a joyousness that trembled on the brink of tears.

I looked at my watch; it was nearly midnight, and the evening so dreaded was almost at a close. He had put down his violin with a gesture of finality, when the prolonged outburst of applause changed his decision, and, with another of those rare smiles, he took the instrument once more.

> Maxwellton braes are bonnie,
> Where early fa's the dew,
> And it's there that Annie Laurie
> Gi'ed me her promise true. . . .

The violin seemed to speak the words; and I'll swear there wasn't a woman in the place who wasn't recalling the sweet innocence of her first love. He had hardly finished, when the man with the face like a pumpkin jumped to his feet, and I rubbed my eyes.

The fellow had changed. His face had expression. Confound it! there was something rather splendid about his features—a kindliness—a——

'Young feller, m' lad,' he was saying, 'I knows I speaks for hevery one when I says we ain't 'eard music like that there since we was knee-'igh to a grass'opper, and I knows you won't take it hamiss if we was to pass the 'at and'——

I held my breath. What would the Blower of Bubbles say?

'You 're a brick, sir!' His voice was a mellow contrast to the other's. 'My friends, this gentleman has suggested that we pass the hat for our poor friend Klotz.'

'I didn't neither,' protested the benefactor. 'Leastways'——

But the woman of the shoulders cut him short by placing two shillings beside him. It was tactful of her, a kindly thing to do, and again I was amazed. There was a womanly, motherly look about her as she turned away, and her eyes were radiant like stars in a mist.

I think I gave ten bob—it must have been a considerable amount, for the girl who would have been pretty if she hadn't rouged looked straight into my eyes and said something that sounded like a blessing. I hope it was; she made me think of a little sister I once had.

And then we were walking together again in the street, and the crowds were thinner than before. I cannot remember what we talked of, but I know I said to him, 'Where did you learn to play like that?'

And he answered, 'My dear old boy, music must be loved, not learned.'

Then we were in Sloane Square, at my flat, and I was thanking him, or he was thanking me—I forget which; and he promised to call at noon next day to take me to Klotz's home. . . . And the lamps in Sloane Square seemed duller than before.

Selfishness does not die in an hour, but the bachelor who looked from his window that night was a different man from the one who had spoken to Mrs Mulvaney. He was thinking . . . and much is accomplished in itself when a man is made to think.

A distant clock struck one.

(Continued on page 218.)

THE LADIES' GALLERY.

By W. H. Moyes, Author of The Mystic's Legacy, The God Stone, &c.

THE only opportunities the fair sex had of listening to debates in the House of Commons that was destroyed by fire in 1834 were obtained by climbing into the garret above the Chamber, and 'peeping down the ventilator.' But a great change came over the scene when the new St Stephen's was designed, for a Ladies' Gallery was added to it. The precaution, however, was taken to protect this gallery in front by stone pillars and a grating, or 'Grille,' the subject of much subsequent criticism.

The green chairs in the gallery are ranged tier above tier, and the occupants used to sit behind the famous brass grating, resembling, as was once said, 'so many lionesses at the Zoo.' But the view of the House from it is a fine one, the ladies being able to see nearly everything that goes on below. Some visitors were in favour of the retention of the 'Grille,' because behind it they could sit at their ease, or read, or even talk quietly, the demand for silence being often more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The existence of the grating also rendered it possible to leave in the middle of dull speeches, which could not decently have been done had the gallery been an open one. The defence of the 'Grille' was undertaken by some members of Parliament on the ground that if it were removed they would be unable to speak with the same freedom as before, owing to nervousness resulting from the battery of bright eyes above. When Mr Herbert (now Lord) Gladstone was at the Office of Works he proposed to take away the central portion of the grating; but he was soon compelled to admit that he could not find any agreement on the subject, either among the members or among their lady friends.

As comparatively few ladies know where the gallery is situated, it may be explained that it is reached by means of a lift from the Speaker's Court; and as it is exactly opposite to, and somewhat above, the level of the Strangers' Gallery, it commands a good view of the Chamber, except that portion which includes the Speaker's chair, immediately beneath it. It is lighted by gas from the ceiling, contains thirty-six seats, and is divided in the centre by a gangway. By its side, but separated from it, is the Select Gallery, under the charge of the Speaker's wife, which affords accommodation for sixteen ladies, although as many as thirty have been allowed to use it on great occasions.

The occupants of the Ladies' Gallery have many privileges which are not granted to those of the Strangers' Gallery. A room, for instance, is set apart for their use when they require tea and other refreshments. They are also permitted to dine with their friends the members, and to take tea with them on the Terrace overlooking the river—an extremely pleasant promenade in the summer months. Many of the most eminent and best-dressed ladies of London and the provinces have availed themselves of the opportunity presented by the 'five o'clock,' as it has been called, and the scenes witnessed on the Terrace from Westminster Bridge and passing steamboats are frequently of a picturesque and animated character.

The Terrace is practically divided into three sections. That nearest Westminster Bridge is reserved for those entertained by the Speaker's wife; the largest portion is devoted to the use of members and their lady visitors; and the remaining part has been described as the 'Desert of Sahara,' being intended 'for members only.' Few prettier sights could be imagined than that presented by the Terrace on a sunny day, when the tables are crowded with men and women; and the resources of the refreshment department are severely taxed, especially when (in normal times) strawberries and cream are served by the waitresses.

The spectators on Westminster Bridge have probably wondered sometimes at a sudden stampede of the members from the tea-tables, when the ringing of electric bells and the calls of attendant constables require their presence in the division-lobbies. Occasionally the occupants of passing boats on the river mercilessly chaff legislators enjoying themselves with their fair companions on the Terrace, by shouting, 'Why don't you get to work?' and by making other pertinent and impertinent inquiries and observations; but it seems to make little impression, and the same scenes are repeated summer after summer.

When visiting the Ladies' Gallery of the House of Commons for the first time the ticket-holder should take the precaution to get there early, and so secure a good seat. The order of procedure in the House may be thus explained. The Speaker, robed and wigged, and attended by the Sergeant-at-Arms in Court dress, carrying the mace, enters the Chamber with the Chaplain, who reads the prayers. The galleries are then opened; and if there is no private business, questions are put by members to Ministers, who are badgered about home, colonial, and foreign affairs for three-quarters of an hour. Then the 'Orders of the Day' are taken, and the real work of the House begins.

On certain great occasions ladies have been known to wait for admission to their gallery for from three to six hours. When all-night sittings have occurred, others have remained in the gallery until four or five o'clock in the morning, while a few have kept their seats there throughout the night.

Sometimes ladies make diplomatic arrangements in order to withdraw their husbands from the floor of the House at a reasonable hour. On one occasion, some years ago, a note came fluttering down from behind the 'Grille.' It alighted in the Press Gallery, but it was evidently intended for one of the members of the House, for it contained the doting inquiry, 'How much longer, duckie?'

The story has also gained credence that, before the 'Grille' was erected, a lady was apparently so much carried away by the eloquence of a young member that she threw her handkerchief into the political arena. Some years ago every eye was attracted to the 'Grille' by the sudden excited and very audible exclamation of a little boy (who, in the company of his mother, had been eagerly watching the arrival of members), 'There's papa!' His name is handed down to posterity as Master Dillon, and 'papa' was none other than the well-known Irish Nationalist leader.

The Suffragettes made their first serious demonstration in the same gallery under memorable circumstances. The question of women's enfranchisement was under discussion, and after 'an inflammatory speech' by Mr Cremer, Mr S. Evans rose at almost the end of the sitting for the obvious purpose of talking out the motion. Cries of 'Coward!' were raised by some of the women behind the 'Grille,' as well as 'We won't have our motion talked out!' While this extraordinary scene was proceeding, a flaming-red banner, bearing the inscription, 'Votes for Women,' was projected from the gallery. For a moment Mr Evans was nonplussed; but realising then what had occurred, he resumed his speech, amid constant interruptions from the occupants of the gallery. Perhaps, however, the most exciting spectacle was that witnessed just outside the entrance to the Ladies' Gallery, where a party of police officials were busily engaged in showing the offenders to the lift, while a burly constable followed behind with a heterogeneous collection of hats, bonnets, and other feminine gear. The banner which had played such a conspicuous part in the scene came into the hands of a journalist, but at the request of the Speaker's wife, it was given her on the following day, her desire being to keep it as a relic.

The 'Grille' was removed when Sir Alfred Mond became First Commissioner of Works. He received many congratulations for the promptitude with which he carried out the decision to abolish it; and ladies highly appreciate the greater freedom with which they can now listen to debates on the floor of the House, no longer a 'prohibited area' to members of their sex.

In future the 'Grille' will adorn the Central Hall of the Houses of Parliament.

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHEN I arrived at Naples I was driven through the ill-paved, noisy streets up to Bertolini's, the caravanserai whose charm of situation is probably unequalled in Europe. There I found no trace of Keene-Leslie, nor was there any message from him; but as his note had asked me to meet him in the evening, his absence did not perturb me. I secured a room, and did nothing all forenoon except feast my eyes on the glorious panorama from the hotel terrace—the domes and the towers of the great, beautiful, evil city, bathed in warm spring sunlight; the giant mass of the Castello dell' Ovo, dominating Santa Lucia, stretching into the sea like some huge saurian; nearer, the frowning Castle of Sant' Elmo and the magnificent Convent of San Martino; the sparkling multi-coloured expanse of the bay dotted with lateen sails; here and there great ships, outward bound or making the port; Capri's twin violet peaks in the distance.

There had been a heavy shower during the previous evening. The scented breeze on the height, purer than along the shore, was deliciously cool after the rain, and in its fresh fragrance I idled the morning away. In the afternoon, as there was still no sign of Tony, I spent the time sauntering about, contentedly waiting for him. Everybody seemed to be out-of-doors. I strolled along the Strada di Roma, looking at the shops and the carriages, and then went aimlessly along lesser streets, to carry away a confused impression of vistas of balconies and light-green shutters rising above a sea of heads; a noisy, chattering crowd; noisy fiacres; noisy, importunate flower-sellers; noisy street urchins—swarms of them; noisy rumbling wheels; noisy beggars of all ages, none of them picturesque, some of them mangy-looking; noise everywhere, steady, continuous, deafening. From the turmoil I was thankful to escape to the cool, quiet sanctuary of the Museo, with its glories of ancient Greece and Italy, its famous 'Resting Hermes,' its great inscrutable marble gods and emperors; and there, under the spell of the place—although I am neither a connoisseur nor even a dilettante—I lingered until nearly sundown.

Naples has an evil reputation, but her lovers say that it is unmerited, and that a person of sense is as safe there as in London. Still, one hears ugly stories of robberies with violence, of strange disappearances, of the incredible tyranny of the Camorra, and the open defiance of the law by that strange and sinister secret society. But, just as in London there are places which a man, alone and ignorant of the language, does well to avoid, so in Naples, unless courting trouble, one will steer clear of purlieus such as the Porta Nolana or the Porta Capuana in 'La Duchessa' quarter. This much I had learned from Keene-Leslie when we were passing through Naples. I remember his adding—quite unnecessarily, I thought—an injunction to avoid making casual acquaintances, and to refrain from advertising the possession of money or money's worth.

I had nothing much to lose in the way of jewellery or anything else (unless the paper in my boot could be counted valuable), and in the evening, under a sky whose starry brilliance made the swarms of electric illuminations look tawdry, I made my way to the gaily lit and crowded Villa Nazionale, the public garden between the Riviera di Chiaja and the waters of the bay. The air was soft and balmy, and feeling pleasantly tired, I took a seat among the trees and listened to the band. How far away, in every sense, was Glen Ciuin with its lonely rain-swept hills, I thought, as I watched the sparkling current of light-hearted Neapolitans flow past, a gay, cheerful, talkative crowd, a mosaic of smart toilettes, pretty faces, bright specks of blue uniforms, Bersaglieri with their cocks' feathers, fat, comfortable bourgeoisie, dark-eyed, graceful women, slender, well-set-up men of the better classes; life, colour, and movement in the warm Southern setting where 'winter is but a word,' with the orchestra's melodious waves ebbing and flowing in the soft, windless air.

An elderly cleric sat down near me, and leaned back in tranquil enjoyment, beaming contentedly through round, dark-rimmed spectacles, his hand softly beating time on his knee to the swing of the melody.

The music ceased. He turned a broad, smiling face to me, politely murmuring something in Italian.

'Scusi! Non parlo Italiano!' I said, regretting my inability to converse with the good-natured-looking old gentleman. He had a long, humorous mouth, black twinkling eyes, and a physique which must have been exceptional in his younger days, before his frame filled out to a more than generous amplitude. I put him down as a country priest, a man of genial and easy temperament, on good terms with himself and his flock.

'Inglese?' he asked in a rich, deep, bass voice.

'Si, signore.'

Ah, he could speak English, a little, but a very little! French, perhaps, I knew? I had only a happy-go-lucky acquaintance with that language, but he was at home in it, and politely contrived to make my dot-and-carry-one attempts at conversation seem quite intelligible. He had been in England many years ago. Mon Dieu! how cold it was! He had seen those brouillards. Quel pays affreux! Did I admire Naples? Naturellement, all Englishmen love their own country best. C'était très juste, d'ailleurs Perhaps I lived in London?

I told him that my home was in Scotland.

Ah! He had known some Scotsmen. But he had forgotten their names. He had hoped one day to see Scotland, but his travelling days, he was afraid, were over. He was a curé de campagne in the North. Mais—on ne devait pas le dire—his heart was Southern, and now and then he came here to get the sun—to make holiday—une petite vacance. But two or three days were enough. Naples was too noisy. So he continued in his musical bass until the crowd began to disperse, when he rose and with a courtly bow gave me good-night. His broad back disappeared in the throng, and soon afterwards I returned to the hotel. There, to my disquiet, I found that Keene-Leslie had not appeared. I waited on the terrace for him in a lovely nocturne wrought by the myriad lights of the city and the moonbeams shimmering on the bay, but though it was late when I turned in, there was no sign of my friend. Mindful of his injunction to me to return to London, if he failed to meet me at Bertolini's, next morning I was seated alone in a compartment of the North train. It was within an ace of starting, when a porter hurriedly unlocked the door. Who should stumble in but the elderly priest of the previous night, puffing and blowing, and considerably ruffled in mind and body! It was some time before his portly frame recovered its placidity. He did not recognise me until I gave him a 'Buon giorno,' when he apologised for his short-sightedness. He had nearly missed the train through a dolt of a hotel porter, whom he apostrophised with unclerical vigour until sheer want of breath forced him to stop. Recovering his equanimity and his breath, he produced an Osservatore Romano, and read it steadily through his pundit's spectacles for half-an-hour or so. Then he laid it down to engage me in conversation, for which he had an indefatigable zest. I could not follow more than half of his rapid French, although he showed great ingenuity in trying to carry me along with him. The talk was concerning current Italian politics, of which I knew a little, and the time passed pleasantly enough; but I was always mentally scrambling after one remark when he was half-way through his next. This was a little tiring, and I was not sorry when he produced a well-filled cigar-case and handed it to me.

'Except good music, tobacco is my only luxury,' said he. 'I own to a weakness for a good Manilla. You will, I think, like this brand. It is of as good a leaf as ever caught the sun. Sometimes I am ashamed of my weakness, but when I recall what I suffered when I gave up snuff, I refuse to face a farewell to my cigars.'

We lit up, and he settled himself in his corner, puffing away with the most obvious enjoyment. After a minute or two he laid his cigar down as if he had forgotten something, produced his breviary, and began to read his office.

I took up his newspaper and tried to translate a few paragraphs; and when next I looked his way, the breviary was face downward on his knee, and his head was comfortably tucked into the corner of the compartment. His breathing was deep and regular, his eyes closed in placid, child-like sleep.

It was then that I happened to notice his Manilla between the fingers of his right hand, which was hanging over the edge of the seat. As the cigar was still alight, I leaned over and, without awakening him, gently removed it. While doing so I was struck by a peculiarity about his hands. They were very large and broad, and covered with a freakish coat of thick, coarse, dark hair from the wrists almost to the middle joints of the fingers. There was something jarring, even repellent, in them—the monstrous suggestion of a hairy savage animal imprisoned, peering out from the sleeve. I trifled with the fantastic idea for a moment, and then settled myself in my corner to the enjoyment of my cigar. A quarter of an hour or more passed, and my fellow-traveller showed no signs of awakening. On the contrary, he began to snore gently, neither raucously nor unpleasantly, but with a placid rhythm which grew positively infectious. I caught myself nodding. The rumble of the train became a lullaby; my eyelids were weighted with lead; a gentle lassitude stole up my legs. I grew drowsier and drowsier. The carriage and the peaceful, broad, clean-shaven disc of my companion's face swung round slowly and back again, to stop with a sudden jerk as I hovered on the border-line between sleep and wakefulness. I hate sleeping in the day-time, but in the end I gave up the struggle, stretched my legs out luxuriously on the seat, and did not open an eye for hours.

How long I lay blinking at the roof of the carriage I cannot tell. For a long time I was only half-awake. A strange disinclination to move clutched me, but with an effort I mastered it, and sat up, dizzy and irritable. My throat was parched, and for the first time in my life I had a splitting headache. I must have caught a chill, I thought, for I was shivering, aching in every bone, completely unable to rally my wits. Dusk had fallen; the carriage was in semi-darkness. A moment or two passed before I remembered the genial cleric. Then I peered into the farthest corner of the carriage. It was empty! The priest must have gone out at some station without wakening me. Curious, I reflected, for usually I am a singularly light sleeper. My flask was in my suit-case, and feeling the need of something to pull me together, I turned to the corner where I had left it, when a sudden fear lifted me to my feet. One swift look round the carriage showed me that my suit-case was nowhere to be seen! It had been lying opposite me when I dozed off. Of that I was ruefully certain. I searched the compartment, but it was not there. Then I dived my hand feverishly into my inside pocket. The pocket-book had vanished, and in a sickening flash I realised that I had been 'doped' by a drugged cigar; that the man in rusty clerical black was probably no more a priest than I was. I had been watched, and the paper was being tracked by crafty and dangerous men. My skin was like ice!

The cryptic paper! I tore off my boot, and drew a long breath of relief. It was still there. Having quickly replaced it, as the train was slowing down, I had just time to button my boot before the lights of a station filed past. It was Civita Vecchia, where there was a stop of a few minutes. My head was still throbbing, and feeling very limp, I stepped out on to the platform for some much-needed fresh air, with a faint hope that the stout figure of my fellow-traveller might be espied somewhere in the train or in the station. Needless to say, I saw nobody with the least resemblance to him, although I nearly missed the train by searching too long. Alone again in the compartment, I thanked my stars that I had taken the precaution to hide the paper in my boot. Either the wily old scoundrel had been in a hurry or he was no ordinary Continental train thief, for my watch and sovereign-purse and some money had not been touched.

I lodged a complaint with an official and left my name and address, but I never saw my suit-case again. Its loss, though annoying, was more than balanced by the knowledge that the rascal had not laid his hands on the paper; but I realised that I was only at the beginning of a dangerous game, and I kept a wary eye on all comers.

The rest of the journey, however, passed without incident, and in due course I heard again the welcome roar of London. From my hotel I rang up Tony's address, and found that he had not returned. Then I turned in, dog-weary, but with a soothing sense of 'something attempted, something done,' for the precious paper was under my pillow. I had won the first trick.

(Continued on page 213.)

THE COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER IN WAR-TIME.

By PETER RINTOUL.

> Still let thy mind be bent, still plotting where,
> And when, and how, the business may be done.
> HERBERT.

COMMERCE has long been regarded as the first material bond of society—a chain of gold that has, in all times, bound men of all nations together in common interest. Indeed, the remarkable commercial growth and development among the foremost world-Powers during the past thirty years was so far-reaching as to be considered by many of our leading publicists as the great antidote of civilisation against war. But when Europe in the summer of 1914 was tipped into the seemingly impossible, it became at once apparent that the vast and intricate commercial interests of the hour did not hold the world in their grip; that the barbaric passions of men were, with volcanic violence, yet to devastate market-places and turn busy counting-houses into desolate ruins.

No class of men deplored this turn of events more than commercial travellers. It meant the interruption of the exchange of merchandise on a large scale between nations and between individuals. Nevertheless, with the breaking of the international bonds and the withdrawal of all the accredited representatives of the enemy Powers, the home producer, freed from the economic depression of free imports, at once sprang into his own. Likewise the British commercial traveller began to enjoy conditions remembered only by old 'road' men—survivors of a time when competition was not so exacting, and profits were not a percentage on a large turnover, but substantial things.

But while the return of less competitive days, in the first years of the war, favoured alike worker, manufacturer, and commercial traveller, curiously enough, unlike the industrial worker and the manufacturer, the commercial traveller—most conspicuously during last year—did not experience the continuity of good fortune.

Apart from the thinning out of their ranks in favour of His Majesty's forces, the need of commercial travellers largely vanished by reason of the world shortage of material and Government control of foodstuffs. While no class of men are more essential to the promotion and the maintenance of business, the state of war nullifies the gradational findings of a state of peace and renders the occupation of commercial travellers of no national importance—a classification to which the majority had (and perhaps rightly so) conscientious objections. Still, the indispensability of the commercial traveller as a business-getter was eclipsed under war conditions. At the same time, there remained 'on the road' a considerable—perhaps a rather surprising—number of 'commercials.' Their activities, however, were diverted from the offensive to the defensive. The objective was not to sell, but to portion out to retailers the goods in which they dealt. The connection between the manufacturer and the retail merchant being established, this apportioning can obviously to a large extent be accomplished by correspondence. So it is; but the connection between the distributer and the manufacturer at one time was not established, and therefore firms are to-day reaping the harvest that has grown up out of the spadework done by their representatives in other days. Fortunately for the commercial traveller, many 'houses' have considered this, and have made monetary acknowledgment as a grateful recognition of past services, and, incidentally, to cover the inevitable pecuniary loss sustained by him while on military duty. But whether or not such services have been acknowledged, in this or any other way, the fact remains that 'commercials' who during the war made railway journeys (often anything but pleasure-tours) were even then of value to their firms. At the same time they were of considerable importance in holding together the business connections within the nation. Their influence in this respect, it has been somewhere suggested, has not been appreciated in the Mother Country, and it has been left to the Colonies to show in a practical way their idea of what they consider the national worth of a commercial traveller. At a large meeting of members of the Sydney C.T.A. Club recently, Mr Denison Miller, governor of the Commonwealth Bank, appealed to the commercial gentlemen there to assist, while soliciting orders for their respective firms, in raising the sixth Australian War Loan. In Canada the financial authorities adopted the same method, and secured the assistance of the organisation of commercial travellers. Therefore, while their actual services during war-time cannot be considered as on the same footing as before the advent of food control and Government super-protection, commercial travellers are not altogether what their category under conscription might lead some to believe—mere cumberers of the ground.

There are, however, other aspects of war-time experience. One of the most important innovations is the large influx of lady 'commercials.' As in other commercial and industrial pursuits, they have caught 'the manners living as they rise.' Their collegiate appearance seems to have caused misgivings among commercial men, and fears have been expressed that their positions may become permanent. Probably in some cases, since women have re-established to our generation their capacity to do work, such fears may be realised; but, generally speaking, they are vicarious travellers, their predecessors being their husbands, brothers, and in some instances their fathers—on active service. That one of the largest commercial travellers' associations in the United Kingdom, with several thousand members, has no more than six lady members enrolled may be accepted as an indication of the situation, affording as reliable a forecast as is possible of an indefinite future. But in the present abnormal conditions, when goods take no selling, the sex qualification is at a discount. To the average male commercial at any rate, especially if he has reached twoscore years and ten, the female competitor gives little or no concern. He keeps 'the noiseless tenor' of his way. The final adjustment of affairs, however, will require to await the day of common freedom, when the younger generation have the sword of Damocles removed from over their heads.

The curtailment of travelling facilities is another war-time obstruction on the path of the commercial traveller. One becomes so accustomed to being wheeled throughout the country in comfortable carriages on endless rails that excellent service is accepted as normal management. But some there are who at the least disturbance of railway routine expatiate on the amount of inconvenience inflicted upon those whose business lies 'on the road.' Others, again, who have sufficient imagination—and 'commercials,' as a rule, are not lacking in that distinction—realise that the inconvenience has been a mere bagatelle in comparison with the enormous aid rendered to the war purposes of the nation, and cheerfully accept the short service. Since the fateful autumn of 1914 all roads have led to France; and when the statement of Sir Herbert Walker, chairman of the present Board of Railway Control, is recalled—that on one part of our railway system (the London and South-Western) fifteen thousand special trains were run carrying troops alone, not including special trains bringing men to and from camps at week-ends; and that two thousand five hundred ambulance trains brought wounded men, soldiers and sailors, to London, all within a period of eighteen months—the wonder is how a regular public service has been maintained. But, after all, the lessened service has not told as heavily against the commercial traveller as it would appear. The trouble is not quite so acute as the railway guide suggests. Where the commercial traveller has the advantage—an expensive enough advantage—is in being able to double back, for those who are acquainted with every highway and bylane of a railway map may catch railway connections not indicated in the time-table. When this resource fails, small country towns are omitted; otherwise it would be impossible to complete a usual journey in schedule time. Where it is possible, however, when country towns and villages lie from two to five miles apart, the knights of the road endeavour to overcome the difficulty by completing the calls on Shanks' nag. This venture in favourable weather is often not the least enjoyable part of the business of a bagman. One may even pro tem. adopt the rôle of 'uncommercial traveller,' and contemplate the singing lark overhead, the tenants of the field, the beauty of the leafy vale, and here and there the pointed summit, or one of the marvels of modern science, a daring flight of aircraft.

It is on such tramps one meets occasionally, apart from the solitary sportsman, odd and old-world specimens of everyday humanity, travellers, too, in this 'wilderness of a world.' At the moment I remember two—a flaming tinman attending to the shortcomings of leaky kettles, and a packman sitting by the hedgerow studying his Bible, for his own spiritual edification, or perchance, according to the measure he had received, to mete it out again to his cottage patrons.

Such overland excursions, however, may only be undertaken by 'commercials' whose samples are light or who sell from lists. Those burdened with impedimenta require to accommodate themselves to the varied regularity of the iron way. This, with the possible prospect of fireless waiting-rooms in winter, may be, to say the least of it, somewhat discouraging, especially to lady travellers.

Travellers must consider their own personal requirements if satisfactory work is to be accomplished. Nothing engenders the spirit of confidence like a good lunch or dinner. Thus, the chief personal concern on a journey, apart from the contents of the note-book, is a good 'table,' and, of course, a comfortable bed—preference being usually given to the former. But since the day of rations dawned satisfaction is obtainable only by those singularly characterised by the loftiness of their patriotism or the fewness of their wants! It must be observed, however, that the reason why the average 'commercial' requires a good meal is because irregularity of meal-times is one of the disadvantages ever associated with commercial travelling. In the average hotel the bill of fare is moderate compared with pre-war days; but in cities, and in the vicinity thereof, one can give commercial hotels but faint praise.

At any rate, compared with the average table now set before us, the commercial traveller who was privileged to dine with George Borrow—according to the customs of the times, the privilege was on the side of Borrow—partook of a veritable Lucullan feast! It will be remembered that when Borrow was about to leave the inn where he had for a time served in the stables, the proprietor, regretting his going, entertained him to dinner before his departure. Borrow thus tells the story: 'At four o'clock I dined with the landlord in company with a commercial traveller. The dinner was good, though plain, consisting of boiled mackerel, rather a rarity in these parts at the time, and fennel sauce, a prime baron of roast-beef after the mackerel, then a tart and a noble Cheshire cheese; we had prime sherry at dinner, and whilst eating the cheese, prime porter, that of Barclay, the only good porter in the world. After the cloth was removed, we had a bottle of very good port, and whilst partaking of the port I had an argument with the commercial traveller on the corn-laws. The commercial traveller, having worsted me in the argument on the subject of the corn-laws, got up in great glee, saying he must order his gig, as business must be attended to.' . . .

In these days, however, the after-dinner capacity of the commercial traveller to dispose of chance wayfarers opposed to his views on the corn-laws, Preference, or like subjects can hardly be expected to equal that of the jovial C.T. who honoured with his company and defeated with his logic the word-master in the wayside inn!

But while culinary delights are rare, they are not altogether non-existent. There are some parts of Scotland where the personal element obtains; where, for example, unpretending Highland hospitality has outlived these grim years. Yet withal there is no extravagance, nor otherwise than the desire to be obedient to the spirit as well as the letter of the law. On the Banffshire coast, for instance, may be found such a 'home away from home.' It is known among 'commercials' as an ideal week-end rendezvous, especially for travellers from the South. In the winter months the appetising table, log fires, and other creature comforts dispel the gloom of the short, sullen days. One has a glimpse, as it were, of pleasant past times, and—the bagman is himself again!

When the world again returns to industry and peaceful living, the commercial traveller will be face to face with fresh circumstances and new conditions. Some there will be who will blunder into a commercial paradise; but the rule of the road, as heretofore, will be high endeavour to uplift lapsed connections and make new ones; while the representatives who have been continuously in touch with their clientele, and have shared with them the war-time difficulties, will, no doubt, stand well in the opening of the new era.

There are expectations in commercial circles, however, that the strain of over-competition will not assert itself after the war to the same extent as it did prior to its commencement, mainly because the home markets, it is predicted, will be more British than they have been during the past seventy years. The prospects of the commercial traveller—the pleasure and the profit he will derive from his calling—will therefore depend, in no small measure, on the ability and the efficiency of the home manufacturer to produce an article that will not only meet the requirements but satisfy the demands of the British public.

BEFORE THE BATTLE.

By F. O. O.

I.

THE heavy lorries rumbled and bumped over the uneven pavé that covered the long, straight road. There was just enough light left for their drivers to see the shadowy forms of the trees that bordered it, or to draw in still farther to the side of it, as a returning convoy loomed gigantic and threatening out of the growing darkness ahead of them. Ten o'clock, and only six more miles to cover—they were in good time.

A red glow as of sunset lightened the sky before them, becoming rapidly brighter as they advanced till the pale ribbon of the road grew red from its reflection. The leading driver turned to his mate.

'Town's afire again, Jim,' he shouted above the roar of the lorry.

'Always is now,' replied the man who sat by his side. 'All the better—give us light to work by.'

They could see the fire plainly now, and the broken towers and chimneys of the abandoned town sharply silhouetted against it. Every now and again the heart of the fire would heave, and a fountain of sparks would scatter from it, as a shell burst in the burning buildings. The Germans had no intention of allowing the fire to be put out.

The leading driver gripped his wheel more tightly and pushed his accelerator-pedal down to its full extent. It is nervous work driving a lorry into a bombardment; there is no chance of hearing the shell coming, and at any moment one may land alongside. And the lorries were laden with ammunition for the big guns.

The convoy crashed over the cobbles of the town, with a roar that re-echoed from the empty, ruined houses, drowning the noise of the bombardment itself. There was no need for caution. The town was as brightly lit as by daylight; the fire was so close that burning timbers fell right across the track. They raced along the deserted main street, turned sharply to the right across the bridge that spanned the sluggish river, and pulled up with a shrieking of brakes as a figure stepped out of the shadows and held up its hand in front of them.

It was an officer from the battery.

'You can't come to much harm under the lee of these houses,' he said. 'One lorry at a time can come up to the position; it's a couple of hundred yards round the corner. I'll show you the way.'

The first lorry moved off, turned into a narrow alley between two rows of what had once been dingy cottages, and finally emerged into an open space surrounded by high, jagged walls, behind which towered the ruins of a big foundry. At the noise of its coming a couple of dozen men appeared silently through a gap in the wall, and fell upon the lorry. In a few seconds they were filing, ant-like, back again, some bearing a hundred-pound shell upon their shoulders, others carrying the square cartridge-boxes in pairs between them.

'We're in luck to have this fire to unload by,' exclaimed the officer. 'We'll get a few hours' rest before the show begins, after all.'

The fire grew brighter, fanned by a light breeze and encouraged by the steady shelling of the enemy. One by one the lorries came into the yard, to be set upon by the never-failing stream of men, who emptied them with an orderly method born of long practice. Each lorry, as soon as it was emptied, backed out to give place to the next. In little over an hour the convoy started back on its perilous journey, looking forward to a few hours' rest at the siege-park before setting out again for railhead to refill.

II.

The unloading gangs disappeared with the last of their burdens through the hole in the wall, and the officer followed them. It was like passing suddenly from daylight into some sea-cavern, an illusion fostered by the feel of the broken bricks and mortar under foot. Overhead great gaps in the shattered roof showed changing patches of the crimson of the fire-lit sky; elsewhere all was dark save for the feeble glimmer of the scattered hurricane-lamps, round which monstrous shadows flickered. At almost regular intervals the ground and the tottering walls shook to the bursting of a shell somewhere close at hand, and then a loose tile or fragment of metal would fall with a crash which stood out upon the background of low sounds that filled the place. One was conscious that men were toiling unseen in the gloom. Sometimes a sharp order, sometimes a low chorus—'Here she comes—now then, once more, heave!'—made itself heard above the general hum of labour. At infrequent intervals the flash of an electric torch revealed for an instant a knot of figures grouped round a huge formless mass of metal, whose polished parts glinted in the sudden light.

Slowly one's eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and the scene began to unfold itself, first in its main features, then, little by little, in its more intimate detail. One found one's self in a great casting-shed, the main building of the foundry. Although roof and walls were breached by shell-holes, enough of the building remained to afford excellent cover for its present occupants. Four sliding-doors were set in one of the walls, and behind each of these stood the forbidding bulk of a great howitzer, so placed that its muzzle would point through the doorway when the door was opened. Two of the guns were already in their final position, and round these toiled their detachments, putting the finishing-touches to their charges, and laying round them the curious apparatus of hand-spikes, rammers, and loading-trays necessary for their service. The remaining two guns were being hauled into position with ropes and tackles, foot by foot, over the unequal floor. The men, stripped to the waist and grimy with the filth of the abandoned workshop, which floated round them as a black dust-cloud, lay back on the ropes like a well-trained tug-of-war team, obedient to the word of their leader.

Three men wended their way over the uncertain floor, one holding the shafts of a wheelbarrow, the other two steadying upon it an ungainly machine, all wheels and chains and cranked handles. They neared the first gun, and half-a-dozen men relieved them of their burden and lifted the machine on to the trail of the gun. The artificer staff-sergeant and his crew appeared from the gloom, and in a few seconds connected up a pipe-line and a pressure-gauge. There was a slight hissing sound as the valve was released. 'Right away!' exclaimed the artificer.

Two sturdy gunners had manned each handle of the compressor, and at the word they started turning furiously. The light of the lanterns shone on their bare skin, down which poured little rivulets of sweat, leaving tracks that gleamed white against the dust that covered them. It is hard work pumping air against a pressure of a quarter of a ton or so to the square inch. Now and again a fresh man sprang in to the task, catching the circling handle as his mate released it. The artificer, watching the pressure-gauge, held up his hand. 'Good enough!' he said. The pipes were disconnected and the compressor carried to the next gun.

III.

From the darkness behind the big howitzers came an occasional heavy sound of clanking metal, the curious half ring, half thud of shell falling against one another. Here in the gloom, relieved only by the strangely reflected glow of the fire without, men were busy cleaning the shell that had been unloaded from the lorries, divesting them of their protecting battens, and ranging them in order for convenient feeding to the guns. Sometimes, when the fire blazed up more brightly than usual, a glimmer of light fell upon the long rows that stretched away into the darkness on either side, hundreds upon hundreds of yellow-painted, wicked-looking projectiles, fifty tons and more of steel and high explosive ready and eager to wreak destruction upon the targets that awaited them.

One could easily form an idea of their possibilities. A German 5·9 battery, almost the exact equivalent of these hidden guns, was firing with easy deliberation into the town, apparently at random. Sometimes its shell fell far away among the ruins, the roar of the burst echoing and re-echoing like a peal of thunder. Sometimes they fell quite close, shaking the crazy factory to its core, with a crash, followed by a long-continued rain of débris that clattered upon the broken tiles and upon the remains of a corrugated iron shed which stood in the yard. Too close to be pleasant, some of these shell, had there been anybody with sufficient leisure to heed them.

And all about the factory, wherever the least damaged walls seemed to offer the best protection, men were busy making piles of the wooden boxes that contained the cartridges. These cartridges are always a source of uneasiness. A hostile shell may often fall among a pile of projectiles, and do no particular damage beyond scattering them and rendering them unserviceable. But if it falls among a pile of cartridges it is pretty certain to set them on fire; and modern propellants burn with a fierce blaze which it is practically impossible to extinguish. The wise battery commander, therefore, distributes his cartridges in small groups to avoid the risk of an unlucky shell starting a fire that may destroy all his ammunition, and so leave him incapable of further action.

At the farther end of the casting-shed a line of light revealed an ill-fitting door, hastily replaced upon its hinges by the battery wheeler. This door opened into a fair-sized room, dimly lit by a couple of candles, each stuck into the neck of a bottle. It had evidently been the drawing-office, for, although every trace of furniture had long since disappeared, probably to supply fuel for the scattered billets in the town, the floor was still strewn with torn blue prints and fragments of patterns, and the walls covered with elaborate calculations in pencil. The room had escaped damage, save in one corner, where a shell-splinter had torn a hole in the outer wall, a gap that had been roughly plugged with a couple of sandbags. The ceiling was discoloured with mildew, and quivered ominously whenever a shell burst anywhere near the foundry; above it could be heard a scurrying of rats between it and the rafters. But, taking the place all round, it made a very good fighting-post—a far better one, in fact, than the battery, accustomed to improvising such places in all manner of strange corners, had learnt to expect.

IV.

One end of the room was completely occupied by a large table, contrived from a coach-house door mounted on two low pillars of sandbags. It was on one corner of this makeshift table that the candles stood, illuminating a collection of maps, range-tables, and instruments of all kinds. Seated on a cartridge-box before these was the battery commander, busily engaged with pencil, protractor, and scale. A sheet torn from a field service pocket-book lay in front of him, covered with notes as to times and targets. These the battery commander was checking for the last time.

'Zero to plus eight, target M14a26 to M14a98; rate of fire, one round per gun per minute,' he muttered. 'That works out: All guns switch eight degrees left; Number One, one eight three-five elevation, one-five minutes right, and the rest of them as I've got down here. The rest follows pretty naturally. That seems all right. It's about half-past eleven now, and the show starts about dawn, I suppose. As soon as we've synchronised and got zero time we're all ready, bar the guns, and they won't be long now.'

He went on with his checking, and the telephonist hidden in the shadows at the far end of the room, who had raised his head at the sound of the major's voice, leaned over towards his mate.

'We'll be relieved in half-an-hour,' he whispered hoarsely. 'Give brigade a call; they're very quiet lately.'

The man spoken to put his fingers on the key, buzzed the call, and put the receiver to his ear.

'Carnation?' he inquired. 'Convolvulus speaking. Line all right?'

'O.K.,' came the reply. 'Hold on, Convolvulus. Here's a message for you.'

The telephonist reached out for his pencil and message-form.

'Go ahead,' he said.

For some seconds he wrote in silence; then he spoke again into the instrument.

'Coming back. Begins: From Carnation to Convolvulus, 11.33 P.M. AAA. Forecast for twelve hours ending midday June 7th. AAA. Wind south to south-west, light, some haze early, clearing later. AAA. Fine, possibly some showers towards end of period. Ends.'

He put down the instrument and handed the message to the major, who read it with interest.

'Good!' he exclaimed. 'Let's hope it's correct. Hallo! What's this?'

The door opened to admit a man covered in white dust, and with a despatch-case slung across his shoulder, who paused on the threshold and saluted.

'Come in,' said the major. 'Have any difficulty in getting through the town?'

'Only by the railway crossing, sir,' replied the despatch-rider, unslinging his message-case as he spoke. 'They're dropping a few gas-shells round there, but nothing to hurt.'

He opened the case and took an envelope from it, addressed, 'O.C. Convolvulus—Urgent,' which he handed to the major. The latter opened it and unfolded the paper it contained. The message was a brief one. 'O.C. Carnation to O.C. Convolvulus. Zero time 3.15 A.M. June 7th, 1917. Acknowledge,' was all it said.

The major signed the envelope and gave it back, as his receipt for delivery, to the messenger, who saluted and left the room. Then he glanced at the number scribbled on the message, and wrote a note on a pink form, which he handed to the telephonist. It bore the words: 'Carnation. Your M 173 acknowledged 11.47 P.M. 6/6/17. Convolvulus.' The telephonist took it, and transmitted it to brigade.

As he did so the door opened once more, this time to admit the second in command.

'Battery ready for action, sir,' he reported.

'Thanks, Hawkins,' replied the major. 'Is all the ammunition properly stowed?'

'Yes, sir,' said Captain Hawkins. 'We can open fire in three minutes after you give us the targets.'

'Good man!' said the major. 'Tell the men they've about three hours to get all the rest they can in, and then come and lend me a hand to check this programme for the last time.'

V.

A few minutes later the two men were sitting at the table immersed in calculations, when the telephone buzzed suddenly. The telephonist took up the instrument.

'Yes, Convolvulus speaking. Yes, he's here, sir. Very good, sir.' Then, turning to the major, 'The adjutant would like to speak to you, sir.'

The major rose from his seat and took the receiver from the man's hand.

'O.C. Convolvulus speaking,' he said. 'Yes, is that you, Gibbs?'

'Yes, sir,' came the reply. 'The colonel would like to know how you are getting on.'

'All well,' replied the major. 'Guns in position and everything ready. Any fresh orders?'

'No, sir,' said the voice. 'Will you synchronise now?'

'Right-o,' assented the major. 'Hand me my watch, will you, Hawkins? It's on the table, beside my note-book. Thanks. Fire away; I'm all ready.'

'I'll give you 12.9, sir. It's just eight minutes past now.' A silence in which the ticking of a watch could be plainly heard; then Gibbs's voice again: 'Thirty seconds to go—twenty—ten—five—now!'

'Thanks,' said the major. 'I got it. Nine minutes past midnight. Good-bye.'

He put the instrument down and laid his watch on the table. Then he wrote, 'Fourteen seconds fast,' on a slip of paper and put it behind the watch. 'The time of flight to the first target is twenty-two seconds,' he said. 'That means that we must fire the first round at eight seconds before 3.15 by this watch. Just three hours to go.'

Perhaps it should be explained that all operations are worked out to exact time, and that a few seconds' error in the bursting of the shell which compose a barrage may mean all the difference between success and failure. Hence this meticulous care with regard to time.

The room relapsed into silence, broken only by the heavy breathing of Hawkins, who, like a wise man, had taken the opportunity of snatching an hour or two of sleep, and had curled himself up in a corner. The major busied himself in writing half-a-dozen letters, not knowing when such an opportunity might occur again. The two telephonists took well-thumbed and much-torn books from their pockets and proceeded to read them—for the twelfth time at least—interrupting their reading every few minutes to test the line.

The fire, whose flicker had penetrated even into this secluded spot, had died down by now, and with it the activity of the hostile artillery. Everything was very quiet. An occasional burst of fire from a field battery far away, or a faint distant chattering of machine-guns, was all that disturbed the almost uncanny silence. It seemed that the world itself stood still, awaiting anxiously the fury of the coming dawn.

VI.

It was not till a quarter to three that Hawkins yawned and sprang to his feet, awake in an instant with the consciousness of work to be done. He glanced at his watch anxiously.

'Plenty of time,' he said. 'Lord! I was dreaming that I was on leave, and dining at the "Troc." I think I'll get the battery into action, sir.'

'Yes, do,' said the major, folding up his letters. 'Let me know when you're ready to fire. Here's the target list.'

Hawkins left the room, and in a few minutes the sounds of the battery getting ready could be heard. The big doors were swung back with a clatter; orders passed; the heavy thud of the big shell being well rammed home told of the loading of the guns. As the hand of the watch pointed to three Hawkins appeared once more.

'Battery ready to fire, sir,' he reported.

The major nodded. 'Stand easy,' he replied; 'you've got about a quarter of an hour.'

Hawkins saluted and left the room, leaving the door open behind him.

The minutes passed with leaden feet. It was still pitch-dark. Nothing could be seen through the open door but the hurricane-lamps, hung by the sights of each gun, and throwing an uncertain light upon the detachments that sat motionless around them. The major gazed at the hand of the watch before him, smoking placidly. There was no more to be done. The attack upon the Messines Ridge would open in five minutes now; its issue lay upon the knees of the gods.

Every minute seemed an age in which each soul in the battery had ample leisure to examine his own actions. Had all been well done? The honour of the battery depended on each man's achievements. The slightest detail left undone might mean failure now—the failure not of the individual, but of the unit. Would the order to fire never come?

The hand of the watch crept to fourteen minutes past three.

'Hook lanyards!' called the major sharply. The 'Numbers Four' of the detachments hooked the long cords into the friction-tubes and stretched them out to their full extent. The rest of the men sprang to their places and stood as if carved in steel. One could have fancied that the ticking of the watch drowned every other sound. The hand crept slowly round the dial. Thirty seconds before 3.15—twenty—fifteen—ten—'Fire!'

And as the word sounded the four big howitzers spoke together with a roar and a flash and a hot blast of dust and acrid smoke. The battle had begun.

JOHN BROWN.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D., and the Doctor; &c.

CHAPTER XII.—THE NOISE OF WAR.

THE best way to understand war is to grasp the thoughts and the feelings of the soldier in action. Our newspaper correspondents have attempted to interpret the soldier's feelings for us, but have failed, mainly because they are not soldiers, and their stuff is written in comparative comfort. It is fashionable to 'write up' the soldier advancing to the cannon's mouth as if he were going to Brighton for a week-end. This is ridiculous, for this reason, that the soldier is just human, and when facing death he experiences all the symptoms of an invalid who is about to undergo a serious operation. But to make the whole thing clear to you, let me reproduce a little discussion we had in our hut one night.

It was Beefy who broached the subject with a casual remark to the effect that when he went over the top at Loos he felt as if he wanted to go home—quick.

'That's just how I felt,' said Billy Greens.

We gathered round the last speaker and asked him to go on.

'Oh, well, let me be frank, and say I was never in such a funk in all my life. I am sure many more felt the same, but, of course, we never said so. What heartened me to go on was the remark our colonel made as he went over the top. He said, "Look here, men; the Boche is just as frightened as we are, so come on." This idea gave me comfort. Still, my knees were groggy, and I believe if I had met a Hun then it would have been a bad show for me.'

'What made you go forward?' I asked him.

'Discipline, and the knowledge that if I funked, my name would stick in the mud for ever. I am not a hero, and I believe thousands feel like that. We are really a race of pacifists; but, for all that, I believe that a pacifist nation in arms is much more deadly than a nation nurtured on the themes of Bernhardi. None of us is in this business because he likes it. Personally, I loathe the whole scheme. It is ghastly. Still we, apparently, can only end it by fighting, and that is why I and many others are in.'

'What frightened you most, Billy?'

'Oh, the noise—the terrible noise. If it weren't for the high explosives I believe war wouldn't be half bad. But it is the noise which has a demoralising effect on the educated brain. It stuns, unnerves, and creates a thousand fears. Mind you, I don't think it has the same effect on a navvy, a miner, or any sort of manual labourer. These men have no nerves, and for that reason I think they are the best private soldiers. The duller the brain, the less the suffering. But modern war is a terrible thing for the highly sensitive and highly skilled.'

'Did you reach your objective all right?' asked Ginger.

'Yes. I saw the C.O. ahead, waving us on, and I went. The man seemed so brave that one really couldn't let him down, so we just followed. But I was still nervous. Then I saw the C.O. fall. He was shot through the stomach. I went mad. I wanted to kill some one. When I got to the first line of the Huns I saw a big fellow skulking away. I shot him—dead. After that I wanted more. God forgive me for the feeling, but I 'm sure it was the primitive lust to kill. It 's in us all. Education seemed but a veneer. When it was all over I went into a corner and prayed. Ugh! it 's a horrible business,' concluded Billy.

'Yes, we all have much the same experience,' added Nobby Clarke. 'Personally, it wasn't the thought of death that worried me, but the secret fear of getting a stomach wound, and being left out in No Man's Land. And I believe almost every officer and man has the same secret dread. The reason, I think, is that an abdominal wound is usually fatal or crippling, and a man does not like to picture a bayonet or a lump of shrapnel in his tummy. If a scientist could devise a light bullet-proof abdominal belt, I believe that men would go forward much quicker and more confidently.'

'Do you think the Hun has the same fear?' I asked.

'I think the Hun is even more afraid of a stomach wound than we are. Man to man, he is not our equal in bayonet-fighting. It may be lack of training, but I imagine it really is due to the fact that he is flabby and no sportsman. For example, in the one bayonet-fight which I was in, not one of the Huns stood up to us. They flung their rifles away and squealed like pigs. Cold steel to a German is worse than gas or shells. The Hun is terror-stricken when he sees the knife of the Gurkha.'

'Who do you think are really best with the bayonet, Nobby?' Billy asked.

'I imagine the Russians are really top-dog. You see, they are primitive, and educated to the knife. Like all semi-civilised peoples, the Russians can stand the most awful punishment. The Bulgarians are also good. Still, it is a fact that the Irish can beat them. In that little scrap between some Irishmen and Bulgarians during the retirement in Macedonia, the Irishmen won. The Irish, like the Scots, are fiery, almost mad, in action. Once they are roused, nothing will stop them.'

'What was your experience, Ginger?' I asked, switching the discussion back to its original point.

'The five minutes before going over were worse than the whole day's fighting. We had too much time to think, and my imagination was running riot. I didn't feel like a soldier. I felt like a lamb going to the slaughter. What really impressed me was how men could live in such a barrage. Worse; the thousands and thousands of bullets which were whistling over and splashing against the parapet seemed to whisper death was near. Of course, I had forgotten that it takes about a thousand rounds to secure one dead man. However, it is wonderful what example and training will do. I believe that, no matter how funky a man may feel, if he has been to a good school he immediately thinks, "What will they say in school if I make a bad show?" Training is also useful. Months of discipline tell. But the greatest asset is the bearing of the officer and the N.C.O. Fortunately we had a splendid company commander. He could mask his feelings. I believe the man was suffering just as we were suffering, yet he walked down the line smiling, cheering, and inspiring. When the time came to go, he was first over, and we followed like deer.

'Once we were over, I seemed to be too excited to suffer from nervous troubles. The noise, the shouting, the running, and the sight of the Huns bolting somehow carried us along. The flight of the enemy also raised the sporting instinct, and we followed as if out shooting hares. Again, I did feel a true hate of the Hun. Belgium and Serbia seemed to flash through my brain, with the result that I was out for results. One Hun fired at me point-blank, but missed. I shoved my bayonet into him. To me it was the most awful physical sensation. I felt sick, but I withdrew automatically, as if I had been at bayonet drill. There was no more time to moralise, for I was fighting for my life. It isn't a healthy business. I believe we, as a nation, abhor it; yet somehow I feel, without bragging, that, once at close quarters, we can always beat the Hun.'

'Yes, Ginger; and the war has proved that we are not the decadent nation many thought we were,' I remarked.

'By no means, John. Trafalgar, Waterloo, Inkermann, and Tel-el-kebir are mere skirmishes compared to Ypres, Loos, and Cambrai. Nelson's or Wellington's men never endured the sufferings of the men to-day. It is really wonderful how this city-bred, over-civilised nation has stuck it out. But another war of this kind would send the world insane. It 's the noise, the awful noise, that is playing the devil with the nerves of all.'

(Continued on page 221.)

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE LAST TRAIL

By F. St Mars.

PART I.

I.

THE snow was gliding down very silently and mysteriously, imperiously imposing a universal silence, as if the Witch of the North had her finger on her lips and was whispering 'Hush!' while she chloroformed the world with ice and cotton-wool.

The night was trying hard to be very dark, but could not, because of the ghostly glare of the snow. Yet you could not see very far; not out beyond where the snow reached on the mud-ooze of the estuary and (since the going out of the tide) glass-like ice began; inland no farther than the sea-wall where the bent, gnarled tamarisks stood, with their heads to the wind and their arms held up in front of their faces, as it were; not far on either hand along the snow-slope of the pebbled shore.

Hst! Listen! What was that?

A bark, guttural, hoarse, full of an unutterable yearning, came suddenly out of the night, on the lap of the wind, and a form, long, low, indistinct, and dark, which, silently and almost unnoticed, had been canvassing along the speckled band of high-tide line, as suddenly switched off all movement, and became as still as if the cold had all at once stopped the action of its heart. But it was not that form which had barked.

The snow fell on, and a curlew, somewhere out on the mud-flats, called dismally, 'Cour-leep! cour-lee!' as if it had heard the sound, and, getting ready to fly, sought to warn all other curlews hidden in the night to get ready likewise.

Then the bark came again, quite close now, only just on the other, or marsh, side of the sea-wall—not the bark of a dog, one felt that; felt, too, the indescribable mystery of wildness underlying it.

And then something jumped up, appeared smudged, a deeper dark against the dark of the sky, on the top of the sea-bank, and began trotting smartly up and down, whisking round at the end of its path, and returning again and again, with a neatness and a celerity that were characteristic.

And all the time the long, low, dark form on the high-tide line remained motionless, as if petrified. And where it stood, as if it had chosen that one and only spot in the whole scene purposely, it harmonised so exactly with the snow-mottled, dark line of seaweed that, unless it moved, it was entirely invisible.

At last the something on the sea-bank jumped down, and a little, vagrant, cloud-chased patch of moonlight, which came hurrying along the shore, caught that something, and revealed it for a moment, clear as clear. It—she—was a vixen.

At the same moment another something took its place on the top of the sea-bank, and—yapped. And that something was a dog fox—her lover. Far away another dog fox could be heard barking somewhere in the marsh, and at the sound of it the first fox snarled wickedly.

Then the vixen began nosing along high-tide line. She knew that the sea, which can be generous in its gifts sometimes, especially after a storm, often throws up free meals there. But this time she found something that she did not want, for suddenly she discovered herself face to face with a form, very long and low, with absurdly short, sturdy legs, a sinuous, brown-black body, and a flat, cruel head. It was a polecat, the weasels' and the stoats' big cousin. Doubtless he was there on the same errand as the vixen.

Seeing that he was detected, the polecat arched his back, and, bristling, gibbered viciously. He did not trust foxes at any time, but foxes in love might be even worse than usual. And they were.

Perhaps the vixen wanted to test her lover. Perhaps she was a little above herself. Who can tell? Anyway, with a wave of her fine brush, she crouched for attack, skirmishing, light as a rubber ball, as the polecat began to retreat towards the tamarisks. He was feeling distinctly uncomfortable.

Next moment the dog fox joined forces with the vixen, and began leaping high in the air as he sprang in and out, snapping, and away again before you could wink; but he was dealing with one of the bravest beasts in all the wild, and at the fifth jump he knew it.

Striking as a snake strikes, from an arched loop to a flattened line, the polecat, whose temper is proverbially bad at the best of times, got his bite home, and when the dog fox leapt back, he —took the polecat with him, pinned to his throat.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

It is true that the vixen's white teeth were buried in the polecat's flank, but it would take more than that to unlock the determined long beast's hold. The vixen lost her grip as the dog fox began spinning and rolling—for the polecat bites to make his teeth meet—and she never had a chance to get it again.

Without a sound something topped the sea-bank, stood staring for an instant, and then, dropping on the shore, drew one streaking, reddish line towards the dog fox. It was the other dog fox, he who had barked his distant answering bark, and he was not one to waste his chances.

The polecat loosed his grip and galloped away, leaving them at it—fighting like fiends. He passed the vixen on his way, and she got out of it. She was several millimetres too interested in the fight to trouble about him, and had not the slightest wish to argue with him alone, in any case.

II.

He had gone perhaps three hundred yards—taking good care to hug the sea-bank and the line of evergreen tamarisks, where were holes and twisted root and wave-made caves, out of which no fox would care to turn him—when a noise, rapidly approaching him, suspended his step 'twixt rise and fall. It was a mighty noise, most alarming there, in that place, with the magic of the snow and the spirit of the estuary lying heavy over all. Also, it was an indescribable sound. The distant ruffle of drums, which a king gets on a visit, a tropic rain-shower on a forest, a south-west gale thundering through an oak hanger—what you will. Anyway, it was wonderful.

The polecat cocked one eye over his shoulder on the line of retreat, then stared ahead with neck low.

It was dark, in the sky at any rate, except when the moon flashed out like a searchlight—which was not then; but that which came through the air could be seen plainly. It was as if a barn was being hurled across the heavens low down. A black mass it was, travelling like the wind, and with a noise like tempests gone astray. Indeed, it was a most amazing spectacle. No wonder the polecat cringed—flattened.

In a breathless breath it was upon him, roaring, whistling, dazing, above him, over him. In another breath it was gone—dwindling into the dark—the biggest, closest-packed flock of teal that ever you saw.

If you tell a naturalist that so many teal could fly together, and so close packed as that, in a huge solid mass, bird almost touching bird, he would perhaps—smile! But if you told one or two old and experienced wildfowlers that, they would not smile; they would believe—for they know. They have seen it.

The polecat's head shot up as the whizzing rush of birds went by, and he listened. Then he whisked round on his tail, almost treading on it, it seemed, and set off after them at his odd, sidelong gallop. The mighty sound of their passage had stopped, and so, he argued, had they.

Came he soon to a low, pebbly bar, and a big cove beyond, fed by an inlet through the bar. The cove had many fingers, and they were rush-fringed. The cove itself was bearded with that species of marine grass which tries to conquer most estuaries, and which, not being learned, I call 'wild-duck grass.' All the scene was white. And all the scene—cove, bar, and fingers—was alive—crawling with teal.

It was at this point that the amazed polecat's mouth watered so much that he had to lick his lips. But he lost not more than long enough to get the geography of the scene fixed in his brain, before he got right down to business. I mean, he seemed about to sink through the snow and vanish completely. This was because Fate does not choose to turn the polecat white in winter, as it does some of his relatives. Therefore his brown-black nondescript uniform was conspicuous, unless, indeed, he chose to pose as a shadow of bush or grass, or what not. And this was what he did do, with the result that somehow, wonderfully, without the many hundreds of teal eyes noticing it, that shadow contrived to move itself one hundred and fifty yards along that bar—just below the crest on the far side—one hundred and fifty yards to the gap, where, low down, within an inch of the trickling water, it lay almost among the teal, without ever having given itself away as anything more than the shadow of some big stone.

Then that shadow turned again into a polecat, and shifted through half-frozen slush and water, to the accompaniment of noises like treading upon glass, in less than the tick of a second-hand on a watch. You have to do that with teal. Even so, they did not wait; they shot, sprang straight up, as if fired from springs—simultaneously. The polecat just managed to grab the foot of one beautiful, gold-spectacled, red-headed, little, fourteen-and-a-half-inch drake, and that only by leaping his highest possible leap.

The death-flutter of that drake—for the polecat can slay quickly as a trained swordsman when he likes—was drowned in the cataclysmal roar of wings that followed, and, ere the noise had dissolved high away in the night sky, he and his prey were lost together among the reeds.

III.

Together they went from sight, but not alone.

As if the roar of wings—those fastest wings of all, nearly—had called it (which perhaps they had), there appeared over the edge of a dike a flat, dark, wedge-shaped head, and eyes that, as the head turned, gleamed. Anon unto the head was added a shape, long, and so low in the snow that it seemed to be gliding on its belly. It might have been the polecat himself, but it was not. Fate must have sent it, for it was a polecat too, and a lady into the bargain.

One year and many months our male polecat had sought for a wife, and had not found one—polecats do not haunt every field these days, nor every county. One year and some months this female polecat had hunted the wild for a mate, and devil a husband could she find. Both had wandered far in the process, far even for restless beasts, far, even unto this flat and wind-swept place at last—neither knowing. And neither knew. If she had lifted her head above the dike even five seconds earlier, she might have seen at least his tail vanish. If he had but paused just once only to look round, he might, he would, have seen the glint of those eyes—like wrist-watches of soldiers who make a night attack—flash above the dike. Fate gave a woggle to their lives, and—they did not. Within a hundred yards of each other, after so long, and—neither knew!

The female shape came out, and hunted about along the inlet shore—she looked like an ant from afar—as if she were a hound questing. Then, a well-marked form, low across the spotless waste, she turned away, and the snow haze gradually swallowed her up. And even as she did so, bells broke out—bells inland, bells of some low marsh church among bent, gale-tormented trees—clearly, beautifully, through the silence: bells of the night. Both beasts heard them, and stood listening, with flat heads up on long necks. Then the female went, and the two that had come within a hundred yards of each other, within a hundred yards, after so long, drew farther and farther apart every instant. Perhaps Fate laughed—or was it a red-throated diver crossing the night sky?

IV.

The polecat did not eat all that teal. It was his custom—a bad tribal habit, indeed—to sip a little and go elsewhere. In deference to the snow, however, he took more than that. It is not quite clear whether, by the same token, he, like the mole and some others, was possessed of an astounding appetite; he certainly slew more than his share as a beast of about twenty-three inches from sharp nose to bushy tail-tip.

For this reason, therefore, the polecat did not reappear immediately after the meal. He cleaned first; as a warrior specialising much in subterranean warfare, cleanliness was with him, more perhaps than with most wild things, a religion. And, secondly, he gained, or tried to gain, some closer knowledge of a thing unknown, that ran about the reeds like a rat, but not a rat, what time he was doing grisly work with the teal. This thing had ruby eyes, and it was a brown wedge. When he tried to follow it, he would have sunk into the rotten ooze if he had not learnt how to throw himself backwards, and if the ooze had not been sheeted with thin ice that crackled atop. The thing might have been a goblin by the way it reduplicated itself, turning up behind when it ought to have been in front, and in front when every sign proved that it must be behind, and by the way it seemed able to run about upon the surface of the very water itself.

At the end of half-an-hour's floundering, the polecat discovered three things: firstly, that he was wet and cold (he clinked icicles as he walked), and not so clean as he had been; secondly, that he was no nearer catching that goblin, or whatever it was, than he had been at the start; and, thirdly, that he did not know from antediluvian relics which was the way out of those reeds.

In another ten minutes he had more or less got over the first difficulty, bar the icicles; in another ten, more by luck than good judgment, he solved the last. And the thing, which was a bird, by name water-rail, or officially Rallus aquaticus, grunted gibingly after him, as it were a bull-frog, as he went. But—and this is where the shoe squeezed—that had given the female polecat fifty minutes' start of him at the least, and fifty minutes may be as good as fifty hours in devious wanderings, where these beasts are concerned.

V.

The polecat, hugging the dikes and hollows where the fingers of water crept inland to the marshes, manœuvred almost unseen down to the shore of the inlet. He put up three lapwings—whose eyes must have been miracles of keenness—which went away, complaining shrilly to all the night. He watched seven little spidery dunlin—at least, I think they were that particular kind of shore bird—running about on the mud-ooze as if it were solid ground, and was deceived into mistaking them for widgeon duck by a yodling call that they made. He crept up to a snipe, running about in a little pan of wet; but the snipe had miraculous eyes, like the lapwings, and dissolved, rasping, into the night.

Then he turned along the shore—the wrong way, the very opposite to that taken by the female. It was an exasperating thing, because they were the last two living polecats in that county, and one felt now that they could never meet, and the race of polecats must be doomed to die out in that part for ever. A watcher, had there been one, would have been tempted to shout out, 'The other way, you fool! The other way.' But it was no good. The idiotic beast persisted in his course, and everything seemed hopeless. And then it was that Fate took a hand in the game; or, if it wasn't Fate, I do not know what it was.

The polecat came to a grayish post. He had seen it for some time, as he ambled slowly along. It had seemed to him almost as if it shone with a faintly luminous phosphorescence; but perhaps this was fancy. Anyway, the wind was blowing from him to it, so he was at a disadvantage. The post, as is the custom of most posts—and there were plenty, sea-washed and tottering, about—did not move. At least, it did not move until he came within about a yard of it. Then it did.

He heard something whiz past his eye, and dodged, if I may so put it, before he thought to. It is a way they have to get into in the wild if they desire to remain alive—acting first, and thinking after. Then he was two yards away. I say 'was,' because the dodge and the jump seemed to our eyes almost simultaneous.

Thereafter he turned and regarded that post with a light in his eyes, and found that it had changed into a heron, and he knew that the whiz was made by its pointed beak on its coiled spring of a long neck. The heron got up and flapped heavily, on great umbrella-like wings, back to the place the polecat had come from; and the polecat, after stopping apparently to think of the wonderful escape of his eye from the plunged assegai beak of the heron, followed his assailant.

I fancy, however, that he judged the heron's observation height by his own lowliness. Anyway, the long-legged bird saw him coming all the time, although it did not appear to, and when he had got nearly close enough—but it would have been risky to tackle old friend heron, in any case—flapped away into the snowy night, grating 'Cra-ank! cra-ank!' in a voice like the rattling of rusty dungeon chains, as it went.

And the polecat struck the trail of the lady polecat, even as, in his rage, he made to gallop after the great bird.

VI.

For about ten seconds he looked as if he had been struck by lightning and incandesced. For the rest he flashed to wild excitement, running that trail with something of the fury of an ant. Not, mind you, that he really appeared to be following that trail at all. Except in the hollows, he kept about forty yards to one side of it, roughly; but that was because the wind had blown her scent to one side for that distance.

But there was only the high-pressure, nearly bursting excitement, which fairly oozed out of that polecat at every stride, to show the amazing change that the striking of that trail had made within him. The obvious proof of that change came when, forgetting the strict rule of hugging cover, he made to cut across the open space between one stiffly rustling, reed-choked dike and another, and—met a man. (I wonder what he was up to there, that night of all nights.)

That man was surprised when, without warning and for no reason that he could see, of course—how was he to know that he stood bang across that magic trail, barring the way?—a long, low, dumb, dark beast slid out of the rushes and the night, and started climbing up his leg. He accuses it of trying to reach his throat, which was quite likely. Now, that man had a gun of sorts, a fourteen-bore, double-barrel muzzle-loader, and it was loaded, but he could not fire at a beast on his leg, you see. Wherefore he kicked and yelled, and the beast slid down his leg, and—made his teeth meet in the first thing he could lay hold of. It happened to be the man's leg, and the 'bitee' acknowledged the fact with a howl that did more towards frightening the polecat than any action could have done.

Next moment the man had clubbed his gun, and with a thud the polecat dropped, all consciousness knocked out of him. He came round in a second or two, being only stunned, and found himself lying, with his mouth full of snow, looking up at the man skipping grotesquely ten yards away, wrestling, apparently, madly with his gun. As a matter of fact, that gun, being a muzzle-loader, had taken advantage of its owner's diversion of attention for a moment, when he clubbed it, to decant its caps, and without those caps, or fresh ones—fumbled for in pockets with cold fingers—it could not be fired. Muzzle-loaders always do that sort of thing—and half-a-dozen others—at critical moments, as you may have noticed.

It seems that animals hate to have things pointed at them, and it is certain that they loathe man to stand still and aim. Perhaps it is too suggestive of the cat tribe about to spring. Anyway, they become all suspicion at once, and mostly they remember appointments elsewhere. And so it was with the polecat—he quitted. He cannot have feared the man very much, or else he would not have attacked him; but all his suspicions—never very much asleep—were aroused by that attitude of aiming, and he vanished into the reeds in the snap of a finger.

In the reeds he was rather useful, because he turned out of them—quite a warm, dry bed she had made against the storm—a hare. The man had found his caps by that time, and the polecat knew it. The thundering report that followed, and the squeal of the hare that followed that, told the polecat the facts, and sent him the best part of a quarter of a mile almost without stopping; but he held the trail—more or less—all the same.

VII.

When the polecat did stop, it was because he had to. Caution was needed. The trail had led him to a farm, one of those long, low, crouched, thatched collections of buildings that mark the marshland farm, where wind is always the prevailing factor in life, and shelter there is none.

The polecat did not much approve of meddling with man's works. A long and bitter experience had taught him to stick to the wilds, and the wilder the wilds the better. But just then he would do anything to please a lady. Nevertheless, there was no need to be a fool over the job, and his caution became extreme.

Selecting the moment of a wild and roaring snow-flurry, he peered through the lower rails of the yard gate, and nearly dropped in his tracks where he stood, for a cream-coloured beast, hunched, squat, and gnome-like, was dancing, it seemed, with a snow-devil by the icicle-festooned water-trough. That beast was only a rat, in point of fact; but in that scene, with his slit ears, stump-tail, and mange-patched hide, he looked something much worse than is conveyed merely by the word rat. Moreover, there was nothing in the polecat's experience to prepare him for cream-coloured rats.

Now the trail of Miss Polecat led to the water-trough. Many trails lead to the little unfrozen water to be found on such a night. Wherefore the polecat held on his way, flat to the snow, pressed into it almost.

As he slid between the lower gate-bars the polecat was aware of three noises at once, snatches, as it were, of sound in the infernal dry howl of the wind. One was the resonant pealing of church bells again; another, another peal—of laughter, in the farmhouse, behind the farm buildings round the yard; and the third, the click of the lowest bar of the gate, which was loose.

He cursed that lowest bar of the gate, for the rat spun instantly on its stump-tail, and sat, hunched, still, silent, and 'at attention.' Perhaps that old rat knew that bar clicked—they are cunning enough for anything.

The polecat 'froze' in his tracks, peering through the falling snow, and in a second or two the rat gave three hops, and—was nowhere! That is a way rats have, but it savours of magic, all the same—black magic and evil.

(Continued on page 238.)

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XV.

NEXT morning I rang up Tony's rooms again, and found, to my relief, that a telegram, despatched from Boulogne, had arrived from him. It gave instructions that I should be asked to meet him on his arrival by the boat-train at Charing Cross in the afternoon. I was there to the minute; but when the long train drew up, although I searched the stream of passengers expectantly, there was no sign of my friend's tall figure. The crowd thinned, and, much disappointed, I had reluctantly turned to leave, when a hand was laid on my arm. I wheeled round and confronted a stooping, spectacled, middle-aged person, with a ragged, grizzled moustache and whiskers. He met the question in my eye with a smile. Then, to my amazement, he seized my hand and shook it warmly, and a welcome voice greeted me with, 'Looking for me, aren't you, Neil?'

'Tony!'

'My speech bewrayeth me. Confess, however, that my little rig-out took you in.'

'Until you spoke, it did, completely.'

'Good! I am gratified, for this is the first time I have used it. It has done me well enough, considering its simplicity. It was most useful in my bolt from Italy.'

'Your bolt?'

'Yes, old son. I fled from that sunny clime without even collecting my luggage. Indeed, my departure was so informal that I did not bid good-bye to my host, Mr Wakeford. A keen-witted knave! His name ought to be "Wide-Awakeford."'

I knew Tony. His whimsical words were not to be taken at their face value, and I thought that, under the gray eyebrows of his disguise, his eyes looked tired. Something had happened.

'You have the paper?' he asked anxiously.

'Safe and sound; but it was a near shave!'

'Excellent! Come along to my rooms, and after I get a tub and a change, we'll swop experiences,' said he, as he led the way with a careful, elderly step, leaning heavily on his umbrella-handle, the picture of a rather untidy, harmless-looking, uninteresting nondescript. Nothing in his appearance called for a second glance.

At his rooms he ran through a pile of letters and some telegrams; and half-an-hour afterwards he was himself again, clean-shaven and alert, tingling with vitality. His eyes, the light of adventure in them, had lost their strained look. He held forth to me from the hearth-rug, his back to a comfortable fire; and this is the gist of his adventure.

After he left me at Ubriano, with the paper in my keeping, he laid himself out to make Wakeford's acquaintance. In the light of what happened, he was convinced that Wakeford was on the same game. The launch lay alongside the landing-stage, and near it Tony dawdled about in the sun, keeping a wary eye around him. He had not long to wait before his man appeared—handsome, lithe, black-avised. 'Reminded one, somehow, of a panther,' was Tony's comment. He gave Tony a polite 'Good-morning,' and the two interchanged commonplaces about the beauty of the bay. Wakeford spoke perfect English, and was obviously interested to meet a fellow-countryman.

They chatted for some time, and a chance remark by Tony in admiration of the launch prompted the apparently hospitable Wakeford to invite his new acquaintance to an hour's sail on the blue waters of the bay.

'I felt I was getting along all right,' Tony continued. 'There was just a chance that he might show his hand, so I went on board the launch and had a pleasant hour. I made myself agreeable, and he asked me to luncheon. I introduced myself as Mr John Robinson of London, enjoying a short holiday in Italy for the first time, and in this rôle posed as grateful for his attention, and accepted the invitation.

'As you know, Neil, I am not given to rhapsodising, but the Villa dei Cipressi is a dream, a delight, a fairy phantasy in colour and setting. Imagine an ascent from the beach by hidden winding pathways to a magnificent garden in three terraces, all around the music of innumerable cascades glittering in the sunlight, leaping and dancing down to a great marble reservoir, out of which they take their final plunge into the blue depths below. As for the garden itself, the only attempt at formality was a splendid avenue of cypresses—hence the villa's name. The rest of the garden had the effect of a lovely wilderness. Its want of formality was studied, no doubt, but the result was a wealth of colour beyond description—cyclamen, narcissus, iris, violets, roses; its polychrome in the mass in vivid contrast to the sombre flames of the cypresses. The Villa dei Cipressi, Wakeford told me, is one of Vignola's creations. It is on the crest of the cliff, and commands one of the fairest views in the world.'

'"Where every prospect pleases,"' I murmured.

'Yes. I'll come to where "man is vile" in a minute. The villa is built round a turf court, relieved by the silver spray of a fountain. A wide loggia runs round the first storey, and below it a veranda—an ideal spot for a lotus-eater; but I shouldn't call Wakeford and Co. lotus-eaters. Both loggia and veranda are decorated in Pompeian red by one of the Zuccari, and the whole effect of the frescoes against the jade green of the cypresses is entrancing. Wakeford must have plenty of money or the command of it. Looking at his luxurious ménage, I recalled the boatman's description of him, "Plenty of money and with the hands perforated." He has at least one virtue. He is an accomplished gastronome. The colazione was as artistic as the villa, and as characteristically Italian. Although there was a bewildering choice, there was no suggestion of Midas' profusion. After the spaghetti we had king prawns, then alodolli stuffed with mushrooms, and some excellent Lachrima Christi. Between truffles and a capretto I chose the latter, with it a salad to the accompaniment of foaming Asti; after that a delicious flip of eggs, cream, and wine (I forget its name); a libation of Vino Santo; then a fresh sheep's milk cheese; and we finished with figs, strawberries, and peaches. The salad is a precious memory. Never again for me the British abominations of sugar and hard-boiled eggs—nothing but fresh olive-oil and a little vinegar, and the bowl with a touch—just a hint, a suspicion—of a clove of garlic. I got the recette for this. Beyond an exciting experience, it is the only thing I carried away from the villa. We were waited upon by a very big and broad Italian, clad in the subfusc of the orthodox English butler. He moved about with the precision and silence of a well-oiled machine. Mark this man, Neil. Wakeford addressed him in Italian (of which I have only a working knowledge), calling him "Benedetto." At first he seemed to me to be the acme of respectability. He might have sat for a portrait of an archdeacon. Stamped all over him, from his bald dome to his toes, was, "Behold one who has served only in the 'best families.'" But I was leaving nothing to chance, and while I kept up a flow of small-talk, I took a mental photograph of his little black eyes, his blue shaven chin, his great creased face, his long, thin mouth, with its perpetual shadow of a grin at the corners, and his large, hairy hands—— Why, what's the matter with you?'

I had jumped excitedly to my feet. 'I think, Tony,' I said, 'that I know this capable butler. I can give him a certificate at least for versatility. I have met him.'

'The devil you have! Where on earth did you run across him?'

'He tracked me in Naples, and did me the honour of travelling for an hour or two with me. But go on. I'll tell you my yarn afterwards.'

Tony gave a long whistle. '"Arcades ambo." Otherwise, a pair of beauties! I'll hurry through my yarn and get yours. To go back to the luncheon. My host was wary, and did not refer to Hugh Forbes, except in the most off-hand, casual manner, when we were half-way through the meal. By the way, he plied the wine freely. I didn't object. (If he meant to loosen my tongue, I thought I might risk drinking level with him.) He believed, he said, that there was an Englishman in the village who was very seriously ill, and that he had no relatives. He had two or three times thought of calling, but he felt diffident about it, and put it off. Probably it was now too late. I murmured something polite and conventional, but I felt sure that he was watching me for all he was worth. I said nothing about Hugh Forbes's death, and waited for Wakeford's next move. However, he changed the subject, and asked me if there were many people at the inn. Very few, I told him. No one whom I knew except a Mr Ford or Forbes. That was you, of course. I said that I wasn't very sure if I had got hold of the right name, and that I had met you by accident in the train. The ingenuous Wakeford remarked sympathetically that he thought Forbes was the name of the poor man who was ill, and that perhaps the gentleman at the inn was a relative. I told him that I had no idea, but that I might ask you, if I saw you again. Just then I happened to look up, and intercepted a glance from Wakeford to Benedetto. A spark of steel in Wakeford's dark eye shone for an instant and vanished, but the servant's big face was a picture of stolid immobility as he deliberately turned and busied himself noiselessly at the sideboard. The incident was trivial-looking, but an indefinable sixth sense told me that a signal had passed, and the knowledge of it rang in my skull like an alarm-clock. However, I kept a tight grip on myself, and I don't think my face betrayed me. Wakeford sheered off the subject, and turned the conversation to a score of other matters, talking very well on art, letters, current politics, and so forth.

'After luncheon Wakeford led the way to the veranda, where he crowned his excellent entertainment with cigars and certosa verde. I can give honest praise to everything about the villa except its inmates. We went into the grounds, and very soon I heard the hum of a motor-car somewhere near. It stopped—quite close to the house, it seemed to me. Wakeford made no remark about it; but in a few minutes, when we returned to the house, a servant—not the sleek Benedetto—presented himself, and said, "Una persona vuole vederla, signore" ("One wishes to see you, sir"). Wakeford rose with an impatient gesture, apologised to me for leaving, and on my suggestion that the length of my visit might be inconvenient to him, assured me that his business would not detain him longer than a few minutes. Off he went, and I seized the opportunity to scribble a note to you, telling you to go on and not to wait for me if I did not turn up at Naples. Then I stepped out to the terrace and sauntered among the flowers, until I got close to the gate. There was a big motor-car waiting, with no one in charge, but by good luck I got a ragged village urchin to deliver the note to you at the inn. This done, I strolled leisurely back until I found myself about a hundred yards down the slope from the front of the house, beside a cluster of myrtles, flanked by a stone parapet, below which was a steep, winding path down the cliffs to the sea. While there I heard the sound of voices. They came from below me, and, without attempting to conceal myself (for I wished to avoid any appearance of eavesdropping), I looked over the parapet. Two men were standing a few yards away. Luckily their backs were to me. I drew back into the myrtle clump, for in that swift moment I had recognised my host and the huge Benedetto. Wakeford's hand was on the other man's shoulder. One thing was clear. Their relationship was not that of master and servant. The voices went on, subdued and earnest, until suddenly my senses were strung taut. I heard my own name. As I told you, I have only a working knowledge of Italian, but what I heard was certainly Wakeford's rather high, eager voice asking, "Have you any doubt?" and the other man's reply in a booming bass, "Scarcely a shadow. It is a hundred to one that he is Keene-Leslie."

'Then Wakeford rapped out, "Lo pigli un accidente! If he resists"——

'I did a little rapid thinking, for the two men had turned, and were coming up the slope into the garden. I concealed myself among the myrtles, and watched them walk hurriedly past towards the house, mount the steps, and disappear.

'What was to happen if I resisted I didn't wait to find out. On the contrary, I did a record sprint towards the gate. The car was still there. There was no one in sight. I ran my eye over the big, powerful Fiat, and made up my mind on the spot to commandeer it, calculating that I might get a minute or two of a start before they found out that I had cleared. They would see my hat in the hall, which might help to throw them off the scent for a few moments. Still, it was going to be a near thing. I switched on the current, gave the handle a couple of turns, jumped in, and rammed the lever. The car got under way. Its head was facing away from the village. However, I dared not risk losing any time by turning it, and as there was a rise for a hundred yards or so in front of me, I don't mind telling you that I sweated with anxiety, for the road was flanked by the grounds, and I had to pass in full view of the windows of the house. Near the top I heard a shout, and next moment Benedetto rushed out from a side-gate, wrath and apprehension in his face, his arms wide open, his hands clawing the air, menacing me, and all the time his great voice bellowing, "Help! Help!"

'He was about six yards away, right in front, and I went straight at him. He dodged with a nimbleness astounding in a man of his bulk and years. I thought I had bested him, but the car hadn't enough way on, and he contrived to clutch it and swing himself on to the step. When he was half-turned to me, trying to steady himself, I stood up and let drive for all I knew with my heel on his ribs. He gasped and wavered. I let him have another. It knocked the wind out of him. He fell and rolled over twice in the dust like a shot rabbit. The car was swaying too much for safety, but I managed to steady it, and a swift glance back showed me the old villain picking himself up. I regret to say that none of his bones appeared to have been broken. But when turning round I caught with the tail of my eye a movement—a dark momentary flicker high up against the white of the Villa dei Cipressi. Instinctively I ducked, half-a-second before the crack of a revolver, and the wind-screen of the car was shivered by the bullet in a line with where my head by rights should have been. I kept down, you bet; and Wakeford—for,' of course, it was he—fired again, but by this time the car had crested the rise and leaped forward. I took every ounce out of her, and in ten minutes I think I must have covered as many miles, mostly downhill.

'Luckily, there were few people on the road. One or two groups of peasants split into two, staring open-mouthed as I shot past like a driven grouse. A cart forced me to slow down, and a herd of goats at a nasty corner had a narrow escape from being made minced meat of; but I was lucky, and every minute gave me confidence. I hadn't the remotest notion where I was going, except that I was putting the leagues between me and the sinister villa. A small town checked my rush; but once I was past it, there was a long stretch of straight road. I let her out again.

'Then came an exhilarating run. The sport of it, and the knowledge that I had a good chance of winning, got into my blood. The car behaved magnificently. I take off my hat to the makers. The ground whizzed from beneath me; the houses were mere flying blurs of red and white. After half-an-hour I steadied down to a good ding-dong forty miles an hour, keeping to the main road for the sake of speed, and at last, hatless, dusty, parched, but with a hundred miles between me and the Villa of the Cypresses, I slowed down and began to take my bearings.

(Continued on page 227.)

MECCA THE MYSTERIOUS.

By Ernest Phillips.

THAT the sacred city of Mecca would be drawn into the ambit of the war was one of the last things any student of affairs would have expected. Situated in the heart of Arabia, remote, inaccessible, guarded by a rigid fanaticism so determined that it visits death upon any Christian who dares to penetrate its mysteries, the centre and capital of the faith of Islam, the holiest spot upon earth to over two hundred million Moslems, more impregnable in its isolation than ever Lhassa was, by one of the most curious turns of fortune's wheel Mecca has been made an ally of the Entente. Nor was the alliance of Mecca a merely passive sympathy with the struggle against the Central Powers. The Arabs rose and threw the Turks out of their country. The Sultan was stripped of his last shred of power in the Holy Land. The Grand Shereef of Mecca assumed the title of King of the Hedjaz. The Ulemas, or Wise Men, issued a proclamation setting forth the misdeeds of the Young Turk party and claiming that the new régime in Turkey was a violation of every canon of Koranic law. And on top of all this, the Mayor of Mecca—fancy it!—sent a telegram to the Lord Mayor of London, congratulating the British Army on their gallant fighting in France, and expressing the profoundest hope for our final conquest of the enemy.

Of all men, the German Emperor must have been least pleased to read that telegram. When he pranced through Jerusalem on a white horse and took the world of Islam under his wing, the Kaiser had visions of a great scheme of Oriental expansion. The Germans have never been successful as Oriental colonists. None of the Great Powers had fewer Moslem subjects than Germany before the war. Great Britain had nearly a hundred millions, or one-half the total number; Russia, France, Italy—all had vast Mohammedan possessions; but Germany was never able to plant her flag successfully in Islamic lands. The Kaiser's trip to Syria was part of a great scheme to redress the balance. Allied with Turkey, the nominal head of Islam; controller of the Bagdad Railway, which would carry German influence through lands that were the cradle of mankind, establish it on the Tigris and the Euphrates, and spread it throughout Syria and Arabia and the Persian Gulf, he doubtless had in mind the creation of an Eastern empire which would rival India, and probably dreamed of the day when, in Constantinople, or Bagdad, or even Mecca, he should be crowned emperor of a greater dominion than any of the Osmanli Sultans ever owned.

The revolt of the Arabs was the death-knell of these hopes. The Sultan's command of a holy war against the Christians fell on deaf ears. Like the massacre of the Armenians, it was a devilish device. It would have plunged India, Afghanistan, Morocco, Algiers, and Egypt into a maelstrom of bloodshed. It was Arabia that, standing steadfast to the cause of the Allies, saved the world from a storm that would have shocked civilisation. And to-day Arabia, by standing firm, has won her freedom. She has thrown out the hated Turk; she has swept her land clean of the last obese pasha from Stamboul. Moslem Arabia united with Moslem India in praying for the success of the Allied cause. It is the fashion to disparage the diplomacy of the Allies. Whatever it may have cost us in the Balkans, it saved the world from the horrors of a Moslem rising at the call of the Turk.

And what about Mecca? None of us knew it had advanced so far on the road to progress as to own a mayor. Think of it—Mecca the mysterious, Mecca the sacred, which, in its whole history, has not been seen by fifty Christians, and which to-day may probably boast that it has not been seen by a single living Englishman! Is there any other city in the world of which this claim could be made? It is extremely doubtful. For Mecca is thrice holy. It was the birthplace of Islam. Mohammed was a native; it was there he taught and preached and prayed, and founded a faith which was to have greater influence upon mankind than all other faiths save one. But Mecca was holy before Mohammed elevated it into the capital of a new empire. Built into the wall of the Caaba, or Temple, was a stone which the Arabs claim was sent from heaven by the angel Gabriel. They maintain that Abraham visited the city, and sojourned within it. Near by is the well of Zemzem, the spring revealed to Hagar when she and her son Ishmael were cast out in the wilderness. Not far off is the mountain of Arafat, where Adam and Eve met after their expulsion from Eden. Mohammed sanctified all these legends and traditions, incorporated them in his new religion. Then, by a master-stroke, he invested Mecca with eternal sanctity by decreeing that every Moslem, once in his lifetime, should visit it on pilgrimage; and to this he added the terrible warning that no Christian should behold its sacred mysteries and be permitted to live.

Is it to be wondered at that men's thoughts all over the world should turn to this city of fable and romance? Moslems visit it by millions. They go from India, Afghanistan, Persia, the hill countries, Turkestan, Egypt, Soudan, Central Africa, Hausaland, Morocco, the Sahara, the Red Sea coast, from distant China and Malaya. Caravans from Damascus convoy thousands; pilgrim-ships from India land the faithful at Jeddah, whence they march overland; Arabs and Persians tramp across Mesopotamia; the Egyptian caravan follows the route by the Red Sea shores. Devotees from the Himalayas, from the great cities in Central Asia, from the heart of the Sahara or the wilds of Kurdistan, take years to do the pilgrimage, begging their way, dying by thousands, but happy even in their death if they have but lived to see the Caaba, to press their lips on the sacred stone, to don the ihram, and say their prayers, 'Labbeyka,' 'Here I am,' within the cloisters which once echoed to the voice of Mohammed himself. In all the world there is nothing in any religion or any faith at all equal to the great pilgrimage to Mecca. And when the pilgrim has done the round of the holy sites, when he has prayed and sacrificed, when he has shaved and cast his stone at the Devil, when he has filled his bottle at the sacred well of Zemzem, he returns with the title of Hadji, to be the wonder and admiration of his family, and to boast in his declining years of the days he spent in holy Mecca.

How many Englishmen have seen Mecca? It is doubtful if the number comes to a round dozen. It is questionable if more than a score of Christians of all nationalities have been there and returned alive. Dozens, perhaps scores, have tried it. They have learned Arabic; they have studied the rites of Islam; they have joined the caravans in disguise; they have braved the dangers of the desert; they may even have got inside the city; but their disguise has been penetrated, and their corpses, mangled and torn, have been thrown from the city walls. An Italian named Varthema managed it safely in 1503. A Frenchman named Le Blanc was successful in 1554. A German soldier named Wild went as slave to a Persian in 1607. The first Englishman to do it was Joseph Pitts. He was sold as a slave at Algiers and went with his master in 1680. Then there was a native of Biscay, Leblich, who went in 1807 as a friend of the Sultan of Morocco. A Russian named Seetzen did the pilgrimage in 1809. Burckhardt, the Swiss, after studying Arabic at London and Cambridge, went and returned in 1814, and his book is still the classic story of the pilgrimage. Finati, an Italian, who joined the Turkish Army and became a Moslem, was there the same year as Burckhardt. Roches, a Frenchman, who lived in Algiers and became a Moslem, went in 1841; and three years later a German named Wallin went as a Moslem doctor, equipped with a knowledge of twenty-nine languages. Then came Sir Richard Burton, a captain in the Indian Army, master of twenty-six languages, who went as an Afghan pilgrim, and wrote a book on Mecca as fascinating as any novel. Von Maltzan (German), Bicknell (Englishman), Keane (a Whitby sailor), Snouck-Hurgronje (Dutch), Courtellemont (French), and Wavell (an Englishman, since killed in the war, who visited Mecca ten years ago) practically exhaust the list of pilgrims; though a British soldier named Keith, a private in the 72nd Highlanders, taken prisoner by the Turks and forcibly converted to Islam, not only lived in Arabia, but was actually for a time governor of Mecca!

Such is the fascination of Mecca. We may wonder if recent events will lead to the opening up of this remarkable city. The Hedjaz Railway brings Medina (the burial-place of Mohammed) into touch with the West. Mecca is not far distant. The Arabs are the greatest of all the peoples of Islam. They are the heirs of a civilisation which kept alive the learning of Europe when it was all but extinguished elsewhere. And now the hour is at hand when European travellers may wander at will through Mecca as they do to-day through Cairo, or Bagdad, or Delhi? Will it be possible ever for a Cook's tourist from Britain to stand beneath the shadow of the Caaba and hear the cries and groans of the pious Moslems; hear, as Burckhardt heard, forty languages spoken in one day; see, as other travellers have seen, frenzied pilgrims blind themselves so that the last image on their mind may be the scene of Mohammed's life and work? None of us can answer these questions, but it seems tolerably certain that the casting out of the Turk may lead to a closer union between Britain and Arabia, and that the iron law which closes these holy cities to all who do not acknowledge the sway of the Meccan camel-driver may be so far relaxed that, in some way, these sacred shrines may become accessible to travellers who would give much to study Islam at the source and fountain of its wonderful power.

THE BLOWER OF BUBBLES.

PART II.

IV.

I HAVE never known any one to change so little with the cycle of years as Basil Norman. When he came to Westminster, at the age of twelve, he had an easy nonchalance, a delightful insouciance, that never left him. He went from form to form, trod the stone-flagged passages as others did; but the youth of seventeen that left Westminster bore the same smiling, detached personality as when he entered. The atmosphere of tradition interested but did not drug him; the Elizabethan pancake impressed him less than did a contemporary Edwardian soap-bubble.

Conscientious form-masters recognised his extraordinary abilities, and gave him the benefit of well-worded and impressive homilies on achievement. Sometimes for effect they quoted Latin. Norman would counter with a 'Greek remark.' He never studied, but more than one scholar owed their success to the eleventh-hour coaching of Basil Norman. Learning, like everything else, came to him as a needle to a magnet.

With a curious air of detachment he watched the panorama of schoolboy life, noticing with a discerning eye the various strata upon which public-school morality is founded, assigning the relative importance of scholarship and cricket, and nodding knowingly as the process of standardisation brought similarity of speech, accent, thought, and vocabulary to all his fellows.

He was like a Puck who had never been really young, but who refused to become a day older.

For a few weeks he played cricket, but without reverence. During a match he kept up (sotto voce, of course) a running commentary of philosophy which, according to our ethics, was vulgar. I shudder to think what he would have done if Westminster had adopted baseball.

On one occasion the captain of the eleven took upon himself to point out to Basil Norman the error of his ways. The worthy demigod deplored Norman's habit of lying on the grass during practice and inventing couplets on the various members of the team. The captain also said that, providing he would take the game seriously, there was a future for him as a cricketer. Whereupon Norman, from his recumbent position, misquoted most of the 'To be, or not to be,' soliloquy, unblushingly attributing Hamlet's indecision towards living to his doubts of himself as a cricketer. When he finished he rose to his feet, and our comments were frozen at the sight of his face.

His cheeks had a ghastly pallor and his eyes were brilliant, but with a fixed, glaring intensity. And as we looked his expression changed—the colour returned with a glow of warmth to his skin, and his eyes were gray and humorous. Being boys, we forgot about it as quickly as it had happened.

The next Saturday we played Charterhouse, and though the score was heavily against us, Norman gave the finest exhibition of batting I have seen in public-school cricket, scoring a century and winning the match for us. He was frail but lithe, and with an air of aplomb batted the offerings of Charterhouse to all points of the compass. At the finish of the game we crowded around him, but he smiled a little wearily, and shook his head.

'I am finished with cricket,' he said.

Bewilderment, then anathema, broke like a thunder-shower upon the head of Basil Norman. We pleaded; we argued; we threatened; then we used language which possessed the merit of forcefulness and frankness. We called him a swine, a rotter, a skunk, and an absolute cad. Some one ventured the opinion that he was a perfect stink, and we all stood about him like the Klu Klux Klan trying a negro malefactor.

'Gentlemen,' he said—and there was a delightful touch of irony in the word—'you have come to bury, not to praise, me; yet, unlike Cæsar, I am not ambitious.'

'Swine!' said Smith tertius (or was it quartus?).

'In spite of the witty comment of me learned friend,' said Norman, after the manner of the leading counsel of the day, 'I have always held the opinion that life is a thing to be sipped, not drunk. I have played cricket—veni, vidi, I scored a century! I would not spoil me appetite, milords, by overgorging.'

'Your conduct,' said Grubbs, the captain, 'is rotten. It shows that you don't give a fig for the honour of the school. If you want to be a pig, you can wear the cap of one.' (We all knew what he meant, and admired him frightfully for his venture into the quagmire of metaphor.) 'We will send you to Coventry until you come to your senses.'

The culprit bowed airily.

'You will lose much more by my silence than I by yours,' he said—and it takes considerable courage to make such a statement to a tribunal of schoolboys.

If Norman suffered from our aloofness, he took it with the same nonchalance as he had taken our plaudits. Oddly enough, he had no intimate friends, and all of us, partly out of resentment against his pose of onlooker, and more from the love of torture which links the schoolboy to the savage, performed our duty of silent punishment with a zeal which deserved a better inspiration. We forgot how he had made friends with the misfits whose square personalities were being drawn through the round hole of public-school life. Little chaps he had taken in hand on arrival when they wanted to weep for loneliness turned from him as if he held contagion. All the sensitive, shrinking ones about whom he had thrown his cloak of vivacity, and who were now grown bold and self-reliant, let him pass from Little Dean's Yard to his house and through the ancient passages, a lonely debonair figure that always smiled. . . . And no one spoke to him. I, whom he had named 'The Pest,' thus turning my naturally perverse sulkiness into a subject of jest and good-humour, took a special delight in watching the man who had been sentenced by his peers to solitude in the midst of a crowd.

His peers? . . . Was it Smith tertius (or quartus) who used the word 'swine'?

Two weeks had passed, and we were to play Winchester a decisive match on our grounds, which, as land near the cathedral is rather difficult to obtain, are a little less than a mile from the school.

The stage was set. Youthful scholars of ten and twelve walked in their gowns, their brows knit with thought, their eyes blinking from overstudy. Little chaps struggled under the responsibility of silk toppers, and conversed solemnly on the deterioration of the tuck-shop; and the Olympian creature who was the head-boy of the school lounged outside the scoring-booth as if he were 'fed up' with nectar, and would like some brown October ale for a change—a pose much favoured by the best people in England. There was an excellent audience of the secondary sex, composed of proud mothers and apologetic sisters, whose presence was necessitating a sort of Jekyll and Hyde attitude on the part of their schoolboy relatives, who were endeavouring to be polite to their 'people' and at the same time give the impression to their confrères that the women were mere acquaintances — accidental dinner partners, as it were.

No schoolboy of twelve likes to admit to a mother.

Surrounding the field there is a high iron fence, through the railings of which, or on top, a motley collection of gamins cheer on their wealthier brethren of the silk hats. Naturally no notice is taken of these uninvited guests. It is quite all right for them to shout for Westminster if it gives them any pleasure, but what has a silk hat in common with a red kerchief and a slouch-cap?

On the day of the match they seemed in larger numbers than usual, and the top of the fence was covered with urchins, who retained their position of vantage as though the law of gravitation were no concern of theirs, keeping up a shrill chorus as Winchester went out for a moderate score.

With the odds all in our favour we went in to bat, Grubbs, the captain, and I leading off. The first ball was wide, but to feel the play of my muscles I took a perfunctory swing at it with my bat. The effect was extraordinary. . . . The crowd of Cockney youngsters raised a volume of sound as if my bat had been a baton and they a chorus.

'Gow it, Pest!' 'That's the style, Gloomy!' 'Troy t' other hend, Bluntnose!' 'Gee, he's got odd socks on!' 'Nah then, Spiderlegs!' (The blunt nose and the legs I admit to, but the accusation of odd socks was pure malice.)

The next ball, with no twist at all, bowled me clean, and I walked off the field to the tune of high-pitched shrieks of delight, and with a face that flushed a dark red. My place was taken by Smith tertius (or quartus), whose appearance caused an even greater furore than mine.

''Ooray for Bones!' greeted the lanky youth as he emerged—''im as his the loife of the school!' (He was the most morose of boys.) ''I, Bones, 'oo did you crib from this time, eh?' (A subtle allusion to an ancient offence which had almost earned him expulsion.)

The first ball came for Smith with an inviting hop. He watched it—went to strike at it—changed his mind — reconsidered his decision, and swung at the air as the ball passed over the bails by an inch, a feat which seemed to gratify our enemies on the fence immensely.

'Nah then, Bones, none o' that there contortionising!' ''It the ball, Bones; don't kiss it!'

And he did—a miserable little pop into the air; the chap in the slips didn't have to move a foot to gather it in.

Mr Smith then added his proof that Shakespeare was right when he said in this world we have our exits and our entrances.

The next six batters went out for a score of eleven, bowled clean by the most intimate volume of abusive chaff ever endured by a cricket team. Skeletons were not only being taken from their closets, but paraded brazenly before the eyes of the world. The secret history of Westminster was screamed from the fence-tops.

It was after the loss of our eighth wicket that Grubbs and I, who had stolen round by the street, stalked and discovered their ringleader.

'That's him,' said the captain hoarsely—the situation was too tense to permit of the niceties of grammar. I followed the line of his accusing finger—and gasped. There was no mistaking those gray twinkling eyes, although they were almost hidden behind a huge bandage, presumably for mumps. He was dressed in a rough coster suit, with a villainous cap on one side of his head and a bandit's red kerchief about his neck.

'It is him,' I said dramatically.

'I thought so,' said Grubbs, and cleared his throat. 'Norman,' he cried. 'Kid—Norman.'

The young rascal, who was sitting on top of a post, more like a Puck than ever, swivelled about and solemnly winked one eye. 'Do I understand that the ban of silence is lifted?' he said from behind the mumps bandage.

Grubbs considered, and then made a tactful and instantaneous decision. (Small wonder that a few years later he was entrusted with a war mission to Washington, of the utmost delicacy.)

'You 've had your revenge,' he said, 'and the joke is on us. Call your mob off, will you?'

'You 're quite sure you wouldn't like us to encourage the remainder for a change?'

'Quite sure.'

'So be it, my captain.'

He blew a whistle through his fingers, and in a moment the fence was denuded of mortals like a tree smitten by an autumn gale. The Blower of Bubbles removed his bandage, and presented a stocky youth with three shillings.

'Buy sweets for the crowd,' he said, 'and mind—play fair.'

'Right you har', guv'nor;' and the mob disappeared. And thus ended the riot of the slouch-cap against the silk hat. To-day, if you are passing the field during a match, you will see that the gamins are still there, but they shout only for Westminster.

We were just turning away, when Basil Norman laid his hand on Grubbs's forearm, as a girl might do, and his eyes had a wistful look.

'Before I change into more fitting garb,' he said airily, then paused. . . . My breathing seemed to stop at the sight—his face had gone suddenly white, and his eyes were glazed.

'Grubbs!' he cried, and his voice sounded hollow. 'Don't you understand? . . . Oh, you damned fool, can't you see it 's my heart?'

V.

After Westminster I went to Cambridge, and succeeded in cultivating the Oxford manner, by which all Cambridge men are known. When I emerged from there I offered myself to the highest bidder (a sudden bankruptcy of my father having made an occupation essential). A London newspaper was the fortunate winner in the mad race for my services, though it would have been difficult for it to lose, as there was but one entry.

I became a writer of power—not quite so much so as the gentleman to-day who wields his pen as he would a bludgeon, and succeeds in writing a powerful article each week; but still I was a writer of strength. I damned the present, doubted the future, and deplored the past. I became an honoured member of the group of London writers whose entire genius is exhausted in criticism. I secured a bowing acquaintance with Bernard Shaw, and always spoke of H. G. Wells as Mr Wells. It was obvious to me that to achieve literary success in England one must abuse England—but especially any one who tried to change her.

Some of my confrères sided with Bernard Shaw and attacked middle-class morality and patriotism. Mr Arnold Bennett had a certain following, though we agreed that his Five Towns stories were not really critical, but merely observant. We did not know at the time that he had it in him to write The Pretty Lady, which was to be neither. For myself, I was drawn towards Mr Wells, and hit at everything like a blindfolded pugilist.

We agreed with Granville Barker that Irving had reduced the value of Shakespeare by overstaging; and we endorsed the opinion of a dramatic critic, known to the public as 'Jingle,' who said that Shakespeare's lines were often worthy of an Oxford undergraduate.

For pastime we abused Lord Roberts as a monomaniac, and Winston Churchill as a kleptomaniac with a passion for stealing the thunder of others. We even argued that the Church had lost its grip, and wrote eloquently on the value of doubt. With admirable esprit de corps we refrained from attacking the public-school system, though we realised that one could always get a hearing by doing so.

And every year those schools were turning out their thousands and the universities their hundreds; every year our number was strengthened by well-routined brains that took to destructive criticism like a German to barbarity. Somebody was writing our puerile dramas; some one was turning out the trash which flooded our bookstalls; some brain was conceiving the tawdry stuff which was educating the millions in the cinemas. . . . But we thanked Heaven that we were not as other men. We were England's educated class. For the education of England fails to teach one that a country's art and literature are as vital to the nation as speech to the individual.

I took a flat in Sloane Square and read Russian novels. Whenever I discovered a new Russian author, I quoted him as if I had known him all my life; it used to pain me to find how unrecognised he was by my fellows. I attended the opera only on Russian nights, and I became a devotee of the Russian dancers. I used to quote Russian in my paper, and brought down the curse of a hundred type-setters upon my head.

I think every writer has his Russian period.

Once or twice I heard of Basil Norman, though our paths did not cross. Some one claimed that Norman could have been a great violinist, if—— Another told me that Punch had published a delicate little sonnet of his that had the quality of tears about it. There was no question (he said), if—— An artist I met had painted one landscape that defied criticism—even ours—and I spoke of the exquisite colouring and detail of the foreground.

'I could not have done that,' he said, 'but for Basil Norman, who brooded over me like an inspiration. The work is mine, but the conception his. If'——

Yet the world did not know of his existence. He remained a detached personality, treading lightly where sorrow was, singing his song of the sunlight wherever ears had become dulled with discouragement. A fantastic, gentle, twinkling-eyed prince in a kingdom of butterflies and violets. Try as I would, I could not refrain from contrasting my life of literary vivisection with his primrose youth that seemed eternal, springing from a genuine joy in living, a youth that was as perfect as a melody of Chopin's.

'The happiest of Christmases, old Pest!'

The subject of my thoughts was standing before me, and the bells were clamouring exultantly on the frosty air.

I gripped his hand, and something in his eyes told me the truth. . . . He had come for me because I was lonely and needed him.

And the message of the bells took on a new meaning.

VI.

We walked into the brisk, vibrating sunshine of a glorious Christmas morning. He had taken my arm, and was chatting gaily on everything from 'cabbages to kings.' Sometimes his nostrils dilated, and he would look up as if he were actually drinking in the ozone of the air; and he seemed younger than ever, with a joyousness born of sheer intoxication with life. We walked for a mile, and all the time his mood was as happy and stimulating as the sunshine sparkling in the December air.

Turning down a street, we passed a church from which the worshippers were emerging, and a mother with two sons on the brink of manhood held our attention for a moment. The lads had a gentleness of feature, an unconscious grace that sometimes is the attribute of adolescence, and their mother walked between them, proudly—they were her masterpieces. For some time Norman chatted amiably, but I could see that a pensive shadow was steadily creeping over the brilliancy of his spirits.

'They tell me,' he said in subdued tones, breaking suddenly from the topic in hand, 'that both my parents hoped for a girl when I was born. And sometimes I have thought that there is a little of the feminine in my nature. I love the pretty things of life, and there are times when I have an unmistakable sense of intuition.'

I waited silently, but it was some moments before he resumed.

'Somewhere ahead,' he said dreamily, 'in months or years to come, I see a vision of a woman in black, coming from church alone, and her head is bowed with grief'—— He passed his hand over his brow with a weary, querulous movement, and shadows appeared beneath his eyes. 'Where—where are the two sons? Not dead?'

He smiled wistfully, and replaced his hand in my arm.

'The picture we saw just now,' he said, 'is my conception of England—the real England of noble mothers and noble sons. But something tells me that the woman in black is England too, mourning for her sons who will never—come back.'

With an effort he squared his shoulders and forced a laugh from his lips.

'Pest!' he cried, 'I should be burned as a witch. Heigho! it's a pretty go when one has to turn lugubrious on a Christmas morning. Cheer us up, Pest. Tell me about yourself—whom you are in love with, and your dreams for the days to come. Let's blow bubbles—shall we?—and see what fresh beauties we can find in this charming adventure called life!'

And I laughed with him, exchanging philosophies light as air; but the chimes that rang out all about us had still another meaning. There was a warning in the pealing discords that broke on the quiet air; there was a requiem in the notes that lingered like an echo, then murmured ominously to silence.

I shivered as though I had a chill, for something of Norman's spirit had seized me, and I felt that both the warning and the requiem were—for England.

(Continued on page 231.)

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XIII.—OUR DEAR OLD COMMANDANT.

IF we thought a lot of our school, and did our best to keep up its good name, this was due not to a swelling admiration of the military system, but mainly to a sense of patriotism; it was also a tribute of respect to our commandant. He was not a brilliant man, and in some things was an absolute fire-eater. However, his bark was worse than his bite, and he improved on acquaintance. The 'Old Man' was sincere. He was no sneak. There was nothing petty in his decisions, and little things revealed a deep love of his 'boys' rather than a selfish love of his job. In his day he had been a gallant soldier and 'a bit of a lad.' As a man of the world, he understood human nature, and his one desire was to have a happy and successful unit.

He had a hard-working but not a brilliant staff. Brilliant men are scarce as instructors in cadet schools. The military system, even to-day, is not kind to brilliance. It is afraid of genius. Genius even in this war has too often been attacked and destroyed. On the other hand, it is just to note that the brilliant men who survive the ordeal of jealousy are all sent to the front, and are, therefore, beyond the reach of cadet schools. What a pity! For in these cadet schools men hunger for more light and congenial thought. Captain Cheerall, I may say, was the great exception. It is good to write such things. The War Office ought to know them. The reason it doesn't know is that those who are running these schools are afraid to be frank. Push-and-Go is not appreciated by certain soft-jobbers in the Home Commands. And they have a quiet but brutal way of dispensing with men who want to be 'American' and revolutionise our whole system of military education.

It is imagined by military mandarins that we cadets don't know and don't see anything. What a blunder! At our school, and at every other cadet school, you can find the cream of intellect studying for commissions. The nation is in arms. And many a lecturer ignores the fact that he is talking to men with the highest university degrees. These men in our school never declared they had nothing to learn. Indeed, they promptly realised their frightful deficiencies in military education. They hungered for learning. When they got a little, they wanted more, and a good lecturer always left the room to the accompaniment of resounding cheers. This attitude of cadets is in striking contrast with the attitude of those who regard them as 'a d—— lot of Tommies who want knocking about.' We never objected to being knocked about, even by the sergeant-major from the Guards. But what we did resent was the visit of silly old fools, who talked a lot of rot and gave us no intellectual food. We were not blind, and all of us had 'been out.' If we were deficient in higher strategy, we had a share of common-sense. Had a War Office inspector tumbled into our midst disguised as a cadet, he would have heard frank appreciation of all that was good, and a damning indictment of all that was bad. The greatest weakness of the military system is that it declines to be told, seldom asks for suggestions, and is up against an intellectual aristocracy. This fear of intellect has been our curse in this war. And only one statesman has fought for 'The New School.' That man is David Lloyd George.

For all that, we were not unhappy. When we ceased to analyse the appalling anomalies of the military system, we enjoyed ourselves. Army life does teach fellowship and breeds great friendships. Our hut was tenanted by a band of brothers. Our company commander was a 'sport,' and the C.O. had rid us of our platoon commander, who was a prize prig and an insufferable snob. We got a new platoon commander, Lieutenant Damall, who was an intellectual rebel, a first-class soldier, a fine lecturer, and a jolly good chap. The general routine of the school was stiff, yet bearable. But it would have been an absolute joy if more brains had been knocking around. However, the school's sheet-anchor, personality, father, friend, jailer, and general entertainer was our dear old commandant. He would come on parade and play h— with everybody; turn us upside-down; call us fat-heads and duffers; then wind up with, 'You know, boys, I curse you because I love you. And I do want to be proud of you. I want to see you all generals and V.C.'s. Buck up, for Heaven's sake, or, by Gad, I'll have you shot!' and off he would stump, pretending he was in a devil of a temper. In reality the Old Man was playing quite a clever game. He had that wonderful secret of knowing how to 'curse' a man, and yet make a man smile and do his best. He might not be brilliant—but he was wise. And he was jolly good fun. 'You know, gentlemen,' he said one day at a lecture, 'I was a bit of a lad when I was young. An awful blood! Wouldn't call a duke my cousin, and was measured for everything—even my ties. Of course, that was in the good old days when we had nothing but nigger wars, and we used to spend nearly all our time hunting foxes or struggling to get in at stage doors. I was jolly good at that.

'When I joined my battalion a colour-sergeant was told off to carry me about. This fellow had to think for me, even on parade. He was always at my elbow whispering the words of command —for which I can assure you I often thanked the Lord. For, to be perfectly frank with you, like many young officers, I was a bit of an ass. I achieved fame at a general's inspection by giving my company the command "Trail Arms!" instead of "Present!" for which I got six months' marked drill on the square. They gave me no leave; wouldn't even allow me to pop out and see my best girl (as I allow you to do); but from 9 A.M. till 4 P.M. an old sergeant gave me dyspepsia, colic, and lumbago by marching, counter-marching, and doubling on that terrible barrack-square. I wore out two pairs of boots, and was almost excommunicated by the garrison chaplain owing to the awful language which I used after those parades. It was a bitter lesson; but it did me good, although I didn't think so at the time. I am just afraid I was a saucy young devil.

'Of course, in those days a subaltern was very small fry. He was merely a "fag" in the regimental system. It was very dangerous to think—it still is a bit dangerous to do so—and the great secret of success was to eliminate any trace of personality or originality. As a sarcastic old major remarked, all he demanded of a subaltern was to be strong in the back and soft in the head. In passing, I may say I was awfully popular with this old chap. Perhaps I was up to his marvellous standard. I led him to think so, for I readily found out that the line of least resistance was the one which assured a calm and charming life. You may think that a terrible revelation, but if you study the British Army in the 'seventies, you will see that it would have been disastrous for any man of mediocre talent to start thrusting out his hand for the field-marshal's baton.

'Company commanders in those days directed operations from the anterooms or their bedrooms, and we long-suffering, fat-headed subs. fetched and carried for them. They were the drones, and we were the working-bees. At least we thought we were, but what we actually did was this. We received our orders, then went to the company office and simply passed them on. The colour-sergeants were really the foremen of works. These old N.C.O.'s were marvellous men—men of great attainments, and men whose abilities were not rewarded as they are to-day. Under the old system the officer was a god, not to be defiled by mere toil or clear thinking. Our daily task commenced about 10 A.M., and finished about noon. When we had to work in the afternoon, we always talked about resigning our commissions. We had an extraordinary view that we were there to enjoy ourselves and look pretty, and it was most unfair to burden our brains with 5 + 5 = 10.

'I am telling you these things, not because I long for those old times again. When I see you boys doing so many interesting things to-day, I feel I must teach you to abhor shams, to face facts, and to tell the truth. In those days I couldn't see the hollowness and the rottenness of it all. I see it now, for I have no illusions. War is a brutal business. Facts predominate. If you have the moral courage to get up in front of your men and admit an error, and seek for light and co-operation, you will show evidence of greatness.

'We were very pretty in those days. I rejoiced in my figure, which, as with all fashionable officers, was kept in order by common or garden corsets. When we went out in review order we were a sight for the girls and—"the mob." The men were just as smart. Indeed, a battalion looked like a thousand dandies out of a cutter's window. I have an affection for that aspect of the past. It is no crime to be a well-dressed man. Even to-day it is most important that an officer should look the picture of a clean, alert, and well-groomed British gentleman. That is an aid to discipline. Every Tommy is an aristocrat. As one of my men once remarked, "I likes my orficer to look a ruddy toff." Of course, there was a great weakness in this system. It was overdone. We concentrated on brass bands, pipeclay, and eye-wash. The men were mere automatons; the discipline was harsh, in some cases brutal; while strategy and tactics were not worshipped as we worship them now. That was not our fault. It was due to the age. The German menace was not even dreamt of. We had only frontier skirmishes to deal with. And we all enlisted—for fun.

'As for training, it was not at all intelligent. We did field-days in full-dress uniforms, busbies, cross-belts, and all the glitter used on review parades. Even in India troops wore European clothing, and died by the hundred from heat apoplexy. The frontal attack was the summit of our knowledge, and "form square" for savage warfare our one great stunt. It looked pretty. And it was this damnable craving for prettiness which hindered the development of military training. Of course, I did not know that then. To me life was one huge jest. But I had a rude awakening.

'In a frontier skirmish, my regiment was attacking a difficult position held by some of the hill tribes. The C.O., who was a charming old gentleman, but no soldier, decided on the usual thing—a frontal attack. We went forward. Two companies were almost annihilated. The senior major, a fairly able man, who was leading the attack, decided it was suicide to go farther, and ordered the retirement. We went back. The colonel demanded an explanation. The major very respectfully pointed out the stupidity of the arrangement, and suggested a feint attack on the front, combined with an enveloping movement round both flanks.

'"Bosh!" replied the Old Man. He ordered us forward again. Another company was decimated, and fortunately the colonel was among the casualties. If he had lived he would have killed every man by his stupid tactics. The major then withdrew the battalion. That night he made arrangements for another attack at dawn. One hundred men were sent to make a feint at the front, and two hundred more were divided into two columns to attack the right and left flanks. The remainder were in reserve. At dawn we carried out his orders. Two hours afterwards we had captured the position, three hundred of the enemy, one gun, and lots of loot.

'Our casualties in that attack were fifty-five.

'Our previous casualties were about three hundred and fifty.

'This to me was a revelation of the use of brains, and an indication that brains can save human life. From that day, gentlemen, I honestly tried to be intelligent. But I had to go warily. I swotted up Napoleon and Frederick the Great—in secret; for it was considered bad form to be a student. Even then I did not quite appreciate the terrible dangers of such false "form." However, I had the courage to chuck my fashionable regiment and become a soldier of fortune in the Indian and Egyptian armies. From those two great and immortal men, Kitchener and Roberts, I acquired any little knowledge I possess. Still, I am not a marvellous soldier—and know it. But one thing I have been taught, and that is—sincerity.

'When I make a blunder I have no hesitation in cutting my losses. Nor am I afraid of criticism or suggestion. You may find this lacking in certain spheres of military life. But do not despair. Do your duty! Be loyal! And attempt no far-reaching reforms unless you have the genius and the courage to carry them out. Otherwise you will only batter your head against a brick wall. Progress is with you, and you are all young. I wish I were sitting with you as a cadet, and not talking to you with the rank of a colonel. In this war my age seems a curse. Your field is wide and your opportunities are illimitable. To the keen soldier this is a day of glory!

'For all that, I do not say our system is perfect. And I am not going to insist that the best men are always pushed on. But I do believe the system is improving. And I can assure you that I am doing my best to smash false barriers. I am not popular with certain people for this. Popularity is nothing to me. I have boys of my own. While I think this is a good school, I quite realise it is not a perfect school. We have not cut the old shackles yet, but we are getting on. You are young and impatient. I know your dreams. I know your hopes. I know how you grouse, and I often hear some of you say, "Oh, here 's that frosted old dug-out again." But I am quite sure you don't mean anything—just as I am quite convinced you try your best.

'Frankly, gentlemen, you have much to be grateful for. You are getting in this school as much knowledge as the old army officer got in twenty years. It may not be issued in palatable or popular form. It may jar your temperament, but the "stuff" is there, if you care to pick it up. I cannot talk to you like Sir Oliver Lodge or fascinate you like Lord Rosebery. I am a plain soldier. My staff are plain soldiers, but they are hard workers. They are doing their best for you, and it is up to you to do your best for them. If I, your colonel, have the courage to come and tell you of my own deficiencies, surely you boys will have the pluck to do a little heart-searching. You must also study the Service as a whole, and not in parts. Believe me, the British Army is a proud and glorious institution. The traditions are high. Great men have come from our ranks. In this war our arms are belaurelled with chivalry. Ours is no mercenary host, no band of knaves or babe-assassins. We fight a good fight. While I am no great Christian, I do believe we are the new Crusaders. This is a Holy Crusade.

'To sum up my theme, let me say I have told you of the jolly but inefficient past simply to show the marvellous advance made in military education, how we have blundered through to a more sensible and useful system. If you feel there are imperfections to-day, you would have been shocked had you soldiered in the 'seventies. For all that, I do not want you to feel contented—not even with me. A healthy discontent is a sign of a progressive mind. Always look forward. Always endeavour to develop new ideas and produce fresh thoughts. But in doing so, try to incorporate the best from the past. Shatter stupid tradition, certainly; but remember this, gentlemen—if your fathers are old, they are also wise with experience. And never insult old age or scorn good counsel.

'Yours is a high calling. Yours is a noble cause. You are all my boys, and I want to be proud of you. When you go from here, I shall watch your careers. If you feel you have any respect for me and this school—imperfect as it is—then I ask you to honour the King, play the game, be good citizens and gallant British officers. That 's all.'

When the Old Man finished an extraordinary thing happened. Tosher, the Canadian, jumped up on the table and shouted, 'Three cheers for the good old colonel!' Our wild hurrahs almost burst the roof.

'Thank you, boys,' said the C.O. quietly, and hurried away. He was afraid of his emotions.

Oh, we did love our dear old commandant!

(Continued on page 253.)

'GOOD-NIGHT.'

THE shades of eve have closed around;
We 've said our last good-night;
But in my dreams, when slumber-bound,
Thou 'rt still my guiding light.

The smiles that deck thy winsome face
Are aye before mine e'en;
Throughout the land in endless space
No sweeter lass is seen.

Thy golden hair will captive hold
The sunshine's brightest beam;
Thine eyes forget-me-nots enfold
From near the mountain stream.

I hear thy voice, in accents kind,
Soft words of wisdom speak—
The outcome of a noble mind,
A spirit pure and meek.

The air that oft I've heard thee sing,
Borne on the summer wind,
Till death within my heart shall ring,
And still an echo find.

Good-night, my own, my dearest love;
May angels guard thy sleep,
And from the cloudless skies above
Their watch around thee keep!

HELEN WILKIE.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE PAGEANT OF A PRIVATE ON GUARD.

By C. A. MALCOLM, M.A.

THIS is one of those quiet, cloistered, 'cushy' guards, where 'visiting rounds' are scarce and duties almost nil. In fact, I am on guard outside an ancient palace, wherein dwelt kings and queens and royal princes of many centuries, and where much of the tragic history of our land had its origin. No need to reveal its name; every true Scot must know it, and every English and Irish soldier who has done duty here will remember the place, if by no other token than that of the perennially fresh, neatly cut 'NELLIE' on one of the stone slabs of the principal door.

In the lonely vigils of our solitary guard how we have vainly speculated upon the unknown personality and the worldly fortunes of the bearer of this name, so long immortalised in enduring stone! Was she kind and beautiful? Haughty, capricious, and a flirt? Was 'Nellie' of the country or of the town? Did she marry her soldier-boy, whose dreams of love found this single expression, never to be effaced until the fabric itself, with the memorials of all those once-potent, illustrious personages that adorn the interior, be blotted out and destroyed?

'Nellie' must be very, very aged, if still alive, for the oldest soldier I know, himself a grandfather, made acquaintance with this name on stone when a mere boy.

When did 'Nellie' live? Why do I seek to solve her lover's riddle after so many thousands of soldiers have been content to accept her at her name value, while doing guard duty?

I break off my reveries. I repeat to myself the Orders: 'To see that no damage is done, no windows are broken; to ring the alarm-bell should sign of fire appear; and to march from tower to tower in a smart and soldierly manner.' . . . .

What is the use of marching in a smart and soldierly manner at an hour past midnight when ladies are not here to admire or 'Brass Hats' to criticise? Besides, it has been a day of toil, and the guardroom coffee was particularly good, the biscuits and cheese delicious. . . . It is refreshing—no, soothing, rather—to lean against one's sentry-box on such a night, and feel at peace with the world. Every one else, everything, seems hushed in sleep, . . . 'and leaves the world to darkness and to me.' . . . Hark! What was that? . . . A railway-engine steam-whistle! Some train speeding towards London, doubtless. What a hideous anachronism for all those old fellows and grandes dames whose portraits line so long a hall inside! They knew nothing of such mechanical contrivances. Horses—black, bay, piebald, or white—were at their service; coaches, with four or eight gallant steeds, and dainty sedan-chairs sufficed their needs.

What would old Achaius—he who is reputed to have been the first King of Scots to make an alliance with the French—say if he could step out of his Dutch artist's frame and discuss the present state of the times? Let him rest, the old eighth-century monarch. Nobody seems at all interested in him. . . . He is not half so fascinating as that elusive lady, 'Nellie.' . . . Could it be that she lived away back in some remote century—with Queen Mary, perhaps? What a time! . . . Hst! . . . What noise is that? The massive, iron-barred, oak door actually opens on rusty, creaking hinges. . . . Do I dream? There, framed in the gap between door and wall, peers the fairest, kindest, pleasantest face I have ever beheld. It is the sort of face a cheerful poet would conjure up. . . . 'Bon soir, monsieur le soldat.' . . . And the laughing blue eyes and dimpled round cheeks shyly draw nearer. . . . What a musical voice she has! What a trim form!

'It makes cold weather, is it not? . . . And you out there! . . . You have cold, m'sieu. . . . No?'

The tones of that voice—how sweet and soft and velvety! What a splendid opportunity for displaying my excellent qualities as chevalier, esquire of dames! But the truth is, I am slow or stupid before two bright eyes. . . . I am mesmerised then, I think—else why did I not give the compliments to the kind visitor? Such a visit was indeed an angel's visit.

At last I found expression in blundering fashion. 'Who—where—how—where did you come from, pray?' At the back of my head I felt that this might be 'Nellie.'

'Tiens!' exclaimed the lady. 'Are you at this lodgment so long time as not to know that I am one of the daughters of the house of the Queen Marie? . . . No? . . . Mais oui!'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

I felt it was due to me, as a soldier of the Garde Écossaise (how ever did I get there?), to prove to my superior that I was not altogether a dolt. 'Pardon, ma'mselle, since my retour from France I am a bit at sea about things, and my French is rather rusty, I fear.'

It was a great effort, and the lady bore it well, though her brow puckered somewhat. 'Rusty? . . . Rusty? . . . Qu'est-ce que c'est que ça? Ah yes! I see!'

'Now, ma'mselle, don't think me such a dullard. I can sing a catch pretty well, as my friends in our platoon can testify.' I was amazed at my lack of modesty. 'Listen, s'il vous plaît;' and there and then I trolled out the 'Marseillaise,' which a real old 'Frenchy' had taught me long ago down Tournai way.

'What a droll chanson, certainement!' exclaimed my audience when I had done wiping the sweat from my brow and neck. 'It is of the newest, m'sieu? I have not heard it before!'

'What!' I ejaculated, aghast; 'do you mean to tell me you don't know your own country's national anthem, written and composed by Rouget de Lisle, and sung by thousands of French volunteers of Marseilles as they marched on their way to Paris in 1792? The most famous battle-song, the'——

'Oh! I say!' broke in the French girl. 'Come, come; you are dreaming. . . . Oh dear, dear! 1792! Hé! hé! hé!' and off she went into peals of rippling laughter—from which it appeared all my eloquence had been in vain. 'M'sieu, did you say 1792? Ma foi! and this is the year 1565! . . . C'est très drôle votre métier. Allons, m'sieu;' and the little lady became serious. 'It is not gentil of me to talk thus to you. I demand ten thousand times pardon for my laughter. But I do not marvel that you dream out here these cold nights, and everything so morne, so triste.' . . . .

I did not hear her out; my mind was again travelling. . . . 'I say, ma'mselle, you don't happen to be Nellie—Ma'mselle Nellie—by any chance?' Whereupon the little lady made the queerest grimace I ever saw, bunching her lips into a nice round strawberry or cherry, and turning her eyes into bright globes, at the same time raising her shoulders ever so slowly. Wrong again, it seemed. Nevertheless I would have her Nellie.

'And you are one of Queen Mary's household?' I asked. 'How fortunate that I should meet you! . . . I always did want to meet you, you know. . . . What about poor young Darnley and old Rizzio? They died terrible deaths, did they not?'

'What is it you ask now, monsieur le soldat?' and the fair, round face and eyes were clearly troubled. 'M'sieu, you had better go to the house, hang up your équipement, and go to bed. You are not well; you dream; your spirit is dérangé. As to the prince, he reposes himself at Cragmilly; and the gross signor is within. Chut! Don't you hear his profound voice? How it fills all the place? Listen!'

And then, my attention having been drawn to it, I did hear the noise of some one singing lustily in deep, bass tones.

'M'sieu, cachez-moi—quick, quick!' And before I grasped the lady's meaning she had slipped behind my sentry-box, the while a broad-shouldered, thick-set man, with the strongest, swarthiest, ugliest countenance I ever clapped eyes on, went swinging past, the brim of his black-velvet bonnet over his eyes, a sword clattering on the stones behind him. . . . In my amazement I completely forgot to challenge the stranger ere he disappeared in the courtyard of the palace.

'Tiens! What a fright I received!' whispered the French girl, tiptoeing from her hiding-place. 'That is one bold, bad man, is he not? Très, très féroce!'

'I do seem to know the face,' I replied. 'But where or how I met the gentleman before, I don't recollect.'

'Really! . . . It is Monsieur Botvil, . . . très fort, mais pas beau. Ugh! . . . He is bad—wicked! But you have hunger, monsieur la sentinelle. Permit me to go bring you something to eat.' And with that she glided off like a moonbeam.

Ah! wasn't I in luck extraordinary? What a nice, dear girl, to be sure! I waited on in patience, but my friend did not reappear; nor did that much-looked-for little supper. Instead, from the opposite direction there clattered in a great crowd of gaunt horsemen with pikes and firelocks, and with curious helmets on their heads. In they thronged, dismounting in the great quadrangle, and out again, talking among themselves of Cromwell, Lambert, Monk, and the great progress they were making.

I stood absolutely dazed. None seemed to notice me (for which I was thankful). It was all so puzzling. These were the Ironsides, then, and I had lived to see them! How strange! I must try to see the great Protector himself. . . . But no more came. . . . Dull times again. . . . No; here was another crowd—a cheering, tumultuous crowd. Nearer and nearer it approached, and now I could discern many of its members.

What a shouting! What a skirling of bagpipes! Scores of tartan-kilted pipers, and above and behind them on his charger sat a tall, fair, young man in blue-velvet cap, with white cockade, and scarlet breeches. I never saw so many well-dressed ladies as I saw that day in that crowd. And they all kept looking at the man on the horse, remarking on his nice straight nose and noble aspect, others of them calling out, 'Welcome, Royal Charlie!' 'Bonnie Prince Charlie!'

'Oh, that's the Pretender!' said I to myself. 'He's not one of us. Never mind; I'll pay him my compliments.' "Shun!" I ordered me. 'Present—arms!' But not a soul seemed to be aware of my presence. Then I glanced with a professional eye on his followers—Highlanders, every one, it seemed; and, believe me, a more unsatisfactory regiment I never looked upon. What a poor show, I thought, they make compared with the white-gaitered, red-coated infantry of the line, these bare-kneed and bare-legged, ragged-looking fellows, armed with all manner of swords and cutlasses, knives and shields!

A dour-looking man beside me, who evidently read my thoughts, gruffly addressed me with: 'Ye ken naethin' aboot it. Thae fellaws 'll knock the guts clean oot o' yer pig-tail, pipe-clay gentry.'

In spite of the unmitigated rudeness of the boor, I was forced to admit to myself that they would be rough customers to tackle at close quarters.

Well, I was a Hanoverian sworn, and had had no dealings with rebels; yet deep in my heart I had always cherished an attachment for the exiled princes of the long line of Stewart. All the romance was—or seemed—there. The most beautiful ladies of Scotland, they said, were all for Prince Charles. . . . Was 'Nellie' too a Jacobite? . . . Surely. . . . Yes, I would declare my secret sentiments. And I burst forth into a new song done by one Adam Skirving, that was extremely popular in certain quarters. I had just got as far as 'Hey, Johnnie Cope, are ye wauking yet?' when a bomb burst on my ear.

'Here! . . . What's this? . . . You're asleep—and on sentry! Do you hear?'

I did. It was actually myself sound asleep, and collared by 'visiting rounds' at 2 A.M., of all hours!

'Pardon, sir; not asleep, sir, but taken kind of bad, sir.' And I repeated Orders like a model soldier. I was excused. . . . You see, I was a very old soldier. . . . But what about 'Nellie'?

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XVI.

'FROM a wine-cart driver,' continued Keene-Leslie, 'I learned that I was near the town of Eboli. The car was now an incubus. Its presence would make the very stones prate of my whereabouts, so I decided to lose it. I turned off the main road, and left the Fiat at the side of a little-used track in a big wood some miles out of the town. Then, still keeping off the main road, I "hoofed it" to Eboli. There I bought a hat and a cheap overcoat, and into the town I sauntered, but with my eyes open, you bet, for the villa gentry. My dodge was to double back to Naples by train at once, but I found that there was no train that night. There was nothing for it but to "lie low," so I went to the Albergo del Vozzo, and stayed the night. Nothing happened; and next morning I boarded the train, and was in Naples in a couple of hours.

'You had not arrived, so I had a talk with the Chief of Police. He was much interested in my yarn, for the villa had been more or less under observation; if the inmates were not "wanted," they were at least suspected of being part of a clever international gang of rogues. He was puzzled about their selecting Ubriano as a base, until I gave him an outline of the story of the paper in Hugh Forbes's possession. I was anxious to gain further tidings, and the Chief set things going promptly. When I went back to see him, he had news for me. The occupants of the villa had evidently taken alarm at my presence in Italy. It looks as though Benedetto had come across my name in his precious career, for the house was empty! It was probable, the Chief told me, that they would make for England. He promised to keep a watch on the Messageries and other lines, and advised me on no account to join you; so I rigged myself out as the elderly nonentity you saw, and travelled home by a later train than yours. Just as well that I disguised myself, for, when we were nearing Folkestone, I'm hanged if Wakeford didn't make his appearance on deck! He was at the same game as myself; he had discarded his dark-pointed beard and was clean-shaven. He scarcely moved from the seat he had chosen, and I'll swear that his attitude was more of the hunted than of the hunter. I am dead-certain that he never suspected that the footling spectacled old nondescript was the man who had bolted with his motor-car, and whom he had tried to plug with a revolver. I determined to keep an eye on him, and to phone to London from Folkestone, as it was possible that Scotland Yard might identify him; but at Folkestone he disappeared. I had gone below for a minute, and never saw him again. He probably had slipped out from the crowd to avoid the boat-train. At all events, he wasn't in it when it started, and he didn't leave it at Charing Cross. . . . So here I am! And now let me have your "hair-breadth 'scape," for I have a telegram from my chief, and must tear off to meet him at once.'

I ran through my adventure in the train with the country priest, and we agreed that there could be little doubt that he and the big 'butler' were one and the same man.

'Look out for the next move from the gang,

Neil. Let me know, of course, and, with a bit o' luck, we 'll beat them again,' were Tony's parting words.

Off he went. I got the night train for the North, and next morning I breakfasted in the peace of my rooms in Auld Reekie.

Among my letters at Jura Street was one from my uncle telling me that the copy of the paper coincided exactly in shape and size with the faded document at The Bield. It was clear that the two had been twin documents; that the one at The Bield had become illegible through damp and age, while my uncle Hugh's copy had stood the test of time. Moreover, in the paper in the colonel's possession, the only two recognisable words, 'Exultabunt Domino,' were in precisely the same place at the foot as in the copy I had sent him, and even the little Roman cross preceding them was there. There had been no developments at The Bield, and no signs of any prowler, although my uncle and Angus had watched carefully. The tone of the letter was that of a man in good spirits, and the writing was in his usual clear, firm hand.

Dr Hall also had written. His note told me that he had informed the police about the old Italian with the melodeon. A man somewhat answering the description had been found in Morayshire, but it appeared that he was a well-known itinerant—a bit of a 'character'—and he was able to prove that he had not been out of Morayshire for six weeks. The colonel was well, and the doctor hoped that there would be no more developments in the affair, as avoidance of excitement was most desirable for him.

Two facts stood out clearly in the queer business. We were in possession of one part of a mysterious document which was being hunted by men who had money, brains, and diabolical resources to help them. The other part, which I had seen in the bogus cigarette on the night of the fog, had fallen (Heaven knows at what cost to others!) into these men's hands. Unless an extraordinary stroke of fortune fell to us, the next move in the game was bound to come from the gang; but I wasted no time pondering the affair, for my own situation gave me more than enough to think about.

A March of foul weather wore on until a few days before the rising of the Court for the Spring Vacation. Not that the rising of His Majesty's Judges (as I reflected ruefully) affected me in the least, except that it would be an escape from the attentions of my clerk, a persistently hopeful creature, who daily during Session approached me, his optimistic eye charged with the cheerful expectancy that a brief had come in on the previous evening. I almost envied the briefless one—his name is now a beloved one in letters—whose clerk left him so severely alone that his lineaments faded from his master's memory. Never a guinea's worth of work came my way. The thought shadowed me. It grudged me sleep, waited at table, strode beside me, up the Mound and down again, took my arm in the Parliament House, stuck to me like a poisonous physical presence, and familiarity with it never bred contempt.

I think I have mentioned that I had written a little for the newspapers and an occasional magazine article. It had only been a little. A conspiracy of heartless editors refused to have more. It is an ill business trying to turn an honest shilling with Black Care at one's elbow, but as best I could I had 'buckled to' an article for consideration by a weekly newspaper. The rate of pay compared unfavourably with a healthy navvy's, but it was better than nothing, and the writing gave me something to think about. Its title, of all things, was, 'The Enervating Effect of Wealth,' and it professed to deal with the dangers of Philistinism and divorce from ideals in the nation and the individual. I wrote it, tongue in cheek, and I read it over with a peevish contempt for myself. I had almost made up my mind to save my self-respect by tearing the depressing thing to pieces, when the diminutive 'slavey' heralded the entrance to my room of Mr Archibald Jardine, one of my colleagues of the Junior Bar. I was glad to see him, for I was in the blackest of humours with myself, and Jardine was an old friend and a good fellow. He was the laziest man in the Parliament House, except one of the judges; but he was a sound lawyer, and his alertness, his clear-headedness, and his personal charm had served him well. He was gathering a good practice, as he put it, 'in spite of himself.'

'How goes it, Tatcho?' I greeted him. (He was nearly as bald as a coot; hence the sobriquet.)

'Fair to showery. Are you busy?'

I was able to reassure him on this point, and he settled himself in an arm-chair with his pipe.

'What 's that thing?' he asked, pointing to the MS. 'I couldn't help seeing it. If the rest of it is as piffling as the title, it must be pretty awful. What is it, anyhow?'

I explained.

'It seems an extremely moderate form of amusement.'

'Indeed it is.'

'Didn't know you were an author!'

'Neither I am. I'm a helot, a hack, a plagiarist, a whited sepulchre!'

'So? That 's a fairly progressive indictment. Do you like doing it?'

'No.'

'Why do it?'

I told him that my object was to improve my handwriting.

He smoked in meditative silence for a little. 'I came to consult you, Neil, about the Spring Vacation. Have you any plans?'

'I am unable to decide,' I replied. 'Torn as I am between the competing fascinations of my private golf-course, my forty-horse-power Rolls-Royce, and my two-thousand-ton steam-yacht'——

'Just so,' he cut in. 'Dammitman, none of your moss-grown jests weighs less than a ton. Don't give me any more of them. I'm in a hurry. Tell me, I pray you, where are you going in the Vacation?'

'I don't know.'

'All is well! You are the very man I want. To business! I have taken my old stretch of the Deveron. You remember?'

'Rather!' The man does not deserve to live who could forget that lovable corner and its green garden by the bridge on Deveron-side. 'What are you getting at?'

'The river won't see me this spring, Neil, and I want you to take my place. The fishing is divine. The air is champagne. You will go?'

'It's good of you, Tatcho! I am tempted, but it's out of the question just now. At any other time I should be delighted, but'—— I shook my head.

'Why?'

'Res angusta!'

'It isn't a question of affording it, man. You and your friends can have the run of the lodge for a month. I hate the thought of the fishing being wasted.'

What he meant was that he loved to see his friends enjoying themselves. True, he was a rich man; but your rich man is not invariably a thoughtful one. I hesitated for a moment. Faint, far off, sounded the music of a salmon-reel. Ah! Did the maiden of the 'Lorelei' ever sing a sweeter lure? With a sigh I wrenched myself from the spell, for I knew that, even with the utmost care, my resources would be down to about a five-pound note by the end of the Vacation. I kept that sombre fact to myself, but the dream of the Deveron vanished.

'No, my friend. Lord knows I'm sorry, but it can't be done.'

'I am disappointed. Look here, Neil,' said the good Tatcho, fixing me with a gimlet eye; 'is there any relationship between your refusal and your writing'—he nodded towards the offending manuscript—'that sort of tosh?'

'Yes. They are both by Stone-Broke out of Little Flutter. Now you know. Get thee behind me, Tatcho! Why can't you whip the beloved stream yourself?'

'I am going to work.'

'I beg your pardon?'

'You heard me well enough. I—am—going—to—work.'

'Wait a moment. The notion of your working in Vacation takes some time to trickle in.'

'Why shouldn't I?'

'Why not, indeed? Absence of occupation is not rest; a mind quite vacant'——

'Is a mind quite blest!' he interrupted. 'But mine won't be blest in the coming Vacation, for I hate work. My job ought to have been pulling blooms off century plants! However, if I do as little as I can during the Session, why the devil shouldn't I work as much as I like in Vacation?'

'Again, why not? But what sort of work?'

'My trade. Smith-Drummond is my senior in a thundering big case, one of the regrettably rare, almost extinct specimens of the go-ahead-spare-no-expense-every-iron-in-the-fire type. The papers make a bundle three feet high already. Both sides are "out for blood." It may come off sooner than we expect, and as Smith-Drummond is up to his neck in other work, the idea of the solicitors is that in Vacation I'm to go to London, where the headquarters of the clients and their English lawyers are, and straighten out a lot of the preliminaries.'

He was in the middle of unloading on me a lot of technical details, when he pulled up suddenly and gave the arm of his chair a lusty slap.

'By Jove! Neil! Will you come to London with me and give me a hand? Technically, of course, you won't be in the case, but I have my work cut out for me, and you'll save me no end of worry.'

'"Devil" for you?'

'Devil, clerk, secretary, label yourself what you jolly well like. Think it over. It will be spadework, but I am not asking you to sweat for nothing. You'll be worth your modest pay, and I can employ whom I dam'-well choose as my private secretary. We'll be three weeks at the grindstone in London, and with little time for the village festivals; but you'll be at your job, and doing yourself a good turn as well as me. My papers get into a hopeless muddle. Just now my room is knee-deep in misplaced documents. You can help to keep things right for me in this business, for I'm an unmethodical blighter. I have a genuine gift for putting things in their proper places and forgetting where they are. I believe I could lose a big drum in a telephone-cabinet! But I must go now. I'll give you a couple of days to think it over.'

A couple of days! Ten seconds of time sufficed for my decision.

'Thank you, Jardine. It's awfully decent of you,' I said. 'I'm your man.'

'Not yet, but you will be for eight hours a day in London on and after the 1st of April next.'

We shook hands on it.

'I sha'n't forget your'——

'Oh, that's all right,' he choked me off hurriedly. 'It's an ordinary affair of business.

I'll send you some of the papers to-morrow morning. So long!'

He took his departure, leaving me with a lighter heart than I had known for months.

The precious thesis on the canker of wealth caught my eye. I jammed it triumphantly into the heart of the fire.

The beginning of April saw me back in London.

(Continued on page 245.)

'YELLOW JACK.'

By JOHN D. LECKIE.

'YELLOW JACK' is not a personality, but a power. 'Jack' is the sailors' name for a flag (as in 'Union-Jack'), and the flag hoisted by ships when in quarantine or to show that they have infectious disease on board is termed, from its colour, 'Yellow Jack.' Hence the sobriquet 'Yellow Jack,' sometimes applied to yellow-fever.

Although yellow-fever is still a dreaded disease, medical science has done much to mitigate its ravages; in fact, the progress made in this direction during the last quarter of a century is marvellous. Readers of Tom Cringle's Log may remember that the author, Michael Scott, refers to Jamaica as the 'land of fun and fever.' The latter part of the designation no longer applies, though it was true about a century ago, during the time of Scott's residence in the island. The ravages of the disease at that time in the West Indies were appalling, and they have left their mark in the world's history; it is to them that the negro republic of Hayti owes its origin. It may seem strange that a handful of untrained negroes should have successfully defied the armies of the great Napoleon; but they would have been powerless without the aid of 'Yellow Jack,' who proved a most effective ally. In 1802 an army of fifty-eight thousand five hundred and forty-five soldiers was sent from France to Hayti to quell the insurrection. Within four months fifty thousand two hundred and seventy were dead of yellow-fever. When, finally, the expedition returned, only three hundred men survived; disease had accounted for the rest. In fact, in proportion to the number of men involved, the Haytian campaign was more disastrous than that of Moscow. In the latter case it was the cold that killed Napoleon's soldiers; in Hayti it was the heat, or, rather, its indirect effects.

Thus 'Yellow Jack' helped to found the Haytian republic. But destiny had a wider scope. Napoleon's army of fifty-eight thousand men was by far the largest that had ever been sent to the West Indies, and, if successful, would probably have been employed in an attempt to subjugate the neighbouring British islands. The West Indies at that time were the richest and most prosperous of the British colonies. Foiled by destiny, Napoleon was constrained in the following year (1803) to sell to the United States the Louisiana territory—not the present State of Louisiana, but a vast region comprising about one-third of the area of the great republic. There is little doubt that the Haytian failure induced him to take this step, which had such a far-reaching effect on the world's history.

About twenty-five years ago I was living in Rio de Janeiro, at a time when that city was a hotbed of yellow-fever. Deaths from the disease were so frequent and sudden that one felt like being in a battle, seeing men drop on all sides, and knowing that one's own turn might arrive at any moment. I remember the case of a friend, a fine young fellow, who succumbed to the disease on Christmas Day. But the sanitary condition of Rio has improved wonderfully during the last quarter of a century, so that it is now affirmed that the local death-rate will compare favourably with that of most large cities in the world. This marvellous change has been produced by a better knowledge of the causes of yellow-fever, and consequently the adoption of improved preventive and curative methods. It was discovered that one of the principal agents in the dissemination of the disease is the mosquito, which acts as a carrier of the germs from an infected to a healthy person.

A vigorous campaign against the mosquito was initiated. The insect lays its eggs in standing water, in which it passes the first (or larval) stage of its existence. Now, the mosquito larva requires air, and consequently free access to the surface of the water. A small quantity of oil poured on standing water forms a film, which cuts off the larva from its air-supply, and so suffocates it, at the same time preventing other mosquitoes from laying eggs in the water. A systematic house-to-house inspection was undertaken. Cisterns were protected by fine wire screens as well as by a layer of oil. The sewers were thoroughly fumigated, dead mosquitoes being taken out, it was said, by the bucketful. It may seem strange that the mosquitoes should frequent the sewers. But the insect, for its health and comfort, requires heat, moisture, darkness, and a calm atmosphere; all these requisites are found in a sewer. Being mainly nocturnal in their habits, mosquitoes lurk and sleep in the daytime in some secluded nook, whence they emerge at dusk in swarms. The result of such a campaign as this in Rio and other fever-haunted cities was that yellow-fever at once diminished or even disappeared.

Yellow-fever has left its mark not only in history, as already shown, but even in the configuration and the commerce of our planet. Had it not been for the discovery of effectual means of combating it, the construction of the Panamá Canal would have been impossible. In his attempt to pierce the Isthmus of Panamá, De Lesseps was balked not so much by engineering as by sanitary difficulties. The white officials sent out from France died almost as rapidly as in the Haytian expedition eighty years before. Then the Americans took the matter in hand. During their occupation of Cuba in 1898–1902 they had proved the efficacy of sanitary methods in abolishing yellow-fever. The city of Havana, formerly a focus of the disease, was so cleansed by American methods that the pestilence almost entirely disappeared. Perhaps it was mainly a knowledge of this fact that induced the United States Government in 1903 to conclude a treaty with the republic of Panamá for the reconstruction of the canal. The result is well known. Thanks to up-to-date sanitary methods, yellow-fever and malaria were banished, and the work was successfully carried out. So great were the ravages of these diseases on former occasions that it is said that every sleeper laid on the short railway across the isthmus (built in 1850–1855) cost the life of a man.

So little was known, even a few years ago, of the methods by which yellow-fever is propagated that the writer remembers reading of the case of a hospital which was actually a breeding-ground for the pestilence. In order to prevent the access of ants, so troublesome in tropical climates, the legs of the bedsteads were placed in tins of water, which thus became ideal places for breeding mosquitoes, and consequently for disseminating yellow-fever and malaria.

THE BLOWER OF BUBBLES.

PART III.

VII.

AT the head of a stairway which one reached by going through a tobacconist's, Herr Klotz greeted us with guttural cordiality. We asked after his wife, and were told that she was a little better, though very weak, and had insisted upon seeing her guests before they left, if they would be so kind as to visit the sickroom.

On the contents of an enormous hamper sent from 'Arcadia' (and, I am certain, paid for by Norman) the German and the two of us lunched with all the bonhomie of Bohemians. Basil Norman was in the best of spirits, so much so, in fact, that Klotz was constantly overcome with laughter, and on three occasions was forced to rush away to acquaint his wife 'mit der amuzing veet of zee altogedderillustrious Herr Norman.'

By no means least in importance, Klotz's little son of about four years of age sat in a high chair and chuckled knowingly whenever he deemed the humour had reached a necessary climax. Though he was not unlike his father in the shape of his head, his chin did not recede, and one could only assume the mother had supplied the qualities lacking in the father. Never for a moment did the child lose interest in the proceedings; he followed throughout the facial expression and the play of conversation of his elders. His face interested me so intensely that I found myself glancing at him whenever his interest in the others gave me a chance; there was so much of promise and heredity about him.

'And what,' I said, during a momentary lull in the merriment, 'is Master Siegfried to become?' We had learned his name a moment before.

'Siegfried,' said his father, 'tell zee gentlemens vot you to be already intend.'

The little chap smiled, but without self-consciousness. 'A conducthtor,' he lisped, 'like Herr Nikith.'

Klotz crossed his hands upon his ample waistcoat and beamed paternally.

'Your baton bring,' he said, 'und der score Tristan.'

With profuse apologies for this display of juvenile precocity, the violinist hurried after the boy, and re-entered a moment later with his violin and a music-stand, which he proceeded to set up.

Siegfried followed close on his heels with the full orchestral score of the last act of Tristan and Isolde, which almost obscured him from sight. Placing it on the stand, he retired in a dignified manner; and Herr Klotz, taking a chair, seated himself at the left of the stand, and proceeded to tune his fiddle to pitch, varying the proceedings with imitations of French-horns, vagrant clarionets, and irresponsible trombones in the melange of discord which always precedes the entrance of the conductor. Norman, who had been enjoying the scene to the full, suddenly rose to his feet.

'Herr Klotz,' he said sternly, 'I protest.'

The tuning ceased, and the violinist looked anxiously at his guest. 'You do not like dis, zumtimes?' he faltered.

'I object,' cried Basil, 'to being left out.—Herr Siegfried!' He raised his voice. 'Herr Siegfried!'

The little chap walked solemnly in, a baton in his hand. 'Yeth?' he said.

'Mein Herr, my friend and myself desire to join your orchestra.'

The youthful conductor considered, ruminatingly. 'You blay goot?' he said.

'Wonderfully. I was comb-and-tissue-paper-player in the Cascade Steam Laundry Orchestra, and my friend'——

'He ith goot alzo?'

'Pest, speak for yourself.'

I shrugged my shoulders. 'Far be it from me to brag,' I said, rather lamely, 'but I was first violinist to His Majesty the King of Diddledoodledums.'

'Ah yes,' cried Norman; 'and you were dismissed because of your unfortunate habit of playing an octave flat.' He leaned over and put his lips to Siegfried's ear. 'Let him play the drums,' he said in a stage-whisper.

Amidst roars of delight from the older Klotz, the youngster left the room, and returned in a minute's time, carrying an immense tin dish-pan and a broken broom-handle, which musical impedimenta he entrusted to my tender mercies, and then sedately stalked from the scene once more. With mixed emotions I carried my pan and stick over to the extreme right, and placed a chair beneath the spot where the stage-box would be, calmly surveying the assumed audience with that look of waggish melancholy one associates with gentlemen of the drums. Norman, whom Klotz had armed with the combined ingredients of his instrument, placed a chair half-way between the conductor's stand and myself, and together we joined Herr Klotz in a two-minutes' orgy of discordant preparation. With a desire to increase the variety of my percussion effects, I conscripted an extra chair into service, placed it back towards me, and prepared to use my cane as an auxiliary drumstick.

By common consent we achieved a moment's unanimity of silence, which was seized by Herr Siegfried as the auspicious moment for his entrance. Without the least loss of dignity he clambered on to his chair, as we applauded, perfunctorily, by hammering our alleged music-stands with non-existent bows; and, turning to the audience, he bowed with the restraint of genius—a feat of condescension which appeared to delight the throng hugely, for he was constrained to turn about and acknowledge their plaudits a second time before they would allow him to proceed.

As drummer I assumed an air of morose boredom.

The noise of the audience having subsided, the conductor opened his score and nodded to his Concertmeister, Herr Klotz, who carefully found the required place in the orchestration.

'Blay der "Liebestod" music,' said he in his most professional manner to us. We nodded knowingly, and found the required part in the last act of our scores, after turning over a vast number of visionary pages.

'Do we begin at the beginning?' asked Norman.

'Yes,' I answered, 'and leave off at the end.' After which sally I laughed immoderately, and began to understand the instinct which causes a humorist to enjoy his own wit more than any other's.

A rap on the stand brought my mirth to a close. Both arms were extended in the air—a last look at both sides of the orchestra (there must have been a hundred of us)—the left hand slowly poised to indicate 'piano'—the right hand gently raised—and then the strings were brought into action. I had intended, as another excellent jest, to give a tremendous crash on the pan at the start, so as to bring down the leader's wrath, but something in the little chap's attitude stopped me. This was not play to him—it was real; and, to my amazement, it seemed no less vivid to my fellow-burlesquers. Herr Klotz was playing the chromatic development of the opening as if it had been Covent Garden and the real Nikisch conducting. The Blower of Bubbles was giving one more proof of his amazing versatility. In some manner he was imitating a cello, and he knew the music. Where he had learned it one could only conjecture—but when did he learn anything?

Silently I watched the serio-comic development. The boy was conducting remarkably, with unerring artistry, sustaining the exact Wagnerian tempi, and, with little exaggeration, indicating the crescendo and diminuendo which colours all the great master's composition. How much of it he knew or whether he was following his father's violin I could not make out, but his earnestness fascinated me; and suddenly his eyes turned towards mine. I gripped the broom-handle—but no, it was merely a warning that my time was imminent. I think my breath came short as I waited. Then his eyes sought mine once more, and inclining towards me, his baton called for the drums. It was I he was conducting, and no one else! And I vibrated the broom-handle against the dish-pan, only to stop instantaneously as his baton moved to subtler instruments. He never failed to warn me with that preliminary glance, and when the magic wand followed I gave him all I had. The little beggar was a hypnotist.

Towards the climax I could have sworn the whole orchestra was there. Klotz was playing superbly, and Norman was roaming from one instrument to the other with a remarkable combination of accuracy and imitative versatility. As for me, I supplied dynamic effects that would have satisfied even the great Beethoven, who once asked for guns.

Then it was over.

Herr Siegfried bowed twice to the audience, indicated his entire orchestra with an all-embracing wave of the baton, and ended by solemnly shaking hands with his father, who stood up to accept the honour. After that, with a self-conscious wriggle, he became the boy once more, and removed his spell from us. With roars of delight we gathered about him, making a circle by joining hands, and dancing extempore, we sang a chorus consisting of constant repetitions of 'Hilee-hilo! Hilee-hilo!' That may not be the correct spelling, but then we were singing, not writing it—which is one advantage music has over literature.

Before we went, Herr Klotz took us into the room where his wife lay ill, and by her eyes—for she was too weak to speak—she thanked us for our part in making the day a festival one for their lonely little household. With an instinctive gentleness that a woman might have shown, Norman spoke of the things she wanted to hear about: how her husband had been missed at the restaurant, of the desire of every one to make a little present to them, of the great future that lay before their son, and of the genius of Herr Klotz that would some day be recognised. With the cheeriest of good-byes, he lightly touched her shoulder with his hand and said he knew she would soon be well again.

He lied. In half of what he said he lied. He was blowing bubbles that the woman stricken with fever might see in them some little compensation for her life of drudgery.

With the guttural good wishes of Herr Klotz still in our ears (we had pledged eternal friendship in three foaming mugs of beer), we sought the street, to find that dusk was settling over the city. For some moments neither spoke, but feeling that perhaps I had descended too abruptly from my pedestal, I cleared my throat and ventured on a remark.

'A decent fellow,' I said patronisingly, and felt my dignity reasserting itself; but Norman failed to hear me. He was lost in some memory. Now that I look back, I wonder was it the picture of the sick woman he saw or his vision of the mother with her two sons; or, with his gift of intuition, could he see, less than a year ahead, Klotz, in a German soldier's uniform, marching through Belgium with an army of lust and rapine, gorged like gluttonous, venomous beasts?

I wonder.

VIII.

It was from an aunt of mine that I first heard of Norman's attachment to Lilias Oxley.

Whenever I received a letter from my relative, I had first to realise that its mission was to educate, not to entertain. She was a woman of strong ideas, and, as my mother died very early in my life, she seldom lost an opportunity of impressing a moral—like the Queen in Alice in Wonderland. In her correspondence, and to a large extent in her conversation, my aunt was given to dashes, underlines, and exclamation-marks. It is perhaps unnecessary to state that she was a single woman.

I received the letter two months after Christmas; it was dated from the Beacon at Hindhead.

'My dear Nephew,—You will find mentholated crystals — carried in a small bottle — a splendid preventive against the present epidemic of cold in the head! Sniff a little every night before going to bed.

'When are you going to marry? For goodness' sake, marry a dark girl when you do. Our family is growing positively colourless!

'Your friend, Mr Norman, is visiting the Oxleys down here. It seems young Oxley is trying to write a play with some ideas in it, and Norman thinks he can help him! Who in the world wants to see a play with their ideas! It's a pity you couldn't teach him to do something useful—Norman, I mean.—Young Oxley is going into the Church! Why doesn't he go to Canada! I mean Norman.

'Do you remember little Lilias Oxley? She had pneumonia last year, though I warned her mother about flannel soaked in goose-oil and turpentine! She always looked like a hothouse flower, and now she is simply frail. Of course, she's pretty and has eyes that always make fools of the men—not that that signifies! Everybody says she's artistic, but all I ever hear her play is by some newfangled foreigner named De Bussy, and it's all discord! She's only nineteen and looks sixteen.

'Of course, young Norman comes along, and instead of picking out some healthy buxom girl, he falls in love with this bit of tinsel china! It's criminal, and should not be allowed. What kind of children will they have, if any! He calls her his Beatrice—Heaven knows why.

'They are together constantly. I would write to the Times about it if I thought that Lord Northfellow would publish it. We should have a Minister of Eugenics! Surely Winston Churchill would be better employed at that than trying to build up a huge navy we'll never need! By the way, I see he's taken to writing novels now!

'Do talk to young Norman! Tell him your uncle is doing very well with pigs in Canada; and why not induce your friend to go there, and get some common-sense, because every Canadian I meet has a head on his shoulders? It must be the climate!

'I am going to stay here for a month, and then visit my cousin in Scotland. She has six children. Whatever induced her to marry a minister? He has no money and no prospects, except more children, I suppose!

'Does that Mulvaney woman see that your room is kept aired? When you write you should have the window open and a cap on your head.

'I hope you will never write books! It is quite a distinction nowadays not to.

Where did you go for Christmas?—Your loving aunt, HANNAH.

Feby. 8/1914.

The only way I can account for my aunt's love of exclamation-marks was her delight at seeing a sentence round to a good finish. I have known authors to be so overcome with the dramatic significance of their work that they put them in as a sort of public recognition thereof.

En passant. . . . I wonder why my aunt never wrote a serial story for one of the London dailies.

IX.

WAR.

Our world of artificiality lay like a cracked egg-shell. As drowning men, we clutched at everything that seemed stable . . . to find nothing that was not made of perishable stuff. Our pens that had criticised so long mocked us as we gazed at the pages which seemed to reject our thoughts before we gave them life. A few of us turned into special war writers and comforted the nation with statistics. We showed that Germany was beaten—it was a mathematical truth that could be proved. While we demonstrated our immense superiority to the enemy in figures, a little British Army was fighting against odds of six to one.

And the Fates stood by with poised shears, ready to cut the thread of Britain's destiny.

It is not pleasant to recall the arraignment of the year 1914. The Boer War had shown our weakness to every nation but ourselves; our educated men had graduated into the world using their abilities as obstructionists. We had discouraged everything that had the very odour of progress.

Yet—we muddled through. Men still use that word as if it were something creditable instead of hideous. We won, because, behind the Britain that muddled and obstructed, there was the Britain of noble mothers and noble sons.

And into the first winter our orgy of statistics went on, like an endless Babylonian feast . . . while the British fleet, that we should never need, strained and plunged in the icy gales of the North Sea, grimly, silently, saving the world for Civilisation.

Great days. Fateful days. Terrible days.

One Friday night early in December I received a note from Norman, asking me to meet him for dinner at 'Arcadia.' I had not seen him for six months, but his debonair charm was as potent as ever, and we chatted of the past like friends who had not met for years. As if by mutual consent, we avoided the present until I noticed that the orchestra was different.

'Where is Klotz?' I asked suddenly.

'Gone.'

'Where?'

'To the war. He was a German reservist, and got away.'

'And his wife?'

'She is confined to her bed all the time, but fortunately there is an excellent woman looking after her and young Siegfried. By the way, what a conductor he 'll make some day!'

By the subterfuge I knew who was paying for the woman, though his income was always slender. Stimulated by a British-born orchestra that played with a respectability beyond question, we pursued bubbles of conversation for half-an-hour, saying many clever things and arriving at no conclusions; but both of us knew that, behind the badinage, there was the consciousness of war gripping our brains like a fever.

'What do you think,' I said at last, 'of the question of enlisting?' It would have been a mockery to deny the fever any longer.

'Why should I enlist?' His smile was so disarming that I regretted my move at once.

'Don't misunderstand me,' I said hastily. 'You are not needed, and you never will be. Besides'—— My voice trailed off into the insincere platitudes that always come to the lips when conscience is to be drugged.

He lit a cigarette. 'Pest,' he said, 'most men are participants in life; a few, like myself, are onlookers. It was my choice when I was a mere youngster—wisely or not, I do not know—but the pose has become reality now. I am a jester at the court of the world, a wordy fellow with a touch of melancholy in his humour, watching and commenting on the real things of life. Before there was a war I blew bubbles, and now I am fit for nothing else. Have a cigarette?'

'Thanks.'

He passed his hand across his brow with the same weariness I had noticed before.

'To gaze on life,' he went on after a pause, 'and not to live it, spares one many sorrows. Even love, which comes to most men as an overwhelming passion, stole into my life like a perfume of Cashmere. When I was twelve years of age and living on the south coast, I used to pass a little dream-girl of seven years or so. The purity of her face, the haunting sweetness of her eyes, stayed with me like a melody a mother sings to her child. Then she was ill, and for three weeks I never saw her. Finally she came one day in a chair, and her beauty was the most exquisite thing I had ever seen. It made me think that the God who gave us this beautiful world sometimes cherishes a soul as sweet as hers and keeps it in a body that is frail, so that through life He can watch it like a flower, tenderly, lovingly; . . . and when He wants it back again He has but to whisper, and, like a violet bending to a summer breeze, it hears and obeys. . . . I have sometimes thought that even tears shed for such a one have in them the quality of dew, and serve to keep the memory green and pleasant.

'The next day I brought her a rose. Though we had never spoken, she took it, and then gave me her face to kiss. . . . I lost my mother when I was very young, but this dream-girl's kiss supplied that inspiration for the ideal that a child takes from its mother. I could not have been impure after that—I could not have been unkind. The next day she was gone, and I never saw her again until I went to Surrey to visit young Oxley. She was his sister.'

'And you found?'

'That the dream-child had become a woman—the charm of Spring had softened to the witchery of Summer.'

He shrugged his shoulders and relit his cigarette, which had gone out.

'That, my dear Pest, is how love came to me.'

I frowned in an endeavour to pierce his apparently superficial dismissal of the subject.

'Don't you intend to marry her?' I said.

'Marry her?' He laughed, but there was little mirth in the sound. 'Does a jester marry?' His eyes hardened, and there was a new ring to his voice. 'Who am I to take a wife? A poseur, a flâneur in a world of men. I stand discredited beside the poorest workman whose toil brings in a pittance for his wife and kiddies. England is calling for men—for men, I say.' He brought his fist with a crash on the table. 'What can I offer her—my parlour accomplishments? My minstrel's mummery that shudders at the sight of a sword? Can I blow bubbles in a world where hearts are breaking?'

There were tears in his voice, but his eyes were flashing furiously.

'Hexcuse me.' A man had stepped up to us, wearing the armlet of a recruit. His face was oddly familiar, but I could not recall it until a light was switched on just behind him, and I recognised the pumpkin-faced man of Christmas Eve.

'I just thought as 'ow I'd like for to tell you as I've been took for the Army O.K.'

We shook his hand and wished him the best of luck.

'Funny thing, sir, as 'ow the 'ole blooming time I was planning to sign hup I was a-thinkin' of you and that there fiddle. "You wouldn't like to meet 'im," I kind o' sez to myself, "and you not in the harmy, you wouldn't," I sez.'

'Instead of which,' smiled Norman, all trace of his intensity gone, 'I am the one who is the slacker.'

'But didn't I see you in the line the day we was going for to join hup?'

Norman laughed. 'I was probably a hundred miles away,' he said. 'Pest, have I a double?'

The recruit scratched his head. 'I could 'a sworn hit was you,' he said, and launched into a graphic description of drill and the absurdities thereof, a recital which appeared to have no prospect of an ending until we were interrupted by the restaurant proprietor, who took Norman to one side for a consultation concerning the medieval cook.

I felt a hand on my arm, and turned to see our friend of the pumpkin face making secret and terrifying signs for me to lend him my ear.

'E's a-'iding something,' he whispered hoarsely. 'I ain't been a chandlery merchant hall my life, wot does most o' 'is business hon tick, without hit learning me to remember faces. Hit were 'im. 'E was turned down for a bad 'eart!'

Whereupon he made a semi-mystic sign with his thumb and forefinger to indicate that the whole affair was a secret between gentlemen.

That night, in bed, the sensitive, delicate features of Basil Norman remained in my memory. I had surprised his secret which he would admit to no one; not to the girl he loved; not to himself. It was the same spirit that had made him defy the whole of Westminster. We had called him Puck and the Blower of Bubbles, and he himself had said he was lighter than air. . . . But Basil Norman's life had been one endless battle with an indomitable soul that refused to yield to the body.

I did not sleep well that night.

(Continued on page 249.)

CONCRETE.

By THOMAS POTTER, Author of Concrete, its Uses in Building.

CONCRETE has of late attracted a great deal of interest by reason of its use by the Germans for 'pill-boxes' as a means of defence, its adoption for the building of ships, its merits as a protective material for floors and roofs during air-raids, and the prospect of its utilisation on a large scale after the war for the erection of workmen's dwellings, &c.

Although employed to a greater extent than formerly, concrete is, however, still almost unknown in many parts, except by name, and its use and application are imperfectly understood. In the United States the Government Board of Agriculture, in conjunction with the universities, issues at frequent intervals publications dealing with concrete, which are obtainable post free on application, and the universities appoint lecturers and specialists to instruct builders and others how to make use of it. Nothing of this kind has been attempted as yet in this country.

Concrete consists of any hard substance of an imperishable nature and suitable size, mixed with water and with cementitious materials having a strong affinity therewith, and cast or deposited in moulds or frames of a temporary character. Concrete is supposed by many to be a new invention, owing to its disuse in this country for many centuries; but Professor Middleton says it can be traced back to 500 B.C. Remains of it have been found in Egypt; and American engineers are of opinion that the huge top stones of the Pyramids could not have been lifted to so great a height by any mechanical means known at the time, and are of the nature of concrete, formed in a similar way to present practice. If this be true, the Egyptians must have possessed a knowledge of some powerful cementitious material, and of mechanical appliances to reduce hard granite chips to minute portions—a task impossible to perform by hand.

Concrete appears to have been used in many European countries from time immemorial. Alberti, an Italian architect, writing in 1485, says: 'I have observed that in other places the ancients, who were wonderfully expert in making great works, followed different methods in filling up their foundations. In the sepulchre of St Antonio they filled them up with little pieces of very hard stone, each not bigger than a handful, over which they perfectly drowned the mortar. I have known other instances where the ancients have much the same sort of foundations, and structures too, of coarse gravel and common stones, which they have picked by chance and which lasted many ages.' The great dome of the Pantheon, built by Agrippa in 27 B.C., one hundred and forty feet in diameter, with an opening in the centre thirty-six feet in diameter, is mainly concrete. Palladio, a noted architect, writing in 1570, says: 'In ancient times coffer-work was made by taking boards laid edgewise according to the thickness of the walls, filling the space between them with cement and all sorts of small stones mingled together, and continued after this manner from course to course.'

This is practically the system adopted in modern times. The Romans introduced the use of concrete into this country, as is still in evidence in many places—the walls that surround York, for instance. The Normans followed suit, as may be seen in the walls of Old Sarum, Corfe Castle, the keep of Rochester Castle, and many others. They used it, too, for other purposes besides the making of walls; the remains of the stairs at Rochester and Colchester Castles show the marks of the boards upon which the concrete was deposited.

Concrete appears to have been used in this country almost entirely for buildings of a defensive character, and when these became unnecessary its disuse was the result. Eventually it was entirely abandoned until less than a century ago; and even then, and for a long time after, it was only employed for massive engineering works, such as sea-walls, dock-walls, and harbour-works. An architect, writing in the Builder in 1848, says he had used concrete for foundations of buildings in London, but was unable to do so in the provinces, as he could find no one who knew anything concerning it. The ancient practice of using concrete for walls, as described by Palladio, by depositing it between boards set on edge to form a trough, was never universal. Walls were sometimes faced with a veneer of stone or brick on each side, and built up a small portion at a time, the space between being filled with rough, coarse stone débris, thrown in dry and consolidated by pouring over it slaked lime of the consistency of cream. This was a usual custom in this country when walls were of a substantial thickness, until the invention of Portland cement. It took many years for Portland cement to become general as a cementitious material for concrete purposes; but when it did, it was found that, for numerous reasons, it was better to mix the aggregate and the matrix in a dry state, then adding water to make the mixture of a suitable consistency, and depositing it where required. The earlier method was a happy-go-lucky process. In many cases the filling-in or core was unshapable and of a rubbishy description; when the walls of Westminster Abbey were cut into on several occasions for some special purpose, the core was found to be of a very indifferent character. The reports of the Society for the Preservation of Ancient Buildings state that it is frequently found, when the walls of ancient buildings are dealt with, that the core is of no value as a support to the roof, and that the facings having to support the entire weight is the cause of many failures. Owing to the difficulties of dealing with concrete from an architectural point of view, buildings of an important and pretentious character are often treated at the present time in a somewhat similar manner; that is, the walls exposed to view are faced with wrought-stone, and the opposite or inner sides with temporary boards on edge, and concrete is poured in between the two. Where the appearance of walls is of no great importance, they are formed either by pouring concrete between temporary boards fixed on each side to form a trough, or by casting it in wood or metal moulds to form solid or hollow blocks, or thin slabs which are built up on each side with a space between to ensure dryness, whichever method is considered most suitable. Hydraulic lime (lime which sets hard as well in water as in air—if not better—and is not influenced by climatic changes) was almost the only cementitious material used in ancient times, so far as we know. Hydraulic limestone is found in abundance in most lands, the best in this country being the blue lias, which is the strongest and most suitable material for concrete purposes, Portland cement excepted.

General Pasley made a series of experiments with limes and cements at Chatham about a century ago, but in his book describing them he makes no mention of the keep of Rochester Castle, one of the best-preserved specimens of Norman lime concrete, situated about a mile from where his experiments were being made. Inventions and discoveries appear to take place in cycles, and are overlooked, abandoned, or forgotten, to be reinvented or rediscovered at long intervals. General Pasley, who was an expert in limes and cements, writing in 1847, says: 'Concrete is a recent improvement first adopted by Sir Robert Smirke in the foundations of the penitentiary at Millbank, where the soil, chiefly of peat moss, was soft to a great extent. The origin of its use arose in this way. In excavating for one of the piers of Waterloo Bridge the workmen had a great deal of difficulty owing to the very compact state of the gravel forming the bed of the river, which everywhere else had been found perfectly loose. The effect had been produced by the accidental sinking of a bargeload of lime over the spot some time before, which had cemented the gravel into a solid mass resembling the calcareous conglomerates of nature which are formed by a similar process. Mr Rennie, the engineer, having told the circumstance to Sir Robert Smirke, the latter availed himself of the hint, and used concrete in all his foundations, none of which has ever been known to fail.'

It was a long time before Portland cement took the place of lime as a cementitious material for concrete, but it is now nearly the only one used for the purpose, except occasionally in the case of foundations. Its manufacture has been much improved within the last thirty years. Previous thereto it was often of an unreliable character, but at the present time it is usually sold to what is known as the British standard specification, which is guaranteed by all manufacturers of repute. This consists of a specification defining what the constituents should be, their proportions, the degree of fineness of the finished article and its tensile strength, &c., and was drawn up by the Royal Institute of British Architects. The materials required for its manufacture are to be found in almost every country, and as a result there are manufactories in most parts of the world. The first one in France was erected in 1846; in Germany, 1855. It was first imported into the United States in 1865, and the first manufactory was erected there in 1875. At the present time more cement is made in America than in any other country, and it is employed there for a greater number of purposes than anywhere else. As the durability and other essential properties of concrete depend largely on the cement, it is self-evident that, no matter what its purpose may be, the cement should be of the best quality only, and its use disallowed if otherwise. It is impracticable to test the character of cement except by experts equipped with machines made for the purpose. In such tests a considerable interval of time is necessary to ensure a correct result, and this is not always available; but if guaranteed to be according to the British standard specification, the quality of cement may be relied on. Except for foundations, concrete did not come into general use in this country for years after General Pasley wrote of the Waterloo Bridge incident; but M. Coignet constructed a number of buildings in Paris in 1858–59, one sixty feet in height, the walls, the floors, and the roofs being entirely of lime concrete, called by him béton aggloméré. It was not, however, until 1865 that concrete was employed in this country for walls of buildings, and occasionally for other purposes. There was an antipathy towards it, engendered by numerous accidents arising from carelessness and want of experience. This was the case mostly in the Metropolis and its suburbs, but in country districts it was used to a certain extent for cottages and unpretentious buildings of a moderate height.

In the London area Thames gravel or ballast, as it is called, was invariably used as the aggregate, as it was readily procurable at a moderate cost; and it is still in general use. The London County Council rules compel aggregates to be either Thames ballast, pit-gravel, if free from clay, certain kinds of quarry stone-chippings, or other materials equally hard and suitable, but disallow coal residues, such as coke-breeze, boiler-ashes and clinker, and slag, by reason of their containing a certain amount of sulphur. Coke-breeze was debarred in addition on account of its inflammatory character, and because it was supposed to be incapable, owing to its softish nature, of sustaining a compressive stress or heavy load. The Fire Prevention Committee constructed trial floors made respectively of coke-breeze, Thames ballast, slag, burnt clay, and broken bricks; a fire was kept under and over each for three hours until nineteen hundred degrees Fahrenheit was reached, and water was played on continuously from hose-pipes. The result was that the coke-breeze floor remained uninjured and proved the best, while the Thames ballast floor failed, and was the worst. Mr Kirkaldy, a material-testing expert, made certain experiments for one of the Metropolitan boards, and found that whereas stock brickwork with blue lias lime mortar crushed with eleven hundred pounds per superficial inch, coke-breeze concrete required two thousand and thirty-seven pounds. These results are against all preconceived notions, and go to prove that theoretical deductions with regard to concrete should be tested by actual practice.

In nearly every part of the country there are materials to be found—often at a nominal cost—suitable for concrete for building the thousands of cottages which the new housing schemes contemplate. These would reduce the ordinary cost and provide healthful and durable homes, superior in many ways to those built of brick and stone, and capable of being constructed by discharged and demobilised soldiers. The writer speaks from experience, having lived in concrete houses for many years.

THE LAST TRAIL.

PART II.

VIII.

THE polecat crept on to the water-trough, sniffed where the rat had been, making sure that it was really a rat and not a gnome, in spite of its strange colour, and—the lowest bar of the gate clicked.

The polecat did not spin about, top-fashion, as the lesser beast had done, perhaps because he was so long. He darted his head round, and looked over the dark-brown curve of his own arched back. One foot he had in the air at the moment; it remained there. Except for that one screw of the head, he had not moved so much as a hair. And he found himself looking at—the cream rat. At least, if it was not he, it equally was not any rat of a legitimate colour, and, if dilapidations count for anything, it was the very same rat.

Now, a human being would have shown surprise. This citizen of the wild showed nothing behind his dark, sharp, brindled, weasely countenance. God knows what he thought.

But the rat was looking at him, had seen that twisted head on the long neck. There was a pretty purply light in the eyes of the polecat, that had gleamed as he turned. The eyes of the rat shone steadily, like tiny white-hot coals. In three seconds and five hops the rat was gone.

And the polecat took no notice—apparently. He drank a moment, and continued to decipher that trail. It took him all his time. It took him, too, once round that yard and into a hay-bin. Here its maker had slain a mouse. It led him, through a little hole in a door, officially intended for the use of cats only, into a great, black, echoing void, that was the barn. The barn had been full of corn; but, all having been sold and carted away two days before, it was now empty—of corn; not of other things.

A very young rat, a legitimately coloured brown one this time, lay on its back on the floor, barely cold, its hand-like forepaws tightly clenched. Something, possibly another rat, made scraping noises high aloft, as one who climbs, under stress of a great fear, laboriously to the roof. The roof, it seemed, had many tenants, mostly awake. And as the polecat cautiously followed the trail, circling the place, he came upon, first, a dead wood-mouse; second, a nearly dead sparrow; thirdly, fur, fur of a—he looked up, and beheld it glaring down at him, eyes, eyes only, floating in space—the eyes of a cat.

'Gr-r-r-r-r-rr! Phtt! Hurr-r-r?' said the cat.

The polecat said nothing. Like most of the fighting breeds, he was rather a silent person. He encircled the post that ran up to the cat's perch three times, as the owner of the trail had done; and as the trail led away, showing that the cat had been deemed too strongly entrenched, he agreed, and followed it.

It took him down a hole of awful twistfulness in the floor, and here he met, face to face, a stoat coming in. The stoat was a kind of cousin of his, but that made no difference. (It rarely does.)

The stoat grinned a horrible grin, as if knowing what had to happen. Indeed, there was no room for anything else. Then they fought. It was a nasty, wicked little scrimmage while it lasted. Each flew at the other's throat. The scientific rapier-thrust behind the base of the skull, which both used for dealing with their prey, was no good here. Do rival fishermen slay each other with hooks?

One might have expected the stoat to go down almost instantly under the direct frontal attack of the polecat, seeing that he was only about half the size of his opponent, but in a nimble tribe the polecat is one of the least nimble, and the stoat one of the most. The result was that the polecat's jaws closed upon a stoat that wasn't there, so to speak, and the stoat's little sharp canines upon a polecat that was. Being a polecat—and one of the weasel tribe—he took the stabs of fire that proved the fact in grim silence.

As a rule it was the stoat's custom to hang like a spanner to anything upon which he got a hold, but not this time. He just bit, and was out of reach before the polecat got in a counter-stroke. He did it again and again. You could not have followed his movements; they were snake-quick. You could not even have told what he was at—all bristled out to twice his size, and swearing in the intervals—but the polecat could feel what he was at. And both animals—well, smelt to blazes, to put it bluntly; which was a tribal trick of theirs.

Next instant the stoat had twisted upon himself, and was running for his life, the polecat hard on his heels. He shot out of the barn, and across the rick-yard into the hedge, where he went down, like a sounding porpoise, into a rat's hole not large enough to admit the polecat. And the polecat, after sniffing, turned away to go back to his previous trail, and—was just in time to catch a glimpse of a creamish body and a long whippy tail vanishing round a corner of the big straw rick. I think it gave him food for reflection, for he slipped to that corner to investigate, and, as he did so, the death-scream of the stoat, muffled and choked, came to his ears from the interior of the hole. They had got him down there, then, cornered and mobbed him, the ruffianly old buck-rats of the place; and there must have been many, for they would never have dared to tackle the plucky little fighter else.

IX.

Again the polecat paused to reflect. There seemed to be a devil of a lot of scaly-tailed vermin hereabouts, and they were wondrous bold, too. It almost appeared as if his quick animal instinct had warned him of something sinister about the place, for he stared sharply round, and for a moment seemed half-inclined to retreat. The lure of love, however, was too strong for him, and he took the trail again, which this time led him into the cow-sheds, where a great red bull, anchored and lashed like a big ship, made the noises of several grampuses, and lunged at him ponderously, as he passed down the line of mangers.

He turned to show his teeth to the giant—which was like his cheek—and stayed to stare amazed, for, looking ghostly and uncanny in the very last of a pale, washed-out rift of moonlight, a creamy-coloured rat was sitting upon the cross-beam that supported the cows' chains and yokes. It ran along and up into the vaulted darkness of the roof-arch, after about ten seconds; but the polecat felt that that was only because he had seen it, and that, as a matter of fact, it had been watching him all the time. He did not say anything, of course—polecats seldom do; but as he moved on, I fancy he was thinking just about as hard as a beast like that can think.

Out of the cow-sheds and into the pig-sties the trail ran, and there the polecat stopped dead. There were noises in the darkness, besides the grunting and snoring of pigs—noises of grim and bitter conflict. As the polecat drew forward, step by cautious step, they grew worse; but, for the life of him, he could not tell where on earth they came from. Weird forms, heard for the most part rather than properly seen, some dark, some ghostly-white, flitted from his path as he stole on, or stared at him, with eyes like gimlet-holes of light, from beams, from holes, and unseen fastnesses. They were the forms of rats—all the rats of the threshed corn-ricks and the barns, gathered there because starving; and, I give you my word, there is absolutely no knowing what starving rats will do—everything bad for certain. These rats, however, were not fighting.

The polecat was puzzled. The horrible sounds of a close-fought, bitter fight continued; and the still more horrible, ceaseless gathering of rats, in every spot where he was not, continued too. Once a rat blundered past him in the dark, badly mauled, and he smelt the blood, and he slew. The rat squealed as his fangs closed behind its neck, and when he looked up, he found himself surrounded everywhere by a ring of cruel, sharp, gleaming eyes in pairs; but when he rushed at them they vanished, only to come back when he stopped. And all the time the noise of that furious fight never ceased; and all the time, coming in from outside, he could hear the pealing of distant church bells. Man, it seemed, was happy that night—which was a good deal more than he was. This business puzzled him, and the unknown is always distasteful to a wild beast, if not terrifying.

In a remote corner he found another rat mobbed by its fellows, but taking no notice of them, and crooning to itself in pain. Its brotherly comrades melted before the polecat, as he came rippling up, but the stricken one could not face him, because its head would not lift. The thing's neck was broken. Again he slew swiftly, and, as with the last, as swiftly hid the carcass away; but as he left it he heard those eyes, the living rats, to wit, rush in upon it with a ghastly pattering, like droves of hyænas. They were most undoubtedly starving, and, by the same token, still more undoubtedly very dangerous. He would have given a night's hunting to be safely out of the place, but he could not find the trail of his beloved. It stopped at the foot of a huge, old-fashioned meal-bin, a very giant of meal-bins, and beyond that, though he had cast forwards and backwards and in every direction, no sniffing of his could carry it. Surely the rats could not have eaten the whole animal up? Banish the thought! She would have put up a fight of fights, for one thing; and something, surely, if only fur, would have been left, for another. And still the noise of terrible combat, somewhere unseen, never ceased.

X.

It seems never to have occurred to him, up to that point, to look up. This appears to be a weakness that afflicts mammals, rarely to look up; a strange fact, too, seeing that, for many of them at any rate, their chief terror comes from above. It was the frantic scratching of claws, as if something was vainly trying to balance itself somewhere overhead, that finally forced him to lift his head, and—a rat fell on top of him from over the side of the meal-bin. It was quite white, that rat, or, rather, creamy, except where it was red. It was already more than half-dead, bitten through the neck with two clean fang-holes, and he had no difficulty in slaying it. 'But why did he slay?' you ask. Why, indeed? Because he was a polecat, I suppose, which is as good an answer as any other. Why do some men arm themselves and slay? For sport? Not always. And Nature had armed the polecat, and he slew—occasionally, but not often, I dare to think, for sport.

Scarcely was that rat out of action when a second incontinently tumbled upon him from above, and was despatched with clean precision and practised promptitude. Not that it would have mattered, for that rat had already two holes through its neck. This grisly work, however, as it were, warmed the polecat up. It set his excitement alight, his blood-lust aflame, and when a polecat—when any weasel, in fact—begins to get excited, to 'see red,' things of a most hectic nature are bound to happen. They forget themselves at such times, but everything within reach gets no chance of forgetting them.

The polecat doubled his long body, on sturdy miniature bear-like legs, into a loop. He sprang. He missed, and fell sprawling. He aimed. He sprang again, and his head and forepaws appeared over the top of the side of the meal-bin. For a moment he swung there, scraping. Then he climbed up and balanced, all four feet touching. And he looked down.

His eyes, those fierce red orbs, saw a sight, a most amazing sight, down there, on and over and among and in the meal of the meal-bin. It crawled, that meal. It was alive, horribly animate, with things — meal-coloured, meal-smothered things—which explained the mystery of the cream and biscuit coloured rats; and they reared, and they fought, and they rolled, and they burrowed, and they sprang at, and ran round, and fell back from, and, in about one case in twenty, got up over, the side; and they gibbered with hate and fear; and they squealed with loathing and pain; and they screamed in rage and death. And not all those things, though all were of the same mealy colour, were rats either. One was not a rat. It looked like a ferret, a big one, parti-coloured; meal-coloured where it wasn't dark-brown black, and dark-brown black where it wasn't — crimson. And it was fighting for its life, that thing, having got into, but finding no chance to climb out of, that death-trap. So were the rats, having got into, and, in the majority of cases, not being able to get out of, that place. But even if the polecat had had his eyes shut, he would have known the name of that other beast. Anybody who had not a cold—and it would have had to be a mighty bad one—would have known the name of that beast too. You could smell its name. It was written, almost I had said in blue, on the very air, for only a polecat could stink like that, and—on purpose. It was indeed the undoubted and exclusive smell—in that land—of Mustela putorius, the polecat. But in one point our polecat was ahead of us; his nose told him that he could add the words 'feminine gender' to that description, and the knowledge acted upon him like the touch of a magic hand.

With a single flying leap he arrived at the bottom of that great, big bin, unannounced and grim, and as he landed he set in to slay. Even among the choking, clinging, clogging meal, he slew and fought, and fought and slew, terribly, ghastlily, appallingly, for he was temporarily as mad as any berserk, and blind to the world; for his trailing of a night, his quest of a year and a half, had come to an end at last.

For a bit, however, it looked, to the dull human eye at any rate, as if the end was like to be of the wrong kind, and of too sweeping a nature; for that great, big bin was literally alive with rats: starving rats, desperate rats, cornered rats, old rogue rats, big father rats, cannibal rats, gaunt mother rats, young 'k-nut' rats, lean 'flapper' rats, crippled rats, one or two hobbledehoy rats, and, yea verily, one blind rat—almost all anxious to get out; nearly all failing in the leap; and very much all desperate beyond the last shred of fear.

As for the female polecat, she appeared not to be able to get out either—at least, not with all those rats there; she must continuously face and fight them; they would have torn her to pieces else, and she knew it. But she did not know it when she went in there to kill them.

Even as it was, there seemed to have been little enough sanity—and no pity—inside that great meal-bin, which was a pitfall to boot—a fact, by the way, which the farmer well knew. But directly the male polecat broke his neutrality, the whole thing went clean crazy in one whirling, boiling, tumbling, revolving, whitish cloud. A few rats managed to get out over the side, wounded, fewer dying, and fewest of all whole. Some fell where they dropped; some crawled away, to be eaten by their kind; some rushed off in the darkness. But by far the greater number failed to make that leap good, in the reeking dark, and died in the choking meal-fog like—well, like rats, and that is darned hard, too.

In the end, as a storm dies, that fiendish combat died down in the bin there, and only silence, and the horrible crooning, mumbling noise of a rat, hard bitten and beset, in a far corner, broke the fat, full, complacent grunting of the pigs. At last even that ceased, and the pigs became as silent as they ever would be, but no polecats appeared. No polecats ever appeared. The farmer found them next morning, surrounded by dead rats, lying one across the other—dead. Some of the rats that had faced them that night had already tasted poison, and that was enough.

But verily, 'Cruel is Fate, who makes, who mars, who—ends.'

And that is why there are no polecats in that county now, and why, too, there might have been.

THE END.

IF LILAC ALWAYS LASTED.

If lilac always lasted,
If roses ever bloomed,
If hopes were never blasted,
And lives were never doomed—

Ah! then this brief existence
Would constitute our all,
And from no heavenly distance
Eternal Spring would call.

PAULINE W. ROOSE.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE FOUR DAYS' BATTLE OF 1666.

By H. W. HOUSEHOLD, M.A.

I.

'JUNE 2. Up, and to the office, where certain news is brought us, of a letter come to the King this morning from the Duke of Albemarle, dated yesterday at eleven o'clock, as they were sailing to the Gunfleete, that they were in sight of the Dutch fleet, and were fitting themselves to fight them; so that they are ere this certainly engaged: besides several do averr they heard the guns yesterday in the afternoon.'

So wrote Mr Samuel Pepys in his famous Diary on that June day, between the Great Plague and the Fire. It was the second of the four days of the great battle in 1666. Samuel Pepys was an official high up in the Navy Office, and when in the previous year there was loud complaining that the fleet had been sent to sea short of food and stores, he was made 'Surveyor-General of the Victualling business,' and at once set busily about his work. It was no light task, as he knew very well; for, as he said, 'Englishmen, and more especially Seamen, love their bellies above everything else, and therefore it must always be remembered, in the management of the victualling of the navy, that, to make any abatement from them in the quantity or agreeableness of the victuals, is to discourage and provoke them in the tenderest point, and will sooner render them disgusted with the King's service than any one other hardship that can be put upon them.' 'Englishmen, and more especially Seamen,' perhaps have not changed very greatly since Mr Pepys wrote two hundred and fifty years ago. He knew what he had to do, and he did it well; and during the greater part of the campaign of 1666 there were few complaints.

On June 2 Pepys hurried away from his office to the river to see about sending off to the fleet a couple of yachts with a body of soldiers on board. Coming on shore again at Greenwich, he went into the park, 'and there we could hear the guns from the fleet most plainly. We walked to the water-side, and there seeing the King and Duke [James, Duke of York, the future James II.] come down in their barge to Greenwich-house, I to them, and did give them an account what I was doing. They went up to the park to hear the guns of the fleet go off. All our hopes now are that Prince Rupert with his fleet is coming back, and will be with the fleet this even: a message being sent to him for that purpose on Wednesday last.'

The great fleet of eighty ships had been put under the joint-command of Prince Rupert and George Monk, Duke of Albemarle—that Monk who had brought Charles II. back to his throne in 1660. The two had joined it in the Downs earlier in the week, but a rumour came that the French had put to sea and were sailing up the Channel to join the Dutch; and Rupert was at once sent off with twenty ships to hold them back, and cover Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight. It was a dangerous move to divide the fleet, and it caused the loss of the battle, but at the moment the Dutch, who were commanded by De Ruyter, were believed to be in harbour. Directly it was discovered that they were at sea, messages were sent off to fetch Rupert back, but for three desperate days Monk with sixty ships had to face the Dutch with ninety.

II.

The English fleet was off the North Foreland, making for Harwich, on the morning of June 1, when 'about 7 aclocke our scouts gave ye signall, wch was leting ye top gallan sails fly, and fireing 2 or 3 guns to let us know they discovered the enemies' fleet to the leeward.' The Dutch had come out with an east wind behind them, but early in the morning it had changed, and it was now blowing hard from the south-west. To avoid being driven to the northward, they had anchored, and were now lying midway between Dunkirk and the Downs, when the English cruisers sighted them. Word was quickly brought back to the Duke that he had the main Dutch fleet before him, and that it greatly outnumbered his own. A council of war was called on board the flag-ship. The Duke himself was for attacking at once. He cared no more for the difference in numbers than did Blake when, off the Thames, he faced Van Tromp's ninety ships with only forty-two. Monk, like Blake, was a soldier, and perhaps he did not fully measure all the difficulties that lay before him. Some of the sailor admirals at the council of war understood the risk of fighting under the conditions of that day well enough, but 'they durst not oppose it . . . for fear of being called cowards, though it was wholly against their judgment to fight.' Not only would they have to fight ninety ships with sixty, but their poor sixty would be unable to use their heaviest guns. They would be to windward of the enemy, and, as the wind was strong, they would heel over so much when it came abeam that the lower tier of ports would have to be kept closed, lest the sea should break in; while the Dutchmen's ports, as their ships heeled over, would be high out of the water on the side engaged, and every gun would be in action. True, the Dutch were caught at anchor and at a disadvantage. With the wind so high and the sea rising, they had expected the Duke to anchor also, and he was upon them so quickly that they had no time to get their anchors up, and had to cut their cables. Their centre and rear were some distance to leeward of their van, and could not get up at once against the wind to help it. So at the van the Duke dashed in the old headlong English way, seizing an opportunity that Nelson was to seize, and use to such effect, long afterwards at the Battle of the Nile. But though the attack was headlong, the English line, even in that day, was so well kept that their enemies marvelled at the sight. On board one of the Dutch ships, serving as a volunteer, was a young French nobleman, who wrote an account afterwards of what he saw and did in the great fight. 'Nothing,' he said, 'equals the beautiful order of the English at sea. Never was a line drawn straighter than that formed by their ships; thus they bring all their fire to bear upon those who draw near them. . . . They fight like a line of cavalry which is handled according to rule, and applies itself solely to force back those who oppose; whereas the Dutch advance like cavalry whose squadrons leave their ranks and come separately to the charge.'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

But the English were to have no success this day. Though the Dutch van had been cut off, the English ships, as the sailors had foreseen, were unable to use their lower-deck guns on the side next the enemy. Meanwhile the Dutch centre and rear were coming up; and when, after three hours of heavy fighting, the Duke found himself close to the French coast by Dunkirk, and had to go about, he ran straight into them. His position then became as bad as it could be. He was doubled on, as the French were doubled on by Nelson at the Nile, and was hammered at from both sides. Some of his ships were cut off, two flag-ships among them, the Swiftsure, flying the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir William Berkeley, and the Henry, with Rear-Admiral Sir John Harman on board. Both fought gloriously. 'Highly to be admired,' wrote a contemporary, 'was the resolution of Vice-Admiral Berkeley, who, though cut off from the line, surrounded by enemies, great numbers of his men killed, his ship disabled and boarded on all sides, yet continued fighting almost alone, killed several with his own hand, and would accept no quarter; till at length, being shot in the throat with a musket-ball, he retired into the captain's cabin, where he was found dead, extended at his full length upon a table, and almost covered with his own blood.' His body was taken to Holland by the Dutch, 'and there,' wrote Mr Pepys, 'he lies dead in a sugar-chest, for everybody to see, with his flag standing up by him.'*

Sir John Harman was more fortunate. After a desperate fight, he saved his ship. 'Being in a short time completely disabled, one of the enemy's fire-ships grappled him on the starboard quarter; he was, however, freed by the almost incredible exertions of his lieutenant, who, having in the midst of the flames loosed the grappling-irons, swung back on board his own ship unhurt. The Dutch, bent on the destruction of this unfortunate ship, sent a second, which grappled her on the larboard side, and with greater success than the former; for the sails instantly taking fire, the crew were so terrified that nearly fifty of them jumped overboard. The admiral, Sir John Harman, seeing this confusion, ran with his sword drawn among those who remained, and threatened with instant death the first man who should attempt to quit the ship, or should not exert himself to quench the flames. The crew then returned to their duty and got the fire under; but the rigging being a good deal burned, one of the top-sail yards fell and broke Sir John's leg. In the midst of this accumulated distress, a third fire-ship prepared to grapple him, but was sunk by the guns before she could effect her purpose. The Dutch vice-admiral, Evertzen, now bore down to him and offered quarter; but Sir John replied, "No, no, it is not come to that yet," and giving him a broadside, killed the Dutch commander; after which, the other enemies sheered off.' 'The undaunted Bravery of that English Rear-Admiral cannot but be Admired,' wrote the Dutch admirals in their report to their Government.

On June 11, when he was home in London, Sir John Harman was visited by Mr Pepys, who wrote in his Diary: 'I with my Lady Pen and her daughter to see Harman; whom we find lame in bed. His bones of his ancle are broke, but he hopes to do well soon; and a fine person by his discourse he seems to be; and he did plainly tell me that at the Council of War before the fight, it was against his reason to begin the fight then, and the reasons of most sober men there, the wind being such, and we to windward, that they could not use their lower tier of guns.'

III.

The battle that day lasted till nearly ten o'clock at night, by which time, after eleven hours of fighting, the two fleets had drawn apart. A hard night's work followed, repairing masts and rigging, fitting new sails, and stopping shot-holes. For the damage was not all on the

* Such was the London rumour. It was quite untrue, for the Dutch treated the body of the dead admiral with the greatest respect.

English side. The Dutch losses were heavy also. Vice-Admiral Evertsen and several captains had fallen. Three ships had been sunk; others had been dismasted; and Tromp, the son of Blake's old enemy, who had commanded the van, had been obliged to leave his crippled flag-ship.

Next morning the English found themselves with forty-four ships to the Dutch eighty, and there was still no news of Prince Rupert. The Dutch at first were to windward, but by better seamanship the English regained that favourite position, which gave them the choice of the time and manner of the attack. When the fight reopened the Dutch were in some disorder. To make matters worse, their van, which had been the rear on the previous day, showed cowardice, and ran to leeward. De Ruyter with the centre had to follow to keep touch, and Tromp with the rear was left alone again. He was surrounded, and the odds were heavily against him, but he was as brave as Berkeley and Harman, and he kept up the fight with all his usual gallantry, until 'a most horrid noise of both great guns and muskets' told his danger to De Ruyter, who succeeded in bringing back the truant van with his own ships to relieve his friends. Meanwhile Tromp had fared badly. A vice-admiral had been killed; two ships had been sunk and three crippled; and Tromp, who had been in the thickest of the fight, had been obliged once more to shift his flag.

The Dutch thought that Albemarle might have routed them, for they were in great disorder, 'all the ships huddled together,' wrote De Ruyter, 'like a flock of sheep, so packed that the English might have surrounded all of them with their forty ships.' But the Duke did not do it. 'Methinks,' said a Dutch captain, 'he committed then a strange fault.' Not so strange, probably, as it seemed. Damaged masts and spars have been answerable for many similar 'faults.' It was, no doubt, impossible for Albemarle to manœuvre his ships. However that may be, the Dutch succeeded in re-forming their line, and, after another partial engagement, the English fleet retreated in good order, with those that had been most damaged in the van; and 'sixteen of the greatest ships to be a bulwark of the rest and bring up the rear in a breast, and so he shoved on the other in a line before him.' The Dutch pursuit was not pressed. Their line was straggling, and with the wind falling to a calm at nightfall the fight died away.

IV.

About noon of the next day, which was Whit Sunday, the wind had gone east, and the Duke, after burning three of his crippled ships, continued his slow retreat towards the mouth of the Thames. Two or three hours later, to the relief of everybody, Rupert and his twenty ships appeared in the distance, and 'wee then steered towards the Prince comforting ourselves with ye thoughts of renewing the fight by returning on ye enemy.' But they had some bad moments to pass through before they reached him. Six ships actually struck upon a well-known shoal, and one, the Royal Prince, the finest ship in all the fleet, could not be got off again. There was no Harman on board, and when the Dutch surrounded her, she surrendered without a struggle. The Dutch tried to tow her off, but failing in that, they burnt her where she lay. The vexation and the shame of her loss were soon forgotten in the general rejoicing at the junction with Prince Rupert. Confidence returned; it was resolved to attack again on the morrow, and preparations began at once. But let us leave the fleet, while the battle is beginning on the Monday morning, to visit Mr Pepys in London and learn what news he has.

'To White Hall, where, when we come, we find the Duke [of York] at St James's. . . . So walking through the Park we saw hundreds of people listening . . . to hear the guns. . . . After waiting upon the Duke . . . I home; where no sooner come, but news is brought me of a couple of men come to speak with me from the fleet; so I down, and who should it be but Mr Daniel, all muffled up, and his face as black as the chimney, and covered with dirt, pitch, and tar, and powder, and muffled with dirty clouts, and his right eye stopped with okum. He is come last night at five o'clock from the fleet, with a comrade of his that hath endangered another eye. They were set on shore at Harwich this morning, at two o'clock . . . with about twenty more wounded men from the Royal Charles. They being able to ride, took post about three this morning, and were here between eleven and twelve. I went presently into the coach with them, and carried them to Somerset-House-stairs, and there took water (all the world gazing upon us, and concluding it to be news from the fleet, and everybody's face appeared expecting of news) to the Privy-stairs, and left them at Mr Coventry's lodgings . . .; and so I into the Park to the King, and told him my Lord Generall [Albemarle] was well last night at five o'clock, and the Prince come with his fleet and joyned with his about seven. The King was mightily pleased with this news, and so took me by the hand and talked a little of it, I giving him the best account I could; and then he bid me to fetch the two seamen to him, he walking into the house. So I went and fetched the seamen into the Vane Room to him and there he heard the whole account.

'How we found the Dutch fleet at anchor on Friday half seas over between Dunkirke and Ostend, and made them let slip their anchors. They about ninety, and we less than sixty. We fought them, and put them to the run, till they met with about sixteen sail of fresh ships, and so bore up again. The fight continued till night, and then again the next morning from five till seven at night. And so, too, yesterday morning they began again, and continued till about four o'clock, they chasing us for the most part of Saturday, and yesterday we flying from them. The Duke himself . . . by and by spied the Prince's fleet coming, upon which De Ruyter called a little council (being in chase at this time of us) and thereupon their fleet divided into two squadrons; forty in one, and about thirty in the other; . . . the bigger to follow the Duke, the less to meet the Prince. But the Prince come up with the Generall's fleet, and the Dutch come together again and bore towards their own coast, and we with them; and now what the consequence of this day will be, we know not. The Duke was forced to come to anchor on Friday, having lost his sails and rigging. No particular person spoken of to be hurt but Sir W. Clerke, who hath lost his leg, and bore it bravely. The Duke himself had a little hurt in his thigh, but signified little. The King did pull out of his pocket about twenty pieces in gold, and did give it Daniel for himself and his companion; and so parted, mightily pleased with the account he did give him of the fight, and the success it ended with, of the Prince's coming, though it seems the Duke did give way again and again. The King did give order for care to be had of Mr Daniel and his companion; and so we parted from him, and then met the Duke of York, and gave him the same account: and so broke up, and I left them going to the Surgeon's.'

V.

While Mr Daniel and his battered friend were telling their story to the king, the fleets were once more fiercely engaged. At daybreak the Dutch had been almost out of sight, but by eight o'clock the English, 'in very good order,' had come up with them. The good order, however, was soon lost. The Dutch succeeded in pushing between broken fragments of the fleet; and all was confusion. A ruinous defeat seemed certain, but first wind and then fog came to the help of the Duke. The Dutch 'bore away to leeward, and, glad to part soe, we stood over for the English shoar.' Or, as the Dutch saw it, 'God, after he had so gloriously favoured the Arms of the Victours, was not pleased that they (the English) should be utterly defeated by the Destruction of their whole Navy, which appeared as unavoidable: For the shattered Remainder of them miraculously escaped by the Favour of a thick Fog.'

No news of the fourth day's fighting reached London till June 6, and at first all seemed to have gone well. 'Sir Philip Frowde,' writes Pepys, 'did meet the Duke with an express . . . being the narration of Captain Hayward of the Dunkirke, who gives a very serious account, how upon Monday the two fleets fought all day till seven at night, and then the whole fleet of Dutch did betake themselves to a very plain flight, and never looked back again. That Sir Christopher Mings is wounded in the leg; that the Generall is well. That it is conceived reasonably, that of all the Dutch fleet, which, with what recruits they had, come to one hundred sail, there is not above fifty got home; and of them few if any of their flags. And that little Captain Bell, in one of the fire-ships, did at the end of the day fire a ship of 70 guns. We were so overtaken with this good news, that the Duke ran with it to the King, who was gone to chapel, and there all the Court was in a hubbub, being rejoiced over head and ears in this good news. Away go I by coach to the New Exchange, and there did spread this good news a little, though I find it had broke out before. And so home to our own church, it being the common Fast-day, and it was just before sermon; but, Lord! how all the people in the church stared upon me to see me whisper to Sir John Minnes and my Lady Pen. Anon I saw people stirring and whispering below, and by and by comes up the sexton from my Lady Ford to tell me the news (which I had brought) being now sent into the church by Sir W. Batten in writing, and passed from pew to pew. . . . Idled away the whole night till twelve at night at the bonfire in the streets. Some . . . did give me two or three vollies of their musquets, I giving them a crown to drink; and so home. Mightily pleased with this happy day's news, and the more because confirmed by Sir Daniel Harvey, who was in the whole fight with the Generall, and tells me that there appear but thirty-six in all of the Dutch fleet left at the end of the voyage when they run home. The joy of the City was this night exceeding great.'

But the joy was not to last for long, for the news that had come, like so many rumours in wartime, was wholly false. Spirits fell and faces changed next morning when there came to hand 'the contrary news, which,' says Mr Pepys, 'astonishes me: that is to say, that we are beaten, lost many ships and good commanders; have not taken one ship of the enemy's; and so can only report ourselves a victory; nor is it certain that we were left masters of the field. But, above all, that the Prince run on shore upon the Galloper, and there stuck; was endeavoured to be fetched off by the Dutch, but could not; and so they burned her. . . . This news do much trouble me, and the thoughts of the ill consequences of it, and the pride and presumption that brought us to it. At noon to the 'Change, and there find the discourse of the town, and their countenances much changed.'

VI.

There were no great newspapers at that day to attack the Government and turn out Ministers; but discontent was general. That sixty ships had fought with ninety was reason enough for the defeat, but people were not satisfied with that, and, in the usual English way, began to make wild charges of mismanagement. 'Sir G. Carteret,' says Pepys, 'tells me, as I hear from everyone else, that the management in the late fight was bad from top to bottom. That several said that this would not have been if my Lord Sandwich had had the ordering of it. . . . There is nothing but discontent among the officers; and all the old experienced men are slighted.' The Duke, of course, would not have it so. He 'is as high almost as ever,' sneers Mr Pepys, 'and pleased himself to think that he hath given the Dutch their bellies full, without sense of what he hath lost us; and talks how he knows now the way to beat them.' And indeed perhaps he did, for he beat them soundly enough some six weeks later. He also knew that the defeat was by no means the disaster that it was thought to be when the tale of the losses first arrived. The Dutch had suffered too, and their victory did them little good. 'They had lost seven or eight ships, many more utterly shattered; some 2000 men killed and wounded; and three flag officers killed, including Evertsen, one of their finest leaders. And that in spite of the fact that for most of the fight they had had the advantage in numbers of nearly two to one. Naturally, the English losses were heavier. Berkeley and Myngs killed, Ayscue a captive in Holland; 12 Commanders killed; eight ships lost to the Dutch; . . . at least 12 ships sunk or burnt, including the Royal Prince; and perhaps 5000 casualties and 3000 prisoners.'

A few days later Rear-Admiral Sir Christopher Myngs was buried, and Pepys attended his funeral. The story which he tells may well close the account of the great battle.

'Invited to Sir Christopher Mings's funeral, but find them gone to church. However, I into the church . . . and there heard the service, and staid till they buried him and then out. And there met with Sir W. Coventry . . . and went with him into his coach, and being in it with him there happened this extraordinary case,—one of the most romantique that ever I heard of in my life, and could not have believed, but that I did see it; which was this:—About a dozen able, lusty, proper men come to the coach-side with tears in their eyes, and one of them that spoke for the rest begun and said to Sir W. Coventry, "We are here a dozen of us, that have long known and loved and served our dead commander, Sir Christopher Mings, and have now done the last office of laying him in the ground. We would be glad we had any other to offer after him, and in revenge of him. All we have is our lives; if you will please to get His Royal Highness to give us a fire-ship among us all, here are a dozen of us, out of all which choose you one to be commander, and the rest of us, whoever he is, will serve him; and, if possible, do that which shall show our memory of our dead commander, and our revenge." Sir W. Coventry was herewith much moved, (as well as I, who could hardly abstain from weeping,) and took their names and so parted; telling me that he would move his Royal Highness as in a thing very extraordinary. The truth is, Sir Christopher Mings was a very stout man, and a man of great parts, and most excellent tongue among ordinary men: and as Sir W. Coventry says, could have been the most useful man at such a pinch of time as this. He was come to great renowne here at home, and more abroad in the West Indys. He had brought his family into a way of being great; but dying at this time, his memory and name (his father being always and at this day a shoemaker, and his mother a hoy-man's daughter; of which he used frequently to boast) will be quite forgot in a few months as if he had never been, nor any of his name be the better by it; he having not had time to will any estate, but is dead poor rather than rich. So we left the church and crowd.'

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XVII.

CONTRAST, some one has said, is the magnifying-glass of the senses.

My three weeks in London were as an oasis in an uncharted waste. The Jura Street days of enforced idleness or hateful hack-writing were succeeded by the blessed tonic of congenial work, the anodyne of routine by full and keen hours. Fresh environment, fresh acquaintances, fresh sights and sounds animated and braced me. I worked with gusto, slept soundly, and woke refreshed, the hum of the early traffic in the April sunshine cheering me like a song. Keene-Leslie was busy, and sometimes out of town, but Jardine and I often dined together. The days slipped past too quickly.

April proved kind. The air was crisp and exhilarating, and if occasional wilful bursts of rain thwarted the sunshine, they did ample penance by freshening the streets and stirring the sap of the young greenery in the parks, where the crocuses held up their pretty heads to welcome the spring. Bits of gay colour were invading the streets, and all Londoners who could find the time were out-of-doors. After my day's work, by way of exercise and recreation, I often filled in a couple of hours before dinner wandering about in the great fascinating hive. Sometimes Jardine or Tony accompanied me, but as often as not I was alone, free to go my own way, to stroll or hurry as I felt inclined, to dine where I liked and in any clothes I chose.

On the 23rd Jardine and I finished our work. He went North for a week's fishing, and as I was booked next day to run down to the Sussex coast with Keene-Leslie, I postponed my return to Edinburgh. In the evening I cleared up a few 'loose ends' of my job, and about six o'clock started out from my rooms in a quiet street near the Museum, on one of my aimless saunters. I made my way leisurely through Oxford Street into Hyde Park, and after idling there for an hour, came up Rotten Row. A few drops of rain made me quicken my pace. I had thought of dining at a good restaurant, but in Piccadilly I suddenly discovered that I had left my sovereign-purse in my rooms, and a search in my pockets showed that my resources amounted to one florin and two coppers. However, I was not cast down. There are very many places in London where a man with no rooted objection to an unaristocratic neighbourhood and close quarters at table can get a decent dinner with two shillings or less, and still have a tip for the waiter and a bus fare left.

Soho-ward I steered. In Shaftesbury Avenue the rain, which up till then had been inconsiderable, began to pour steadily down out of a sky of unredeemed and dismal slate. London was promised a wet night. I strode briskly on, and soon had an embarrassing choice of cheap and exotic restaurants. At the little, red-painted, muslin-curtained 'Au Bienvenu' in Greek Street I could have specialised, among other delicacies, in 'Tripes à la mode de Caen' or 'Snails in green butter,' but neither these gastronomical adventures nor the grievous aroma of sauerkraut farther along the street held an allure for me. I struck into Frith Street, and halted at the Restaurant de Bon Goût. Its exterior belied its name. The window was austerely draped in dingy-white curtains, with a few india-rubber plants and a couple of music-hall bills thrown in; but the carte du jour announced (in phonetic spelling) that a dîner de cérémonie was provided within for the sum of one shilling. This was the place for my money, I thought. Curiously enough, I have the menu of my repast on that eventful night, and it lies before me as I write: 'Soups, 1 viande au choix, 2 légumes, dessert, café,' with the attractive addendum, 'pain à discrétion.' Bread ad lib.! Does the language hold a more heartening slogan for hungry, hard-up men? If the proprietor received small profits, no wonder he had a steady turnover! I passed the house not long since, and noted, with mingled feelings, that although it had been rechristened, its orthographic tradition survived in an assurance to the world which ran: 'Ivery atention to patrons.' The statement tallied with my experience—for I certainly received all the attention I wanted, and considerably more.

On the threshold I hesitated for a moment, but the rain was now coming down in rods which jumped a couple of inches up from the pavement and sent runnels tinkling down the street drains. Little recking the events which hung upon my haphazard choice of a cheap dinner, I entered. The dining-room was narrow and low-ceilinged, but well lit and scrupulously clean. The little tables were spread with snowy cloths, and if the cutlery and the glass were cheap, the cooking was first-rate. At one end was a 'snack' buffet where a stout daughter of Israel, with an air of aggressive chastity, presided over weird-looking drinks and dishes. These I resisted, and having secured a table to myself and instructed a moist and septic waiter to bring me the renowned shilling dinner, I took a look at my fellow-diners. They were not an interesting lot—half-a-dozen city clerks; three long-haired super-specimens of the musico-artistic breed, drinking vermuth at one of the tables; a whispering pair of lovers tête-à-tête, the girl's face very pretty in the pink glow of the shaded lamp; solitary diners absorbing the evening papers along with their meal; a couple of theatrical damsels in much-beflowered hats; and a lot of nondescripts, most of whom were obviously foreigners.

I had just attacked the inevitable petite marmite, when three men came in. I threw them a casual glance, and probably would have taken no further notice of them had not the resonant 'Good-evening' of one of them to the little proprietor struck full on my ear. The deep voice seemed strangely familiar. The three were making their way up the room in single file; all I could see was the back view of the man in the rear, a heavy, broad-shouldered figure in a loose blue-serge suit. Having reached the farthest corner of the room, they sat down at a table, the heavy man at the top, facing me, with his companions on either side of him. One of these was a lanky, evil-looking young fellow with a pinchbeck Mephistophelean face, the other a heavily jowled ox of a man. Both were dark, Southern types. I had just registered a mental verdict that their room was preferable to their company, when suddenly I became aware that the big man was staring hard at me. I caught his eye, when he instantly withdrew it and began to talk to one of his companions; but in that swift moment I recognised him, and I knew that he recognised me. The last time I had seen him was in the Naples train, apparently wrapped in innocent slumber, with a breviary on his knee. For he was no other than the simple country priest with a discriminating taste in cigars! He had discarded his dark-rimmed spectacles, but he could not so easily dispense with his long, humorous mouth, his little black eyes, or the rich contrebasse quality of his voice. My pulses quickened, but I wanted a minute or two to think out the situation. Feigning absolute unconsciousness of his neighbourhood, I went on with my dinner.

I am not a good actor, and did not trust myself to look his way lest he might read recognition in my face; but, luckily, there was a mirror on the wall on my left, and in it I contrived to snatch a wary glance or two at the three men. Once the bland old rascal bent forward and said something to his companions. The three heads were close together for a minute or two. Very probably the conversation concerned myself, for the two younger men did not look in my direction until afterwards, when I saw them take a stealthy survey of me in turn. Evidently my man intended to play the same game as I did. He did not look at me again, but chattered and laughed with his confrères, to all appearance oblivious of my presence. This went on until I was half-way through my dinner, when he rose and came along between the rows of tables towards the entrance. To lose sight of him was the last thing I had any notion of. Now or never! Up I rose from my table and faced him in the middle of the room. He halted and looked at me, mild surprise in his eye.

'I have been looking for you,' I began.

'For me?'

His little, puzzled, interrogative bow was a bit of excellent acting, but his next movement clinched my suspicions. He put his hands up to the lapels of his coat, and instantly I recalled the hairy paws of the knave in the Naples train!

'For me?' he repeated. 'I have not the pleasure of remembering your face,' he said coolly, in excellent English and with his voice perfectly under control. But I recognised that voice at once.

'Perhaps I may jog your memory,' I rejoined. 'We met in the train at Naples, and you left without giving me an opportunity of saying good-bye. You kindly presented me with a cigar, and I have since been most anxious to meet you.'

He shook his head. The note of regret in his voice was admirable. 'My dear sir! You are in error, I assure you! I have not been out of England for years. A case of mistaken identity! But it is of no consequence. These things will happen. Sometimes they are a little awkward. Pray think no more of it.'

His face was a study of solicitude lest I might feel any embarrassment, and I confess that his sang-froid shook me for a moment. My first impulse had been to close with the oily scoundrel and send for the police, but by this time his two companions had come closer. I did not like their looks. A moment or two passed, with nothing said on either side, my companion of some weeks ago standing in front of me with an air of mild boredom. His two satellites edged a foot nearer. Swiftly I made up my mind to 'ride cunning.' A fracas would have been useless, and in all probability there were more of the gang near.

'I believe that I have made a mistake. I am truly sorry,' I said, with all the grace I could muster.

He bowed, with 'I quite understand,' and for a moment I thought I caught the ghost of a smile on the long, thin-lipped mouth as he turned back to the table, followed by his two friends. But I made no sign, and took my seat again, outwardly, I hoped, unruffled, but fairly tingling with excitement.

Between pretending to read a newspaper and dawdling over my dinner, I contrived to spin out a quarter of an hour, in which I got a good look at the trio. Beyond doubt, the last time I had seen the man facing me was on the Continental train when he was disguised as an elderly and spectacled priest. I was itching to lay him by the heels; but there were obvious difficulties in the way. I had no evidence to back up the charge of theft of my belongings, and the restaurant was clearly one of the man's haunts. The little proprietor hovered round his table, and the waiter was at his beck and call, a smiling embodiment of attention. It was plain that the rascal was a habitué of the place, and, for all I knew, a good many of the swarthy diners might have been his friends or his accomplices. I felt sure that he thought he had bluffed me into believing that I had made a mistake in accosting him, and I was wondering what his next move would be, when another man came in. He was a clean-shaven, tall man in evening-clothes of faultless taste and cut—his lithe figure and patrician looks in striking contrast to the burly rascal and his vulgarian comrades. The handsome new-comer made his way towards the table at the end of the room, where the three had again seated themselves. The waiter had just brought them drinks. They were for the moment engrossed, but at a word from my Naples friend, on the approach of the new-comer, they rose with a marked air of deference. There was, indeed, more than deference (in the sense of acknowledgment of a social superior), there was the suggestion of discipline, in their attitude. The new-comer shook hands with the older man, and with a careless nod motioned the other two to sit down. Presently he and the big man went to the fireplace, where they engaged in animated talk. I would have given a good deal to hear it, but they were too far from me.

Although I kept my eyes glued to my newspaper, I was conscious of being watched. There are few more unpleasant sensations, and a minute or two of it proved enough for me. Having laid down the paper, I leaned back in my chair with all the nonchalance I could muster, and a swift glance at the mirror showed me the new-comer half-turned in my direction, his heavily lidded dark eyes lighting on me for a moment. Two or three minutes afterwards he rose and sauntered past my table to the office window, where he engaged in conversation for a little while with the proprietor. Then he came back, and gave me a glance in passing. It was perfectly well-mannered — the ordinary casual, politely indifferent glance, with nothing marked in it, which one gets and gives every day; but I thought that his eye rested on me for just a second too long, that he was interested, and had deliberately passed my table to get a good look at me.

On his rejoining the others, I lit a cigarette and pretended to bury myself in the newspaper. A party of diners seated themselves at an intervening table, which prevented my seeing beyond it without craning my neck and thereby attracting attention. . Five irksome minutes passed, and then the four came down the passage between the tables. None of them looked in my direction except my Naples friend, who gave me a polite inclination of his head and a glance of his little black eyes as if to say, 'Sorry! Surely you see now that you must have made a mistake.' To his little bow I returned what I imagined was a disarming smile.

The four men went to the cloakroom near the entrance, put on their overcoats, and went out through the swing-door. In a trice I paid my bill, and at the door I nearly ran into the little, smirking proprietor. 'Who are the gentlemen who have just left?' I asked him. He was desolated to be obliged to inform me that he did not know the names of these patrons. They sometimes came here, he thought; but, as he explained, with apologetic upturned palms, there were so many people came to the 'Bon Goût.' I thought that he was a liar, and felt inclined to tell him so, but I had no time to waste. Ten seconds more and I was outside.

(Continued on page 261.)

NATURE AND ART.

WHEN the equestrian statue of Charles I., which, after an adventurous career during the Commonwealth, was finally erected at Charing Cross, was lately being sandbagged to protect it from air-bombs, one newspaper objected to this proceeding on the ground that the statue, as a work of art, was not worth the cost. The reason given for this opinion sounds plausible. How, asked the writer, can the statue be a good work of art when the horse's eyes are placed on the front and not on the sides of its head? This reason, as has been said, sounds plausible; but really it is absurd. There are plenty of other equestrian statues in London where the horses have their eyes 'just where their eyes should be,' and yet these horses do not look like living horses, but rather like horses' hides stuffed with hay—a whole skinful. Eyes right or eyes wrong, King Charles's horse alone looks 'just what a horse should be.'

What the sculptor who made the statue set himself to do was to produce a work which, when looked at on its pedestal, would appear a vigorous representation of a living man on a living horse. Effect is what all great artists, whether sculptors, painters, or poets, seek. If they can secure that while adhering to facts, well and good; if they cannot, so much the worse for the facts. Thus the greatest equestrian statue in the world is by universal consent that of Colleoni, placed before the Scuola di San Marco in Venice, and during the war transported to Rome for safety against air-bombs. Every one who has seen that resplendent effigy has been amazed by its animation and naturalness; yet few have ever noticed that the horse is walking as nothing but a circus horse ever walked—and it may be doubted whether the most accomplished circus horse could walk thus with an armoured warrior on its back—by advancing its two offside legs at the same time. That equestrian statue's only rival is the one of Gattamelata at Padua; and, strange to say, the horse there is walking in the same impossible way.

As to painting, take the greatest of English landscape painters, Turner; when he wished to make an effective picture of the last voyage of the 'Fighting Téméraire,' he did not hesitate to make the sun set in the east. Most people who look at the picture do not know, probably, that it is the east in which the sun is setting; but the judicious who do know do not care. Shakespeare, again, when he found it necessary for the plot of his play to create a seaport in Bohemia, promptly created one. And Milton, when he wished to produce a tremendous effect, disregarded the very nature of things. Who does not remember such lines as:

A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,
As one great furnace, flamed; yet from those flames
No light; but rather darkness visible
Served only to discover sights of woe;

and:

And in the lowest deep a lower deep
Still threat'ning to devour me opens wide?

It is true, 'piddling' Bentley in his edition of Paradise Lost objected to 'darkness visible' and 'in the lowest deep a lower deep' on the paltry ground that they were contradictions in terms; but the reader who is alive to the magic of words recognises these as figures of speech which could be conjured up only by the wand of an enchanter.

Byron's 'Prisoner of Chillon' is a fine example of a poet's disregard for facts when they stand in the way of effects. He introduced that poem to the public by calmly stating that he knew nothing about its hero, Bonivard. If he had known that François de Bonivard of Geneva was a gentleman who had no brothers, whose notions on private morality were constantly getting him into trouble with the public authorities, and whose quarrel with the Duke of Savoy had nothing to do with liberty of conscience, but much to do with the perverted fruits of ecclesiastical property, does any one imagine that that would have prevented Byron from writing the poem? He wanted to write a poem in denunciation of tyranny and in praise of freedom; he saw in the Castle of Chillon a picturesque setting, and in the long imprisonment of Bonivard a theme full of possibilities for such a work; and so he bothered his head not a bit about the facts of Bonivard's life, but proceeded to write. At Ouchy he and Shelley, who had been cruising together round the Lake of Geneva, were held up for two days by bad weather; and during those two days there at the inn, now called the Hôtel d'Angleterre, he wrote the verses which in the result have blotted the real Bonivard out of history and consecrated Chillon for ever to the memory of a Bonivard who never existed.

THE BLOWER OF BUBBLES.

PART IV.

X.

I DID not meet Basil Norman for nearly four years. I joined the Artists' Rifles early in 1915, fought for eleven months, and was given a commission. After a short time in England I went out in all the glory of a Sam Browne and one star, but in a few months I was wounded in the chest, which earned me Blighty and a surfeit of Aunt Hannah, who still contended that had we only concentrated on an army instead of a navy——

As I write, it all seems a blurred memory of colourless monotony, mud, fatigue, death, and grim humour. In January 1918, after a term of duty as musketry instructor, I returned to France, and fought through the horrible spring battles until, with cruel coincidence, I was wounded in the same place again, and once more came to England with a bullet in my chest—a bullet they dared not extract. In September I was discharged.

One morning in November I sat by the fire in my den at Sloane Square. I had resumed the tenancy of the rooms, and Mrs Mulvaney looked upon me as being even less mature than before, warning me about goloshes when it was wet, and umbrellas when it wasn't, but appeared likely to be.

How long I sat there I do not know, but memory began to weave its spell, driving my surroundings into a dim obscurity and bringing back incidents of the past with vivid clarity. I gripped my head with both hands, and, for the hundredth time, sought the truth that lay buried in the holocaust of the nations. . . . My wound hurt again, and a dizziness crept over me like a fog that rises from the sea and enshrouds the land.

Futile. . . . Futile. . . .

Had some one spoken? The words sounded distinctly. . . . I could have sworn I heard them.

Was the whole war a dream, or was it real? Once more I was in Sloane Square; there was my desk with its litter of papers, my pipe-rack, my books. . . . Had I ever left them? Could it be true that I had led men against machine-gun fire—and that I had killed? Were those boys who died beside me, smiling like children in their sleep, really dead? Was it all some hideous fantasy of an unhealthy brain—a gigantic charade invented by the greatest buffoon of all time?

Futile. . . . Futile. . . . Futile.

I cursed, and pressed my brow with my hands. It was a fight for sanity, as so many men have fought in the solitude of their rooms since the hell of Flanders.

Like a panorama the events of the war crossed my mind, and yet those that stood out most clearly were the unimportant things that came as mere incidents during the unfolding of the world's destiny. The senior chaplain's dog, which was shot by an A.P.M. and mourned by a whole division . . . the new arrival who thought he was a special charge of the Lord's, and who persisted in looking over the top during the day—we buried him next morning . . . the night that the female impersonator from a divisional concert-party lured the colonel into amorous confession . . . the little chap who got no mail at Christmas, and said he hadn't received a letter for two years . . . one after the other these human trivialities coursed through my brain, forcing the vaster issues aside.

From no apparent cause, the strain of reminiscence turned toward Basil Norman. I had seen him somewhere, but whether in London or in the country my poor tired brain seemed unable to determine. And then, with no regard for relevancy, I was with my battalion once more, marching with the Australians to hold a strategical point that one of our brigades had saved from the disaster of March. Who was it said that the Australians lacked discipline? Look at them grinning like youngsters at a game, with the odds against any coming out alive! Discipline? Hell!

We rested at a cross-roads and smoked;

one of our Tommies was singing the refrain of a song that urged the country to call up all his relations, even his father and his mother, but for Gawd's sake not to take him. The sublime incongruity of it was so thoroughly British that we laughed and called for a repetition. A few minutes later the Australians passed us, going forward, and there was a reckless air of bravado about them that boded ill for the Hun.

We waited an hour, two hours—perhaps more.

By Jove! Coming around the bend in the road was the brigade that had held the line. Good work, you chaps! Well done! Bravo! That's it, you fellows; give them a cheer! Beneath the mud and the dust and the beards, they were livid with fatigue; the skin beneath their eyes had dropped, and their jaws hung impotently, like those of idiots. There wasn't a sound from their ranks as, too weary to lift them, they dragged their feet through the dust of the road. They had held their position for fifty-six hours, attacked incessantly from three sides by overwhelming numbers. Damned good, you fellows; damned good!

Still buffeted by imagination, my memory of the scene seemed to fade; yet one impression lingered that was both vivid and blurred. It was when that brigade, or what was left of it, had almost passed, and we were tightening up the straps of our kits, that I caught a glimpse of his face, or that of a man who could have passed as his twin. The soldier beside him was limping painfully and leaning on him heavily in an endeavour to keep up, and beneath the grimy pallor of that face I could see the old wistful, whimsical smile. . . . I tried to cry out, but something stuck in my throat, and next moment we were falling in.

It was Basil Norman, and the lame soldier beside him was the man with a face like a pumpkin. Either that or my brain had become the plaything of fancy.

Again my memory became a blank, and for a few minutes everything seemed obscured. Some one was shouting! It was taken up by another, then by many—the whole air was filled with noise. . . . I heard a woman's voice. Good God! Had the Germans broken through? . . . 'Steady, men—get your aim first.' . . . The shouting grew in intensity, and I pressed my brow with my hands until the marks stood out like wounds. With a cry as of an animal in pain, I rose to my feet and shook the shadows from my eyes. There was my room—the smouldering fire—my chair . . . but the shouting—it was louder than before.

Feeling my reason tottering, I crossed to the window and threw it open. People were running, and crying some word as they ran; one woman wept openly, and no one heeded her; a taxi passed, crowded to the roof with hatless, gesticulating enthusiasts. Was the whole world mad? From every direction came the noise of deep-throated shouting, swelling into a vast Te Deum of sound. A soldier with one foot leaned against a lamp-post and rested his muscles from their labour with the crutches.

'Hello!' I cried. The khaki seemed to restore my grip on things. 'I say—hello!'

He turned round and hobbled over to my window. 'Wot 's the trouble?' he said.

'This shouting,' I cried; 'these people running like rabbits. What does it all mean?'

'Wot! don't you know?' He smacked his lips in appreciation of the surprise he had in store for me. 'Why, Fritz 'as took the count, 'e 'as.'

'Then'—— Confound it! what made my lips quiver so? 'Then—it 's peace? . . . You mean . . . it 's peace?'

He nodded half-a-dozen times. 'The war,' he said, feeling the importance of his declaration, 'is napoo. Kaiser Bill 'as 'opped the twig, and the hold firm of 'im and Gott is for sale, with the goodwill thrown in, I don't think.'

I leaned out of the window, and we grasped hands.

Futile. . . . Futile. . . . Futile.

No—by Heaven, no! Not while we remember our dead; not while the spirit of comradeship still lives in the breasts of those who went out there; never, if the Britain of the future is worthy of her knights of the greatest crusade of all, and of the mothers who gave that which had sprung from their very heart-beats.

'Out of sorrow have the worlds been built, and at the birth of a child or a star there is pain.'

Half-mad with joy, I rushed into the street and urged my hospitality on the mutilated soldier, who came into my den and took a seat by the fire, while I fetched a decanter and cigars that we might make the occasion a jovial one. As I came into the room I noticed that he was examining me curiously.

'Hexcuse me,' he said, 'but if I may make so bold—wasn't you 'is pal?'

'Good heavens!' I cried, a light bursting upon me. 'You 're the man with the face like a—like a'—— I suppose I blushed.

'Don't 'esitate,' he grinned. 'Many a time over there 'e told me you called me "Pumpkin-Face," and, beggin' your pardon, sir, I likes it a sight better than "Pest."'

'Then—it was Norman I saw in March?'

'Ay.' He sipped his glass meditatively. ''E lied about 'is 'eart, and was took O.K. late in 'fifteen. 'E was a ranker like the rest of us, but 'e was a proper gentleman, 'e was—that is, not just like we hunderstands the word in Hengland, but a real gentleman. 'E never preached and 'e never whined, but them two heyes just kept twinklin', and whenever hany of us was a bit windy, 'e 'd sort of buck us hup by that there smile 'e 'ad. I ain't much on langwidge, not 'avin' no eddication to speak of, or I'd hexplain better; but when little Sawyers got 'is from a sniper, and 'e knew 'is ticket was punched for to go West, the sergeant says, "Fetch the padre," but Sawyers 'e says, "No, it's Bubbles I want." . . . I ain't much on religion neither, and I've done a 'eap o' filthy swearin', which I guess is all down agin me in the book; but wherever Bubbles is goin' is good enough for me, whether it's brimstin and blazes or hangels playin' 'arps.'

'Tell me'—I dreaded the answer to the question—'where is he now?'

''E's took a cottage hover in the Hisle o' Wight,' he said, clearing his throat and speaking slowly, 'and 'e's married to the sweetest creetur I ever sees houtside a book. Blime! after I gets hout o' 'ospital, me not 'avin' any hold woman of my own, 'e finds me hout and sends a letter sayin' to go there for my convalessings, which likewise I did. That's 'is haddress on the top of that there letter.'

I took the paper from his hand, but kept my eyes on his face; he was keeping something from me. 'Tell me the truth about him,' I said, and waited.

He shifted uneasily in his chair. ''E got a blighty near 'is 'eart,' he said, making a supreme effort, 'and 'e'll never get hup from 'is chair no more.'

XI.

The packet for the Isle of Wight threaded its way through the traffic of incoming vessels, and ran by a cruiser that had just come from the bloodless Trafalgar of German shame, where the second navy of the world surrendered without a fight.

A man next to me grunted. 'It's all right for us to crow,' he said; 'but Germany was beaten, and she did the right thing.'

I looked at him—he was quite sincere. His hair was unduly long, and he carried a manuscript case—probably one of the statistical writers still going strong.

'In your wildest flights of imagination,' I said, 'even if the combined fleets of the world were against him, could you picture Beatty leading the British Navy out to surrender?'

'Supposing he were ordered?'

As if in answer to his question, our course took us by the hull of the Victory, straining at her moorings in the November wind.

'In that case,' I said, 'Beatty would have had two blind eyes.'

Which was the sum total of our conversation until we landed at Ryde, when our paths diverged, never, I hope, to meet again. Probably, over the week-end, he was polishing up some powerful articles on the absurdity of Reconstruction.

By the time the train had reached the little station of St Louis, just beyond Ventnor, the wind had blown away any clouds, and the sun was shining radiantly. As I emerged from my carriage I felt a throb of exhilaration shoot through my veins, but depart as quickly as it had come, when I realised how near was the tragedy I had soon to witness. I heard my name spoken, and, turning, saw a ruddy-faced, storm-blown fellow of fifty odd years, whose whole bearing smacked of nor'-westers and mizzen-tops. When I admitted to my name, he seized my bag without a word, and started down the road with the swaying motion peculiar to mariners.

We had hardly gone any distance, when he stopped at a gate, which proved to be the back entrance to a garden, and following him through it, I was led along a path which was strewn with leaves in all the wealth of autumnal colouring, while through the trees there was the deep blue of the sea, flecked with crests of foam. We had gone about fifty yards when we came upon a cottage, in front of which, on a promontory, was a neatly trimmed lawn, guarded by six trees that stood like sentinels. The lower branches had been cut to give a better view, and their appearance lent a quaintly tropical look to the place, as if they were palms. In front of the house, fields sloped gradually to the edge of the cliff, which overlooked the sea beneath.

'My dear old Pest!'

Against the background of the trees I had failed to notice him sitting in an invalid's chair. In three strides I was by his side, his hands in mine . . . but no words came to my faltering lips. For a moment the gray of his eyes softened to a look of understanding; then the old smile, just as charming as ever, irradiated his face.

'This is an event,' he said, 'to be entered in the log.—Sindbad!'

The ex-seaman who had acted as my guide pulled at his forelock.

'Ay, ay, cap'n!'

'Take this gentleman's things to the guest-room upstairs.'

'The cabin to starboard? Werry good, cap'n.'

Heavens! such a voice! There were fog, gale, piracy, rum, and combat in it.

'Sindbad,' said Norman, in answer to my look, 'is one of my indiscretions—like "Arcadia." He turned up here one day with such a tale of the sea as would have shamed Robert Louis Stevenson at his best. So far as I can discover, he has been in every naval fight since Aboukir Bay. He's a bit hazy on the Jutland scrap, but hints darkly at the possibility of an invasion by Spain. He is convinced that the Armada is only hiding and waiting its time.'

In spite of myself, I laughed.

'As he refused to go, I decided to employ him as a man-of-all-work, and, as he appeared to have forgotten his own name, I gave him that of "Sindbad," which pleased him as much as me. As a result of my engaging him, the lawn you stand on is the quarter-deck, which he never fails to salute. As nearly as I can discover, we are sailing a perpetual voyage—you see by this view that the illusion is possible—and we're living in the imminent danger and hope of an attack by the Spanish. By the way, old man, would you rather go upstairs and clean up? Are you cold sitting there? Sometimes, being so comfortable myself, I forget all about my guests.'

I protested, sincerely, that I was quite contented where I was.

'Good!' he smiled. 'Now, tell me all about London. . . . I see you were hit twice. From more than a dozen sources I've heard how splendid you were in France.'

His voice was so bright, with its old, happy mannerism of rapidity of words, with the occasional slurring rallentando, and his gaiety so infectious, that, under his influence, I felt the clouds about my brain lifting—not only those caused by grief for his helpless condition, but those born of my own black moods which drove sleep from my eyes for nights at a time. I had come determined to be cheerful and to bring encouragement to the invalid, but already I was drinking in the elixir of his spirit and feeling my arteries throb with a kind of ecstasy.

His charm was more potent than before.

For a few minutes we chatted about France and the old Westminster boys who had won renown. We talked of many things, and laughed to find that we were still boys.

'By the way,' he said, during a momentary lull in the stream of reminiscence, 'I must apologise for my wife. She is doing some necessary shopping in Ventnor, but will be back by the next train.'

'I heard you were married,' I said, but got no further. Delicacy forbade my asking him how his dream of love had become a reality. He must have read the question in my eyes, however, for he offered me his cigarettes, which, with him, was always a prelude to a change in the tone of conversation.

'I did not write to her after I went to France,' he said quietly, 'because . . . well, I've spoken to you before of my sense of intuition—and I knew that mine would be a heavy price to pay. It was not fair to fasten her with a life none too robust at its best, because of a love-fantasy between two children. When I was hit, and they broke the news to me that—that this was to be my luck, the one thing that comforted me was the thought that she was free and would not have to share my captivity. By-the-by, Pest, isn't the sea fascinating? It is never the same for two days together.'

He was still a Puck, lightening his moods whenever they threatened to hurt the listener with their intensity.

'Pest,' he said, after a pause, 'she came to me. . . . When everything was dark, and I was groping blindly for some hand that would start me just a—a little on my path, she came—out of the mists. I urged her to leave me. I argued that she was not fair—and for answer she kissed me. . . . Pest, it was a moment of such exquisite happiness, a happiness so poignant, that I wish I could have died then. I was never so fit for heaven.'

The figure of Sindbad appeared from the house, tugged at its forelock, and disappeared into the garden to trim some shrubs.

'How did you happen to come here?' I asked.

'I had always looked on the Island,' he said, smiling, 'as the only spot in England where a twentieth-century Robinson Crusoe could find a sanctuary from the world, and, by the courtesy of the gentleman who owned the place, I was able to purchase it at a ridiculously low price. As a matter of fact, he was offered twice the amount quoted to me, but refused because I was a disabled Tommy. We came here strangers, but really the kindness of every one is so great that the ordeal is turning into a privilege. You have no idea, Pest, how extraordinarily sympathetic and courteous these people are.'

'I suppose, though,' I said softly, 'that it is rather—lonely.'

'Lonely?' he laughed. 'Bless your heart, old boy! talk about a French savant and his salon—this place is a positive Mecca for all the distinguished pilgrims on the island. For instance, there is the editor of the Tribune—a man who thinks editorially and talks colossally. He claims that any one who has read Boswell's Life of Johnson, Cervantes's Don Quixote, and Carlyle's French Revolution is educated. He never reads anything else, but keeps on reading these three in an endless cycle. We have perfectly stupendous arguments that never get anywhere, but utterly exhaust both of us. Then there's the station-master. How many passengers boarded the train here when you were coming off?'

'Four, I think.'

'Ah yes; this is Saturday—a busy day. Some trains we don't get any, and others just one or two; but in anticipation of a rush at some future date, he's inventing a scheme of getting tickets out of a drawer, stamped and all complete, by merely pressing a button. I tell you it's going to revolutionise the booking systems of the world—we've been working on it for weeks, but so far all we've got is the button. The plans are prodigious, though. And the Tommies! Gor blime, Pest! there's a convalescent home just down the road, and it's a queer day that at least two of the beggars don't come up for a "jaw" about old times. You talk about your officers' messes and brass hats; why, it's real life in the ranks. I tell you, Pest, I would rather be the man that coined the word "Cheerio" than the greatest general the world has seen.'

A merchant-ship, still wearing its strange motley of camouflage, sailed past only a couple of miles from shore.

'Look!' whispered Norman, and pointed down the garden.

Sindbad was crouched behind some bushes, surveying the vessel through a dilapidated telescope. After a careful scrutiny, he resumed his labours, shaking his head and muttering darkly to himself.

Norman chuckled hilariously. 'He's on the look-out for Spaniards,' he said.

'What a villainous telescope!'

'Isn't it? He always has it by him, though. I'll swear you can't see half-a-mile with the blessed thing.'

A huge black hound appeared from the direction of the conservatory, and, after the canine manner, expressed his wriggliest delight at the sight of Norman, ending by sitting solemnly beside the chair and laying one paw on the invalid's knee.

'Good-afternoon, Mr Jones,' said Norman.

The dog thumped the ground four times with his tail, and emitted a yawn like the sound of a train emerging from a tunnel.

'Mr Jones,' said I, 'changes from cordiality to ennui with rather startling rapidity.'

The hound acknowledged his name by a solitary thump, and then groaned with the air of a Stiggins contemplating the wickedness of a Weller.

'What breed is he?' I asked.

'Dog—just dog. He is, if I may say so, the battle-ground of his ancestors. Every breed but that of bull can be traced in him, and each has its moment of ascendancy. Mr Jones possesses a most remarkable hereditary system.'

The subject of our conversation became suddenly tense. A bird had hopped on to the quarter-deck, and was pecking at the ground in a manner that would infuriate any self-respecting dog.

Gathering up his loins, Mr Jones stalked the intruder to within four yards, and then fell in a heap on the spot—where the bird had been. After surveying the landscape with a puzzled air, as if to indicate to us that foul work was afloat, he walked to the end of the lawn and gazed thoughtfully at the sea. Having thoroughly demonstrated his indifference as to whether he ever caught a bird or not, he yawned terrifically, and left the scene for the comfort of the kitchen.

(Continued on page 264.)

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XIV.—NOT UNDERSTOOD.

DO not believe that we of the New Army are bloodthirsty Bernhardis, always talking about offensives and what not. Not a bit of it! Ninety-nine per cent. of us loathe the whole business, and seventy-five per cent. are opponents of militarism. Indeed, I think we may rightly be described as an army of pacifists enlisted in defence of our beliefs. No decent-minded Briton desires to compete with the brutal philosophy of the Hun. The man who says he likes war is either a liar or a Shylock in the supply department. The best way to end war is for the German nation to reduce the German General Staff to the ranks, and let them suffer such a bombardment as we gave the German Tommies prior to the battle of the Somme.

Shell-fire kills militarism.

The great New Army is a successful army, because it has a cause. Its moral is largely based on our love of freedom, truth, ease, and peace at our own fireside. We are a peace-loving people. A navy we have always regarded as an expensive business, the army as a luxury, war as a d—— nuisance and a most uncomfortable affair. War interferes with our commerce, our studies, our games, and our pleasures. War kills and mangles men who have been made in the image of God. It wrecks nations, countries, and homes; brings into millions of lives suffering, poverty, anger, despair, madness, and soul-racking sorrow. It is the most foul, ghastly, ungodly thing that man ever created.

War is hell—a suffering hell, a grisly hell.

Every man in the New Army thinks that. And it is most important you should realise our point of view; otherwise you will be unable to understand our psychology, and the reason for our carrying on. Of course, you may never have heard that side before. You are not to blame. Newspaper correspondents at the Front send home the most awful 'tripe' about us. They actually dare to say we 'like it.' When we read such things we laugh. Perhaps the poor devils are not entirely at fault. Some bright gent, who is director-general of moral, may consider it necessary that they should produce this piffle. But such a view is rather an insult to our education. We can penetrate official camouflage, sometimes enjoy it, but all the same this sort of stuff is not good for the army or the nation. It breeds illusions. Illusions of this order eventually become a danger to the State. Much better to speak the truth! To show war in all its vile nakedness, show it in operation—with blood, bayonets, and a brutal barrage blowing horses and men to bits, and motor-cars sky-high. Britishers can face this, for we are a race of stoics. But what Britishers cannot understand is that extraordinary diplomacy which says we must camouflage heavy casualties, hide disasters, whitewash blunders, and instil in the minds of a shivering British public that the Front is really 'not so bad as they say.' The Front is a vile and a hellish place.

But it was the Germans who made it so.

That is the whole alphabet of our cause. We are in this military business because we hate it. The position is such that if we refuse to fight, our lives, our homes, our businesses, our mothers, wives, and sweethearts, will be a the mercy of that awful devil who says he is the chosen of God—the Kaiser. We must fight, or fizzle out. Snowden, Ramsay Macdonald, and men of that kind are foolish and dangerous counsellors. Their methods, if successful, would mean that Pacifism—the true Pacifism—is dead for ever, and we should be compelled to deify the sword and applaud the philosophy which condones rape, murder, burglary, and all the vile dogmas of Berlin.

And yet our instructors never took up that line.

(Continued on page 271.)

AN AWKWARD PREDICAMENT.

By S. W. King.

I.

'OH Lord! it's too jolly hot for anything!' The remark came from Second Lieutenant Antony Seaforth, who was orderly-officer for the day.

He made it aloud, though, save for himself, the 'mess' was empty. Orderly-officers, you must know, are lonely folk at the best of times. Nobody talks to them. Everybody pities them. For the time being they are outcasts, asking nothing at the hands of their luckier brethren, and getting what they ask. Consequently an orderly 'dog' is sometimes driven to utter his thoughts out aloud, if only to make sure he has not lost the power of speech. Hence the remark with which this story opens.

Nevertheless, Tony Seaforth was not unhappy. Far from it. He was reclining on an easy-chair, with his coat off and a 'bull's-eye' in his mouth. A large glass, half-full of beer, stood on a table within easy reach of his right hand; and in his left hand he held a novel by George A. Birmingham, entitled Spanish Gold.

Further, he was not likely to be disturbed, as almost the whole battalion had gone on a route-march, and would not be back till lunch-time. The small hand of the clock in the mess pointed to eleven; the big hand was at twelve.

So that, all things considered, our hero had very little to grumble about except the weather, which, by the way, was almost as hot as he said it was. Still, against that one small discomfort he could set his beer, his shirt-sleeves, a comfortable chair, and an amusing story.

Soon he grew drowsy, put his novel down on the table, finished his beer, and closed his eyes. In fact, he fell asleep.

Now, to go to sleep in the mess is, as everybody knows, the unforgivable sin. It is worse, for example, than spitting on the floor. Tony Seaforth knew that well. But he also knew, or thought he knew, that there was no likelihood of his crime ever being discovered. In this, however, he was wrong, as my story will show.

His gentle slumber was rudely disturbed by the sound of a voice. Here let me explain that our mess consists of one long room divided into two parts by curtains slung on a steel bar. Our hero was in the part known as the anteroom. The voice that roused him came from the messroom proper, which lay to the other side of the curtains.

In a moment Tony was on his feet; in another he had crawled—with the bag of 'bull's-eyes'—under a small sofa which stood beside his easy-chair. He had recognised the voice. It was the general's. Now, Tony did not like the general.

I decline to describe the feelings uppermost in the young man's breast as he lay on his back under the sofa. I could describe them; but I won't. Any soldier who has been in the firing-line knows exactly what they were—just as anybody who has ever been a second lieutenant can tell you why Tony did not like the general.

Presently the curtains parted, and the general strode into the room, followed by a lady. From his lowly position Tony could just see a pair of top-boots and a portion of a skirt. He wondered who the general's companion could be. But he was not left long in doubt.

'Hubert,' said the lady, walking over to the easy-chair and picking something out of it, 'can you tell me what this coat is doing here?'

At the first sound of that voice Tony started violently. I do not blame him in the least. You would start violently if your aunt, who lived three hundred miles away, suddenly appeared in your mess without any warning. Particularly if she called your general 'Hubert.' And that, as you know, is what Tony's aunt Mary did.

The general replied he had no idea what the coat was doing there, and then softly invited Aunt Mary to sit down on the sofa.

Now, Aunt Mary was thirty-five, extremely good-looking, and a widow. So that, when the general came and sat down beside her, right over Tony's head, that youth, instead of being terrified at the close proximity of a certain pair of top-boots, smiled a cruel smile and set himself deliberately to listen.

II.

'Tell me, Mary,' began the general in low tones, 'what lucky chance brought you down here? Do you realise that this is the first time I have seen you for sixteen years?'

Mary blushed. Tony asked me afterwards how did I know she blushed. I pointed out coldly that whether she blushed or not was no concern of his, as he was not writing the story.

Mary blushed. 'Oh,' she said carelessly, 'I got an invitation from a friend to come and stay with her. So I came. I purposely did not tell my nephew of my visit, as I wished to give him a surprise.'

The general raised his eyebrows inquiringly. 'Your nephew?' he said.

'Yes. Don't you know that my nephew, Antony Seaforth, is in the Bumffshires?'

Tony grinned. 'I rather think he does know, thank you, aunt,' he said under his breath.

'Antony Seaforth!' exclaimed the general. 'I did not understand he was your nephew. Yes,' he continued, 'I know the lad. Rather a scapegrace, isn't he?'

The scapegrace ground his teeth, and waited anxiously for his aunt's reply.

'Oh no, Hubert!' it came protestingly. 'I don't think so at all. Tony is a nice lad. I am really very fond of him.'

'That's one in the neck for you, you old bully,' chuckled the 'nice lad' silently.

'Well, well, Mary, I have no doubt you are right,' said the general impatiently. 'We won't discuss the boy any further. I want to talk about old times,' he added, a new note in his voice.

'Oh, please, Hubert, not that! Anything but that!' came Aunt Mary's voice imploringly. 'I don't like even to think of old times.'

'But I do,' said the general in what seemed to Tony a bullying tone. 'One day,' he continued, 'sixteen years ago, you told me you loved me. Then why did you marry Captain Carruthers? Did you like him better?'

'No, Hubert.'

Tony could only just hear the low response.

'Then why did you marry him?'

'Oh, Hubert, I was only a girl of nineteen, and a very foolish one. I allowed myself to be carried away by Jack's pleading. He seemed to me so strong and masterful, and you'—the sweet voice trembled—'you were always so quiet and gentle.'

The eavesdropper started. 'Good Lord!' he said to himself; 'fancy calling that loud-voiced, overbearing tyrant "quiet and gentle"!'

'Is that the only reason why you would not marry me?' asked the general quietly. 'You don't care to answer,' he continued gently, as his companion remained silent. 'Then may I tell you why you would not marry me?'

'No, no, please, Hubert, no!' was the anguished reply. 'Oh, if you ever loved me, please don't say any more!'

'I have loved you for sixteen years. I love you now. That is why I feel I must speak.'

There was a ring of manly sincerity in the general's voice which Tony rather liked. But what amazed him was its wonderful gentleness.

'You married Captain Carruthers,' the general went on slowly, 'because you thought I was a coward.'

Tony imagined he heard a stifled sob.

'Do not think,' the gentle voice continued, 'I ever blamed you for the thought. You were very young—only a child—and you worshipped bravery. You heard Carruthers match his horse against mine over a two-mile course. He asked if he might make your hand the stakes. You looked at me, hesitated, and then agreed.'

He paused for a moment. Tony was so intensely interested that he had quite forgotten he was under the sofa.

'As long as I live,' the general went on, 'I shall not forget the look you gave me when I declined the match. Carruthers, you will remember, laughed at me, taunted me, even accused me of being afraid. But I would not ride.'

He hesitated and looked at his companion. 'I think, dear, that is all,' he added. 'Forty-eight hours afterwards you were his wife.'

Aunt Mary said nothing. She was crying softly. Tony, listening to her, found he could no longer suck his 'bull's-eye' with comfort because of a queer lump which had suddenly risen in his throat.

He was now really sorry for both the general and his aunt Mary, and he disliked intensely having to play the part of eavesdropper any longer. He was about to leave his hiding-place and face the consequences, when the general's voice speaking again stopped him.

'Ah, my dear, my dear,' it came—and Tony noticed how strangely husky the voice was—'my life without you has been a lonely one. I have often thought since that I made a mistake in not accepting Carruthers's challenge. But at the time I felt I could not do it. The idea of riding a race with you as the stakes was utterly abhorrent to me. I just wanted you to come to me of your own free-will—or not at all. Do you understand, Mary dear?' He looked wistfully at the bowed head.

Mary suddenly stopped crying and looked up. 'Understand?' she said quietly. 'Yes, Hubert, I understand. I understand that one day sixteen years ago I threw away a noble man's love. I understand that on that same day I allowed myself to listen to a suggestion which a true woman would have scorned, and to agree to it. I understand that I married a man I did not love, and sent the man I loved away without even a word of explanation. But,' she added in the same quiet tones, 'I have suffered for it.'

There was a long silence. Tony was quite relieved when the general broke it.

'I am getting an old man now, Mary,' he began sadly. 'I am fifty-one. You are only thirty-five—sixteen years younger. Sixteen years is a long stretch, dear,' he continued; 'but if you would care to come to me, then'—he hesitated—'why, then,' he added simply, 'I shall thank God every day of my life for His great goodness to me. Will you marry me, Mary?' he asked suddenly, longingly. 'I want you so badly.'

Mary blushed a lovely red. She hesitated.

'She's surely not going to refuse him,' said Tony to himself in real alarm. 'If she does,' he added decisively, 'I have done with her.'

Then Mary spoke. 'Do you really want me, Hubert?' she asked wonderingly.

'Silly fool,' breathed the anxious Tony; 'didn't he tell you he does?'

'I never wanted anything so much in my life,' said the general decidedly, as he moved nearer to her.

'Then, of course, dear, I'll marry you. I love you,' she added simply.

To a certain pair of ears which were anxiously awaiting it, there came the unmistakable sound of a kiss. Their owner breathed a sigh of relief. 'At any rate, they're all right,' he said to himself. 'Now, thank goodness, I expect they'll soon go,' he added contentedly.

III.

Tony's assumption was quite correct. The idea underlying the assumption was all wrong. As a matter of fact they did go soon; but—well, finish reading the story, and you will see.

'Don't you think, Hubert,' came in Aunt Mary's voice a few minutes later, 'we might have another window open? It's so very hot in here.'

'That's a good notion of yours, Mary,' said the general joyfully, as he hastened to put it into action.

Tony mentally reflected that any notion, so long as it happened to be Mary's, would naturally be good to the general. For his own part, he also admitted the notion was a good one, though for vastly different reasons. He was nearly suffocated. Besides, it was twenty minutes to one by his wrist-watch, and lunch was at one o'clock. That was to say, he told himself, that in twenty minutes, or possibly less, the route-march would be over, and the room in which he was now a prisoner would be chock-a-block with all sorts and degrees of hungry men waiting impatiently for the gong to sound. 'And if you're not out of here before the C.O. gets back,' he said, addressing himself sternly, 'then, Antony Seaforth, you will most certainly be court-martialled.'

Having duly opened the window, the general returned to Aunt Mary, a broad smile of pleasure on his face.

He was about to resume his seat beside her, when his left foot suddenly, and of its own accord, shot from under him, and he came down on the sofa in great haste and with considerable force.

Underneath, the sofa was in bad repair. Tony ought to know, and he says it was one vast hole. Accordingly, when attacked so violently by the general, the outraged piece of furniture at once avenged itself by indignantly raining dust and horse-hair straight down on Tony's face. The dust got into his nose and eyes; little bits of horse-hair made their way between his lips or nestled confidingly in his ears; and, to complete his troubles, the 'bull's-eye' he was sucking, endeavouring to slip unnoticed down his throat, in its hurry chose the wrong passage, and got stuck.

Caught in 'the fell clutch of circumstance,' poor Tony coughed and sneezed at one and the same time.

The cough at once cleared his throat of the 'bull's-eye.' But it also alarmed Aunt Mary, who bounded from the sofa. 'Good gracious, Hubert!' she exclaimed in trepidation; 'whatever is that queer noise?'

The general had risen from his seat almost simultaneously with Aunt Mary. He was no longer the lover, but the cool and level-headed man of action. Also, he had an 'idea,' and that 'idea' was closely connected with the coat which Aunt Mary, on her entrance, had picked up out of Tony's easy-chair. 'Don't be alarmed, Mary,' he said confidently, as he seized her umbrella by the handle. 'We'll soon see what the noise is.'

Then, stooping down, he viciously thrust the point of the umbrella underneath the sofa. It came in contact with something soft and yielding; whereupon the general smiled. To make sure there could be no mistake, he again and again repeated the jabbing process, each time with a similar result. Then, either satisfied or because he had no breath left, he stopped and withdrew the umbrella. 'You may come out now,' he said.

One side of his body aching with pain, the wretched Tony crawled abjectly out, and slowly rose to his feet.

Now, the rest of what happened during the interview which followed between Tony on the one side, and the general and his aunt on the other, and the things that his aunt said, and the things the general did not say, and the money which Tony received both from the one and from the other of them, are they not written in the Book of the Mind of Tony?

And Second Lieutenant Antony Seaforth slept without a care that night, and the next day a new orderly-officer reigned in his stead.

A FOREST THOUGHT.

In the green woods I lie at ease to-day,
A pigmy here where giant oak and beech
In lordly silence commune each with each,
While feathered fronds of bracken lightly sway.
The wide, embracing boughs hold Time in thrall;
Their benediction fain would compass Fate.
Yet they for some grand consummation wait,
Some voice to answer life's insistent call.

So gropes the soul through shadowed circumstance,
Upreaching towards the Light: calm, unafraid.
The great trees' lower branches are in shade;
But see, above, how bright the sun-rays glance—
How vast the arch of heaven limitless,
Where the immortal Presence broods to bless!

CONSTANCE FARMAR.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE HEART OF THINGS.

By Henry Leach.

London, Yesterday.

WHO are the Bolsheviks, and what do they desire? There is perhaps not a question of the day of more importance to the life of the world and to each of us than this of the existence, the aims, the methods, and the prospects of these Bolsheviks of Russia who, from the small beginning of a revolution against the revolution in their own country, are spreading their evil influence in all places. Here in the British Isles, in France, in Spain and Portugal, the agents of Bolshevism have been found at work, and making no great failure of their efforts. They have appeared in the United States, and the discovery has shocked the Americans. Agents of the Bolsheviks are everywhere in South America. Find an island with a small population almost isolated from the rest of the world, and there somewhere, disguised as a simple islander, perhaps, will be a Bolshevik, seeking his opportunity to distil his poison in the minds of those about him, stirring them to revolt against the world as they find it. Now, is not this ubiquity, this universality, of the new movement an amazing thing? It is so remarkable that, in no manner of impiety, it has been said that this is the most spreading social movement in the world since the advent of Christianity. In such a comparison, startling at the first thought, there is, of course, no reference to the ethical merits of these movements; only to their wide extension and their grip of peoples. They are very different things. It has been remarked of Christianity that it was a story that transformed the world, a beautiful story that for all time will exercise an influence upon the minds of men. But when Christianity began, the world was but slightly equipped in what we may call conveniences and communications, and it was long before that story spread and became the universal force we know. Bolshevism is produced at a time when those enjoying a vast abundance of conveniences and communications seem suddenly, through science, to have made a grab at the inner and more precious secrets of nature, and to have snatched before their maturity some that were being prepared for future ages. People murmur that such rashness and foolish, greedy impatience must surely be accounted for. Consider that the real practical application of electricity—as in the electric light, the telephone, and things like that which seem so indispensable now—has come within the lifetime of many of us. Go back forty or fifty years and see how amazingly elementary the system of life, as then conducted, appears to us now. If you examine broadly the extent of invention and discovery, and their adaptation to the methods of life since then, especially in the last ten years, you will perceive that in this period humanity has been involved in a veritable fury of what it calls progress, directed chiefly to manufacture, movement, and destruction, culminating in a gorgeous and extremely vulgar exhibition of them all in a four years' war. The developments of science, discovery, and invention accruing from this new curiosity have exceeded all by which they were preceded. Through thousands and thousands of generations mankind has been struggling in some vague, blind way, impelled by forces beyond itself, for advancement in pursuance of that tremendous scheme of the Creator which we cannot grasp. It seems man must have stood almost actionless for ages, since his means of transport and communication remained so simple. Anyhow, we have the fact that in these matters and others of science—electricity and the like—we have made more advance in fifty years than was made by our predecessors in a hundred thousand. Of course, one may be told that during all that period of slow progress the foundations of intelligence, society, commerce, and everything else were being laid, and that when they were ready the great push in science was made; but such an argument does not satisfy. Such points as these are directly associated, as we shall see, with first considerations and inquiries upon Bolsheviks.

* * *

It seems an incredible thing that Bolshevism, even upon an assumption that there may be some good in it, should so rapidly gain a footing nearly all over the world. In a couple of years it has done far more than the great religious movements could accomplish in centuries. Still more incomprehensible is it that its prospects as a dominating world-force should need to be seriously considered; that the Great Powers in all their military might, after scorning the

 [All Rights Reserved.]

Bolsheviks and waiting for their self-extermination, should consent to invite them to a conversation upon an island in the Sea of Marmora; that one German industrial magnate, Hugo Stinnes, looking into that difficult future which faces his country now, should say with truth, 'If Bolshevism extends, it will mean the ruin of the whole world;' or that another, Rathenau, director of a great electrical concern, should murmur, 'The danger comes from the North; it is Bolshevism. It is impossible to settle any question—Poland, the Czechs, or the Balkans—without taking into consideration this formidable situation. The Entente believe they can stop Bolshevism by Poland and a weakened Germany. It is a dangerous illusion. The active solidarity of all nations against the common peril can alone save the world.' There is nobody—in Britain any more than elsewhere—to deny the power and the truth of this suggestion. And this is the state of a movement that people in general had never heard of only two years ago, threatening now to overturn the human order, smash the social structure as it is known, and start life afresh. It is remarkable. However much we disbelieve in this movement, regard it as a canker and a pestilence, it seems somehow that there must be a great force behind it, even beyond that of the men who are leading it and using it. But perhaps it should not be surprising. If in fifty years, or even twenty, we could do more in revolutionising systems of life than in hundreds of thousands before, why should not movements like this also spread much faster than the movements of old, communications of every description having been much advanced? We have become accustomed to speed; whatever is done in the future must be done quickly. Then these are clearly the days of violent transformations. That which marks a direct and absolute change from the old order seems to begin with a good recommendation. Four years of destruction, four years of the ruthless employment for evil purposes of all those great secrets taken from Nature, four years of the dethronement of kings and overturning of constitutions, have given peoples a taste for strong things in the way of changes; the milk-and-water of parish council bills will no longer suit them. Faster movement is wanted. On the other hand, the world has clearly lived too hastily in recent years. Its morals, its ethics, its conceptions and practices have not by any means kept pace with its discoveries. It has been grabbing at the future, and by luck and ingenuity has somehow become possessed of means and instruments from the secret store which it is not old enough to handle, is not fit to own, any more than an infant is qualified to play with a loaded gun. Despite the seeming atavism of late, the spirit of the human race must be progressing, or else the whole scheme of nature is a mere negation—which would be absurd—and in time, perhaps another half million years ahead, the thoughts, feelings, desires, conceptions of people will be such that they would no more think of using their latest scientific discoveries (immeasurably more advanced than ours—think of the new world that radium is opening!) for their mutual destruction than we now, so much inferior mentally and spiritually, would think of dining upon each other in the manner of common cannibals. Now, if those future folk have any record of us and our war they may consider us as people who discovered too much, more than was good for us, and, losing our heads completely, misapplied it. They will not be able to understand by any other explanation than that of our having been in a delirium how we could behave in this manner and with so little reason.

* * *

Bolshevism, as we know it, see it, feel it in 1919, is a mean, ugly, contemptible thing, in which there is surely no good for the peoples of the world, now or in the future. But in an abstract and unpractised principle of Bolshevism there is something of a fair ideal. That was what it might have been, a movement for the complete emancipation of man—his social, industrial, economical, and intellectual independence, one that would afford him the greatest possibilities in life, the greatest efforts, the greatest rewards, and would institute a régime of perfect honesty, sincerity, and absolute fairness in every direction. But evidently man will have to live and work, progress and evolve, fight and die, and fight again for thousands and thousands of years ere he will have advanced spiritually so far that he can apply any such doctrines and ideas to his own case with safety and advantage. He is hopelessly unequipped at the present time. It is said that Bolshevism is anarchy, and so stands for ruin. It is certainly anarchy, and, as applied at present, would cause worse than ruin if successful. The world is not old enough for anarchy or anything belonging to it yet, for even in the main principle of anarchy there is an ideal of some quality involved—the state of perfect self-development, with full self-control and independence in accordance. In a million years it may be applied. Bolshevism is a form of anarchy, and, even if conducted by honest men, idealists, it could find no place in a world that is only beginning to try a little Socialism, and is blundering badly even with that. In Socialism there is a fine ideal which practically every man of sense and feeling would accept, but not in the way that some of its advocates would apply it. So it is with Bolshevism, sometimes called Revolutionary Socialism, which proposes to take a short cut to its own millennium, and, instead of moving along by steps both short and slow, seeks to snatch sharply at the supreme result anticipated. Therefore it would overturn monarchies, constitutions, capitalists, the present systems of organisation of the State, industries, society, and all the rest, and start afresh on a basis of individual enjoyment, in full measure, of all the products of work and the world. And it would achieve it by force, tyranny, robbery, and slaughter. All men should be equal in labour, in remuneration, and enjoyment. This is not Socialism; it is not even Syndicalism; it is that which is beyond even the latter, and stands for the maximum hope or desire of those who would overthrow the existing system of things and begin this new millennium of all-round equality and happiness. That man, Karl Marx, whose centenary was celebrated only last year, was a forerunner in this kind of thing; but the Bolshevists go further than he did, though much of his teaching is as the basis of their own abstract principles, very abstract and utterly disregarded. These Bolshevists, then, are Maximalists, the most advanced of all. But alas! Lenin and Trotsky —the sublimer faith is not for them; their hearts are far away, with greed, tyranny, despotism, selfishness, insincerity, and every human disqualification in their company. Their Bolshevism is merely destructive; they have no constructive programme. These Russian leaders know how to exploit the weaknesses and the stupidities, the simplicities and the trust, of the proletarian mass. They have done it enormously for their own advantage so far, and having placed their agents everywhere, they have a vision of obtaining such an empire for themselves, such a world dictatorship, as was far beyond the dreams of any other tyrant. Keen exploiters, they start unfortunately with one great argument in their favour, of which the civilisation of the time, the people of our modern governmental systems, in all their stupidity, their insincerity, and their political mischief-making and bungling, have made them a present. The world, meaning our social and governmental systems, has really asked for Bolshevism, and must not complain that, at the present moment, which seemed indicated for it, it has come. Bolshevism pretends it would destroy those systems and start afresh with something new, upon original foundations, and not something that has been a slow building-up and patching, on a basis of rule which is contrary to much modern thought and ideas of freedom; and when Bolshevism proposes to destroy the system, it asks what there is in that system's record, particularly its recent record, that entitles it to consideration. The evolution of government through all the ages has come to such a pass of domestic and international intrigue, secret diplomacy, secret treaties, super-Machiavellian tactics in all matters of State, that it has culminated in the most ghastly war that the world has known, a repetition of which some years hence might conceivably destroy humanity itself. 'There you are,' the Bolshevists say, or seem to say. 'There are the fruits of your modern system! This is what you work for! And it is not a mere matter of kings, as some of you seem to think. It is the bourgeoisie as much as the others, or more. The bourgeoisie is hateful, insincere, decayed, corrupt. There is no health in it. Your bourgeoisie and its capitalists, in all their selfishness, their cupidity, their wickedness, have caused this war. There is your modern system! You do not like it? Then away with it and everything belonging to it! We will start afresh from the beginning.' The bourgeoisie, indeed, has placed this strong card in the hands of the Bolsheviks, and the latter in their game of gulling are making the most of it. For the bourgeoisie—that controlling class which is not of kingly origin, but the richer, more capitalistic, more authoritative and governmental of what we may call the common people—the Bolsheviks, and indeed most fairly advanced Socialists, have the supremest contempt. It is the bourgeoisie, those who are beyond the democrats but below the nobles, who, with all their insincerity, as the Bolsheviks see them, are responsible for most of the world's blunders and sufferings in modern times. So the Bolsheviks would finish them all. If there was thus a Bolshevik movement of any kind to be started anywhere, clearly Russia, a great country with infinite possibilities, where the people were starved under the worst of autocracies, was the place for it to be started. It was the natural birthplace of Bolshevism. And there Bolshevism rose long before the war, but moderately then. The fires of the European conflict heated it to whiteness.

* * *

See how Bolshevism began. Russia was slow to come by any sort of Socialism; the people were a backward lot, for all their sorrows, and there were difficulties. Yet Russia was the first to make its attempt to govern a European country on extreme Socialist principles. Some twenty or thirty years ago what were called soyuzy borbi, or fighting unions, were formed in various Russian cities, not by the workpeople, who knew nothing of the Socialist idea, and perhaps, bearing their burden meekly, thought less, but by the students and the intellectuals, who regarded this at first rather from the ethical standpoint more as a matter of high politics than as one of necessity, of life. The soyuzy borbi, however, set out to teach the workmen, encouraged them to demand higher wages, and supported them in their struggles. That was the beginning. Lenin seemed to come forward a little less than twenty years ago, when the first militant Socialist organisation was established. Lenin! His influence has been a sad one for the world; he is surely the most evil genius that a proletariat has followed; but, that granted, it is no less certain that he is a man of most extraordinary force of character, of indomitable will, one of the strong men of the age. Right away back at that time when Europe was in peace and the only war in the world was that with which Britain was engaged in South Africa, a war which Russia hardly heard about, Lenin began his effort. A man of arresting appearance he was. Prematurely bald, they said, those who met him then or soon afterwards when he passed into exile—not to return until the Russian Revolution was established—the few hairs on his head were arranged in their special places with a keen proprietorial care. His face was somewhat rubicund, his nose a little blunt, his eyes small but piercing and suggestive of great determination and fixity of purpose, and his mouth was strongly set. He had a moustache, and a bit of a reddish beard on the chin only. Some said in France that he had the appearance of a country lawyer in the time of the Second Empire. Yet he seemed to be of good birth and had nice manners. They say that in the long years of exile that followed after 1905 he became in some ways much coarser, and that the pure intellect and force that he possessed in his first period in Russia became transformed into a kind of frenzy, that those little eyes burned with a sort of madness, that his enthusiasms had mastered and transformed him, that he had passed beyond reason. Such was a definite impression. Lenin and an associate, Martov, began their serious work in 1900, when they started a little Socialist newspaper in Switzerland, which they called the Iskra, the Russian word for 'Spark.' They had to prepare it in Switzerland because such a thing could not be done in Russia, and it was then circulated by various means among those whom it concerned. There were daring men associated with this enterprise, and they ran risks in smuggling the sheet into 'Holy Russia,' the land of the Czar, the 'Little Father,' whom all the people were supposed to love, according to the nonsense that used to be written. The object of the paper was to set Socialism at work in Russia as a definite organisation; it told the people that there was no happiness for them until they had seized the reins of government.

* * *

Lenin began as he meant to go on, and as he is acting now, in the way of the dictator. The simple Socialist and others preach equality and so forth, but some of the chief ideals of democracy fitted not well with the view of Lenin as to how Russia might be taken—and afterwards who knew what? He had his own ideas on the establishment of Socialism; and the chief one was that it should be done through autocracy and blood. 'See,' says he to-day, 'where now is the Socialist or the anarchist who dares to say that you can achieve Socialism without civil war? He would have lost his reason. Look through the entire literature of all the more or less responsible Socialistic parties, factions and groups, and you will find no responsible and earnest Socialist writing such nonsense as that Socialism can ever come in otherwise than by civil war, and that the landowners and the capitalists will relinquish their privileges. It would be a degree of simplicity bordering on imbecility.' Along with this principle went that of the necessity of dictatorship. The new Socialist organisation (secret as it was) that gradually came to life in Russia as the result of those 'sparks' which set the people thinking and then acting had few of the ways of democracy about it. It seemed to be the principle that there should not be democratic control of the committees by the general body, but dictatorship of the secret committees over the masses. They had to fight soon for their autocracy; and, strange to say, the first struggle for their principle engaged in by those autocrats was made in London sixteen years ago, and it was then that the Bolsheviks came out definitely as a party in opposition to others. The new Russian Socialists, being unable to hold a conference in Russia, held it in London, and the Bolsheviks strove, and successfully, having the majority, for the dictatorship of the party organisation; while another section, the Mensheviks, were for more democratic methods that would admit the workmen to an equality with the intellectual leaders of the party. 'No,' said the Bolsheviks; 'the extreme revolutionary character of the party must be preserved, and, if necessary, all democracy must be sacrificed for it.' What a whirligig! Here was inconsistency, if you like. To Socialism and the most perfect democracy through dictatorship of the most ruthless kind! It seemed a hard way. But Lenin was a hard man. He knew his mind, and he cared no more for the sacrifice of men than did Kaiser William. About a year ago he made an official report to his executive committee in which he said that it would be the greatest folly and the most stupid Utopianism to imagine that the transition from capitalism to Socialism is possible without compulsion and without dictatorship. He said that the Marxian theory had long ago and in the most definite way taken a stand against such petty bourgeois-democratic and anarchistic nonsense. The Russia of the present time, he said, had confirmed that Marxian theory so plainly, passionately, and impressively that only men who were hopelessly stupid or firmly determined to shut their eyes to the truth could any longer be mistaken in the matter. The conquest and abolition of capitalism could only be brought about by ruthlessly overcoming the opposition of the exploiters. Every great revolution, and especially the Socialist revolution, was unthinkable, he said, without an internal war—that is, civil war—which implied even greater disorder than external war. During the revolutionary disturbances of 1905 the Bolsheviks made their intentions very clear. The Mensheviks were for moderate measures, urging that Russia was a backward country, and could not leap all at once from a feudal autocracy to a Socialist Republic, but must approach the goal by degrees. The Bolsheviks, however, said that they would not have a mere political revolution in Russia, but would lead the way to a general social revolution throughout Europe and perhaps the world. The effort of 1905 having failed, they set to work upon a scheme for a new rising. Theirs was an illegal movement, and they had to work in secret in Russia. Their leaders went abroad and organised from there. Lenin was the chief; he has always been that. He was the founder of the Bolsheviks, and their dictator from the first day. That was the beginning of Bolshevism. Later we may consider some other points about it.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE rain was still falling with sodden persistence. Few foot-passengers were to be seen, and these were all hurrying to their destinations. I looked up and down the street, and saw, plainly enough, the backs of the four men about thirty yards away on my left. The two ringleaders were in front under an umbrella, the other men a couple of yards behind, arm-in-arm, with their coat-collars turned up. All were walking fairly quickly, and none of them gave so much as a glance behind. They held on their way to the junction of Old Compton Street and Wardour Street, where they slowed down to a saunter. Next moment I heard the honk! honk! of a motor-car behind me. It passed, slowed down, and drew up abreast of them. With a word to the chauffeur, my acquaintance of the Naples train opened the door. The other three men got in. He raised his hat in a farewell salute, and the car started, leaving him on the kerb.

He tossed his cigarette into the street, settled his umbrella well down to his broad shoulders, and set out at a brisk pace. I followed him. From Piccadilly Circus he went down the Haymarket, and thence, viâ Cockspur Street, steered down the west side of Whitehall. It was easy to follow the big figure with its light waterproof, but I was wary, and did not come too near him. Unsuspecting, he never once looked round, nor did he slacken his steady pace until he came to Parliament Street, where he hesitated for a moment or two, and then bore to his right through some side-streets. In one of them a restaurant-by-day—pub.-by-night threw a cheerful patch of light on the steaming pavement. Near it he slowed down, looked at his watch, and then disappeared through its red-curtained swing-door. I took shelter on the other side of the street, well in the shadow, in a doorway which commanded a view of the house. There I lit a pipe and composed myself to wait, pluming myself on my great luck in having run across and shadowed my man.

The weather was of the kind that clears the streets of humanity, other than cabmen and policemen in oilskins or derelicts without them. My collar was sodden; I was cold and uncomfortable; but in the doorway I was out of the rain, and I made the best of it, for if I could track my man to his lair, there would be little difficulty in interesting Scotland Yard. From a passer-by I learned that I was in York Street, Westminster. Half-an-hour passed. The red-curtained door often opened and closed, but there was no sign of the rascal's burly frame. Another half-hour crawled by. By this time I was chilled to the bone, but I was resolved not to lose trace of him, and at last my patience was rewarded. The Westminster chimes heralded the hour. Big Ben boomed ten o'clock, followed by a great chorus of lesser voices. The mellow vibration from their deep throats had scarcely died away when the swing-door opened and my man appeared, lurching slightly as he stepped into the wet street. Excellent! I thought. It was plain that he had been at the bottle, and if the visit to the bar had blunted his wits, so much the better. It was now a hundred to one that I should be able to mark him down.

Keeping my side of the street in the shadow of the towering bulk of Queen Anne's Mansions, I followed him. Every dozen yards or so he would sway a little, then pull himself together and start off again with the ludicrous erectness that often labels the half-drunk. Once, undecided as to his bearings, he stood for a long minute in owlish meditation. Then, apparently having made up the remains of his mind, he lurched off again, going straight on until he came to a narrow, ill-lit court on his left, into which he turned. Quickening my pace to avoid losing sight of him, I had just arrived at the junction of the street with the court, when I caught sight of him standing near a lamp-post, unsteadily trying to light a cigar. I turned abruptly, and nearly collided with a couple of men who suddenly appeared out of nowhere. A hoarse voice said, 'Beg pardon, guv'nor!' The hum of a motor-car sounded near. A swift sense of danger clutched me, but before I could draw another breath I got a most workman-like, sledge-hammer blow on the point of my chin. A confused impression of being lifted like a baby, of blurred faces round me, the slam of a door, and then a horrible feeling of sinking into a fathomless black depth are all that I remember.

How long elapsed before my senses began to creep back I cannot tell. The first thing I was conscious of was a steady and continuous humming in my ears. Also, there was a fierce eye glaring into mine. It was large and unblinking, and I could not get away from it. My dazed wits were groping round the staring eye and wondering what it was, when a voice, sounding thin and far away, said, 'Drink,' and I felt a flask held to my mouth. I swallowed some good brandy and came to myself with a gasp. The steady hum was explained. I was in a motor-car; the fierce eye was an electric light above me; and I was lying on my back on the floor. Presently an arm was put in mine and helped me to a seat, where I blinked for a minute, feeling very queer and dizzy. Sitting opposite to me was the man whom I had just been following, and beside him the two underlings.

'You are better, I hope, Signor Forbes?' he said. The sound of his suave bass voice and the sight of his carved grin filled me with nausea and anger, which must have been reflected in my face, for next instant I was looking into the barrel of a revolver.

'You must not raise your voice, unless you do not wish to see daylight again.'

His own voice was not raised. It was pitched in an ordinary conversational tone, but the little black sparks of his eyes watched my every movement.

'Nor need you ask any questions,' he went on. 'These and their answers will come in good time. Meanwhile, be assured that no harm will befall you now or in the future if you are a sensible man. We know you are unarmed. We took the liberty of searching you. You agree to refrain from raising your voice?'

I nodded. I was a little tired of the revolver-muzzle near me; but although I was still half-dazed, every minute was pulling me together.

Gradually I pieced together the events of the evening. Was this the man whom I had last seen come out of the York Street bar and lurch along the street? His eyes and his voice were clear. His hand was uncomfortably steady—the revolver had not wavered a hair's-breadth. There was no doubt about the scoundrel's alertness and sobriety. Not a trace, not a whiff, of alcohol from him suggested the opposite. Ruefully, I recognised that I was no match for him in cunning. I had been cleverly trapped. From the moment I had faced him in the restaurant he had planned my capture. His drunkenness was a ruse. He had counted on my following him, and I, the shadower, had been shadowed.

'You have a mobile countenance, signore,' he purred as he lowered the revolver and shook a fat finger playfully at me. 'It betrays self-reproach. I detect more than a little chagrin in it. In fact, I suspect you are in a towering rage.'

'What is the meaning of this outrage?' I tried to speak resolutely, but my voice was weak and quavering. The men's faces spun round me, and I felt uncomfortably like fainting.

'Gently! Gently! Compose yourself, Signor Forbes. You are not fit to talk, as yet,' said the smooth voice.

He watched me for a few minutes until I showed signs of recovery.

'You have invited attention to yourself, which you no doubt resent,' he continued in his oily, rich bass. 'But consider! Having tried, unsuccessfully, to inveigle a peaceful citizen' (this with a complacent grin) 'in conversation, you watched him in the "Bon Goût," and followed him, not, perhaps, with intelligence, but with a certain wooden persistence. The peaceful citizen, however, regarded this as a liberty, and, while you were shivering in the rain, arranged that you should have the opportunity of offering him, in the strictest privacy, a full explanation of your conduct.'

'Was it necessary for this that I should be knocked senseless and kidnapped?'

'Perhaps not necessary, in the strict sense,' he said, inclining his big head judicially. 'No, I prefer to call it prudent. Yes! Prudent is the word. My dear sir, what would you have done in the circumstances? I confess the poetic justice of the situation appeals to me.' He chuckled softly. 'Come! I am no sour dullard, as I hope you may discover. We can set you down in comfort near your own home, if you convince us that you are a man willing to listen to reason.'

His voice and eternal smile could not hide something ruthless in his every fibre. Notwithstanding his bland and easy manner, I felt that he had about as much conscience as a rattlesnake. In the Naples train he had passed for an agreeable, garrulous, chance acquaintance. Now his face was hateful. I was almost glad of the other men's presence. To have been alone with this smooth creature would have been like sharing the cage of a watchful reptile.

I found my tongue once more. 'Where are you taking me? I warn you that you shall pay for this.'

'A little trip to the country is proposed. You may suffer inconvenience, the precise amount of which depends, as I hinted to you, on the sense of justice you possess.'

'Justice!'

'On your common-sense, then,' he went on with a shrug. 'As for my paying for the disorganisation of your affairs, I hope this will be adjusted between us in a little "give-and-take," like sensible men. Permit me, however, to suggest that I cannot enter further on a discussion, however interesting, in the presence of my subordinates. You will be acting wisely if you compose yourself and, meanwhile, keep silent.'

The man's assurance, the leisurely boom of his veneered phrases, and his crafty grin fairly goaded me into losing my temper. I stormed at him, telling him that he and his gang were known, and that my friends would speedily run them to earth. I called him names until I was tired, and the futility of it choked me; but the only reply he vouchsafed was to switch off the electric light. There he sat in silence, his face in the shadowy corner looking like some evil heathen god's.

(Continued on page 279.)

THE WAR-BALL.

By Bart Kennedy.

FOR a part of a second it was poised high in the air. The players were watching it. Then it began to come down. The tension that was upon the spectators and the players was such that parts of seconds were as seconds. The ball seemed to fall slowly.

It was down now on the field, and the players were upon it. No, they were not players. They were fighters—fighters as truly as if they were engaged in a life-and-death struggle. This big, elliptical ball! They were fighting for all that was in them for the mastery of it, side against side, fifteen against fifteen. Thirty fine, hard young men were struggling together upon this playing-field. They were fitting themselves to enter the dread world-struggle wherein the referee was the grisly figure of Death.

This elliptical ball was a symbol of the world itself—the world for the mastery of which vast armies were now fighting. The ball was a symbol of life's eternal struggle. The symbol of fighting, of change, which is the condition of the existence of life itself.

'Well played! Well played! School-house! School-house!'

These cries were ringing out over the field from those who were watching, and who were as much in the fight as the actual players. The air was electric with excitement. Every one was thrilled with the glorious contest.

'Day boys! Day boys! School-house! School-house!'

'Day boys! Day boys! School-house! School-house!'

Up again in the air was the ball. It sailed and sailed, spinning on its axis, on and on, as a world going through space. Evans had propelled it with a mighty drop-kick from the twenty-five line. On and on it went, spinning. And it passed in its flight over the cross-bars.

'Well kicked, sir! Well kicked, sir!'

Moments passed of a rushing and a struggling that were too quick for the eye to follow in detail. Outwardly it seemed but as a confusion of motion. But in this confusion there was exact purpose and plan. Behind it was definiteness. The flurry and the crush and the hustle of it were but as the flying outer garments of a swift-moving, balanced organism that was working harmoniously within.

Suddenly the sound of a whistle pierced through the air, a sound keen and sharp as the edge of a sword.

And all at once there was a lull in the fighting. The forwards came and packed themselves down, head to head—eight against eight. The scrum! This curious formation brought to my mind the picture of the Roman soldiers of old packing themselves down beneath their shields to advance upon a position. The scrum had the look of a strange machine-being—made up of arms and bodies and legs. There was about it a suggestion at once primal and sinister. It was as some composite monster of fighting; a combined human machine, alert and threatening; a thing of legs and backs and arms.

The ball was thrown into the centre of it, and all at once the scrum was a chaos of violent struggling. Here was fighting indeed—actual, physical, bodily, intimate fighting; a closer fighting than the fighting of hand-to-hand; head against head, arm against arm, leg against leg, body against body; a confusion of pushing and shoving and crushing. It lasted no more than five seconds, but they were seconds that were hard and vivid and concentrated.

And now came a bit of fine, quick play.

The ball was heeled out, and the scrum broke. The half picked up the ball and threw it to a three-quarter, who took it on the run. Like lightning he went till he was collared. As he was collared, he passed it to his neighbour, who ran with it till he was collared in turn.

This last three-quarter passed it to the wing, who swerved round the full-back, and scored a try. A fine bit of play!

In this combat here on the field there was no anger. But it was fighting none the less for that. It must not be forgotten that the most effective fighting of all is cool, methodical, unangry fighting. Anger in fighting is a mist that is against the clear directing of the forces that are under one's command. These fine young men were learning the secret that lies behind successful fighting: to fight without anger.

'Go low! Go low! Go—go low!'

Ah, that was a good collar indeed! Down came the player, sprawling. 'Follow up! Follow up! Follow up!' The war-ball was going ahead, moving in front, a thing living. 'Feet! Feet! Feet!' The ball was being dribbled. It was being passed and passed. 'With you! With you!' This from the players who were on the attacking side. On and on and on. The ball jerked along in short, spasmodic movements. It was a glorious, exciting time of seconds. 'School-house! School-house! Day boys! Day boys! Day—School-house! Day! School!' The field was ringing with the shouting.

Again the sound of the whistle cut through the air. And again came the scrum. And again was the chaos of violent struggling. Heads and legs and arms and backs were going. And the ball was heeled out and the scrum was broken and dissolved.

Up in the air—how evenly and beautifully the ball sailed! Evans had propelled it again with a mighty drop-kick. A fine lad, this Evans! A powerful figure of a fighter! A fine lad!

They were all fine lads, lads that Britain might well be proud of. And they were learning to fight for their country here on this playing-field. They were passing through a searching test, a test mental and physical. They were fitting themselves to take their places in the fight for the honour and the existence of their country. Good lads!

The game was over. Which side won? Which side lost? Oh, that mattered nothing. It was the game, it was the sport, that was the thing. They had all won!

The losing side gave three cheers for the winning side. And then the winning side gave three cheers for the losing side. So you see they were all sportsmen.

Every man of 'em!

THE BLOWER OF BUBBLES.

PART V.

XII.

AND so, partly with banter, but with many moments that were tense with feeling, we talked while the afternoon wore on. Norman was in the midst of some anecdote of either Sindbad or Mr Jones, when he paused, and a look of delighted anticipation lit his countenance.

'That's the whistle,' he said. 'The train's right on time to-day.' He sighed happily, as a lover about to meet his sweetheart after a long absence.

'Sindbad,' he cried, 'pipe all hands to tea. Tell Mrs M'Gillicuddy we'll have it in the music-room.'

Telescope under his arm, the worthy buccaneer—for I am convinced he sailed under Captain Kidd—shuffled into the house, and the noise of the train could be distinctly heard as it emptied its crowd of one or two at the little station.

'I shall go and open the gate,' I said, but he stopped me.

'He is with her, Pest.'

'Who?'

'Wait. . . . I have kept a surprise for you.'

A minute later I saw his wife at the end of the path as she waved to him. She came through the leafy garden with a grace of movement that made the scene a delicate, colourful picture, and even before she had reached us I could see that her beauty was as exquisite, as perfect, as an orchid's. All sacrificed to an invalid. . . . .

With the tenderest of smiles in her eyes, which were blue as the sky, she advanced towards us and kissed him; and I, who detest things sentimental as I would the plague, thought it was the loveliest tribute I had ever seen. Before he could speak, she turned and gave me both her hands

'I won't apologise,' she said, and her voice was as sweet as a running brook, 'because I know you both enjoyed your talk of old times the better for my absence.'

'It was a wonderful afternoon,' I said, 'but it would have been doubly so with you here.'

And then I, the Pest, the cynic, the modernist, stooped and kissed her hand. It seemed the natural thing to do, and she accepted it with the understanding heart that Nature had given her.

'But, Lilias, where is the lad?'

'Oh,' she laughed gaily, 'the station-master kept him a moment to show him an entirely new button he had thought of. But here he is now.'

Coming up the path, carrying a couple of parcels, was a boy of, perhaps, ten years of age. His hair was golden and curly, and his eyes had a dreamy look that contrasted strangely with the strength of his chin. He had the poise and the appearance of a thoughtful, well-bred youth; but there was something, I could not say what, that told me he was not English.

He touched his cap to me as he came on the lawn, and smiled cordially to Basil.

'Do you remember the gentleman?' asked Norman.

The boy shook his head and unconsciously moved nearer to the woman, who placed her hand on his shoulder.

'You shouldn't forget each other,' laughed Norman, 'for once he played the drums under your baton.'

A few minutes later we went in for tea, the boy and Mrs Norman going first. I waited while Sindbad prepared to move the invalid, and then turned to him for an explanation.

'Klotz was killed,' said Norman swiftly, 'and his wife died a month later, after she heard of his death. We have adopted Siegfried as our ward.'

XIII.

That night a storm came up from the sea, and the house rattled and shook in the clutch of a November gale. The trees that looked like palms swayed and bent before the wind, and the many-coloured leaves in the garden fled like refugees before an attack, and covered the ground with their quivering bodies.

We were gathered in the music-room, the cosy warmth from a fire of logs making pleasant contrast to the snarling wind outside. The evening had been a memorable one. The woman whose beauty was as delicate as an orchid's had charmed us with her voice, her playing; charmed us without effort or knowing how.

From a lounge, Norman's vivacity, which always had in it the quality of sympathy, illuminated everything that happened. When she sang a little extract of the eighteenth century, 'Bergère Légère,' it was he who knew that it had been a favourite of Marie Antoinette's. When she played the love theme which Puccini gives the strings in the first act of Madame Butterfly, it was Norman who, by a dozen deftly chosen words, created the atmosphere of Japan, and brought before us the cruel tenderness of Pinkerton's love for Cho Cho San. When Siegfried played MacDowell's conception of 'Mid-ocean,' Norman recalled in a moment the genius of America's greatest composer, the genius that had finally crossed the thin barrier to insanity. From that we talked of the sea, while the wind howled outside, and I spoke of the many moods of blue that coloured it in a single day, and, without giving the effect of quotation or of monologue, he brought his artistry into play with three lines of Keats's sonnet 'Blue.'

Whenever any of us spoke, his sensitive, rhythmic intellectuality seemed to hover about us, acknowledging thought where it struggled to the surface, adding some subtle touch of colour when our efforts seemed too drab. Under its influence we talked our best, we thought our best, we were our best.

At nine o'clock Siegfried rose to go to bed, and advanced to shake hands with me.

'Well,' I said, 'and do you still intend to be a conductor?'

He smiled a little self-consciously.

'There is much to learn,' he said, 'and—I do not want to leave my home.'

Norman lit a cigarette—his old mannerism when emotions were taut.

'Parents,' he said, 'and quasi-parents like us, march straight towards loneliness. Our greatest concern is to have our children ready to leave us as soon as they hear the call of the world, knowing that such a moment will be the proudest and the saddest of our lives.'

'Good-night,' said Siegfried to me. 'Good-night, Uncle Bubbles.' He turned wistfully to Mrs Norman, who smiled and linked her arm in his.

'Won't you come along?' she said to me. 'Siegfried is very proud of his room, and would like you to see it.' It was her way of hiding her knowledge that the little chap was frightened by the storm. So we saw him safely in bed, and admired his books, and wished him pleasant dreams. We had just left his room and were about to descend the stairs, when we paused as the sound of rain beating against the house came to our ears. We hurried about for a few moments seeing that all windows were closed, and were going to rejoin Norman, when I stopped her.

'Mrs Norman,' I said haltingly, 'it is never easy for an Englishman to express the emotion he feels, but may I tell you how touched I am by your devotion to your husband? Without you, his life would be—unbearable.'

She did not smile or protest, but her eyes looked straight into mine.

'To live day by day,' she said slowly, her fingers playing with a necklace that hung about her full white throat, 'near a soul like Basil's, to commune with a brain like his . . . to feel the inspiration of his nature that is so in tune with the beauty of the world, is a happiness few women can experience. If it were not too cruel, I could feel thankful for his wound that has given him so completely to me.'

I stood by her on the creaking stairs as the rain swept in torrents against the house, and her murmuring tones mingled with the sounds of the storm.

'Perhaps you cannot understand,' she said gently, 'but loving Basil as I do, and having him dependent on me, is a selfish happiness that only a woman could really know.'

And out of the night a truth came to me that, though it never, never could be mine, the most precious thing in this world is a woman's heart.

XIV.

It was eleven o'clock, and Basil Norman and I were alone. The storm had subsided, and, through the sound of the rain, we could hear the waves breaking against the shore.

'I do not want Siegfried to go to school yet,' he was saying; 'he is so full of promise and latent genius that I dread the risk of having it all standardised into what we call a public-school man. I am coaching him in languages and the three R's, but more than anything else I want him to form his own conception of the scheme of the universe, so that when he takes his position among the world's musicians—as I am confident he will—he 'll have the echo of what he interprets in his own breast. Music is so vast, yet musicians, as a class, are people of little depth.'

'Has the lad a chance in England with his German name?'

'Yes. England must realise that genius has no nationality.'

'What was Siegfried like when you took him first?'

'He was arrogant, sullen, and in his child's brain was the knowledge that his father had fought against us. To make him forget his unhappy past, and partly to satisfy a caprice of my own, I—well, you would say I blew bubbles. We invented a little city of make-believe. From the hill at the back of the house you can look down on all these houses, and at dusk, when the mist rises from the sea and the windows begin to glow with light, it is quaint enough for a study by Rackham. In our little City of Bubbles there dwelt such celebrities as Aladdin, Jack the Giant Killer, Midshipman Easy, Peter Pan, poor Wilde's Happy Prince, and Heaven knows how many more. They were very real to Siegfried and me, and Lilias used to have many a laugh over the troubles of our little family. But I had not counted on Sindbad; he was filling Siegfried with stories of buried treasure and men forced to walk the plank (all of them absolutely authenticated by the narrator), and the lurking Prussian began to appear. He stole down to Ventnor and bought books on the war . . . he began to glory in the stand Germany was making. So I was not surprised when, one day, he suggested that we should play soldiers.

'Pest, you should have been there. Siegfried was Napoleon, and I was Hindenlorff, his Chief of Staff. Sindbad was given command of a naval brigade, and was also in charge of a large fleet lying in hiding to cope with the Spaniard, should he emerge. In addition to these modest duties, he had to wheel my chair. Lilias came along as a composite representative of all the women's services. Napoleon's plans were that we should attack the City of Bubbles, which was being defended by a heavy force on the fringe of the hill. I omitted to mention our flying cavalry in the person of Mr Jones; but owing to a misunderstanding of our objective he waged separate war on birds all afternoon, inflicting no casualties, but covering an immense area of ground. We began the attack about half-a-mile back; but when Napoleon ordered Sindbad's naval brigade into action, we were unable to find him, until Mr Jones discovered him behind a rock, scrutinising a passing merchantman through the inevitable telescope. After some persuasion, we induced Sindbad to attack, but half-way to his objective he remembered that he had left his pipe in the kitchen, to which he repaired, leaving his troops in the air, as we used to say in France, and taking away the mobility which, as Chief of Staff, I needed urgently. There is no question that Sindbad possesses imagination, but it is an unreliable one.

'To make the story short, we won by a brilliant ruse of Napoleon's, who got word to the enemy that the tuck-shops in Ventnor were being evacuated, which was as effective as his famous "Sauve qui peut" at Waterloo, for they fled ignominiously, and we captured the city, after inflicting heavy casualties.'

I looked at him and waited. Behind the nonsense I could see some serious thought was lurking, but what I could not conjecture.

'The next day,' he resumed, 'Siegfried was tired, and asked me to tell how Peter Pan frustrated the pirates. "Peter is dead," said I. Siegfried suppressed a sob, and asked when he died. "He was killed in our attack," I said. After a long pause, he mentioned the probability of Mr Midshipman Easy being at home. "He is dead," said I. Again his question, and again my answer: "He was killed in our attack." He went out; but on going to bed that night he asked if Cinderella was really very pretty. "Not now," I said, "for she is lying dead." Does it seem ludicrous, Pest? That night he cried himself to sleep, and it is not easy to listen to a youngster's sobs when you know that a word from you will do away with them. For two long dreary weeks our City of Bubbles was a City of the Dead. . . . Then I suggested that we play soldiers again and make another attack. After all, Pest, it isn't every Tommy gets a chance of being Chief of Staff. I wish you could have seen his face. It was as though I had struck him with a whip, and he left me without a word. That afternoon the Wizard of Oz visited our city and brought them all back to life. That was some months ago, and our little dream-world is only a serio-humorous memory for Siegfried and me now. But during that night he cried himself to sleep I think the Prussian in him died.'

For several minutes we listened to the rain.

'The greatest of the Arts,' said Norman, very slowly, 'is life. I don't think our writers, our painters, our men who dream in bronze realise that. If they did, it would not be said that the English are the least artistic people in the world; for you and I know that is not true. Scott going to his death in the Antarctic snow was a great artist. The sailor standing to one side when the last boat is filled, and those six Tommies at Grieswald in Germany, holding their ground against a row of bayonets and taking a sentence of two years' imprisonment rather than aid the Hun in making munitions—are they not artists? Where we fail as a race is in our authors, composers, painters, who divorce themselves from the real spirit of England and wonder that the products of their brains quicken no pulse and stir no imagination. Our educationists, our leaders in every movement allied with culture, have too often striven to choke the imaginativeness and blind the eyes of our youth to the beauty of life that is one of its greatest truths. One has but to read the despairing lines written by bereaved mothers for their sons who have fallen, to feel the sorrow of England crying for expression; instead of which, our triumph, our courage, our artistry are mute and inarticulate.'

The rain had ceased, and the wind was moaning over the sea as if it had been balked of its prey.

'Mark my words, Pest,' he said dreamily, 'as a nation we shall have no self-expression until our artists take for their model the greatest of all Arts—life.'

A burning ember fell from the grate and lay on the tiled surface of the hearth.

THE END.

PEAT-MOSS AS AN AGRICULTURAL ASSET.

ALTHOUGH the value of peat as an aid to agriculture has long been known, the peculiar attributes of peat-moss are only just beginning to be realised. Peat, generally speaking, is no more than decomposed and compressed peat-moss, but the latter, as used for the bedding of live-stock, is not infrequently mainly composed of sphagnum which has retained its light and fibrous characteristics.

Now sphagnum, particularly when in the form of peat-moss, is a great absorber of moisture. It will drink up water like a sponge, and hold it, even under conditions of excessive evaporation, for a longer period than most substances of the kind. It is, moreover, practically indestructible, as the following instance will show. Twenty-five years ago a layer of sphagnum was entrenched in the subsoil of a garden, the object being to check the extreme summer drought from which the land suffered. Last winter this sphagnum, on being dug up, was found to be almost as fresh as on the day it had been buried.

These two properties of peat-moss being taken into consideration, it follows that if this substance were to be mixed with light, porous soil, the soil would be better able to support plant life during dry weather. The peat-moss would not only absorb and retain natural moisture, but any fertilising elements which it contained, whether from animal or artificial manures, would be retained also. Indeed, unless some 'holding' material in the form of vegetable humus is present in porous soils it is often hardly possible to use many artificial fertilisers at all; certainly not with economy, since the fertiliser is quickly washed down beyond the roots of the plant. Peat has been used by cultivators of light soil with the object of arresting this great loss of moisture and plant food (practically synonymous terms, since vegetable life subsists only on liquid nourishment); but peat-moss is proving of higher value, as its absorptive power is greater and its fibrous texture more lasting.

There is another important feature in favour of peat-moss, and that is, it is more easily obtained and handled than peat. Compressed into bales and extremely light, it can be conveniently carried any distance at a reasonable cost in freightage and trouble, whereas these factors render the use of peat almost impossible save by those who live near the deposits. It is mainly owing to this convenience in transport that peat-moss has so largely superseded straw as a stable litter; and there is no doubt that its power of absorbing the invaluable liquids, so rich in potash, of animal manure has done much towards awakening farmers and others to its peculiar uses as an asset in agriculture.

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS

PERFORMANCE OF AEROPLANES PREDICTED BY MODELS.

WHEN an estimate of the power necessary for a new size or type of ship is required, an exact model of the proposed vessel is constructed in paraffin-wax, and towed through a long tank at a speed which corresponds to the desired speed of the full-sized vessel. (What the relation of these speeds is will be shown later.) During this operation delicate instruments register the pull exerted, from which the horse-power necessary for the new vessel can be calculated. Models having proved so successful for predicting the behaviour of ships, it is not surprising that attempts have been made to foretell the performance of projected aircraft by similar means, and a number of model aeroplanes used for this purpose by the Aircraft Manufacturing Company, of Hendon, were exhibited recently at the Royal Institution. Instead of the models being made to fly through the air, however, where their behaviour would be difficult to observe, they are suspended in a wind-channel, through which the air can be made to pass at any speed between twenty and forty miles an hour. In this connection it should be noted that the corresponding speed of a model is always much less than the speed of the craft which it represents. In the case of a ship and its model, their corresponding speeds vary as the square roots of their lengths; thus, a ship measuring two hundred and fifty-six feet, and having a speed of twenty knots, would be represented by a four-foot model with a speed of two and a half knots. (If the model were towed at twenty knots, her performance would be quite different from that of the full-sized ship.) So it is with aircraft, except that the reduction in speed varies in a different proportion. The model aeroplanes are carried by instruments which measure the lift, drag, and other features of their 'flight,' for different designs and settings of the ailerons and the rudders. With the aid of suitable formulæ, the data thus obtained can be made to show what may be expected from the full-sized machines. The predictions are very close approximations to the actual results. Thus, for the De Haviland 10A bombing-machine, fitted with two four-hundred-horse-power Liberty engines, the model indicated one hundred and twenty-nine, one hundred and twenty-five and a half, and one hundred and nineteen miles an hour for altitudes of five, ten, and fifteen thousand feet respectively; the actual speeds obtained were one hundred and thirty, one hundred and twenty-four, and one hundred and seventeen miles an hour respectively. In one case the speed foretold by the model was exactly realised. The apparatus for testing the models and their behaviour under varying conditions was designed by Lieutenant R. Rolleston West.

THE CROSS-CHANNEL TRAIN-FERRIES.

Better means of communication between England and France have been suggested from the time of the great Napoleon, to whom a tunnel through which coaches might be drawn by horses was proposed by a Frenchman named Mathieu. So long ago as 1874 the French Channel Tunnel Company began operations from Sangatte, and a gallery a mile and a half long was driven under the Channel. Seven years later a section of nearly equal length was constructed at the Dover end, but the work was eventually stopped owing to the opposition of the British military authorities. More recently a train-ferry scheme was strongly supported, but only the need for the quick transport of war material led to the establishment of this method between the new 'mystery' port of Richborough on the one hand and Calais and Dunkirk on the other, and between the British port of Southampton and Cherbourg and Dieppe on the coast of France. The advantages of train-ferries for heavy through goods traffic are obvious, the time and labour occupied in unloading railway trucks into steamers and discharging the latter into railway trucks again at the other side being entirely eliminated. The steamers which carry the trains across the Channel measure three hundred and sixty-three feet in length, and have a breadth of sixty-one and a half feet over the fenders; while they 'draw' nine feet of water forward and ten feet aft, their displacement being three thousand six hundred and fifty-four tons. They are driven by twin-screws coupled to engines of nearly four thousand horse-power, which give the vessels a speed of about twelve knots (nearly fourteen miles an hour). The four rail-tracks on the deck are capable of accommodating fifty-four ten-ton trucks, having a total weight, when filled, of about eight hundred and fifty tons. Provision is also made for carrying motor-lorries and other road vehicles. Three vessels have been built for these ferry services, and one, slightly shorter, but wider and deeper, was purchased from the Canadian Government, she having been in service on the St Lawrence to deal with traffic subsequently carried by the Quebec Bridge. To enable the trains to run on and off the ferry steamers, bridges, hinged at the shore end and raised or lowered at their outer ends to coincide with the rails on the boats, had to be provided. These bridges range between eighty and one hundred and twenty feet in length, according to the rise and fall of the tide at the various ports. Very special arrangements had also to be made for holding the sterns of the ferry-boats (the sterns being the parts where the boats are loaded and unloaded) accurately in position, so that the ends of the rails should exactly meet those on the bridges. This is done by running the ferry steamers alongside a wooden jetty with a recess at the shore end between this jetty and another short jetty. This recess just admits the stern, and allows the boat to be brought up to the end of the bridge. Experience has shown that the boats can make the crossing safely in any weather that is suitable for the ordinary cross-Channel services. The train-ferries were started early in 1917, and up to the signing of the Armistice over a million and a quarter tons of war material had been shipped from Richborough alone.

WATER-SUPPLIES FROM DEW.

Almost every one must have heard of the famous dew-ponds of Sussex, in which water accumulates, despite the fact that they are fed by no springs, and that no streams run into them. Similar ponds are to be found in the Colesberg district of the Cape Province, in which the water-level rises every night, although no rain has fallen and there is no source of supply other than dew. The fall of dew depends upon the varying power of the air to hold moisture according to its temperature—the warmer the air, the greater its capacity to hold moisture in suspension, and vice versâ. At nightfall, therefore, after a hot day, the moisture with which the air has become charged is deposited on every available cold surface. This accounts for the bulk of the dew being caught by grass, which rapidly cools after sundown, whereas the bare ground retains its heat for many hours. These facts have been taken advantage of by Mr George Hubbard, F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A., and his brother, in the construction of a scientifically designed artificial dew-pond, with a view to demonstrating the possibility of obtaining considerable supplies of water by such means. According to Mr Hubbard's description of this experiment, given recently at a meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects, an area of flat, low-lying ground, one hundred feet square, was dug out to a depth of eighteen inches, and lined with a four-inch layer of concrete, the surface being afterwards thickly coated with pitch. Next came a layer of fine sand, upon which were laid mica slabs two feet square by two inches thick, and spaced about one inch apart. The whole surface was then flooded with asphalt to a depth of three-quarters of an inch. It should be explained here that mica is an excellent heat insulator. The result on an autumn morning, after a still, clear, frosty night, was a thick coating of hoar-frost over the mica slabs, although very little showed on the grass beside the pond. Later the hoar-frost on the slabs was melted by the sun into hundreds of gallons of water. A noteworthy feature was the absence of hoar-frost on the asphalt above the joints between the mica slabs, these portions, owing to the absence of the mica, not being so well insulated from the ground.

A 'HAY-BOX' DE LUXE.

Several self-cookers working on the hay-box principle have been described in this journal from time to time, some of which can be easily made by amateurs, while others are manufactured in quantity, and may be bought ready for use from the makers. What may be called a hay-box de luxe has been placed on the market recently, of which every part has been devised with a view to convenience, high efficiency, and pleasing appearance; in fact, the appliance would form a handsome addition to the equipment of any kitchen. The box proper is of wood, stained and varnished, and is fitted with castors, handles, and a hinged lid with a hasp. It has a height of eighteen inches, and is thirteen and a half inches square outside. Inside is a cylindrical, cream-glazed, earthenware container, having a sunk lid and a flange at the top, which rests on a ring in the upper part of the box, the body of the container passing through and down to within about two inches of the bottom. The space between the container and the box is packed, both at the sides and along the bottom, with special material having a high value as a heat insulator. A flat, square case filled with similar insulating material forms the lower part of the lid of the box, and fits closely, thereby preventing any leakage of heat. Three enamelled pans, holding three quarts each, and fitted with lifting-handles, are provided for each cooker, and exactly fill the container. A fact not always remembered in connection with hay-boxes or self-cookers is that they form excellent ice-chests in summer.

A GAS-SAVING COOKER.

One can almost see the heat going to waste in an ordinary gas-cooker. The rise in temperature of the kitchen or scullery in which the cooker is located certainly makes us feel it, especially if we place the hand above the cooking-utensils standing on the various lighted rings. In addition, the large volume of air continually passing through the ordinary gas-oven is a great source of waste, as it has all to be heated to the cooking temperature. Several attempts have been made to minimise this loss of heat by the use of small ovens and grillers which fit over the rings at the top of the cooker. Among the most successful appliances for this purpose is the 'Imperial Multicooker,' which by utilising the heat from one gas-ring in the most effective manner cooks a meal that would involve the use of two or three rings, as well as the oven, if it were prepared on the ordinary gas-cooker. Various forms of this appliance are made for use with gas-rings, oil-stoves, and the burners above the domestic gas-oven, but they are all similar in principle. A form complete in itself, called the 'Super-Multicooker,' consists of an oven with a hot plate at the top for boiling, frying, &c. At the back, sides, top, and bottom of the oven are spaces which form one continuous chamber, allowing the heat to circulate freely. A row of burners at the bottom of the space at the back supplies enough heat for the oven and also for boiling or frying on the hot plate above the oven. When the oven is not required, the row of burners can be raised to the top, thereby greatly increasing the heat available immediately under the hot plate. It should be noted, too, that the oven is entirely shut off from the gas-burners; consequently the air inside it is still and pure. It is also moist, owing to the steam arising from the food which is being cooked. In the ordinary gas-oven, the gas-burners are inside the oven, and must be continually supplied with air, which becomes charged with foul gases, and passes away through the vent at the top, taking the moisture along with it. When meat is cooked in any oven it is bound to lose weight, owing to the evaporation of the moisture; but if the air is still, the loss is comparatively small. Indeed, tests have shown that the loss in an ordinary gas-oven is more than double that which occurs when an externally heated oven is used. The 'multicooker' for placing over a ring at the top of the ordinary gas-cooker consists of a shallow box, of which the top forms a hot plate, holes round the sides and in the top allowing the burnt gases to escape. In another form of the apparatus a small oven rests on one part of the hot plate, while sauce-pans or kettles occupy the remaining space, plates and cooked foods being kept warm on the top of the oven. Alternatively, the oven may be removed, and the whole of the hot top used for boiling or frying. A slightly modified form of the appliance can be used with the ordinary gas-ring; while another type, provided with legs, fits over a 'Primus' paraffin-stove. Apart from the advantages already referred to in connection with the oven, the main feature of the 'Imperial Multicooker' is the saving in gas, only one-third of that used in the ordinary gas-cooker being required. Overwhelming evidence on this point is forthcoming from users, and a test carried out by the editor of Popular Science Siftings fully confirms the above claim.

CLOTHES FROM PEAT.

Few would consider peat to be a promising substance from which to make clothes, yet a company has been formed at Stockholm for the manufacture of 'fiberuld,' as the textile fibre obtained from peat is there designated. From this substance, with the addition of 30 to 40 per cent. of wool, an excellent cloth can be woven, which, it is said, is hardly distinguishable from pure woollen material. The peat fibre by itself has proved to be very suitable for mats and carpets; with the addition of 10 per cent. of animal hair, felt soles for slippers can be made from it. According to the English Mechanic, peat-fibre thread is very strong, having a breaking-strain of over twenty-eight pounds against just under twenty pounds for wool. Professor G. Sellegren, of the Technical High School, Stockholm, is said to have originated the investigations that led to the production of peat fibre.

A NOVEL RIVER DAM.

When a dam is to be constructed across a river, it is usual to divide off a section at a time by means of cofferdams, inside which the work can be carried on with ease and safety. This procedure is very costly, however. A cheaper plan is to form a dam of big stone blocks by simply dropping them into the water, the interstices being filled up with smaller stones and gravel. A variant of this method has been carried out in New Zealand, on the Kawarau River, a deep, swift stream, with steep, high banks. Two huge pillars of concrete were built —one on each side of the river—at the site of the proposed dam, one being sixteen feet square and forty-six feet in height, and the other thirteen feet square and thirty-six feet high, their respective weights being seven hundred and twenty and five hundred and thirty tons. Where the dam is required the current is very swift, as the river has just entered a narrow gorge, in which the water has a fairly uniform depth of seventeen feet. The intention was to fell these pillars across the stream, and the larger has already been successfully thrown into position, resulting in a rise of three feet in the water-level. The operation was carried out by firing a charge of gelignite under the pillar, which literally flung it across the stream, causing the spray to rise to a height of sixty feet. The engineer in charge of the work professed himself entirely satisfied with the result. The object of the dam is to raise the level high enough for water to flow into an intake, whence it will be carried through a flume for about two thousand feet to turbines which are to force water from the river up to a height of one hundred and eighty feet for purposes of irrigation. That the scheme is of some magnitude will be gathered from the size of the delivery-pipes, which measure thirty inches in diameter, and have a total length of over two thousand feet.

LIQUID AIR AND THE WAR.

In an interesting lecture on 'Liquid Oxygen and the War,' given recently at the Royal Institution, Sir James Dewar referred to the Haber process for the fixation of nitrogen, which was used by Germany for producing the nitric acid needed in the manufacture of explosives when her supplies of nitrates from Chile were cut off by our blockade. The process in question consists of passing a mixture of nitrogen and hydrogen at an enormous pressure and at nearly red heat over finely divided iron, whereby some of the two gases are caused to combine into ammonia, which contains one part of nitrogen to three of hydrogen. This ammonia can be obtained by absorption in water or by freezing, while oxidation of it yields nitric acid. Abundant supplies of nitrogen were available, being produced in large quantities by the fractional distillation of oxygen from liquid air; while pure hydrogen, of which huge volumes were required for filling Zeppelins, was obtained by the purification of water-gas. An interesting feature of the process is the part played by the iron in facilitating the combination of the gases into ammonia. In the absence of the iron only very slow combination would take place; in its presence it is brought about much more rapidly, though the metal itself is in no way affected. Used in this way the iron is known to chemists as a catalyst or a catalytic agent. Sir James also touched upon the manufacture of liquid air or oxygen for the use of airmen at high altitudes. Devices for using air in this form for breathing were found in German aeroplanes brought down over London. Liquid air has the advantage of being much lighter than the compressed gas carried in steel cylinders. The liquid was stored in vessels surrounded by a vacuum, as in thermos flasks, the vacuum in this case, however, serving not to keep the contents hot, but cold. Volatilisation was caused by heat, and the air was conveyed by tubes to mouth-pieces. Three methods of heating the liquid and turning it into air as required were mentioned, one electrical, and another consisting of screwing a rod of copper or aluminium into the liquid. In the third method the liquid was simply siphoned out through an adjustable valve into an evaporating-chamber, the heat from the surrounding air being quite sufficient to gasify it. Before being fit for breathing, however, the gasified air had to be warmed in coils, as when first vaporised liquid air is intensely cold.

A WONDERFUL TREE.

It is a question whether there is a more wonderful or more useful tree to man than the carnauba (or carnahuba) tree of Brazil. This tree abounds in the states of Maranham, Piauhy, Ceará, Rio Grande do Norte, Parahyba, and Pernambuco. It is one of the most stately of the palm tribe, with large fan-shaped leaves. Every part of this tree has some useful or economic value. Its roots have a depurative virtue, while the heart of the young leaves makes a good substitute for cabbage. Its trunk, which is of considerable girth, is employed in the construction of cabins or huts, for which the leaves furnish the roof-coverings. From the pith of the carnauba is extracted a nutritive sediment, which, by fermentation, gives a very agreeable drink. Its fruit serves as a food for man and beast; another portion of the plant yields a kind of sago; whilst the seeds are not only oleaginous, but are roasted as a substitute for coffee. The principal value of the carnauba-tree, however, resides in its leaves. In addition to their use as roof-coverings, very good fibres are extracted from them which are turned to account in many ways. Mats and hats are made from them, as well as the hammocks in general use in the north of Brazil. The leaves, when young, have on their lower surface a layer of powdery matter, which is the well-known carnauba-wax. When the leaves are old and dry this layer of wax is dispersed with the slightest wind. To collect the wax, the leaves must be cut when young, dried in the shade, and then beaten. This wax closely resembles beeswax, and can be used for the same purposes. In the north of Brazil it is largely employed in the manufacture of candles. Carnauba-wax has formed an important item in the list of exports from Brazil for some years, for it is much used in connection with the preparation of gramophone cylinders. After the outbreak of hostilities the demand for it steadily grew for a more war-like purpose, and a considerable increase was noticeable in the quantity exported.

A WISE PRECAUTION.

Acting on the advice of their medical officer, Dr F. W. Alexander, the Metropolitan Borough of Poplar took steps during the recent influenza epidemic which might well be copied by other municipal authorities in case of subsequent outbreaks. The council issued free a supply of their electrolytic disinfecting fluid, and by means of posters explained how it should be used in rinsing out the mouth, gargling the throat, and douching the nostrils, thus destroying or retarding the development of the germs producing influenza and pneumonia. This course of treatment is undoubtedly based on scientific principles, and where the electrolytic disinfecting fluid is not available, any suitable disinfecting mouth-wash may be used instead.

To Correspondents who wish fuller information regarding new inventions, publications, &c. mentioned here, addresses will be furnished, when possible, provided a stamped and addressed envelope or post-card be sent to the Editor, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XIV.—continued.

VERY few of the Old Army men have plumbed the depths of the New Army. Privately, we think many of them are afraid of our intellects. They seldom get down to earth with us, and often seek refuge in the discipline which can hold us off. They are brave men, and, with a few exceptions, are gentlemen. But they believe we are swashbuckling imperialists, when in reality we are pacifists fighting for peace now and—for ever. The professional military mind is in many ways admirable. It is honest, direct, and cannot compromise. When it damns, it damns. But it is not elastic; it takes in slowly. Even now, after years of war, you will not get 50 per cent. of Old Army men to give you a correct analysis of our psychology.

At the school we were not understood.

Apparently it is considered necessary to give 'the new fellows' a lot of talk about the King, the Empire, the Cause, and 'the Correct Thing.' This is quite all right when presented by capable men, who will at least recognise that we have been to school. But when an old red-cheeked blunderbuss pops into the school on a visit of inspection, and commences to ladle out this stuff like a jingo orator on a soap-box, we squirm and silently rebel. We hate all this empty talk. Our King, our Empire, and 'the Correct Thing' have nothing to do with the making of this war. It is the Germans' war—the Kaiser's war. Lip-service is of little use to the monarchy or the Empire. We are not flag-waggers. We are plain, home-loving shopkeepers in arms. We do not question the right of King George or ignore the Empire's existence; but we are all determined, with the aid of God, bayonet, and high explosive, to root out the Kaiser, his chiefs, and all their works, because they and their foul gospel mean the moral ruin and the brutal domination of the world. On enlistment, when we held up our hands and swore by Almighty God 'to defend His Majesty, his heirs and successors,' we meant it; but we do think that in our terms of service there should be a contract that we be understood.

For all that, you must not believe that we New Army men resent intelligent discipline or intelligent superiors. Oh no! We, I think, have the ability to distinguish between the system and the men who live under it. While we hate militarism, we have a deep and lasting affection for many of the professional soldiers. And it is this personal bond between officers and men that has helped to make the New Army effective. Their views are not our views, but their personal devotion and example are priceless assets in such a war. Indeed, the good officer is usually a good man. What always impressed us was the strong religious convictions of men like Maude, Kitchener, and Robertson. Example is the key-note of the true British officer. There are many instances to prove my contention. General Maude, in Mesopotamia, ordered all his officers and men to refrain from drinking or eating anything offered by a native. Yet, when receiving a native deputation, who offered him the hospitality of the country, he, like a courteous gentleman, realising how hurt and offended these simple natives would be if he refused, took the proffered cup, which reeked of cholera, and—DIED. There is no greater example of chivalry, and it is just that sort of chivalry which has endeared the best men of the Old Army to all in the New.

Again, there is that noble story of an air-raid on London when our barrage was rotten, and somebody in the War Office phoned to an aerodrome for some one to go up.

'We can't. The weather's against us. It's suicide,' replied the air commander.

'You must do something,' was the final order.

The air commander, realising that it simply meant ordering a junior to go to his death, went up himself, and was KILLED!

In Mesopotamia, a naval cutter was ordered to rush a bridge and break the boom across the river. The commander knew it meant death to the man who did it. So he took the hatchet himself, jumped over the bow, and commenced to hack at the hawsers. He was shot DEAD.

Now this sort of thing, and this sort of man, we appreciate. Personal bravery is a quality which can stir and develop the best in tyros at the military game. It was these glorious soldiers who gave the New Army the confidence to go on, the ability to stick it, and showed us the need for some kind of discipline, and the use of comradeship and esprit de corps to effect our purpose. What I want you to appreciate thoroughly is this: Militarism is a hateful creed, but the military life does show whether a man has 'guts.' War is not our business as a nation, but in war we, I think, are one of the toughest and bravest peoples on earth. The forte of the New Army is its intelligent grasp of the principles for which we are fighting. But only one British general has said we are out to destroy the brutal doctrines of war.

That general was Sir William Robertson.

Now, at the school we got all sorts of excellent technical stuff which was absolutely necessary, and which we fully appreciated. But we did not get what I have been writing about. We often talked about this. And all of us were agreed that it is dangerous to neglect the frank discussion of the principles, the politics, and the creeds which affect a nation in arms. War to-day is a complicated business. An officer must not only have mastered the technicalities of the military profession; he must be acquainted with the broad principles of high policy which guide the action of his army. He must appreciate the value of moral, and the need of cultivating it and sustaining it. But he cannot do so if he ignores the principles for which five millions have enlisted. It is all very well to know how to 'form fours' and 'slope arms;' but if an officer cannot distinguish Hindenburg from Liebknecht, Lloyd George from Lenin, Enver Pasha from the simple Turk, or Clemenceau from Bolo, then he is NOT educated. This knowledge can be given either in pamphlet form or in a couple of lectures. At present the voice of the New Army man is drowned by the louder cries of 'the old school.'

I am only a youthful person at this business, but I do feel that in this great and terrible war we should have an opportunity to pop our ideas into a collecting-box which will be taken direct to the War Office and opened by a bright, sympathetic young soldier of the General Staff.

Sir Henry Wilson will agree.

He, like General Maude, is a man of imagination.

(Continued on page 284.)

MOONLIGHT.

CLEAR and splendid is the gleaming
Of the moon upon the deep,
When the weary town lies dreaming
And the winds are all asleep.
I can hear the wavelets dashing
With a low melodious splashing
On the pebbles, silver flashing
From the deep.

Now the moon's bright silver stairway
Stretches out across the sea,
And I think that such a fair way
Straight should lead me, dear, to thee
Up the moonbeam which is nearest
I would climb where light shines clearest
Into Paradise, my dearest,
Up to thee.

DORA NICOL.

 TO CONTRIBUTORS.

1*st*. All communications should be addressed to 'The Editor, Chambers's Journal, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.'

2*nd*. For its return in case of ineligibility, postage-stamps should accompany every manuscript.

3*rd*. To secure their safe return if ineligible, ALL MANUSCRIPTS, whether accompanied by a letter of advice or otherwise, should have the writer's Name and Address written upon them IN FULL.

4*th*. Poetical contributions should invariably be accompanied by a stamped and directed envelope.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE WINGS OF THE MORNING.

By JOHN A. STEUART, Author of The Minister of State, The Red Reaper, &c.

PART I

I.

IN all circumstances a philosopher ought to be composed. The dominie was a philosopher, yet a glance would have told that he was deeply, painfully perturbed. He sat crouched over his desk, his chin on his hands, his face an epitome of acute distress. For a full half-hour he had sat thus—mute, motionless, miserable. Spread out on the desk before him was a letter, the manifest and immediate cause of his distress.

It was Friday afternoon, and still with the stillness of golden sunshine and perfect summer peace. The schoolroom was as silent as the tomb. Outside among the leaves not a bird twittered; the very winds were asleep. The day's work, the week's work, was done. The scholars had all gone. Nearly an hour earlier the last whoop of the emancipated boys had been swallowed by the all-devouring silence, leaving the master alone with his trouble.

Taking up the letter, he read it for the twentieth time. It was not addressed to him, and, properly speaking, did not concern him at all; yet it had thrown his whole world into confusion as by the sudden convulsive upheaval of an earthquake.

'Poor Margaret!' he murmured, laying down the letter with a sigh that seemed to be torn from the very roots of his being. 'Poor Margaret!'

He rose as he spoke, and stepping to the nearest window, looked out. The school stood high against a background which was a panorama of empurpled hills with peeping Bens behind, now lightly azure in the azure distance. Up there, between him and the sky-line, was Margaret Gordon, as yet unconscious of what the Weird Sisters had spun for her.

'Poor Margaret!' he repeated on a heaving heart-throb. 'My poor Maggie!'

Turning away, he paced up and down the room with jerky irregular step that sounded eerie and hollow in the emptiness. His thoughts were now on another tack.

Early in the afternoon Sir Hector had broken in on the humming babel of scholars and left the fateful letter.

'We can't talk of it now,' said the baronet. 'Come down to the Castle in the evening, and we'll discuss it. Come and dine with me; I am all alone.'

The pair ought to have been separated by all the rigid, impassable conventions which mark off the landed proprietor with wide possessions of 'brown heath and shaggy wood' (mostly brown heath), and a pedigree antedating the Flood, from the village schoolmaster with no patent of nobility save that stamped upon him by his Creator. But, to the confusion of fools and the scandal of snobs, they were fast friends, and often smoked a pipe together in animated, most amicable disagreement. To the discerning public eye the baronet appeared a long, lean relic of feudalism, with the figure of Don Quixote and the temper of Hotspur. To the same discernment the dominie was—just a dominie with a reserved manner, a caustic tongue (if put to it), a deal of superfluous learning, and a love-secret which kept him a bachelor. But the two men had the all-important mutual understanding and appreciation which Cicero forgot to mention when dilating on the essentials of friendship.

'There is not an atom of the toady in our good dominie,' the baronet declared admiringly. 'He neither fawns nor flatters, and he isn't afraid—even of me. When I blow off steam he just smiles. Yes, decidedly I like and respect Thomas Dunning.'

'Fiery and a bit sulphurous whiles,' said the dominie of the baronet. 'No denying it. But I'll tell you this, he's the very man I'd go to for a favour.'

Thus two utterly dissimilar men may admire each other to the point of affection.

The dominie received the invitation to dine with the remark, 'You dress for dinner, Sir Hector; I don't.'

'Confound you, what does it matter how you dress?' was the retort. 'Come in pyjamas if you like, or, if you like, come just in your garters. You must help me in this business. That's all.'

'Of course, if'——

'Never mind of coursing. It's a way fraudulent lawyers have, which I don't like. Some son of Ananias in London has sent me a new brand or blend of tobacco to sample. We can test it and talk. Anyway, come.'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

II.

The dominie went, and that evening Sir Hector did not dress for dinner. When the servants had gone, and the two were thickly enveloped in smoke, the baronet remarked from the midst of the cloud, 'Well, you'll go and tell her.'

'I'd say it's your place to do that,' was the reply.

The baronet fanned aside the smoke to see if his friend could be in earnest. 'My place! How on earth can I tell her? I put it to you frankly, Dunning, how the devil can a man have the face to sympathise with a woman to whom, as she thinks, he has behaved badly?'

'Not easy for a gentleman, certainly,' agreed the dominie.

'Gentleman!' snorted the baronet. 'We'll let that fly stick to the wall, if you please. You know how things are between us?'

'Yes, I understand she is under notice to go.'

'She was,' corrected the baronet. 'It's a long story. You'll admit Duncan, her late husband, wasn't exactly an angel in temper, especially when he was in drink. If all tales be true, neither am I—even when I'm sober. Maybe even angels fall out whiles, just to clear the atmosphere. Anyway, Duncan and I didn't get on too well together, and it didn't mend matters that M'Watter the factor was always coming to me with tales of arrears of rent. After the husband came the son, and things were worse. As the old dog snarls the young one learns to show its teeth. The father scowled at me; the son defied me. One day I think he was for thrashing me—and his mother a tenant in arrears with rent!'

'Foolish, but not cowardly,' said the dominie significantly.

He thought of another encounter, of which the baronet was ignorant. The young heir, home from Eton for a holiday, met Aleck Gordon. Old feuds took fire, and there was a fight. Eton was the heavier weight, yet Eton suffered defeat—and lied bravely in explanation of results. Ever after the dominie, who knew all, thought well of Eton.

'Aleck Gordon was no coward,' said the baronet decisively. 'We have proof of that. But any fool can be wise after the event. If I was mistaken in him, possibly he was mistaken in me. Two such mistakes, and you have hate in the making. M'Watter was for getting rid of the whole breed, and I consented. That's the extent of my crime. Now there comes this, and—and I'm bowled over. So you'll go and face Margaret Gordon for me, Dunning. Tell her the law's off. M'Watter will be here early to-morrow morning, and I'll tell him; and the lawyer body in Aberfourie will be instructed to the same effect. Honour and gratitude can do no less.'

'Then go and tell Margaret Gordon that yourself,' insisted the dominie. 'It will be one of the finest things you ever did.'

'No I won't, because I can't. Pride, you say. No, sir, cowardice—pure cowardice. You see, she'd be bound to cry, and I'd lose my head and skedaddle. Nice tit-bit for the gossips, eh? No; you'll go. I ask it as a favour. And look here, Dunning, as to the future, let it be whatever you think proper in the circumstances. You see what my boy says—"For my sake, do all you can." There are certain things I cannot do—would that I could; but what I can I will do. It'll be little enough, seeing what I owe. I'd send M'Watter, only he'd be even more of an ass than myself. Besides, I remember that Margaret Gordon and you are old friends.'

'Yes,' said the dominie, with a sudden twitch of the features; 'very old friends.'

'Old friends are best in a crisis,' said the baronet. 'So to-morrow you will do me the favour of going to Margaret Gordon.'

'To-morrow, Sir Hector,' replied the dominie, 'I will go to Margaret Gordon.'

III.

Next morning, after a restless, sleepless night, the dominie rose to face the most trying ordeal of his life. Janet, his elderly, gaunt, and active housekeeper, complained that although she prepared a breakfast 'fit for a prince,' he paid her the ill compliment of leaving it almost untouched.

'And, mercy on us, Mr Dunning,' she cried, coming to a sudden halt before him, 'what's happened that your collar's a' bluidy?'

She recalled his strange aspect of the day before, and was terrified by thoughts of attempted suicide.

'I—I must have cut myself in shaving,' he returned, lamely, as Janet felt.

'Ay,' she said, still cold with the suicide theory, 'razors are unco unchancy things.' It was in her mind to hide his and let him go unshaved—at any rate until he should recover his wits.

He put on another collar and went out, remarking that, as he did not know when he would return, Janet need not trouble about dinner for him. This was confirmation of her worst fears.

'Puir, doited thing, what's come ower him?' she thought, watching him as he went. 'A' last nicht I could hear him tramp, trampin' his room when he should have been sleepin'; an' this mornin' no breakfast, an' a face like a ghost's. It's for the hill he is,' she added, noting his direction, and instantly a cold shiver went through her at thought of a certain tarn of evil name that was just the place for a would-be suicide. 'A soaked, draigled corp—it fairly gies me the cauld grue juist to think o't.'

She had an impulse to rush after him, and by sheer force, if persuasion failed, compel him to come back.

Lacking courage—for the dominie was not a man to be lightly meddled with—she went inside to her household duties instead.

Meanwhile, all unconscious of the terrors he inspired, the dominie climbed the steep slope above the schoolhouse. Once out of sight, he sat down, took Sir Hector's letter from his pocket, and read it as a man might read his own death-warrant.

'He should have come himself,' he muttered. 'Yes, he should have come himself.' Yet not that either, for, above all things in the world, Thomas Dunning wished to be with Margaret Gordon in this crisis of her fate.

He went on again, cold at heart, though the sun shone warmly. When at last he sighted High Croft nestling in the little green dip of the hills, its windows and whitewashed walls gleaming in the brilliant light, he stopped as if afraid to proceed. Then with a sudden prick of courage he hurried on, like one hypnotised by the very dread and peril of his enterprise.

IV.

Roger the collie spied him from afar, and rushed forth, all bark and bristle; but midway his ears fell back and his tail began to wag joyously. Next instant he was licking the dominie's hand, as in apology for his unpremeditated rudeness. For the master was no stranger at High Croft. A maid followed the dog, gazed a moment at the approaching figure, and disappeared. When the dominie reached the door Margaret Gordon herself was there to welcome him.

'Having a Saturday dander, Tom?' she remarked smilingly, in response to the salutation of the soft slouch-hat. 'It's bonnie among the hills the day, isn't it?'

'Yes; one of the days that come just to show what the Highlands can be in a good mood,' he returned. 'How are you, Maggie?'

In the presence of others she was Mrs Gordon, and he was Mr Dunning; but by themselves she was still Maggie, and he was still Tom.

'I mustn't complain,' she answered, Scots fashion. In the national creed of her country complaint in the matter of feeling is tantamount to a reflection on Providence, which is straitly forbidden. 'Come away in by and rest. It's a warm pull up here on such a day.'

She turned, and he followed her into 'the room,' which in rural Scotland is the equivalent for city drawing-room or parlour. 'You'll be for having something?' she added, setting him a chair.

'No, thank you, Maggie. I haven't long breakfasted.'

'A drink of milk at least,' she coaxed. He had a glass of milk which was nine-tenths cream, not because he was thirsty, but to please her, and incidentally to rally and compose his own fluttering faculties. As he drank he watched her face. When he knew it first that face was radiant with a beauty that might have made Helen jealous; but time and trouble lay heavy upon it, giving it a look of settled, wistful sadness, such as beautiful faces sometimes wear. It wore the habitual look now.

'She doesn't know anything,' he told himself. How was he to tell her?

'Any news from Aleck lately?' he asked in the ordinary tone of ordinary conversation.

'A letter two days ago,' she replied. 'Here it is. Read it for yourself.'

It was a letter written with Cæsarean brevity. The writer was in 'the thick of it,' and he was glad to say the Boches were getting something of what they deserved. He was well, and would write again just as soon as he could. He often thought of High Croft and his mother. She was not to worry. He thought of his friends too, and the night before had dreamed of the master, a funny dream about fighting Sir Hector.

As he handed back the letter the dominie had a painful lump in his throat.

'It's comforting to think he's been spared to me so far,' said Margaret simply. 'God can save on the battlefield as well as on the quiet hillside.'

The dominie coughed, thinking of that other letter in his pocket. Then he blew his nose with a force that was like a sudden explosion; and a close observer might have sworn that a corner of the big bandana handkerchief swept his eyes.

'I happened to see Sir Hector last night,' he said with some difficulty. 'He had just got a letter from young Mr Hector, and he mentions Aleck.'

'Good news?' she asked quickly.

'Yes, good news.' He could say so much truthfully, and the relief was infinite. 'What do you think, Maggie? Aleck's won the V.C.'

'The V.C.!' she repeated. 'That's a big honour, isn't it, Tom?'

'It's the one honour that every soldier covets,' was the reply. 'It's for valour, Maggie—for valour,' he repeated in a thrilling voice. 'The whole army salutes the man who gets the V.C., be he private or general.'

'Ay,' she said, as if trying to understand what she heard. 'Just before going out Aleck was speaking that way. I was wiping my eyes a wee. "Never mind, mother," says he; "maybe I'll get the V.C. Don't be down-hearted. I'll make a proud woman of you yet." That was how he talked.'

'And he's done it,' said the dominie. 'He's done it. You are proud, Maggie. Any woman would be.'

She whipped away a tear; mothers will have moist eyes when they are overcome with joy. 'Yes, as you say, any woman would be proud.

I used to think Sir Hector and the rest of them were a little hard on Aleck. But we'll not speak of that. You'll notice he says nothing about the honour himself.'

The dominie explained that in war-time the postal authorities indulge in vagaries of transit.

'Aleck must have won it just after he wrote,' he said. 'You see, Mr Hector's letter may have had better luck in getting through quick. Anyway, your boy has won the V.C.'

'And what was it for?' she asked eagerly. 'What did Aleck do to win what the whole army covets?'

The dominie regarded her a moment, as if speculating how she would take the answer.

'He saved young Mr Hector's life,' he said then.

'Saved young Mr Hector's life!' she repeated, her eyes wide with amazement.

'Yes. As you know, they have been out there together. In the heat of the fighting Mr Hector was badly wounded, and lay where he fell. When the fight was over Aleck saw him, went out under fire, and carried him back to safety.'

'That was just Aleck all over,' said Margaret; 'and you know what took place between them at home here!' She smiled wistfully; her smile cut the dominie to the heart.

'Aleck didn't stay to think of that,' he returned. 'He just went and did as his own brave and generous heart prompted. That is always the way of heroes.'

'It's hard for his old mother to understand it all,' she remarked, as if such mysteries were beyond her simplicity. 'But Mr Hector wrote it, and so it must be true. What else does the letter say? Is Aleck safe?'

The dominie's heart stood still. In a sense he could answer 'Yes, Aleck is safe,' but not as she would have it.

Her eyes were fixed upon him. She saw that he hesitated. She saw also that his face had become seared and drawn as in a sudden spasm of pain, and her mother's intuition flashed in alarm.

'Tom,' she cried, a quick terror in voice and face, 'you have ill news as well as good. Has anything happened to Aleck? Is he also wounded? Tell me. Don't—don't keep me in suspense!'

He rose and took a step towards her, she, too, rising. He would have taken her in his arms, but that the proprieties forbade. Once she had nestled in them and been rapturously happy, but that was long, long ago, and everything was different now.

'They got in quite safely,' he said, struggling against a choking constriction of the throat. 'Then'—his head swam, and it seemed the air was thick with darting sparks of fire—'then—just as Aleck was laying Mr Hector down, a sniper's bullet'——

'Hit Aleck?' she gasped.

'Hit Aleck.'

'And—and killed him.'

The dominie bowed his head, fearing to look into the stricken, agonised face before him.

V.

When he ventured to look up again Margaret Gordon stood blenched and rigid, one hand clutching the back of the chair from which she had just risen. He took her gently by the arm. 'Sit down, Maggie,' he said softly.

She obeyed mechanically, and the dominie sat beside her. She did not seem to be aware that he was there, that he held her hand and was chafing it in an anguish of sympathy. From her bloodless lips came a low moan, to him the inarticulate cry of a breaking heart.

'Margaret,' he whispered. 'Dear Maggie, the mother of a hero cannot but be brave.'

'Aleck is dead,' she said, as if that were the end of all things.

'He died nobly and gloriously,' said the dominie, striving to keep a steady voice. 'Nobly and gloriously, as the great, the good, and the brave of all ages have wished to die.'

But she could only repeat dismally, 'Aleck is dead—dead. My Aleck is dead, and I cannot even see him.'

Her heart had no room for any other thought.

The dominie had come primed with consolation from the sages. He knew all that Solomon, Socrates, and the rest of them had said on the great questions of life and death. He believed with the Greeks that the beloved of the gods are taken young. He meant to say—what was simple, literal truth—that in his heart he envied Aleck. 'Gone at twenty, a hero who gave his life for another,' he told himself on the way up. '"Greater love hath no man than this." Oh! rare good fortune of the happy boy warrior!'

Heroes, he felt, should die young, while the lustre of glory was still fresh upon them. 'Ere the evil days come,' he had often thought; 'ere the evil days come.' How lucky to spread wings and soar off in the roseate morning, rather than be kept lingering and dawdling into the darkness of night; to escape for ever, without scar or taint, all the corrosions of time, all the malice of fortune! Surely Aleck was fortunate, thrice fortunate, in his going. On his way to High Croft the dominie had said all this and more to himself with absolute conviction and sincerity. But face to face with her, he could not say it to Aleck's mother, not if it were certified wisdom, set with rubies and bound in gold. He could only stroke the hand he held, incoherently murmuring commonplaces of comfort.

At last she suddenly leaned forward upon the table and broke into a storm of weeping; and Thomas Dunning was devoutly glad, for he knew that to the stricken heart tears are salvation.

(Continued on page 296.)

THE FUTURE OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

By W. V. Roberts.

THE war has caused tremendous changes in the food-supply of the United Kingdom, and in a variety of ways has involved the future of the world's fisheries. As compared with pre-war days, the quantity of fish landed on our shores fell off by two-thirds, while its cash value (per cent.) was trebled. Now, it would be a grave mistake to assume that with the restoration of peace conditions matters will automatically right themselves by a return to normal catches and prices. Several new factors are coming into play, and are likely to affect the quantity of fish caught, methods of preservation, and the system of distribution; the position being also influenced by new and greatly increased imports from Canada and Newfoundland, and possibly by reduced exports to Germany and the Continent. The whole situation, therefore, is instinct with changes that may be felt in almost every household.

Consider, first, the question of quantity. There is ground for the belief that during the war fish round the British coast have enormously increased, the reduced catches of the last three or four years having had substantially the same effect as a series of close seasons. At the same time, the Government have made a beginning with a small grant or loan through the Fishermen's Society to enable individual fishermen off the Cornish coast to install motors in their boats, so that they may go and return with catches without waiting for wind or tide. It is accordingly expected that, while larger quantities will be available, improved methods of catching and landing fish will be adopted, with satisfactory results to the consumer.

But the war has made clear also the great need that exists for some vastly improved means of preserving fish when caught. If enlarged catches are now to aggravate the gluts which periodically occur, this need will be decidedly accentuated. It is, therefore, to possible systems of fish preservation that private enterprise is keenly directing itself, so that both supplies and prices may be, so far as possible, regularised. The whole position may perhaps be best illustrated by reference to the humble herring, whose food value has in recent months been so strongly insisted upon. If we go back to the last normal fishing year before the war—that is, to the year 1913—it will be found that the fish landed on our shores amounted in quantity to about twenty-four million hundredweights. Few, however, realise that of that huge total nearly half, or, to be precise, eleven million eight hundred thousand hundredweights, consisted of herrings. But herrings are often caught in shoals that cannot be disposed of with sufficient promptitude as fresh food. They may be unsaleable in one week because of their abundance, and unobtainable in the next owing to their scarcity. The British public have not taken to them in a pickled form. Consequently an export trade grew up, pickled or otherwise cured herrings being sent to other countries, especially Germany, where the demand for them was insistent. The result was that 80 per cent. of the herrings landed by British fishermen on the British coast were cured and exported. It will be seen at once from the figures just given what an enormous inroad 80 per cent. of herrings means on the whole catch of fish landed on our shores in the course of a year. During the war the export to Germany, of course, stopped. The Government, to save them for food, took over immense quantities of pickled herrings, and readers must have noticed what efforts were made to popularise them.

It is to meet this condition of things that attention has been turned to cold storage, which during the war played an ever-growing part in connection with the food problem. Various projects are in the field. There is the dry freezing process, which means freezing in the air of a cold chamber at a suitable temperature. But that is held to be far from satisfactory, as the time occupied in freezing—about twelve hours—involves loss of weight and flavour. Then there is the plan of brine freezing advocated by Professor Stanley Gardiner, F.R.S., and Professor G. H. F. Nuttall, F.R.S., both of Cambridge. Under this system the fish would be plunged into a bath of ordinary salt brine at a temperature below sixteen degrees Fahrenheit, and would be completely frozen through in two hours. After that they could be packed in barrels, which might be left for months in a cold-storage chamber. It is claimed that when thawed out they would be found to have suffered no appreciable loss in either flavour or weight. If the system proved successful, it could, of course, be applied to every kind of fish, the finest as well as the coarsest. It would mean almost a revolution—fish in times of plenty being preserved almost automatically for use in times of scarcity.

It might be applied, for example, to pilchards. These are seldom seen in this country outside Cornwall, except in tins as 'Cornish sardines,' or 'Pilchard sardines.' The bulk of the supply, it is believed, finds its way to Italy, and it is said that many of the pilchard-curing establishments in Cornwall are controlled by Italians. But if pilchards are held in such high esteem in Italy, why not in the United Kingdom also? The supply might range from fifteen hundred to six or seven thousand tons a year.

In 1917 the Government appointed a strong committee to go thoroughly into the whole sea-fisheries question. The Food Investigation Board of the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research for its part appointed a committee to inquire into the present methods of freezing, storing, and preserving fish. As the Government recently made a grant of over three-quarters of a million sterling for the extension of cold storage, it may fairly be assumed that for fish at any rate that system will receive a considerable impetus.

Then comes the question of imported fish. In 1913 the fresh fish not of British taking landed on British shores worked out at two million three hundred thousand hundredweights, a large proportion being cod from Norway and the deep-sea fisheries. Thus the total of imported fresh fish equalled about a tenth of the British catch. But in the same year we imported also one million three hundred thousand hundredweights of canned and cured or salted fish, canned salmon alone accounting for six hundred thousand hundredweights. The curiosities of public taste in the matter are illustrated by the fact that, while in the year named we exported cured or salted fish (chiefly herrings) to the value of five million three hundred and thirty-one thousand and forty-two pounds, we imported canned fish (chiefly sardines, salmon, and lobster) to the value of three million two hundred and twenty-one thousand seven hundred and six pounds. It is here that a great change is foreshadowed. Why should imported salmon be canned? Soon after Canada despatched troops to take part in the war, the Dominion Government resolved to send them rations of fish. Major Hugh A. Green, of the Canadian Quartermaster-General's Staff, was appointed to organise supplies for camps and hospitals, and the experiment was so successful that it was extended to United Kingdom troops as well. The fish was transported in refrigerator steamers, and defrosted in cold water. Samples lately shown in London of fried sole from Prince Rupert and the Pacific, boiled cod and hake from the Atlantic western bank, halibut from Vancouver, and other fish were pronounced excellent. Experts believe the supply of such fish to be inexhaustible. Yet in the past it has remained untouched during half the year for lack of markets. Now one cold storage at St John's, Newfoundland, will hold twenty million pounds of frozen fish, and freezes a hundred thousand pounds daily. Lord Morris, long the Prime-Minister of Newfoundland, has given the weight of his authority to the view that with cold storage and proper collection there could be a great development of the trade with the Mother-Country. That opens up a new prospect, as hitherto Newfoundland has salted its surplus fish, and sold most of it to Greece, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Brazil.

Another subject that has attracted attention is that of making more use of certain kinds of fresh-water fish. Here, again, the Government have appointed a committee, who have already made an interim report. But the possibilities do not appear to be great, as they are in the case of sea-fish. The area of the lakes and the rivers of England and Wales is estimated at only three hundred and forty square miles, as against the one hundred and sixty-two thousand square miles of the North Sea; and most of the waters are privately owned. Lord Desborough, the chairman of the committee, estimates the annual growth of fish-life in the fresh waters of England and Wales at about two thousand tons, and the present stock at about four times the annual growth, an amount that would not go far as food. Of the fish caught that are available as food, trout, grayling, pike, perch, and eels are generally considered most worth eating. The committee 'believe that fishing for eels in the United Kingdom might be developed with advantage.' The taste for eels is not perhaps universally shared, but it exists, and the Fishery Departments are seeking to give effect to the committee's recommendation that the output be increased. Possibly even here something has been learned from the Germans, for the Fresh-Water Fish Committee, in a second interim report on eel culture, state that before the war the Germans established a large elver—young eel—catching depot on the Severn, whence about 80 per cent. of the total supply handled by the German Fisheries Association was exported to Germany for development. Now the authorities seem to be stimulated to emulation, for the Fresh-Water Fish Committee have, during the past season, supplied considerably more than a million elvers for stock, and the Lea Conservancy Board alone have placed fifty thousand in the rivers Lea and Stort.

Clearly it is mainly to the sea-fisheries that we must look for developments. There will be a call for men. Before the war rather more than a hundred thousand men and boys were engaged in the sea-fishing industry. Over 50 per cent. entered the naval service, and were employed in mine-sweeping and other dangerous occupations. Many lost their lives—sacrificed them for their country in its hour of trial. There will be a call for boats. In 1913 some four thousand steamers and about twenty thousand sailing-boats were available; but every one who watched the losses through submarine ruthlessness knows how steadily fishing-boats were put down. Many sinkings must be made good before the fishing-fleet recovers its former strength, to say nothing of necessary increase. So, too, with capital. It is difficult to discover the exact position, for estimates vary, but some have computed that the capital devoted to the fishing industry has hitherto amounted to only ten million pounds, which is a small sum in view of the results achieved and the possibilities ahead. But whether, as some suggest, the State should step in and take over the industry is another matter. The facts which have been cited show how diverse and widespread must be the interests concerned. Already the English, Scottish, and Irish Fishery Departments have done splendid service in giving direction to scientific knowledge, and in framing needful regulations for promoting all that is best in fishing enterprise. Perhaps it is in that direction that the State will continue chiefly to help. But the field is exceptional. Man grows the fruits of the earth by the sweat of his brow; but the fish of the sea are always ready to his hand, to be had for the simple labour of taking as he will. It is true that the taking may be often a matter of peril and of hardship, but none the less the harvest of the sea remains abundant and perennial; and when, with the coming of peace, men are able to turn their attention freely to it once again, the result, in increased food-supply for the people, will probably be more fruitful and more certain than in any other field of human endeavour.

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

CHAPTER XIX.

NOT a glimpse of the outer world was visible beyond occasional blades of light which came from the streets through an eye-hole in one of the blinds. The car was running evenly at, I guessed, some twenty miles an hour. Now and then it slowed down to thread its way among busy, rumbling streets; but gradually the traffic thinned, the fitful flickers of light from street-lamps and windows showed at lengthening intervals, the voice of the city fell to a mutter, and the car forged ahead at a much swifter pace. All the time I sat in intolerable suspense and inaction, without uttering a word.

My captor sat back in his corner in silence, smoking a cigar; nor did the other two men speak even to one another, beyond exchanging a whisper or two in Italian. I could not read the face of my watch; but, my hunter having no glass on its face, I felt the hands with my fingers, and made out that it was about a quarter to eleven.

I was wondering how long the strange journey would last, when the light was again switched on, and my vis-à-vis leaned forward.

'We shall leave the car soon,' he said. 'I must ask you to give me your word of honour that you will make no attempt to attract attention.'

'And if I refuse?'

'We shall be under the unpleasant necessity of gagging you before we leave the car. But I am unwilling to submit you to this indignity,' he rejoined, with odious politeness. 'As it is, I am afraid that we must blindfold you; but if you promise not to call out, this is the only liberty that I propose to take—at present.'

Argument or expostulation would have been alike useless; the compulsitor of events was too strong for me. The scoundrel meant what he said, and as the three of them could easily have overpowered and gagged me, resistance promised nothing except the certainty of further violence.

Swallowing my mortification, I replied as unconcernedly as I could, 'Very well; I promise.'

'I am obliged to you. I know that you will keep your promise. Now, be so good as to bind this over your eyes.'

He handed me a handkerchief. I blindfolded myself (not very carefully, I confess), and as I did so the car slowed round a sharp corner. The wheels crunched on soft gravel and came to a standstill.

'Now, Signor Forbes,' said my Naples friend, 'our little trip is at an end. Please accompany me. Remember your promise of silence.'

He put a muscular arm in mine, and one of the men took me by the wrist on the other side. The handkerchief was pulled down well over my eyes, the door of the car flung open, and I was led out and up a flight of five steps. After two or three paces forward I was taken into the warmth of a house, and, I thought, inside a hall. Here my coat and hat were taken from me, and the door was closed. The lock rasped, and without a moment's delay I was guided along a passage and into a room. Both the passage and the room, I noted, were to the right. Not until I was well inside the room did my captors release my arms and slip off the handkerchief. An electric light was switched on, and revealed to me a small apartment, uncarpeted, scantily furnished with a couch and a couple of chairs, and having a single heavily shuttered window in an embrasure. There was no fire, and the room had the unmistakable old musty smell of a place that had been shut up and disused for some time. The leader gave a nod to the others, who left the room at once.

'Where am I?' I began hotly.

'All in good time. I am not master here.'

'I know that. Your master is the man who calls himself "Wakeford." We know his real name, and I recognised him as well as you in the restaurant.'

'Is that so? I confess that I suspected you knew me. I may as well tell you that you are right about Mr Wakeford. He will arrive immediately. I ought to warn you that, unfortunately, he has not my easy temper. It is improbable that you will leave this house alive unless you completely satisfy him on certain points.'

In a gust of anger I took a couple of steps nearer him. He never blinked an eye, but with swift dexterity covered me with the revolver. There was no veneer of politeness in his voice now.

'I fear you also have a doubtful temper,' he growled. 'I counsel you to keep it on chain, for I warn you that you will not get two chances if you attempt any violence. By the way, what a fortunate accident it was that led you to the restaurant!'

'You are the man I met in the Naples train. My presence in the restaurant was not accidental. I went there to seek you.'

I lied boldly, but he was not put out in the least. With a shrug of his shoulders he sat down opposite me.

'Whether by accident or by design, your arrival was the one thing I wanted. As for the incident in the Naples train, Signor Forbes, I regard it as one of my most amusing experiences.' He put on his dark-rimmed spectacles, and gave me a villainous leer. 'I must compliment you upon your strong head. My cigar took a long time to induce repose.'

Just then a footstep sounded in the corridor. He backed to the door, keeping his wicked little eye on me, and admitted the tall, clean-shaven man who had joined him earlier in the evening. Then, silently, he left the room. The new-comer locked the door, and having motioned me to a chair, sat down on the opposite side of the empty fireplace, and, without a word, took some papers from his pocket. At close quarters the lines of his handsome face bespoke resolution, even ruthlessness. Having turned over the papers with a white and delicate hand, he selected one, glanced at its contents, then leaned back in his chair and addressed me with well-bred composure.

'I am unwilling, Mr Forbes, to cause you more inconvenience than is necessary, and I am anxious to give you your liberty at the earliest possible moment, but your liberty, and indeed your future, depend on your prudence and good sense.'

'I am in no mood for circumlocution,' I said coldly. 'Pray come to the point at once!'

'Your directness is all in your favour. I am of your mind. Let us waste no time. You have, or you had, in your possession a document which I must get from you. It was taken by you one day last month from the little house in the Italian village of Ubriano after the Englishman died. The document was stolen from its rightful owners, whom I represent.'

'Surely the simple course is to send for the police,' I rejoined.

His face relaxed in a flicker of a smile. 'Ah! The police! Believe me, I am not one of those who underrate your Criminal Investigation Department. Indeed'—again the faint smile—'no one, if I may say so, is more familiar with its methods than I. But I do not propose to invite its excellent assistance in a matter like this, which, believe me, requires delicate handling.'

I thought of the drugged cigar in Italy and the knock-out blow from which I had barely recovered, and raised my eyebrows.

'I am sorry,' said he. 'Coarse methods are repellent to me, but they were necessary. One cannot always choose one's instruments. You must give me the document.'

'Must?'

His eye met mine steadily, and a hard ring came into his voice.

'Realise at once that if the document is not forthcoming you do not see daylight again. I have neither the time nor the inclination for half-measures. Do you pretend that no paper was taken away from the Englishman Forbes?'

'I do not,' I said, for I saw little to be gained by evasion; 'but it is not in my hands. It is with its rightful owner.'

'Rightful owner!' There was a contemptuous frown on his brow, but he leaned forward with an eager note in his voice. 'His name?'

'I will not tell you,' I answered firmly. 'If the document was, as you say, stolen, I repeat that your remedy is to inform the police. When and where was it stolen, and by whom?'

'That is beside the question. It was given to you by the Englishman Forbes, or stolen by you after his death.'

I kept a tight rein on my temper, for I had an idea that I might be on the track of useful information.

'Let us assume that it did come into my hands,' I said. 'Your associate who has just left us tries, with the aid of a drugged cigar, to steal it from me in a railway-carriage. He fails; and the next time I see him, he arranges with you to have me knocked senseless and kidnapped. Do these methods strike you as likely to be employed by honest men trying to get their own property back? Your name is not Wakeford. You are one of The Searchers!'

Surprised out of his real or assumed imperturbability, he sat up suddenly, frowning, his eyes fixed on mine.

'What can you—— Pshaw!' He snapped his fingers contemptuously. 'What conception have you of our Society? Any country policeman knows of your ludicrous British imitations of it. We—the Brotherhood—flourished long before any of your mushroom Ancient Orders of This, That, and The Other Tomfooleries in England were thought of. It is centuries old. It has its traditions, its history, and its rules, and—one of them has been broken.'

'Yes. I know that you have been outwitted lately,' I said coolly. It was a random shot. I had not the least idea what his reference to a rule having been broken meant, but his next words—'Whence comes your knowledge?'—told me that I had found a joint in his harness.

'That I propose to keep to myself,' I said. 'But you know that it is accurate. Meanwhile, I warn you that my absence will be remarked, and I am willing to make a sporting bet that your Society of peculiar methods—The Searchers—traditions or no traditions, will soon be heartily sorry that they laid their hands on me. If I am not set free in another half-hour, my friends, who, I assure you, know the position, will find me.'

'Alive?'

'Alive or dead.' I thought that my answer was unexpected, for he frowned, but said nothing; and I went on: 'But if I am dead, you cannot fail to see that your object is defeated once and for all. "Dead men tell no tales" is a two-edged saying.'

He did not reply immediately. Watching him, I had more than a suspicion that under his cool mask he was weighing my words. His vertical frown deepened, and a momentary twitching of his throat was a plain sign of disquiet. From that moment, too, his voice lost something of its arrogance. This man, I thought, was more highly strung than the Naples knave.

'What do you mean?'

'My words were plain enough. Unless I am set free at once from this trap, you and your associates will get your deserts. I think Scotland Yard has a few scores to settle.'

'I can only assume that you do not realise the position you are in. Foolhardiness offends my sense of proportion. You must be aware that you are completely at my mercy. This room, if I but lift a finger, becomes your oubliette. This is my last word. I will not alter my terms. You will never—never, you understand—be seen or heard of again if I do not receive from you the document taken from Italy.'

'My answer is also final. We understand each other. I will not discuss the subject further.'

He walked slowly to the door, and having unlocked it, turned to me a face pale with anger and disappointment.

'Nous verrons! Meanwhile, pleasant dreams, Mr Forbes!' The door closed behind him, the key turned in the lock, and his footsteps soon died away.

I went to the door and listened intently. A curious noise like the faint rumble of traffic, but coming from within the house, reached me. I caught its sound a few minutes after I had been left alone, at first low and indefinite, afterwards louder, until I likened it to the purring of some monstrous animal. I should have put it down to the starting of the motor-car, had not the purring gone on steadily for a quarter of an hour. Then it ceased altogether, and there fell a silence so uncanny that after another quarter of an hour I came to the conclusion that my quarters were cut off from the rest of the house, and that the walls were deadened.

Ordinarily, the thought of being spirited away in civilised, police-rated London would have been too fantastic, but the thing had happened! Within a short distance of Scotland Yard, I had fallen into the hands of a gang of dexterous scoundrels who would stick at nothing to gain their ends. The swiftness and the cunning which had plucked me out of the lighted London streets made it plain that The Searchers had diabolical resources and organisation. I confess that I was badly frightened; but after a few minutes' sterile brooding, I resolutely abandoned conjuring up cases of mysterious disappearance, and turned to an examination of the room.

A strict inspection of it put any attempt at prison-breaking out of my mind. The locked door was massive, the shutters of the window were secured by padlocked iron bars, not a crevice showed in the walls, and the chimney was narrow and impassable. There was nothing for it but to nurse my nerves till the coming of morning, and present a bold front to my captors.

One circumstance heartened me. It was evident that my knowledge of The Searchers was totally unexpected by their leader. In ignorance of how much my friends and I knew, he might shrink from the consequence to himself of even undiscovered murder, for it was obvious that his one desire was to lay hands on the paper. Foul play to me would make his chances of getting possession of it a thousand times worse.

(Continued on page 292.)

OFF THE BEATEN TRACK IN THE WEST INDIES.

By the Rev. MONTAGUE L. FOYLE.

THE average Briton probably knows nothing of the Dutch West Indian colony of Curaçao; even to the ordinary Dutchman it is little more than a name. The Hollander has found the East Indies more attractive than the West; and Java, Sumatra, and Borneo have offered ample scope for Dutch colonial enterprise. In the West, Surinam, with its vast unexplored interior stretching away towards Brazil, its extensive river-system, its possibilities for the gold-digger, and its wonderfully fertile soil, has naturally exercised most fascination for Hollanders whose lot was cast in that part of the world. But Curaçao holds the proud distinction of being the premier Dutch colony, having belonged to the Mother-Country since 1634.

The colony consists entirely of islands, six in all, which fall into two distinct groups. The southern group comprises Curaçao, Bonaire, and Aruba, all adjacent to the coast of Venezuela, and sharing in the general features of the mainland. The inhabitants of this group are largely Venezuelan in origin; Roman Catholic in faith, they speak a manufactured language, called Papiamento, without syntax or grammar, a compound of Spanish, Dutch, English, and native words. The northern group of islands is some five hundred miles away, and embraces Saba, half of St Martin, and St Eustatius, all adjacent to the British Leeward Island of St Kitts. This group is English-speaking, and overwhelmingly Protestant. All the islands are small. The total area of the entire colony is four hundred and five square miles, with a population of some fifty-seven thousand. The area of the northern group is only about thirty square miles. The capital is Willemstad, on the island of Curaçao.

It is the purpose of this article to give some account of St Martin and St Eustatius. Small and insignificant though the former may seem—its total area is less than forty square miles—it is yet remarkable for the fact that it belongs to two of the nations of Europe, being almost equally divided between France and Holland. The northern side of the island is occupied by the French, and the southern by the Dutch. There is an elevated ridge of rugged hills which forms a natural boundary. According to local tradition, the division was arrived at in a very simple way. The French and the Dutch found themselves on the island simultaneously, and agreed to a peaceful partition. So a French soldier walked to the right, and a Dutch soldier to the left. Round the island they marched till they met, and the dividing line was drawn from their starting-point to their place of meeting. The local name of Concordia is supposed to commemorate the scene of this harmonious arrangement. The two communities have always lived on good terms, despite the fact that two faiths, two sets of laws, two capitals, and two official languages are all contained in some thirty to forty square miles.

St Eustatius, or, as it is called locally, 'Statia, has experienced many vicissitudes, especially during the Napoleonic wars. The island was first colonised by the Dutch in the early part of the seventeenth century, and was soon declared a free port for the ships of all nations. As such it became a centre of trade and commerce unsurpassed by any West Indian island, and was a rich and coveted prize. It won the name of 'The Golden Rock,' and nation after nation struggled for its possession. In 1665 the Dutch were expelled by the English. Then France and Holland united and turned out the conquerors, holding the island jointly till by the Treaty of Breda in 1667 it was given back to Holland. War soon broke out again, and the island was captured by the French, who were ejected by the English, who restored the island to Holland at the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. The island was captured for the British by Rodney, whose work of destruction will never be forgotten. There fell into his hands a warship of sixty guns, several merchant-vessels, and property on the shore valued at four million pounds sterling. Seldom have eight square miles yielded such a prize to a conqueror. But his triumph was short-lived, for the French descended from Martinique, and again the island changed hands. And so 'Statia continued to be the shuttlecock of the nations till the general Peace of Paris in 1814, when it was finally restored to Holland, whose property it has been ever since. Like St Martin, the island has greatly deteriorated, and can scarcely now be regarded as a prize worth capturing. The ever-increasing influence of America in the West Indies has been greatly enhanced by the recent transfer to the U.S.A. of the Danish islands of St Thomas, St Croix, St Jan, and Santa Cruz, an event which has naturally raised once more in the neighbouring small Dutch islands the question of annexation. So far, the sentiment of the Mother-Country has proved loyal to her little possessions. But the influence of America is strong, and emigration to the States is unceasing. Only very occasionally does one hear of a native of these islands making a home and living in Holland.

No steamers call at these isolated spots, and consequently they are seldom visited by tourists. Basseterre, in St Kitts, is the nearest steamer port of call, and the traveller who goes on board the small one-masted sailing-vessel to cover the twenty miles to 'Statia, or the forty to St Martin, must be prepared for the terrors of the ocean. Sloops are not built for passenger comfort; it can never be said for certain when a start will be made, and it can never be foretold when the destination will be reached; all depends on the wind. Cabin accommodation is primitive. There may be a torrential tropical downpour, but usually during the day-time the fierce, merciless sun beats down on the sea. Constant tacking may necessitate double the distance being covered, whilst in the narrow channel between the islands the current may run high and the sea be lashed into fury. Especially during the hurricane season from July to October is sloop travelling dangerous, and it is noteworthy that in both islands that particular period of the year is ushered in by a special official divine service of intercession, and is closed by one of thanksgiving. But once the islands are reached, there is much to interest the visitor. 'Statia's magnificent white cliffs, called the 'White Walls,' remind the Englishman of the cliffs of Dover as seen from Calais. The island, which is really an extinct volcano, rises from the sea like a huge cone with the top cut off, and presents a magnificent view. The little town of Oranjestad is approached by a steep path cut out in the face of the cliff. The old fort stormed by Rodney still stands, and is used as court, post-office, and prison. The ruined Dutch Reformed Church, with its ancient vaults, is of great interest. Several large dilapidated graveyards scattered around the town testify to the size of the population a century ago. The Jewish burial-ground, unused for many a year, shows the former influence of the Dutch Jew. Horseback is the method of travel, and the ride round the island reveals a succession of ruined estates. The ascent of the Quill, as the top of the volcano is called, is the sight of the island. The view from the summit is grand beyond description. On a clear day six other islands can be seen, whilst the whole of St Eustatius lies mapped out at the traveller's feet. The descent can also be made into the deep crater, from which there once flowed streams of lava. Now it is densely overgrown with luxuriant vegetation. The mountain cone has been described as one of the most romantic spots in the West Indies.

Philipsburg, the capital of Dutch St Martin, stands on a spacious bay with a small signal-station at the entrance, boasting the proud title of Fort Amsterdam. Behind the town are extensive salt-ponds, the island's chief source of revenue. A large area of land is flooded by the sea, the water is allowed to evaporate, and the salt is then 'picked.' It is a pity that St Martin is not better known. One experienced missionary wrote: 'It is unsurpassed in its romantic scenery, presenting to the traveller such a variety of mountain and valley, hill and dale, as can hardly be found anywhere in the torrid zone.'

Both islands suffer much from drought. St Eustatius has neither river nor brook, and the water obtained by sinking wells is so impregnated with salt that it cannot be used for domestic purposes. Horses and cattle will, however, readily drink it. Whence, then, do the inhabitants obtain water for household use? The answer is, from the clouds. Rain-water is universally used. The houses are furnished along the eaves with gutters which, instead of leading the rain away into drains, conduct it to large cisterns prepared for its reception. Among the first questions asked in taking a house in these dry islands are: 'What is the state of the roof and the guttering?' and 'Does it possess a cistern?' The quality of the water is another vital point. That from a sheet-iron roof is generally cleaner than that from a shingled roof. The question, 'When were the shingles last painted?' is also of importance. Rain-water has a regular market-value, and during a drought its price steadily advances as cistern after cistern is emptied. The possession of a good cistern means a substantial income for the fortunate owner. The soil is naturally fertile, and, despite the limited rainfall, produces excellent crops of yams, cassava, sisal, sweet potatoes, sea-island cotton, and arrowroot. 'Statia is a regular port of call for the South American whalers, who depart loaded up with provisions. But it must be confessed that since the abolition of slavery, with its cheap and abundant labour, the islands have not been developed on any large scale, and have been allowed to run to waste somewhat. Till quite recently modern methods of agriculture were unknown, and the small holding worked with the hoe, whilst giving a very satisfactory income to the petty planter, has not tended to the development of the islands and the opening up of uncultivated lands.

The population consists chiefly of coloured and black people descended from the slaves, with a small proportion of white folk, the descendants of old Dutch settlers. Perhaps in no part of the West Indies do the people stand so near to slavery days. Emancipation was granted only in 1863; ex-slaves are still alive; and such phrases as 'emancipated people,' 'when we got free,' and 'I belonged to the family of So-and-so' are in general vogue. The coinage and the postage-stamps are specially prepared for the colony, the stamps being much sought after by philatelists. The doubloon and the piece-of-eight of pirate fame are occasionally met with. The national songs are most patriotic; witness the following translations:

Who Neerlands blood feel nobly flow in current pure and free,
Whose hearts for queen and country glow, come raise the song as we,
With hearts alive and spirits gay, attuned from breasts serene,
The soul-inspiring festal lay of Fatherland and Queen.

Or again:

I to William of Nassau and to the Fatherland
Do plight my troth for ever,
With brain and heart and hand and wealth and blood,
Yea, dear life hold ready for the call,
To yield them up as freely as William gave them all.

Lastly, it may be mentioned that whilst each island is under the general supervision of His Excellency the Governor-General of the colony, yet they all enjoy well-organised local self-government. Each boasts a resident governor or gezaghebber (frequently a Dutchman, and always appointed direct from Holland), a court, a queen's attorney, local councillors or landraaden elected by ballot, a harbour-master, a small detachment of Dutch military, a doctor, a staff of qualified school teachers, a Protestant minister, and a Roman priest.

JOHN BROWN.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D., and the Doctor; &c.

CHAPTER XV.—MOTHER COMES TO SCHOOL.

YOU will have gathered ere now what a dear old soul my mater is. How tender her love! How trusting in all things! To an artist she is a dream-picture. So quaint, yet so dignified; so innocent, yet so human. When dressed in black brocade, with white collar and cuffs, with her silver-haired ringlets hanging on each side of her head, she looks a charming Victorian—just the sort of old lady you see stepping out of an ancient picture-gallery. She is of the past—the beautiful past—when life was slow, yet kind and true.

She lives in a rustic manor in sleepy old Berks. There she is sheltered from the storms. Her four interests in life are The Times, the Tory Party, her Wyandottes, and—ME. Whatever our modern Delanes say, my mater endorses with emphasis. When Lloyd George was appointed Premier, she had no sleep for four nights, and had it not been for the reassuring leader in The Times, the mater might have been tempted to stuff a bomb in a highly flavoured dead Wyandotte and send it to 10 Downing Street. However, I did my best to assure her that David was thoroughly respectable, and that his Conservative colleagues would keep him in order. That ended all opposition.

She has implicit faith in me. I am the idol of her heart. This devotion is really embarrassing. I am not worthy of it. Now, the mater loathes liquor, and she has a dread of girls. Her boy must be kept from the bottle and the hussies at all costs. In this age—indeed, in all ages—that has been impracticable. But it made me a sort of hypocrite, for I would not have shattered that dear old lady's illusions for all the wealth of Carnegie. Yet, somehow, I also felt that her sweet faith always kept me within bounds. A man could not be a bounder with a mother like Mrs John Brown. Still, like all youths, I was having my 'fling,' and out of your 'fling' comes strength or ruin. Life is a series of temptations. The man who can taste and leave them goes forward. The man who is ensnared is damned.

We have all got to go through the mill.

As I have said, the mater is innocent in affairs of the world, especially in military matters. She mixes things up. For example, an 'offensive' she thought was a nasty smell at the front. One day she inquired, 'John, when are they going to make Douglas Haig a sergeant-major? I am sure he deserves it. Don't you think I should write to The Times?'

'You mean a field-marshal, mater.'

'What 's that?'

'Oh, field-marshal is the highest. He carries a baton.'

'What a common thing to do!'

'Why, mater?'

'Well, I thought it was only plain policemen who did that. The army is very strange, my boy.'

I did my best to enlighten the dear old lady, but I had no success. When colonels and majors came to tea, she called them corporals or sergeants, to the enjoyment of all. They never disillusioned her. She was such a kind old soul. And now that I am a military cadet, she has got the idea that I am a most important person. She confided in Aunt Jane's ear that I should soon be a 'brass hat.'

'What 's that?' asked Aunt Jane.

'Oh, the pretty men who ride in front of the band and give orders.'

'How nice!'

Aunt Jane is mater's youngest sister. She is almost forty-five, unmarried, quite a fine woman to look at, and a good soul. When I was at school she used to send me mince-pies, plum-puddings, and cigarettes. (Mater didn't know about the cigarettes.)

The greatest weakness the old lady has is jumping to conclusions. Like a silly ass, I had written and said I had caught a cold on a route march, owing to the awful weather.

She replied:

'MY DEAREST BOY,—How shocked I was to hear you had got a cold on such a day! It is abominable to think that boys are taken out on a wet day. You might have died! I am so annoyed about this that I have asked our Member to put a question in the House. I have also written to The Times. It is shocking!—Your loving MOTHER.'

When I got this I almost had apoplexy. Something had to be done. I wired the Member: 'For Heaven's sake, don't put mother's question: writing.' And I also wired to The Times. That saved the situation.

The mater couldn't understand war, nor did she realise that soldiers are not mollycoddles. She didn't mind my dying at the front, but she did object to my getting a cold at home. Rather a mixed-up point of view, but quite motherly. And there are lots of mothers like that, as I have since discovered.

This route march incident apparently decided her visit to our school. Aunt Jane was invited to accompany her. She was delighted. The two old dears simply wired: 'Coming to see you. Ask the rector to let you off.'

The rector! How the old 'com.' would have laughed if he had seen the telegram! The mater gave me no clue as to how she would come, or when I might expect her. However, I knew Aunt Jane would look after her. Meantime, I asked all my pals to have tea with the ladies at the local hotel. I insisted particularly on Nobby's coming, for I knew she would like to see the Radical.

There was going to be fun.

Unfortunately I was not about when they landed. They came from the junction by motor-car, and were deposited at the gate.

'I don't see John,' said the mater.

'Never mind! We'll soon find him.'

The first man they saw was the commandant. He was looking well that day—the picture of a powerful mandarin. The ladies got a little nervous. They wondered whether the 'com.' was a fierce sergeant-major or a regimental policeman. He was so impressive! But they tackled him.

'Can you tell me where to find the rector? I want to see my son,' said the mater.

'I'm afraid, madam, there's no rector here,' the old man said with a smile on his face.

'Oh, well, the manager, or whatever you call him. I really don't know the right terms.'

'Well, I'm the commandant.'

'Then you must be the head-master.'

'Exactly!' The colonel blinked. He loathed these civilian terms.

'My boy's name is John Brown.'

'Indeed! He is a very bright boy. I am delighted to meet you. Will you ladies kindly come into the anteroom?' The old sport took them into the mess and gave them afternoon tea. Mother and Aunt Jane enjoyed this immensely.

'I hope you see my boy wears flannel next his skin. He's rather delicate, you know,' ventured the old lady.

'Oh, yes. The boys have a platoon commander who acts as a sort of mother. He spanks them when they are naughty, and tucks them up at night.'

'Does John ever give you trouble?'

'Not a bit! He has never been before me. Your boy is a great credit to you. I'm awfully proud of him. Do have some more tea.'

Wasn't the old 'com.' playing the game?

Meantime a dozen officers were scouring the school for me. They discovered me in the gym. having a bayonet-fight with Beefy.

'Come along, Brown. Look smart! Your mother and a friend are here.'

'Oh, thanks, sir.'

I was over at the mess door in a jiffy. As the tea-party was over, the 'com.' and the ladies came out.

'Here's your boy, Mrs Brown. Now, off you go. He may have leave for the day. Good-bye.'

I led them away, and all I could get out of them was, 'What a delightful old gentleman!' Aunt Jane was quite struck with the commandant, and bluntly asked if he was married.

'He's a widower.'

'How interesting!' That was all she said, but I wondered! I wondered!

'Here's our hut, mater.'

As we entered Ginger and Beefy hurriedly pushed some liqueur-bottles under the blankets, while Tosher discreetly flung a rug over a series of wall pictures taken out of the Sketch and the Tatler.

'This is the Reverend Billy Greens.'

'How pleasant to meet you, Mr Greens! I am so glad you and my boy go to prayers so often.'

'Yes, we are great friends,' said Billy, tactfully evading discussion of what really was a terminological inexactitude invented by me.

Ginger and Tosher were next introduced, and then came Nobby.

'Ah! I wanted to meet you, Mr Clarke. You really don't look like a Radical at all. You are much too nice for that.'

'I'm being converted, Mrs Brown,' said Nobby maliciously.

'How splendid!'

'What do you think of our happy home, mater?'

'Well, it does look untidy. And what a lot of papers and books.' She picked up the Tatler.

'John! Do you read this?' she said, pointing to a wonderful picture by 'Fish.'

'Well—no, mater. The Red Cross send us old magazines to use for shaving-papers.'

'I am so glad,' she returned.

I did feel a rotten hypocrite.

'Now, do all of you sleep in those little wooden things?' pointing to the trestle-beds.

'Oh, yes.'

'Dear me! I thought you only got those things in jail. Oh! What's that?' she exclaimed, spotting Adela's photo over my bed. She went nearer, put up her pince-nez. 'Dear, dear! A girl! A girl, John!'

'An old friend, mater. She's—she's really quite nice. Her uncle is a vicar.'

'Does she live near here?'

'Well—not quite.'

'I must speak to you about this later.' Then she turned to the boys again, and had a pleasant chat.

Meantime I had got two cars, and pushed the party into them. We sailed off to the local hotel, where we had a ripping tea. Poor Aunt Jane wasn't in the piece, for mother had so many things to ask my friends. They gathered round her, and she simply treated them as her own little boys. Even Ginger enjoyed it. It was so natural, so human, so much like his own dear mater, who was—dead. Her whole concern was about their boots, their clothing, and their spiritual welfare. And did they write every day to their mothers, like her own dear John? Tosher, the materialist, fell head over ears in love with the dear old mater. She taught him to appreciate this fact, that the strength of the Old Country lies in the wonderful women who have suckled a manly and virile race. The party was all too short, and the ladies were sorry to go. We escorted them to the station. Tosher, with true Canadian generosity, bought a huge box of chocolates; Beefy presented some flowers to Aunt Jane; and Ginger, Nobby, and Billy loaded them up with magazines and books.

'You dear, dear boys!' said mother.

'Good-bye, mater.'

'Good-bye, Aunt Jane,' they all shouted as the two dearest women in the world were whirled away on the south express.

'Good-bye, dear boys. And, John'—— mother shouted.

'Yes, mater?'

'Button up your collar—it 's cold!'

. . . . . .

'DEAR JOHN,—Will you thank all your friends for such a delightful time? They are such nice boys. By the way, I've found out that your commandant has a sister in the next village.

'We are going to call next week.

'AUNT JANE.'

(Continued on page 312.)

THE 'BLOODY FALL' MURDER.

By GEORGE C. WELLS.

I.

SOME few years ago two priests of the Oblate Order, Fathers Rouvier and Le Roux, went into the Far North of Canada to labour among the Eskimo. At first they were highly pleased with the docility and the friendliness of those strange primitive people, and wrote back glowing accounts of the hospitable manner in which they were received. They were given the best of everything; and so polite were the Eskimo that, when the fathers happened to visit one of their homes, the owners would even ask permission for themselves to enter. The latest message received from them was dated in 1913, and was to the effect that they would accompany the Eskimo as they moved farther north to the sea.

After the lapse of several months their friends began to fear that something had befallen them, and early in 1915 Inspector La Nauze of the Royal North-West Mounted Police (that fine body of men which maintains law and order throughout the wilder regions of the great Dominion) was sent out from Regina (the capital of Saskatchewan and headquarters of the Royal North-West Mounted Police) with instructions to ascertain their fate. At the Peace River Crossing in Alberta (three hundred and twelve miles north of Edmonton) he was joined by two constables. Proceeding viâ the Peace and Slave Rivers, Great Slave Lake, and the Mackenzie River to Fort Norman, where the Great Bear River joins the Mackenzie, the party was augmented at that point by two special constables, one of them an Eskimo named Ilavinik, who acted as interpreter.

It was not supposed at that time that the priests' disappearance would be accounted for by foul play, the belief being that they had died of cold and hunger or had met with some accident; but Indians whom Inspector La Nauze's party met near Fort Norman stated that some of the Coppermine Eskimo living at the mouth of the river of that name were wearing 'church shirts,' whose ownership they declined to explain, and told the inspector further that they feared the fathers had been killed for what they possessed.

After hearing what the Indians had to say, the inspector determined to make for the mouth of the Coppermine, but so difficult is travelling in that country, and so great are the distances, that, while the party left Fort Norman towards the end of July, they did not reach the point where the Coppermine empties into that arm of the Arctic Ocean known as Coronation Gulf until late in the following spring, having been obliged to winter en route.

Eskimo encountered on the journey were curious to know what the white men wanted, but were simply told that they had come, under orders from the 'Big White Chief,' to show them what was right and what wrong, and nothing was said about the missing priests for fear of arousing antagonism.

II.

On the shores of Coronation Gulf the party met Corporal Bruce, whose headquarters were at Herschel Island (lat. 69½° N., long. 139° W.) —most western, most northerly, and, probably, most desolate and lonesome of all the Royal North-West Mounted Police posts—but who was then travelling with the Canadian Arctic Expedition engaged in survey-work. Bruce had with him a number of articles belonging to the two fathers, which he had found in Eskimo caches or had purchased in their villages. Among them were a cassock marked 'R. Père Rouvier,' a crucifix, a rosary, and a couple of books, one of them a Latin breviary with Father Le Roux's name written in it.

Shortly afterwards Eskimo in a village which was visited by the searchers told them that the priests had been murdered, and by whom; and in the same village they located a man named Koeha, who impressed them as being particularly truthful, and who said he had visited the scene of the tragedy, and gave a detailed account of it.

The place where the murder had been committed already bore a sinister reputation, and was known as 'Bloody Fall,' for the reason that there, when Samuel Hearne,* of the Hudson's Bay Company, visited the spot in 1771, being the first white man to reach it, the Indians accompanying him fell upon a number of Eskimo spearing salmon, and exterminated the whole band.

The information received warranted Inspector La Nauze in ordering the arrest of two Eskimo named Sinnisiak and Uluksuk, who were located after a long sled-journey across the ice of Coronation Gulf to Victoria Land, and who surrendered without resistance. Sinnisiak was discovered sitting on some skins in his hut, engaged in making a bow. When the inspector and the constables entered he looked up and asked what they had come for, to which Ilavinik replied they had come to take him away. 'What for?' 'You kill two priests.' Then, 'You going to kill me?' Sinnisiak demanded, and the interpreter answered, 'No; nobody going to kill you, but you got to come along.' Ilavinik, in relating the story of the arrest, said further, 'He say he no want to come. I tell inspector, and inspector say he got to come. I tell him, and he come.'

The other man was arrested in just as simple a manner.

Under preliminary examination by the inspector, both men confessed to killing the priests, but claimed that the latter had beaten them and threatened them with their rifles, and that the killing had been done in self-defence.

As by this time it was late in the summer of 1916, and it would have been extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reach civilisation before winter set in, the inspector decided to take his prisoners to Herschel Island, and there remain until the spring. And a dreary enough time he and his party must have had! The island is but twenty-three miles in circumference; it has neither drinking-water nor fuel; and for six months of the year it lies in almost complete darkness.

As soon as navigation opened in the spring of 1917, a start for the south was made, the party consisting of Inspector La Nauze and the two prisoners, Corporal Bruce, two constables, Ilavinik, the Eskimo Koeha, who was taken along as the most important witness, and a sixteen-year-old boy named Patsy Klengenberg. Patsy's father was a Dane or a Norwegian, and his mother an Eskimo, and, being bright and intelligent and able to speak English as well as his mother's tongue, he was engaged as an improvement on Ilavinik as interpreter.

The long journey of the inspector, covering some six thousand miles, was completed when, the last stages from Vermilion Chutes on the Peace River having been performed by 'up-to-date' steamer and railway train, he landed his charges safely in Edmonton, the capital of the province of Alberta. There court was opened on August 14 before the Chief-Justice of Alberta, a great deal of interest being taken in the trial. Incidentally, it may be said that the sittings had to be limited to two hours, as that was as long as the Eskimo, accustomed to a cold climate, could stand the warm atmosphere of the court-room.

III.

The men were charged first with the murder of Father Rouvier. Relics of the unfortunate priest's belongings were displayed in court, including a rifle and a diary kept by Father Rouvier, very much dilapidated, but still decipherable, in which the last entry contained in French the following significant statement under date October 15, 1913: 'Foot of Bloody Fall. Arrived at mouth of Coppermine River. Some families have already gone. Disappointed with the Eskimo. Threatened with starvation, and don't know what to do.'

The story of the tragic event, as brought out by the evidence and the confessions of the prisoners themselves, seems to have been as follows. The friendly feeling at first displayed by the Eskimo had evaporated. Their food-supplies ran short, and the fathers were no longer welcome. Some of the young men coveted the wonderful rifles and other possessions of the white men. One of the rifles was stolen, the thief claiming, when charged with what he had done, that Father Le Roux had promised it to him. Though it was given back, friction increased; and at last the situation became so strained that the priests decided to leave the Eskimo village and return to the nearest point at which they had left supplies en cache, some nine days' journey distant. Koeha, the witness, testified that he accompanied them part way on the first day's journey and helped them with their dog-sled. Next day they were overtaken by Sinnisiak and Uluksuk, who were travelling light, having only one dog and little ammunition, and who said they were going to meet a party of friends. After some bargaining, they agreed to help to pull the sled. All went well the first day, and when night came the priests cooked supper, while the Eskimo built a snow house, in which all four slept.

Next morning there was a snowstorm, and the going was heavy. The Eskimo did not want to get into harness again, and there was a dispute about the road. The situation had become desperate for the priests—their food was running low and they had a long distance to cover. So they resorted to intimidation, and when the Eskimo declined to proceed, they forced them to do so at the point of the rifle.

Finally, Sinnisiak made an excuse to get out

* It was Hearne who, as governor of Fort Prince of Wales (Churchill), surrendered it in 1782 to the French under La Pérouse, without attempting any resistance.

of the harness and manœuvred so as to come behind Father Le Roux, whom he then struck in the back with his knife. The priest fell in the snow, and Sinnisiak called to Uluksuk to give him the rifle, which was on top of the sled. 'Then,' said he tersely, in telling the story, 'I finished him.'

Father Rouvier was unarmed, and started to run away, but was shot by Uluksuk. As he was not killed by the bullet, both knife and axe were brought into requisition, and an end was made of him also.

Then the two Eskimo cut open the bodies of their victims, and ate a small piece of the liver from each. This was done, according to their story, 'so they wouldn't come back.' Uluksuk said he had been told by his grandfather to take this precaution if he ever killed a white man.

Taking the rifles, the Eskimo returned to their village; and next day a party, including Koeha, the witness himself, came and divided up the remainder of the spoil.

There was no doubt about the killing—that was admitted by the accused—but there was some uncertainty as to the motive. The Eskimo declared that they feared the fathers were going to force them to go a long way and then kill them, and that they were quite innocent of any evil designs when they overtook the priests on their last journey; and so skilfully did the counsel for the defence handle the case that the jury of Edmonton citizens brought in a verdict of 'Not Guilty.'

IV.

The Government was not satisfied with this result, and as public feeling in Edmonton was very much in sympathy with the accused, and there was no likelihood of a different verdict if the prisoners were put on trial there on the second charge (that of killing Father Le Roux), it was decided to hold the other trial at Calgary. The prisoners accordingly were removed to that city, and again faced a judge and jury. This time a verdict of 'Guilty' was returned, it being proven that they had pursued the priests with intent to kill, so as to obtain possession of the coveted rifles and other effects. The presiding judge told the accused, through the medium of the boy interpreter Patsy, that they had been found guilty of killing the priests, which they had no right to do, and that, according to the law, when a man did that he had to give his own life in return. However, he would himself send word to the 'Great White Chief,' and perhaps he would not be too hard on them. Sentence of death was pronounced; but, on a strong recommendation to Ottawa, this was commuted to life imprisonment. For the place of incarceration the Royal North-West Mounted Police post at Herschel Island was chosen, the climatic conditions there best suiting the prisoners' constitutions. They were sent north under guard during September to be kept at Fort Resolution (on Great Slave Lake) till spring, it being too late to reach Herschel that season. It is pretty well understood that, while the sentence is for life, the murderers will be released after a time and allowed to return to their friends, among whom, it is hoped, their experience will have a salutary effect in protecting the lives of any white men who may chance to visit Canada's Arctic regions.

From the time Inspector La Nauze set out from Regina to the departure of the prisoners under sentence nearly two and a half years elapsed. Much hardship was undergone, many perils were faced, and a very considerable amount of expense was incurred; but it was considered very necessary that the Eskimo wards of the Canadian Government should be taught respect for human life, and that the writs of Lex Britannica should be shown to run even within the Arctic Circle.

To the credit of the prisoners—and of their captors as well—it may be said that they were never once handcuffed or locked up. While at Calgary the prisoners and the witnesses shared the guardroom together, with only a constable on guard outside to prevent an escape if one were attempted. Wonderful were the sights seen by the Eskimo on this their first journey into the White Man's country—electric light, water-taps, trains, steamboats, automobiles, and tram-cars were marvels indeed; and the tales that will be told in the igloos along the Coppermine River and Coronation Gulf will far surpass in interest any that the most fluent story-teller has had at his command heretofore.

THE LADS THAT WERE.

THE foeman is vanquished; we triumph and mourn;
And it's oh for the lads that will never return!
For silent the hill-tops, the corrie is lone;
From their nest in the aerie the eaglets are flown.
The maids and the mothers are waiting afar;
But they'll ne'er see the lads coming home from the war.
Dark, dark lies the moorland, deserted the shore;
For the lads will return to the shealing no more.

In vain comes the spring-tide, the woods to adorn;
Sere, sere lies the oak that the tempest has torn.
Though it's far o'er the uplands the lassies may roam,
Soft, soft sleep the lads that will never come home.
Ye may pluck the pale primrose that grows by the burn;
But the stream shall run dry ere the laddies return.
And it's oh for a voice, for a foot at the door;
But they'll meet their dear lads in the gloaming no more.

Ye fathers, arise in your sorrow and pride,
And tell of the death that the dear laddies died;
Ye mothers and orphans, uplift your sad eyes,
Where new constellations are set in the skies.
They died that the land of the proud and the brave
Shall ne'er be dishonoured by tyrant or slave;
And matchless the fame, as their fathers' of yore,
Of the lads who'll return to the shealing no more.

HILDA SKAE.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE WAR AND THE PLANETS: STRIKING COINCIDENCES.

By JOHN J. ROSS, M.A., B.A.

I.

IN connection with the terrible world-wide war waged during the past five calendar years, there have been several remarkable instances of coincidence in time between prominent celestial occurrences and terrestrial events. Without suggesting for a moment that there was any relationship, other than accidental, between the two, it may be of interest to point out a few of the cases which seem specially worthy of note.

Among those major planets whose orbits are more remote from the sun than ours, our first neighbour is the red planet Mars, which is called after the Roman god of war, and has from ancient times been associated with ideas of 'martial' conflict. On 1st January 1914, the opening day of the year which brought the nations into the direful contest, Mars was at its nearest to the earth during the course of the synodic revolution period (a little over two years) then current. In a well-known Scottish newspaper the present writer commented at the time on the circumstances as follows: 'Whether or not the fact should be regarded as of sinister omen in an astrological sense, the year 1914 has entered with the Planet of War in a position of extraordinary prominence. After the moon, it is at present the nearest celestial body to the earth, as well as the most brilliant in the night sky. About 6 A.M. on New Year's Day the nearest approach of the earth and Mars for the present occasion took place.' The paragraph containing these words was headed, 'The Opposition of Mars. Prominence of the Planet of War.' It is curious that these comments should have proved, in the light of events which occurred a few months later, to be so regrettably appropriate to the occasion.

On Sunday 13th February 1916 there took place a very close conjunction of the planets Venus and Jupiter, the brightest star-like objects which ever adorn our sky. These were then evening stars, and their exceedingly close juxtaposition attracted universal notice. By multitudes of spectators the unwonted sight was mistaken for the searchlights of some aircraft, hostile or friendly. A similar occurrence in August 1826 was the theme of a poem by the American writer, William Cullen Bryant, 'The Conjunction of Jupiter and Venus.' In that poem he alluded to the struggle of 'hapless Greece,' then fighting against great odds to free herself from Ottoman tyranny, while Europe was idly looking on. On the occasion of the conjunction of 1916, Greece was again prominently before the world's notice; this time the enemy of her freedom was a traitor king, happily soon to be expelled, like the former Turkish oppressor.

II.

The next instance to which attention may be directed is of a more directly astrological nature. Astrologers have always attached particular importance to the position of the planets at the exact instant of the commencement of one of the four astronomical seasons. Spring, summer, autumn, and winter begin respectively when the sun enters the signs Aries, Cancer, Libra, and Capricornus. The planetary positions at such an instant are supposed to be prophetic of events immediately to follow. The spring equinox, in particular, is regarded as an epoch of special importance, as it has often been looked upon as the natural astronomical commencement of the year. National affairs are deemed to be 'presignified' in each case by the positions of the planets relatively to the horizon of the metropolis of a state. In 1917 the sun entered Aries, marking the commencement of spring, on 21st March at 4.37 A.M. (Greenwich time). At this moment of ingress all the nine planets (including in the term the sun and the moon) were beneath the horizon of London, a condition which existed three-quarters of an hour, between the setting of Neptune at 4.10 A.M. and the rising of the moon at 4.57 A.M. The chances against the nine planets being thus all below the horizon at any one point of time are five hundred and eleven against one, certainly a very large balance. But this is not all. By 6.8 A.M. (i.e. an hour and a half after the moment of ingress) six of the planets had risen—namely, Moon, Uranus, Venus, Mars, Sun, and Mercury. At the time of ingress (4.37) all these six were situated in what astrologers call the 'first house'—that is, the twelfth part of the celestial sphere immediately below the eastern horizon. With astrologers it is not a case of 'out of sight, out of mind.' The first house is also called the 'ascendant,' because it contains the celestial bodies about to rise; and though out of sight, these are considered, from the imminence of their ascent above the horizon, to be then powerful in a pre-eminent degree. The saying that one's 'star is in the ascendant' has become an expression of everyday occurrence. As there are twelve houses, the chance of any one planet being in the ascendant at a specified instant of time is one in twelve, and the chance of these six planets (or of any six chosen planets) being simultaneously in the ascendant is only one in nearly three millions (2,985,984). This calculation, however, assumes that six particular planets are selected. If only the sun and the moon are selected, and any other four planets are allowed to complete the group of six, the chance of fulfilment becomes one in eighty-five thousand three hundred and fourteen; if the sun alone is selected, the chance becomes one in fifty-three thousand three hundred and twenty-one. Even if no restriction is laid down, the chance of any six planets whatever being simultaneously in the ascendant is no higher than one in thirty-five thousand five hundred and forty-seven. Therefore, even if we include all the four seasons of the year, such a concentration of planets in the ascendant as occurred at London at the spring equinox of 1917 cannot mark the commencement of a season oftener upon an average than about once in nine thousand years. The year signalised by its occurrence was certainly one of notable successes for British arms, including the liberation of Jerusalem from the long-continued sway of the Turk.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

Shortly after the capture of the Holy Places a celestial occurrence of pleasing appropriateness took place. The planet Venus was then a brilliant object in the early night sky, and on 5th January 1918 it reached an epoch of maximum brilliance as an evening star, an event which occurs at successive intervals of about five hundred and eighty-four days. At such times Venus shines with a lustre so surpassing that it has often been spoken of by imaginative beholders as a return of the 'Star of Bethlehem.' As an evening star the planet is always to be seen in the western heavens, and it is obvious that the 'Star of the East,' though viewed in the east (terrestrial locality) by the Wise Men, must have been seen shining in the western sky, since their journey was towards the west. The 5th January is the eve of (or day preceding) the Church festival on which is commemorated the Epiphany of Our Saviour and His Adoration by the Magi. If we suppose the 6th January to be indeed the correct anniversary of the day upon which 'star-led chiefs' did 'Assyrian odours bring,' there appears the interesting fact that soon after the 'little town of Bethlehem' was restored for the first time for centuries to Christian rule, the brightest and most beautiful of planets—Star of Bethlehem or not—shone down upon the city with its maximum brilliance on the night corresponding to that of the conclusion of the journey of the Magi to the shrine at Bethlehem. Surely a felicitous coincidence!

III.

Some weeks later, on 21st March 1918, an extremely critical phase of the war was entered upon. This again was accompanied in point of time by noteworthy configurations of the planets. The 21st March, it may be observed, is the precise date of the sun's crossing the equator, or the spring equinox. As has been pointed out, the year 1914, in which the war commenced, was ushered in with Mars at its nearest and brightest. This position of Mars was repeated (after one intermediate occurrence in 1916) on 18th March 1918, just preceding the equinox and the opening of the great German offensive. It may thus be imagined as having presaged the bitter struggle which immediately followed. If so, the fact that the 'auspicious planet' Venus attained almost simultaneously (on 16th March) its greatest brilliance as a morning star might with equal reason be regarded as emblematic of the propitious influence which averted the menace to the French capital and rendered the enemy's successes but partial and temporary.

The turning-point in this critical phase of the struggle came some three months later, and was immediately preceded by the two most outstanding astronomical events of the year 1918. Of these one was predictable, and its exact time was known many years in advance. The other, which was of an entirely unpredictable nature, chanced to fall on exactly the same day—namely, 8th June. The predictable event was a total eclipse of the sun, during which the moon's shadow traversed the United States of America, from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast, its track forming a relatively narrow stripe across the country. The other event was the bursting out of a new star in the constellation of Aquila, the Eagle—the brightest new star which has appeared since 1604. There was thus the triple combination of an eagle, a star, and a stripe, all familiar as symbols of the great Western Republic. Further, the 'stripe' was actually traced upon United States territory. To add to this chapter of coincidences, on precisely the same day (8th June) a vessel was launched for the British Navy, and was christened The Eagle; the christening ceremony was performed by Mrs Page, wife of the then United States Ambassador. This ceremony had, of course, been arranged a considerable time in advance; the new star was not seen until the evening; the coincidence was obviously unpremeditated. Altogether there was thus in June last an extraordinary accumulation of omens suggestive of that effective entry of the United States into the contest, which was very soon to turn the scale decisively against the Teuton foe. In the subsequent months, when the successes of the Allied arms were shaping events towards victory, Venus, the auspicious 'Planet of Love,' was prominently in evidence, appearing successively in conjunction with other planets. On 27th July it was in conjunction with Jupiter, on 5th September with Saturn, and on 15th September with Mercury. All of these conjunctions presented a spectacle of exquisite beauty in the morning sky, and in view of the influences traditionally ascribed to Venus, they might be regarded as prophetic of the termination of hostilities that was soon happily to be consummated.

In 1914, the first year of the war, the planet Mars, or 'Planet of War,' as we have seen, made a closest approach to the earth early on New Year's Day. It is most remarkable that on 1st January 1919, the opening of the first year of re-established peace, an event occurred which forms almost as exact a counterpart as could have been devised if designedly arranged. Jupiter, which is the mightiest of the eight major planets, and hence reputedly a most influential one, and, further, one to which human fancies have always ascribed a beneficent influence, made a closest approach to the earth a few minutes before 2 A.M. on New Year's morning 1919. Such approaches occur near to the time of an 'opposition' to the sun of the planet concerned. In the case of Mars they happen about every twenty-six months, in the case of Jupiter about every thirteen months. It is, therefore, extremely remarkable that the early hours of 1st January in the years 1914 and 1919—respectively 'a time of war and a time of peace'—should in each case have witnessed a closest approach of one of these planets, and in addition that in each case it should have been the planet whose traditionally accredited influence was in keeping with the terrestrial events of the newly born year.

IV.

One or two other coincidences may here be alluded to. In September 1913 a comet was discovered in Aquarius by Delavan, a South American observer. A year later it was easily visible to the naked eye. In the words of the great French astronomer Flammarion, 'A comet that will be known in future as the "War Comet" reigned in the heavens throughout a year, and it will be visible for the ensuing five years. Such a long period of a comet's visibility is unknown in astronomic annals. . . . Without asserting the influence of the stars upon our planet's events, the coincidence is, to say the least, worthy of notice.' At the time of its greatest brilliance (September 1914) this comet was passing close beneath the 'Plough' or 'Charles's Wain,' the asterism formed by the seven brightest and best-known stars of that most familiar of all constellations, the Great Bear. The alteration of appearance which its presence temporarily produced in the constellation attracted much attention, and as the Bear was long a symbol of the great Muscovite Empire, the occurrence naturally suggested a connection with the war. It was hailed as an omen for the success of the Russian arms—surely, however, a case of the wish being father to the thought, for comets have always been looked upon as portents of evil. The sequel showed that the traditional view would rather have been justified. Also, as stated above, the comet was at the time of discovery in Aquarius, and this, according to tradition, foreboded misfortune to kings under Aquarius. Aquarius is reputed by astrologers to be the ruling sign of Russia and Prussia. It must be granted that this tradition also has been abundantly justified by the event. These facts are almost as striking as the coincidence which marked the return of Halley's Comet in 1910. Halley's is the most famous of all comets. Its visits to our neighbourhood occur only at intervals of seventy-six years. Yet on that occasion its nearest approach to the earth (one day out of seventy-six years) occurred on the very day of the late King Edward's funeral. Little wonder that some of his South African native subjects believed the huge and imposing ethereal visitant to be a chariot sent to bear the monarch's soul to celestial regions.

Another coincidence, though not astronomical, may be added to the list. According to the Biblical chronology in general use (Ussher's), the parting of Abraham and Lot, and the Divine promise to the former that his descendants should possess the land of Canaan, are dated as at B.C. 1918. In A.D. 1918 that land was freed from its long suppression to the Turkish yoke. It might be objected that the Old Testament date is to some extent uncertain, and that the adopted positioning in time of the Christian era is believed to be at least some four years too late. But notwithstanding this, it may fairly be claimed that the coincidence of the numbers stands. The date B.C. 1918 was assigned to the events mentioned centuries before this war was thought of, so the liberation of Palestine in A.D. 1918 presents a striking arithmetical coincidence, to bring out which no artificial manipulation of figures whatever is required.

The writer desires to add that he has no belief in astrology. In fact, most of the coincidences mentioned have no connection with the rules and principles of orthodox astrology, and therefore cannot be taken as affording any evidence in support of its truth. But he thinks that several of them are at any rate of much interest, even if regarded as purely fortuitous coincidences, especially the extraordinary configuration of 21st March 1917, the probabilities against the occurrence of which have been shown to be so colossal.

It is rather strange that the official 'astrologers' seem to have been oblivious to that remarkable adverse balance of probability, as well as to most of the other coincidences which are here pointed out, and have left it to the present writer to discover them.

This article cannot, perhaps, be more fittingly closed than by quoting some of the lines of William Cullen Bryant in reference to the conjunction of Jupiter and Venus in 1826:

> Look, even now,
> Where two bright planets in the twilight meet,
> Upon the saffron heaven—the imperial star
> Of Jove, and she that from her radiant urn
> Pours forth the light of love. Let me believe,
> Awhile, that they are met for ends of good,
> Amid the evening glory, to confer
> Of men and their affairs, and to shed down
> Kind influence. Lo! they brighten as we gaze,
> And shake out softer fires! . . . Happy they > Born at this hour, for they shall see an age
> Whiter and holier than the past, and go
> Late to their graves. Men shall wear softer hearts,
> And shudder at the butcheries of war,
> As now at other murders.

Let us hope that the aspiration to which the poet gave voice may now at last be realised, by the institution of a League of Nations, and the inauguration of an era when man shall practise war no more.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XX.

THE silent night dragged on. I had groped my way to the couch, and lay, awake and unrefreshed, until in the dark early hours I caught the sound of some one stirring in the house. Footsteps halted in the corridor outside, the key turned in the lock, the electric light was turned on, and my interviewer of the previous night entered. He was still in evening-clothes, and carried a soft hat and a dust-coat. These he tossed on to the couch, and having locked the door, he put the key in his pocket and sat down on the chair opposite me.

He began by apologising for interrupting my rest, and his tone at first was more conciliatory than before.

'Come, Mr Forbes; surely we can arrive at an understanding,' he said.

'I have nothing to add to what I have said,' I told him. 'You can, of course, do what you please, but the document is not mine, nor is it in my keeping. Short of your stealing it, you can never lay hands on it.'

He controlled himself, but with an obvious effort.

'Consider,' he said again. 'It can be of no use to you,' and this time there was almost a pleading note in his voice. 'I assume that you value your life, and that you know you cannot pit yourself against us.'

'Your own life would be short if mine were lost or even endangered. There are two or three matters to which Scotland Yard and the Sûreté of Paris have given some attention, and in which you are interested. For instance, there are the little affair of the Plymouth mail-packet, the Linovada Hotel Syndicate, and'——

'Bah!' he interrupted. 'These incidents are of the past—dead and buried. We defeated both Scotland Yard and the Rue de Jérusalem; and they know it.'

He drew his chair close to me.

'Mr Forbes, if I am not mistaken, I can convince you of the uselessness of persistence in your attitude. No doubt it is "British" and "bulldog," and all that your strange nation worships. But it is senseless. Listen. I have money and power at my disposal. The Searchers have a history; and, strange, incredible though it may seem to you, I have a sentiment—a foolish kink of the mind, if you like—regarding it. You may not be able to understand this feeling, but it is there. Pray do not imagine that we shall fail in this quest. It is not the experience of the Brotherhood to be thwarted. We have a way of surmounting difficulties. You are one of these difficulties, and you can easily be dealt with. Regarding ourselves as ordinary citizens, I have no personal animosity to you. Rather the reverse! You have certain qualities which extort my admiration. You have the misfortune to stand in my way; that is all. But I am a trustee, a sworn member—nay, a leader—of a great organisation. We permit no defiance, and have only one sentence for it. I am (to avoid—shall I say?—extreme measures) about to suggest a fair and sensible arrangement, which will ensure your freedom now, and an equitable compromise of the matter between us. What price do you put on the document?'

'It is not mine.'

'Pouf! Negotiations are not impossible.'

'So far as I am concerned they are.'

His face grew dark.

'Where is this document?'

'Beyond your reach, and safe with its rightful owner.'

'For the last time I ask you, who and where is he?'

'That I refuse to tell. To force or cajole his name from me is the reason why I was brought here.'

He looked at me with a savage earnestness, and suddenly burst out: 'If you are in league with the miserable, thieving, red-haired traitor, I swear that your fate will be the same as that which is surely overtaking him. I swear it,' he said, with cold and ferocious deliberation, his eye searching mine. 'You and your ingenious friend Keene-Leslie succeeded in outwitting us in Italy, but you will not do so a second time. My time is short. Here are my terms: On the delivery of the paper you shall receive a sum which will mean affluence for life. The details can be arranged promptly. These are fair terms; but if you reject them, to save your life will be out of my power. The Brotherhood will deal in its own way with you. I am empowered to offer you in return for the paper a princely sum. The Leopard's Eye alone is worth a fortune. Think what it means to you.'

I risked a bold card.

'A discussion of terms is out of the question with persons whose next appearance will probably be in the dock.'

He jumped up from his chair, but I held up my hand and raised my voice. 'This house is known. You and your gang are known. The game will soon be up.'

His face became transfigured with fury and menace. To this day I believe that, for a moment, my life was in danger.

'You are in league with the snake, the traitor. I swear,' he said, his anger choking him—'I swear that you and he shall pay the same penalty. I shall watch you die by inches. I shall hunt him down'—and this with a great oath—'I shall watch him die. . . . I shall'—— He came a pace nearer me, livid with passion.

His loss of self-control was his undoing. As he made a spring, I ducked, just in time to escape his hands on my throat, and in the same instant I got my left straight on his solar plexus. The blow knocked the breath out of him, and before he could give a second gasp, I followed with an upper cut from my right on his chin. He dropped like a stone. I was not 'seeing red,' but knowing, without the shadow of a doubt, that mercy to him meant death for me, I lifted him up and heaved him against the opposite wall. The impact of his skull on the wall, and the limp, motionless huddle of his body, told me that he would not trouble me for at least some precious minutes. Grimly thankful that I had been a useful three-quarter in the old days at Raeburn Place, Edinburgh, I bent over him. He was breathing, but unconscious, and a trickle of blood came from one ear.

I got my wind back, and listened intently, but there was not the slightest sound from the house. Silence reigned. I had not a moment to lose. The man lay still, breathing heavily, his eyes closed. Slipping his revolver into my pocket, I ran my fingers through his evening-clothes for the door-key, and in search of anything which might be of use to me afterwards in the way of information; but I found nothing. His fawn-coloured coat and soft hat were lying on the couch. I put them on, pulled the coat-collar quickly up to my ears, jammed the hat well down, and with my mind made up, if the need arose, to fire at sight, I cautiously unlocked the door, and, with the revolver ready, peered out into the corridor. It was empty and dark, except for a faint greenish gleam five or six yards or so to my left. Having noiselessly locked the door, I put the key in my pocket, and holding my breath, tiptoed a foot at a time down the corridor towards the light. This, I discovered, came from a single electric bulb held aloft in the hand of a marble statuette round the bend of the corridor, at its junction with a well-carpeted hall. The light was dim, and after half-a-dozen stealthy steps forward into the hall, I blundered into an alcove lined with coats and hats. It was well that I found myself there, for I had hardly reached its shelter when a sudden shrill noise close beside me stiffened me with fright. It was only a telephone-bell; but its uncanny presence in the dark—like some invisible watcher—positively made my scalp creep.

There was just time to crouch in the darkest corner of the alcove, when quick and heavy footsteps sounded on the floor above me, and then began to descend the stairs. My heart was beating unpleasantly when their owner neared my hiding-place; but he hurried past, and went straight to the telephone. It was Benedetto; I heard his rich bass voice saying, 'Yes. . . . Ah! . . . It is you, signore. . . . Other business on hand just now. Your message must wait.' (I felt horribly certain that the 'other business' referred to me.) 'I cannot disturb him just now; but the car is waiting, and if he does not send for me in a quarter of an hour, I will deliver your message. It must keep until then. Yes. . . . The affair went off like clockwork. So did Signor Forbes! Ha! ha! . . . Yes. . . . We got here without an incident—not so much as a kick. . . . Ah! Call me in a quarter of an hour, then.'

He rang off, and walked briskly back to the foot of the stair, where he stood and listened for a moment. Then, satisfied, he went upstairs, humming an air. I heard a door shut, and once more his footsteps on the flooring overhead. My luck had held. I drew a long breath of relief. Neither shooting a man nor being shot appeals to me, and had the old villain discovered me, my only chance would have been to fire first. There remained the danger of the man in the room regaining consciousness. The slightest noise—the upsetting of a chair, a false step—and the house would spring into life.

In my jacket-pocket was a box of vestas. Having covered it with the overcoat to stifle the sound, I struck a light and looked round the corner of the alcove. The way to the door was straight, and clear of furniture. I blew the match out and moved noiselessly forward.

A thin current of air met me, and, to my astonishment, I found that the door was slightly open. Drawing it wider, stealthily, inch by inch, I stepped out into the chill night air. One—two—three—four—five steps, and my feet were on the gravel. Another twenty yards with my nerves taut, and, 'Here I am, signore. The car is ready,' came a voice out of the darkness in a wary half-whisper. I own that I got a bad shake. Chagrined, beaten 'on the post,' I stood stock-still for a second or two, straining my eyes into the gloom, when, 'This way, signore,' came the voice again, and I saw the pin-point of an electric torch leading the way. Recovering my scattered wits, I followed the light boldly, but not trusting myself to reply, for the man had obviously mistaken me for somebody else. Then came the rattle of a key and the sound of the gate being opened. I hunched my shoulders into my coat-collar and went forward, to find my confiding guide holding open the door of an empty motor-car. There was a chauffeur on the driving-seat, who turned round and touched his hat. The glare of the head-lamp threw me into shadow. 'Buona notte, signore,' came from my guide. Not a second did I hesitate. I jumped in; the door was shut; and after an intolerable delay (it seemed to me) during which the guide said a word or two to the chauffeur, the gate closed with a clang. Next moment the car started.

Where it was going was a minor consideration, so long as it put miles between me and the accursed house. I did not risk switching on the light. The chauffeur had not seen my face, and was looking steadily ahead, intent on the steering-wheel. I struck a match and looked at my watch. It was almost half-past two. In a couple of minutes the car was running swiftly and smoothly—much too quickly for me to risk jumping out; but I made up my mind to leave without ceremony when it slowed down. Feeling like the central figure in a nightmare, I kept my eyes on the driver and waited for developments. None came. The man's stolid back never turned. The car hummed along at a good pace, past lamps and the dim shapes of houses, now and then over street pavements. We were nearing London, I was sure. Once there, I reflected, I was comparatively safe, and the feel of the revolver-butt heartened me wonderfully. So far I had escaped by the skin of my teeth, but I was by no means out of the wood. Three o'clock. Now the street-lamps became more numerous. Every minute was bringing me nearer safety and freedom.

(Continued on page 309.)

LEECHES.

By Mrs F. A. Douglas.

AMONGST the many curious occupations of the human race is that of leech-gathering. Once it was a feature of our English countryside, but our supply has always been comparatively limited, and it has continued to decrease. Even in Wordsworth's day the 'leech-gatherer on the lonely moor' complained:

> Once I could meet with them on every side,
> But they have dwindled long by slow decay,
> Yet still I persevere and find them where I may.

The picture of this old man is full of poetic pathos, and has cast something of romance over the thought of this old-time occupation. However, lingering by muddy pools, stirring them and watching them in all kinds of weather, must have been peculiarly productive of rheumatism; and if, in the end, leech-gatherers made a poor living by it, it is not surprising that one hears little of the practice now. One subsidiary cause of the dwindling of leeches in England is the extensive drainage and cultivation of waste land that has gone on during the last hundred years.

As a matter of fact, leeches have for some time been imported, mainly from the continent of Europe. The war led to a very serious shortage of them. A correspondent of the Times pointed out a year or two ago that there were only a few dozens left in London, and they were second-hand! America and Canada were applied to without success; but, finally, an ingenious doctor succeeded in getting some from India. They stood the journey and the change of climate well, and, when last heard of, were in a state of promising vigour and salutary hunger. In a word, they were ready for work. Leeches are not used nearly so much now as formerly. About 1830 as many as fifty-two millions a year were used in Paris alone. Still, they were in considerable demand in the hospitals during the war, and the shortage was a distinctly serious matter.

The use of the leech is, of course, a survival of the old system of blood-letting. This method of reducing the excessive vitality of our too buoyant ancestors was, in those days of gargantuan eating and drinking, no doubt beneficial if not carried too far.

Such was the part played by the leech in old-time medicine or 'leechcraft' that it confirmed (if it did not occasion) the application of the same name to the physician or the veterinary surgeon. In both senses the word is derived from Old English lǽce, 'one who heals,' variation in form or spelling having doubtless been obviated by the intimate association in the public mind between the leech and its prescriber.

The ancients had a mighty belief in leeches. Pliny held they were good for the gout, and also said that the ashes of burned leeches, made into a paste with vinegar, would remove hair from any part of the body to which it was applied. Leeches, it was affirmed, removed 'offensive humours from the body.' One wise old physician attempted to cure 'lethargy' by applying leeches to the fore and back parts of the head. The leech was preferred to the lancet for children.

Leeches should be thrown into warm water, to clean them before use, and removed from the water one hour before you wish to apply them, so that they may be hungry and ready to bite. If they hang on longer than you wish, you can detach them by drawing a horse-hair across their sucker, or by sprinkling them with salt.

Leeches, however, are contrary creatures. Like fleas, they will not bite everybody, and are probably connoisseurs in blood, objecting to the acidity that spoils so many people's circulatory supply. One remembers Dame Fripp in Mr Gilfil's Love-Story. She made a pretty penny by not only keeping leeches, but knowing also how to apply them. She was understood to have a remarkable influence over 'those wilful animals,' and to be able to make them bite 'under the most unpromising circumstances.'

The partiality of leeches for flesh has been in some places their undoing, for on the Continent people sometimes catch them by simply wading bare-legged in the pools they frequent. The leeches fasten on to the legs of their own accord, and as nothing sticketh closer than a leech (unless it be a limpet), they are easily captured.

Leeches take their predominant colour from the soils in which they are found. For instance, leeches found in peaty soil near Glastonbury are black; taken in red soil they are reddish; and in yellow clay they are yellowish. In winter they love deep water, but in summer they come into shallow water to get the sun. When their pools freeze they burrow deep into the mud at the bottom to keep warm, and reappear when the thaw comes. Just before a thunderstorm they come right to the surface, and that is the best time to gather them.

Cowper said of leeches that 'in point of the earliest intelligences they are worth all the barometers in the world.' A clergyman in France kept one in a jar of water in his window. When the weather was likely to be good the leech remained at the bottom of the jar; when rain was coming it mounted to the surface. When the weather threatened to be boisterous it moved restlessly about, and on the near approach of thunder it was very restless indeed.

The leech has considerable vitality—probably owing to its diet. It takes five years to grow to its full size, and sometimes it lives twenty years. It can be kept in confinement for as long as ten years. In spite of its vagaries, it can to a certain extent be controlled and kept from straying. It feeds in its natural state on the larvæ of aquatic insects.

There are medicinal leeches (Hirudo medicinalis), horse-leeches (Hæmopis sanguisuga), and land-leeches (for example, Hæmadipsa Ceylonica).

The leech has two suckers, one at each end of its body. It resembles the earthworm. Its suckers enable it to elongate and contract its body, and render it capable of very varied activity. The anterior mouth, with which it sucks human blood, is furnished with three tiny, strong jaws (semicircular 'saws,' each armed with eighty or ninety minute teeth of lime and chitin) which inflict a peculiar triradiate bite. It has ten small eye-spots on the head. Leeches require to scale off their epidermis frequently, and if kept in plain water they cannot do so. In pools they are aided in this operation by the aquatic plants, against which they rub themselves. The horse-leech is a big bully of a leech—of no real use for medicinal purposes (its teeth are not sharp enough); it feeds on its cousins the earthworms. Old amateur surgeons, however, if we may judge from the following extract, appear to have used them.

'Horsleches,' says the writer, 'are wholesome to drawe forthe foule blood, if thei are put into a hollowe rede, and one of their endes cutte of, whereby the blood maie run forthe.' It may be that he confused the horse-leech with the medicinal leech.

The land-leech is a curious little wriggling thing about an inch long, inhabiting mostly hot countries. There is a tiny insidious species in Japan. You do not know it has attacked you until you find yourself running with blood. In Ceylon land-leeches drive horses distracted, worry through stockings, and hang in bunches on the bare legs of the natives.

It is not wise to swallow leeches. Travellers in hot countries drinking hastily from stagnant pools too often regret it. A French army marching through the desert once quenched its thirst at a muddy pool, and the results were disastrous. If you do swallow leeches, you are recommended to drink vinegar and eat garlic; but a salt-and-water emetic is really the best thing. They are digestible, for a French doctor, having caused a patient to vomit some, examined the recovered leeches and found them semi-digested.

It may be that we shall gradually learn to do without leeches, yet this natural and ancient method of extracting superfluous or unwholesome blood will always remain of great interest to students alike of hygiene and of manners.

THE WINGS OF THE MORNING.

PART II.

I.

NEXT day was Sunday, but instead of putting on Sabbath-day blacks and dutifully answering the call of the kirk bell, the dominie decided to take his weekly allowance of preaching by proxy. Accordingly Janet occupied the 'school pew' in solitary state and vast secret displeasure. For Janet had a grievance, the sort of grievance trusting women so often have against sly, deluding man. She had not been deceived, thanks to her own cuteness; but the attempt to deceive was palpable.

'I wouldn't have believed it o' him,' thought Janet, as the small, broken-winded organ began to wheeze out a jerky prelude. 'No, I wouldn't,' she repeated, as the minister, stately and solemn, entered, and mounted the pulpit stairs. 'What would he think o' ane o' his elders tryin' to bamboozle his auld hoosekeeper? To tell me he was for a whiff o' hill-wind to cure a heidache, when a' the time I kent fine he was off to see Margaret Gordon! David was richt. Men are a' quirky; and he's juist like the lave o' them. It's for marryin' her he'll be, for a' that's come and gone. What I'm wonderin' is if ae hoose will be big enough to hold me an' her.'

She knew what had happened, and of course was sorry for Margaret Gordon, with the sorrow of a spinster for a weeping Rachel. But she could not forgive the dominie. These thoughts so engrossed Janet that she could not find the text in all her Bible, heard not a word of the sermon, and almost broke into singing when others were composing themselves for prayer. When the ordeal of public worship was over, and gossip had been duly exchanged at the kirk door, she returned to a cold dinner in an exceedingly hot state of mind. That she had the dinner all to herself was part of the dominie's duplicity.

A charge of duplicity was perhaps justified, though not precisely as Janet suspected. While the church bells jangled out their cracked summons Thomas Dunning 'looked in' at High Croft, 'just to say, "How d'ye do?"' in the passing. He remembered that Margaret had not seen Mr Hector's letter. Perhaps she would like to read it for herself. He would, therefore, leave it, and call for it on his way back. No, thanks, he would have nothing. One climbed all the better for going light. Then, remarking that the day was warm, and good for growing crops, he turned once more to the hills above. Margaret understood. 'Tom is always tactful and delicate,' she said to herself. On his part he was saying, 'She hasn't slept a wink all night, and her eyes—oh, poor thing! I could scarcely bear to look at them.'

II.

For a quarter of a mile—that is to say, as long as he was within sight of High Croft—the dominie walked rapidly; then, finding himself in solitude, he sat down on a mossy, sun-warmed rock and thought of Margaret Gordon.

Three hours later he returned, and she was waiting for him, pitiably white, but dry-eyed and composed. Together they went inside, and this time he consented to have refreshments—of scone, fresh butter, and creamy heather-milk, which would have superseded nectar had it been known on Olympus. Thus braced, he cleared his throat—somehow he had all at once become a victim to hoarseness—and cautiously referred to Mr Hector's letter.

'It's a fine, generous letter,' said Margaret simply. 'I'll always love Mr Hector for what he says in it. Yes, though I'm far, far away from High Croft.'

The last part of the statement was a clear lapse, and nearly cost Margaret her studied, resolute self-possession.

'Yes,' he agreed, noting her effort to be calm. 'The letter of one brave man paying tribute to another. Sir Hector is deeply touched.'

He appeared to be going on, but, instead, turned abruptly and looked out of the window. The rich flush of midsummer was on the scene; a Sabbath peace was in the air. All thought of war seemed remote, alien, and incongruous.

'It's bonnie,' he murmured. 'Theocritus would have loved it.' And then, with a sidelong look, 'You wouldn't like to leave it, would you, Maggie?'

'It just needs that to break my heart altogether,' she answered. 'That would do it.'

There was a long pause. 'Wouldn't it be hard for you to carry on alone?' he asked then.

'Oh! I could do it,' was the emphatic reply. 'And now that they're all gone, it's what I'd like to do.'

The dominie gulped something invisible. 'Maggie,' he said, not too successfully keeping the gulp out of his voice, 'there's one thing I have to say, and it's this—that, go or stay, Sir Hector is your very good friend. I have seen him again, and he authorised me to tell you that.'

She looked at him searchingly. 'Tom,' she cried, 'you have been pleading for me.'

'Never a word,' he replied promptly. 'Never so much as a single word. You should have heard what he says about Aleck.'

'Then if he's my friend he'll let me stay here,' said Margaret. 'I have some help, and I'm used to working. Tom, do this for me, and tell Sir Hector he will have every penny of his own—every penny.'

'Believe me, he's not thinking of that,' the dominie assured her.

But he did not argue. Instead, he acted.

III.

The very next day Margaret received a letter which made her giddy with excitement. She glanced at the address—'Carbenny Castle;' she glanced at the signature—Sir Hector's. The letter, in the baronet's own hand, was as follows:

'Dear Mrs Gordon,—Our common friend, Mr Dunning, informs me that you desire to remain at High Croft. I greatly regret that I cannot see my way to comply with your wish' (Margaret nearly collapsed) 'because it is contrary to pending arrangements. In the providence of God and at the call of duty, you have been deprived of those to whom you would naturally look for help. My heart goes out to you—but I will not dwell on that. What I have to say is that for all our sakes I think it best you should leave High Croft. Therefore you shall have choice of two other houses. Whichever you choose shall be rent free as long as you care to occupy it, and I trust you will accept such a supplement to your income as will be sufficient for the comfort I should like you to have. I beg this as a favour, and not in any sense as a return for what you and yours have done for me and mine. That is beyond payment. You see, I assume you will do us the honour of remaining on the estate. For the rest, with your permission, you shall have assistance in winding up things at High Croft. My advice, dear Mrs Gordon, is that you just leave the bother of winding up and flitting to us men-folk.

'My son is already in hospital in London. As soon as ever the surgeons are done with him he will be home. His mother, who sends her love and sympathy, thinks our Highland air will do him more good than all the apothecary's stuff in England. You may be sure he will take the very earliest opportunity of calling and expressing to you in person something of what we all feel.

'Please let me know that all this is agreeable to you. God sustain and bless you, now and always.'

Margaret was glad she was permitted to read this letter by herself, that no one was by to witness the grateful, tender, distressing tears she shed over it. 'My Aleck,' she sobbed, 'saved me in the end, as he said he would. And Mr Hector—yes, I'll always love Mr Hector.'

IV.

She met Mr Hector soon, but not in the quietness of her own Highland hills as had been planned. Before he could come home she went up to London, first class, at Sir Hector's expense, to receive from the King's own hand the decoration won, but never worn, by Aleck. The dominie accompanied her, for, as Sir Hector pointed out with clinching force, she could never be trusted to go alone.

'The tumult and confusion would simply stun and bewilder her,' he said. 'Ten to one, she'd be run over by some careering fool or ever she got near Buckingham Palace. So she needs you. Eh! What's that? The school? Fiddlesticks! The Board aren't idiots; and when did scholars object to a holiday?'

The scholars accordingly had their holiday—'in honour,' the master was careful to explain, 'of one who has brought lasting glory to our school.'

The weather being fine, it was an open-air investiture; and when Margaret, who would fain have hidden at the last moment, was conducted into the Royal presence, a small, white, trembling figure, lost, as it seemed, in the sea of uniforms, the Cockney crowd cheered lustily. There was more cheering when the King presented the little Maltese Cross with the bit of crimson ribbon which would for ever tell the tale of Aleck's valour and sacrifice. She curtsied in acknowledgment, and was turning away, but the King detained her to praise Aleck's bravery and say how well the proud distinction was deserved. Finally he shook hands, 'warm and friendly, just as if he had known me all my life,' said Margaret afterwards. She had not imagined kings capable of shaking hands in that fashion. As she made her way to the rear, smiling through her tears and holding her treasure tight, the watching, eager crowd exploded in another and more prolonged cheer. She turned quickly round, as if afraid. 'Don't you be a-takin' on, missis,' she was told sympathetically. ''E was a good boy as got 'e that, mum.'

'Thank you for that,' said Margaret simply.

Mr Hector stood beside the dominie, waiting for her. He was on crutches (that was why he had not attended her before them all), and at sight of him she stopped, a quick look of pity in her face.

'Oh, Mr Hector dear!' she cried, scarcely noticing his salute, 'but I'm sorry to see you like this.'

'I am very thankful to be like this, Mrs Gordon,' he answered. 'If it hadn't been for Sergeant Gordon I shouldn't have been here at all. I'm glad to have seen what I've seen to-day. My father has told you all, hasn't he?'

'Yes, sir, he has told me all.'

She caught her lip. He understood, and withheld something he greatly wanted to say. By-and-by she would be better able to listen.

A motor was in readiness, and he took the two to the little hotel off the Strand (recommended by Sir Hector) where they had put up for one night. Thence he took them to Euston, and, in spite of crutches, insisted on conducting Margaret to her carriage.

'Tell them at home I'm getting on famously,' he said at parting, 'and that I'll be north in no time. It's mortal dull work getting well here in London.'

Only when the train was starting and he held Margaret's hand a moment did he venture to hint some fraction of what was in his heart. She was infinitely grateful for his reticence.

'I don't think I could have held up if he had spoken much of Aleck,' she confided to the dominie.

V.

Janet, with a small company of intimate and particular friends, received Margaret in her new home, which was just ready, and passed by Sir Hector as fit for occupation. By one of the coincidences in which truth plagiarises so shamefully from fiction, it chanced to stand next neighbour to the schoolhouse. Janet looked wise and prophetic.

'Ay, juist so,' she remarked. 'I'm thinkin' it's no exactly for nothing they're gable to gable. It runs in my mind that it's under the same roof they'll be afore a's ower.'

And Janet was right. One day, some months later, a gossip ran to her, in a state of high excitement, with a certain question.

'Ay, it's quite true,' announced Janet, 'as I kent weel it would be. Margaret Gordon is to be Margaret Dunning. Astonished, are ye? Ye'd be fair dumfoonered if ye saw what I see. Daft, that's what the puir man is—clean daft. Canna eat or sleep for thinkin' o' his dearie. An', my word, sic preparations! The drawin'-room's to be pented an' papered. There's to be grand new upholstery an' picters an' a carpet, forby a braw brass bed an' a wheen o' whigmaleeries upstairs. An' the pension's to go on. The maister an' Sir Hector had words ower it; but Sir Hector would have it so, or doon comes the moon aboot our heids. No, I'm no leavin'. He says I maun bide an' take care o' her. Twa to cook an' clean for instead o' ane. It's grand to be so muckle thocht o'. My certie!'

Janet was the most loyal of women and the best of housekeepers; but the mysteries of sentiment were far beyond her ken.

THE END.

BACK TO THE WEEDS—NOURISHMENT FROM NETTLES.

By I. I. Brants.

EUROPE of late years has listened to the call of the land. She has grown conscious of over-industrialisation, of artificiality, of a one-sided, shiftless, and helpless development. Back to the land, then, is the gospel for our super-civilisation. And it seems that the war has accentuated this tendency. Shipping troubles have forced nations to produce their own sustenance and their own raw materials. In industrialised countries farming once more is coming to its own.

But the movement has not stopped there. Not only does scientific agriculture strive to enhance the yield of every acre, to increase the produce of every grain of seed through selective improvement, but botanical explorers scour the valleys of the world for new possibilities to vie with the regulation crops.

Not the least interesting venture in this direction is the effort nowadays made all over the European continent to turn to benefit indigenous vegetation hitherto considered harmful or, at least, useless weeds. Certain of these attempts have already been crowned with success. Ethnographical and other research tends to show that many of these weeds, at some time or other in the historic or prehistoric past, were put to economical use. In this respect the movement is a return to the 'forgotten truths' of our Neolithic ancestors, the flint-armed dwellers of the caves. And it is a remarkable fact that this re-exploitation of the native weed should have had its origin in Sweden, by common consent of anthropologists the cradle of our Neolithic race, the country where the physical characteristics of this race have been most purely preserved.

In Sweden it is Erik Lundström and his followers who teach the people to profit by whatever grows. Their greatest 'boom' recently has been in stinging-nettles, Urtica dioica and Urtica urens alike. Want of cotton has taught people to obtain the textile fibres from the stems of the stinging-nettle (as did their ancestors), and not only in Sweden, but in Germany, Holland, and Switzerland likewise. What used to be called 'nettle-cloth' is again brought on the market, not merely as a substitute for cotton, but as an improvement on it both in fineness and durability. For this reason 'nettle-cloth' is almost certain to remain on the market even after the war.

In the boggy regions, so common in a sparsely populated country like Sweden, people have begun to cultivate nettle-fields. Nor is this culture intended exclusively for the spindle and the jenny. The leaf of the stinging-nettle constitutes an excellent foodstuff. Properly speaking, this is not a discovery or even a rediscovery. All over the European continent there are country-folks who in early spring use the first nettle-sprouts for making soup. They claim the nettle—and rightly so—to be the great purifier of the blood. As cried the Mermaid of Glasgow to the oarsmen who rowed the coffin down the Clyde,

> If they wad drink nettles in March,
> And eat muggons in May,
> Sae mony braw maidens
> Wadna gang to the clay.

But April come, even the cottar forgets his nettles. There is some sort of superstition that with this month the leaves cease to be suited for human consumption, and at best can be used only for fodder. This tradition the Swedish scientists have proved to be altogether mistaken. It is true that in early spring nettle-leaves produce a daintier dish than in the height of summer, but even in latest autumn they are perfectly edible and highly nutritive. The analysis of the Swedish chemist Almén has given the following results: albumen, 5·5 per cent.; fat, 0·6 per cent.; carbohydrate, 7·1 per cent.; salts, 2·3 per cent. As concerns food-values, the Swedish experiments have shown that one kilogramme of beans can give 548 calories to the human system, one kilogramme of carrots 355 calories, one kilogramme of stinging-nettles 590 calories. This sufficiently proves the importance of the said 'weed' as a vegetable.

In Sweden nettle-leaves are eaten both in the form of soup and as a substitute for spinach. Quite recently the leading school of cookery at Gothenburg, Sweden, has been most successful in producing nettle-bread. For this purpose the nettle-leaves are first boiled in water, which eventually is poured off. The cooked leaves are then passed through a mincer, after which leaven is mixed with them and one part of rye-flour to every three of nettle-mush. The best results are reached when the bread is not baked too thickly. Apart from being much more nourishing than ordinary bread, the nettle-loaf allows considerable economising of the bread-card in rationing days.

It is not necessary each time to gather the leaves fresh from the stem. They can be preserved in jars for winter use like any other vegetable, and it is also possible to dry them. For this latter purpose the leaves are simply spread out for a couple of days on paper, after which they can be kept indefinitely in bags or boxes, if not exposed to damp.

S.O.S.

By F. O. O.

THE vault-like silence of the dug-out had been unbroken ever since the night relief had come on duty, five hours ago now. Since then an unusual stillness had reigned, emphasised rather than ruffled by the faint sounds that required an attentive ear to detect them: the deep breathing of the sleeping telephonist, the scuffling of a rat among the pit-props that supported the roof, the slow drip of water somewhere in the dark corners. The greater part of the place was in shadow, hiding strange, grotesque forms of telephones and all the apparatus of the signallers, for this dug-out was the fighting-post of the battery. Only above the table at which sat the subaltern on duty hung a hurricane-lamp, casting its uncertain light on the back of his head as he leant, half-asleep, over the maps spread out before him.

A faint, blue haze of smoke from the smouldering logs piled in one corner hung about the place. This fire was a source of perpetual trouble. There was only one direction of the wind in which the smoke consented to go up the hole in the roof that served as a chimney; at other times it drifted about the dug-out, finding an eventual exit by the door, and nearly stifling the inmates in the process with its pungency. It was a choice between freezing and suffocation, and the night relief invariably chose the latter. By the fire, at a spot where it seemed as though the glowing embers must fall out and singe her fur, sat the battery cat, luxuriating in the warmth and the stillness. She was supposed to be useful as well as ornamental, a catcher of mice as well as a mascot; but a recent visit to the battery cookhouse had rendered her completely indifferent to the scuffling of the rats, or even to a faint squeaking in the dark corners.

Outside, up the long flight of muddy steps that led to the entrance of the dug-out, the night—or rather morning, for it was nearly two o'clock—was pitch-dark, and dismal with unceasing drizzle. November is never a particularly dry month in Artois, and this November must have been one of the wettest on record. The country-side was a swamp; the roads had degenerated into water-courses; the wood in which the guns were concealed, and among the roots of whose trees the fighting-post had been contrived, was sodden with fallen leaves and dripping with great drops from the naked branches. To one coming up out of even the faint glimmer of the dug-out, the darkness seemed like an impenetrable wall. The way to the guns was a devious one by day; on a night like this it was fraught with a thousand pitfalls. The wood was a favourite target for the German gunners; they were pretty certain that it must conceal something, probably guns, but they had never succeeded in discovering exactly where these were located. Consequently they had amused themselves from time to time by sending over a few high-explosive, which had scattered the branches of the trees and made deep craters, now full of dark-brown water. The paths through the wood wandered between the trees, skirted the edges of the shell-holes, took wide sweeps to avoid swampy tracts where the fallen leaves of countless years had decayed. This labyrinthine battery position was no place for any one who did not know its ramifications by heart. But here and there, scattered at irregular intervals among the undergrowth, was all that complicated organisation that constitutes a heavy siege battery: the big howitzers under their woven canopies of branches, piles of shell and cartridges in cunningly constructed shelters, dug-outs for the men to live in, a cook-house, a workshop for the artificers. The wood had become a settlement of cave-dwellers.

In the fighting-post the telephonist on duty rose from his seat, glanced at the watch on the officer's table, then stirred his sleeping comrade with his foot. 'Wake up, Jim,' he said. 'Your turn for a spell.'

Jim leapt to his feet without a word. One gets used to waking up instantly on service. He stepped over to the fire and stirred it carefully. 'Stick it a minute, mate, while I boil up the tea,' he said, putting a mess-tin on the embers as he spoke. The other man nodded and turned to his instruments again. Suddenly the insistent note of the buzzer cut into the stillness like a knife —GL, GL, the battery call, impatient and sharp.

Instantly the place sprang into life. The telephonist adjusted his receiver more closely to his ears; the officer leapt to his feet and turned up the lamp; the cat opened her eyes, stretched herself, and proceeded to wash her face preparatory to taking an interest in the proceedings. Then the telephonist turned to the officer and handed him the instrument. 'Brigade want an officer at the telephone, sir,' he said.

The subaltern put the receiver to his ear. 'Yes, officer speaking,' he said. 'Very good, sir; S.O.S. Auchonvillers South.'

The telephonist snatched the big megaphone from the nail on which it hung when not in use, and thrust it into the officer's hand as he put down the receiver. Armed with this, the subaltern bounded up the steps, sent one clarion call resounding through the dark wood, then rushed back to his table to make out the orders for the guns. It may be explained that 'S.O.S.' calls—that is to say, sudden calls from the infantry for artillery support—are all arranged for beforehand, and the orders to the guns worked out. All that remains to be done is to issue the orders to the guns corresponding to the sector from which the call comes.

But during the few seconds that it took the subaltern to look up the orders in his list many things had time to happen. The wood had passed the night in a strangely peaceful silence, broken only by the steady plashing of the rain; but before the echoes of that sharp call, 'Battery, action!' had died away, it woke into sudden life. It seemed as though the notes of Gabriel's celestial trumpet had burst upon a dead world. From every corner unseen figures could be heard rushing to their posts; here and there bright flashes betrayed the electric torches of the 'Numbers One,' as the N.C.O.'s in charge of the detachments are termed, or fainter flickerings showed where the battle lanterns were being lit. The darkness slowly gave place to a dim, ghostly light, which revealed a scene of apparent chaos, in which dark figures rushed helter-skelter among the dim shadows of the trees. But this apparent confusion was really the working of an exact and rigid machinery, elaborately worked out to the last minute detail, whereby each man performed his duties in the smallest possible fraction of a minute. When artillery support is wanted, it is wanted immediately, and the first test of a battery's efficiency is the speed with which it gets into action. This particular battery had a reputation to maintain, a reputation very dear to every soul that had helped to build it up, and a call to action meant a desperate race between the detachments for the honour of being the first to report ready. Under such circumstances no fraction of a second was likely to be lost by a single member of the gun-teams.

The detachments on duty spent the night round the guns, so as to be ready for instant action. They had built themselves curious wigwam-like shelters of woven branches, lined with tarpaulins, which were far more effective in keeping out the wet than they looked. It was, therefore, merely a matter of two or three seconds before they were on the guns; but getting into action involves other preparation than this. For one thing, not more than half-a-dozen shell are kept at the guns ready fused. Shell unfused are most unlikely to explode, even if they receive a direct hit from a hostile round; but if they are fused the danger is greatly increased. Both shell and cartridges are, therefore, kept in small quantities scattered about the battery, the former unfused, in order to minimise the risk of damage from an unlucky round. As soon as the battery comes into action, sufficient ammunition must be collected at the guns to ensure an uninterrupted rate of fire. Hence the figures struggling among the tree-trunks under the burden of the heavy shell, causing the wood to assume the appearance of a disturbed ant-heap.

Suddenly a familiar sound made itself heard above the noise of preparation—a long-drawn whine that rose in rapid crescendo until it became almost a roar. Nobody paid any attention to it; probably very few even heard it—they were far too busy for that. The shell burst harmlessly a few hundred yards behind the battery, the first round of a favourite form of 'counter-preparation' by which the Germans hoped to neutralise the guns opposed to them, before they could interfere with whatever mischief was on hand.

But before a battery can be effectively neutralised, it must be located, and this the Germans had never succeeded in accomplishing. Knowing this, they resorted to indiscriminate 'searching and sweeping' of the wood, hoping for a lucky round. The shell came over in salvos, dropping here and there among the trees with a series of dull roars and lurid flashes. Splinters sang through the air, with a high, buzzing note like a swarm of giant mosquitoes, lopping off twigs in their passage, or thudding angrily into the tree-trunks. Sometimes one burst near enough for its flash to light up the toilers at the guns, pursuing their business oblivious of the turmoil about them.

All at once a new note came into the whine of the approaching shell, and before the salvo had fallen the battery resounded with shouts of 'Ware gas!' The shell burst with a curious soft pop, quite unlike the roar of high-explosive, which was followed by the deep, metallic clang of a length of railway-iron being beaten with a steel hammer. Well within the six seconds allowed for the operation the detachments had their gas-helmets on, and the sentries detailed for the purpose were running from one dug-out to the next, arousing their sleeping occupants. The only danger from gas lies in being caught unawares.

The men were too used to gas-bombardments to be greatly impeded by their respirators, and the work went on without slackening. But the scene—viewed by the light of the battle lanterns, which by now were burning fully, and casting dim rays through the glades of the wood—became more weird than ever. The detachments, muffled in their greatcoats, their faces hidden by the unearthly shapes of the respirators, seemed like creatures of some perverted imagination, toiling at the half-seen monstrous bulks of the big howitzers. The wood took on the appearance of a gnome-haunted forest, mephitic, inhabited by wailing ghosts and toiling demons.

Away out beyond the wood towards the trenches the night had blossomed into intermittent fire. Hardly had the coloured rockets, the signal of the infantry that something unusual was happening, soared up into the low-lying mist and been lost, than a bright constellation of Very lights, blurred and yellow through the driving rain, rose along the whole line. Closely following them came the flashes of the field-guns, seeming to light up the whole heavens with the bluish glare of summer lightning. So thickly were the guns massed that the glare was continuous, penetrating even into the darkness of the wood. But the mist and the trees seemed to muffle the sound, so that no distinct reports could be heard, only a great reverberating roar that made the ground tremble beneath one's feet, and shook the big drops in showers from the overhanging branches. Against the background of this roar played a continuous rattle of musketry and machine-guns, reaching ever farther to right and left as the alarm spread.

Thirty-five seconds after the call to action had sounded through the battery, the subaltern on duty came running up to the guns, a paper with the orders written on it in his hands. It is not much use to try to shout orders through a gas-mask, but probably fatal to take it off for the purpose. As he ran with the paper from gun to gun, showing it to the 'Numbers One,' they reported their guns loaded and ready for action. Each emplacement was lit by two hurricane-lamps that seemed only to render the darkness within the canopies visible. But a well-trained detachment works by touch as much as by sight, and the lack of daylight seemed no hindrance to speed. More than ever the drill gave one the idea of the ordered movements of some well-oiled machine. The breech-blocks swung open to receive the shell, brought up on its loading-tray by four sturdy gunners. No sooner was this in position than the rammer, impelled by the weight of six men, drove the shell with a satisfying clang into its seating in the gun. A swift hand placed the cartridge behind it, and the breech-block swung to as the hand was removed.

By this time the layer was at his sight, flashing the light of a torch upon its graduations, and manipulating the traversing wheel until the gun was laid. Then the blunt muzzle swung into the air, the lanyard was hooked, and the detachments stood still as statues, waiting for the order to fire.

The race between the guns ended in a virtual dead-heat; there could barely have been a second between the first and the last. The subaltern glanced swiftly up the line of guns, put his megaphone up to his respirator, and bawled out one word as best he could: 'Fire!'

Nothing more articulate than a muffled bellow reached the men at the guns, but that was enough. The wood swayed and rocked under the roar of the simultaneous discharge of the great howitzers, and a blinding flame that seemed to fill the whole world shot out from their lips, leaving the eyes dazzled and lost in the utter gloom that followed. It seemed as though the mighty voice of the guns must shatter the senses of the men working in the emplacements, as though they must stand a few moments, dazed and stunned, before their will-power could prevail over the shock and force them to their work again. But to the servants of the guns the voice of their masters is familiar and encouraging, and in the silence that followed the crash of the first salvo, a silence broken only by the dwindling drone of the shell as they sped on their way, the detachments were already reloading the guns and laying them in readiness for the next.

The major, roused by the gas alarm rather than by the noise of his guns, came up from his dug-out and walked up to the subaltern. 'What's all the noise about?' he asked.

'Only an S.O.S. call, sir,' was the reply.

'How soon did you get the first round off after you got the call?' said the major.

'Forty seconds, sir,' replied the subaltern.

'Not bad work with respirators on,' said the major approvingly. 'Let me know if it develops into anything serious.' And with that he disappeared again in the direction of his dug-out. Like a wise man, he never interfered when things were going properly.

The second salvo was more ragged than the first; the order was 'Gun-fire!' which means that each gun reloads and fires as soon as it is ready. In a trice the fire developed into a rapid sequence of independent rounds, each gun-team working with desperate haste; but there was no sign of disordered hurry; everything was carried out with mechanical precision, although the guns were striving one with another, as always when gun-fire was ordered, to see which could get most rounds off. These totals formed an eager subject of discussion in billets afterwards.

The officer stood behind the guns, watch in hand. The orders for S.O.S. calls laid down that fire was to be as rapid as possible for the first five minutes, and after that at a certain definitely slower rate. At the end of this period he passed the word to the guns, and the series of explosions became more deliberate. But by that time over six tons of steel and high-explosive had been poured into the German lines, more than enough to make a flaming hell of the small sector upon which the battery was concentrated.

The battery settled down to its more decorous gait of one round per gun per minute. In the intervals between the rounds the rattle of machine-guns could still be heard in the distance, but fainter and less insistent. The night seemed darker than ever, and the rain, which had been little more than a heavy drizzle when the alarm was given, was now pouring down in slanting lines, visible against the gun-flashes. The gas bombardment had ceased by now, and a rising breeze was sweeping away the deadly traces that it had left. Out in front, towards the trenches, the Very lights still rose gracefully, but in ever-diminishing number. Even the thunder of the field-guns was growing less intense. Their flashes were no longer continuous, but rather resembled the last lightning of a dying storm. The alarm, whatever it was, was evidently subsiding.

The subaltern felt a touch upon his arm, and turned to find the telephonist at his elbow, with a message-form in his hand. He flashed his torch upon it, and grunted approvingly as he read. 'I thought so,' he muttered, then put one finger under the fabric of his mask and sniffed cautiously. Finding no trace of gas in the air, he swept the mask from his face in one swift movement, and put the megaphone to his lips. 'Cease firing! Take your respirators off!' he shouted. Two guns that were loaded emptied themselves with a final roar, and then silence settled down once more. The detachments set to work to clean their guns and to cover them with their tarpaulins, while the officer went round to inspect and to receive reports of the number of rounds fired. Then he returned to the fighting-post.

It was much as he had left it. The double blankets over the entrance had kept out the gas that tended to drift into it. The steady flame of the lamp and the glow of the fire made it seem like home, the most desirable place on earth, despite the pungent smoke from a hissing pile of fresh logs that filled it. The subaltern drew a deep breath of satisfaction, and turned to the telephonist.

'Call up brigade for me, will you?' he said. 'I want to speak to the adjutant.'

The man put the call through, and handed the instrument to his officer.

'Halloa!' said the latter. 'That you, Gibbs? Here's my report. Convolvulus speaking. S.O.S. Auchonvillers South, 2.13 A.M., 182 rounds fired. Ceased firing 2.29 A.M. I say, what was it all about, anyway?'

'Thanks!' came the voice from the other end. 'Raid of some kind against our line in front of Y Ravine. Repulsed without casualties, they say. I'll let you know when I get further particulars. Good-night.'

The subaltern put the instrument down, and returned to his table to enter the particulars of the shoot in the book kept for the purpose. The telephonist bent down to the fire, picked up the mess-tin that had been keeping warm on the ashes, and divided its contents carefully among three enamelled mugs, which he handed round with the gravity of a professional waiter. The cat, bored with the whole business, turned her back on the company, and composed herself to sleep. In a few minutes the fighting-post had returned to its previous restfulness.

But behind the German lines the stretcher-bearers were busy with their dead, and where the support trench had been was nothing but a row of smoking shell-holes.

THE TIAHUANACO MYSTERY.

By JOHN SHARP, Consul for Bolivia.

AS one beholds the colossal walls and monoliths of Tiahuanaco in Bolivia, which towered in the height of their splendour before Solomon of the Old World had erected his famous and wonderful temple, Horace Smith's soliloquy in the presence of the mummy of Thebes rushes with almost overwhelming meaning to the mind:

> When the Memnonium was in all its glory,
> And time had not begun to overthrow
> Those temples, palaces, and piles stupendous,
> Of which the very ruins are tremendous!

The study of these ruins (which lie in an arid plain, south of Lake Titicaca) is one which deserves the attention of the world, one worthy of all scientific research, pointing as it probably does to a solution of the important problem of the priority of races in the New World.

Unfortunately everything relating to Bolivia prior to the period of the Spanish conquest is shrouded in mystery to such an extent that, so far, few satisfactory results have rewarded the most careful investigation. Happily, however, such is the overpowering fascination of the long ago to the human mind that success in a large way may be considered certain, as scholars will follow scholars from generation to generation until the spell is broken and the world is made acquainted with what the ancient races of that part of the New World did and thought, and what they had to say to their kind.

The gigantic ruins, as now seen, represented a shattered record of past greatness when the Incas set up their dynasty. They are but the remains of a second, and probably a third, Tiahuanaco; and it is certain that it was not a contemporaneous civilisation that wrought such marvels of progress, but the peoples of successive or even remotely separated periods, not necessarily of identical origin. The earlier structures seem to have been swallowed up at a time, forgotten ages ago, when a great seismic upheaval changed the face of the Bolivian plateau and buried out of sight evidences of culture advanced far beyond anything the same race attained subsequently.

Much of the architecture of Tiahuanaco at the present day represents unfinished temples and palaces, giving the impression that the work had been abandoned on account of some great calamity, or disturbed—and afterwards forgotten—during a sudden invasion by an enemy, who drove the workmen from the scene, never to return. Between La Paz and Guaqui lie huge rocks intended for structural purposes. One measures ten feet in height, thirteen feet in width, and nearly two feet in thickness, and its approximate weight is ten tons. This is the Puerta del Sol, 'the door of the sun,' as the great doorway of the temple is called. The hieroglyphics are only partly finished, there being a space where the artist had made merely the outlines of the design, at which he seems to have been working when the place was suddenly abandoned. Around this spot lie colossal blocks of stone, some of which may be estimated as weighing fully one thousand tons. These rocks, including those used for the foundations of the palace Tunca Punco, for the obelisks, and for the largest of the columns of this great structure, appear to have been transported from a hill five miles away, and were probably conveyed by the same system of inclined planes as that used by the Egyptians. The material forming many of the monoliths of Puma Punco, where the carved doorway of the temple stands, is volcanic lava. It is thought that this material was brought from Cerro de Japia, an extinct volcano situated on the Isthmus of Yunguyo, about fifty miles distant from Tiahuanaco. The founders probably made use of the liquid lava of this volcano, which was at that time in eruption, bringing it, by means of canals, to the foot of the mountain, where it flowed into earthen moulds, a primitive method employed to-day in the moulding of liquid iron. In support of this theory, moulds are found in Tiahuanaco which indicate that they were used for casting idols.

From whatever standpoint they are viewed, there is something intensely interesting in the aspect of these gigantic ruins, and speculation as to the probable uses for which the various blocks were intended has resulted in the popular naming of each of these huge pieces. A cyclopean cube, carved as if for the purpose of holding writing materials and other accessories of the writing-table, has been named 'The Inca's Writing-Desk.' There are also 'The Inca's Bath,' the table of the officiating authority in the Palace of Justice, the stairway to the throne-room of the great palace, and a number of other furnishings, any of which would be worthy of adorning the ancient palaces of Egypt. The wonderful perfection of these stones, the apparently carefully chiselled outlines, the exquisite carvings, the well-polished surfaces, are such that the best sculptor of our day, using the finest steel chisels and other instruments, would be unable to improve upon the work. Although the name Inca has been associated with these remains, it is, of course, only by popular use, as it is known that these monumental ruins were in the same condition as they are at present when the Incas first visited Collasuyo.

The beginnings of various structures are to be seen over the entire area, and at the base of the great carved doorway of the temple excavations have been made which add another element of mystery to this archæological problem of the West. Huge idols, of which there are several, made in human form, and measuring from ten to fifteen feet in height in standing posture, occupy a prominent place in the ruins. These are curious-looking figures, more primitively fashioned than the ancient Egyptian idols, and bear some resemblance to the monuments of Easter Island. But the Tiahuanaco figures are better carved than the latter, and show many hieroglyphics on the arms and on the cincture around the body.

One is at a loss to understand why the builders fixed on such a site for their colossal edifices, as, from its singularly isolated position, it could have served little purpose as a fortress against invaders, and it is perfectly clear that the palace was not being built in the centre of any great population. The temple could hardly be filled with worshippers in a region so unfavourable, on account of the soil and the climate, to the development of a rich and prosperous empire. Although the choice of a spot removed from the centres of political activity for the erection of palaces and temples for religious purposes is a step indicative of Oriental worshippers, and influences the impression that it was a holy city, like Mecca or Benares, it is doubtful whether any other monument of antiquity presents to the modern world a more difficult enigma than this Sphinx of the Occident, Tiahuanaco. To study its builders deepens the mystery, as it seems incredible that a people who were sufficiently advanced in culture to erect such stupendous works of architecture, and to whom the arts of picture-writing were known, should have left no trace of their existence in the historical records of antiquity. But, after all, these remains, and others to be seen in the plains, deserts, and forests of South America, are but evidences of eras of activity fashioned upon older ones, telling us that there have been long, unknown periods or cycles of civilisation, in relation to which the few thousand years of known or conjectured history are a mere last chapter. And who can tell but that these are the source of the legends of a 'Lost Atlantis,' or a 'Lost Lemuria,' especially as there is every reason for believing that a complete change in the American continent and the Pacific had been wrought at some period, through a cataclysm which left only a few vestiges of anterior civilisation in that part of the world?

Even the word Tiahuanaco is a disputed point, and many interpretations are given. Attempts have been made to connect it with Chinese, Greek, and the language of the Mayas of Yucatan, but it is more likely to have been derived from either the Quichua or the Aymara language. Certain authorities of repute say the name was suggested by some great deluge, but although hieroglyphics cover the granite blocks, one can only look on these ruins with a feeling of helplessness while the key to the writings remains undiscovered. Under the doorway of the ancient temple is carved the figure of Viracocha, the great deity of popular worship for the ancient builders. Here Viracocha is represented as holding in each hand a sceptre, or perhaps a key, symbolic of his possessing the innermost treasures of the secret chambers of wisdom. According to the traditions of the Aymara inhabitants of this region, Viracocha was certainly not a war-god, but a wise and beneficent deity, who, rising from the waters of Lake Titicaca, created sun, moon, and stars, plants, animals, and man, and made his omnipotence felt throughout the world by performing deeds of great wisdom. As the two sceptres differ in form and appearance, they may symbolise a double sovereignty over the religious and the political destinies of the peoples. Surrounding him are half-kneeling figures which have the attitude of rulers rendering homage to their great chief, not in abject obeisance, but each with head erect, bending only one knee, and holding a sceptre. Perhaps they represent the kingdoms of the earth, or political sovereignty, inferior only to the omnipotence that rules both heaven and earth. At the doorway of the church in the plaza of Tiahuanaco two idols in sitting posture attract attention, seeming to symbolise the harmony between the old religion and the new, and testifying, with silent eloquence, to the universal character of the Christian faith, in which all beliefs are spiritualised and given a more lofty significance. These chiselled figures in all probability were originally designed to adorn the altar of the ancient pagan temple, and perhaps were intended to have a place near the throne of the great Viracocha. There are also idols standing in the plaza beyond the temple doorway, which were probably likewise intended to occupy important niches in the palace or the temple.

These monumental remains are all that has been left of the works of what must have been a strange and gifted people, struggling with all their strength to enlist the favour and the protection of the deities their imagination had conjured up. They are an extraordinary medley of the efforts of primitive savagery, the great undertakings of an ambitious barbarism, and hints of the dawn of civilisation. The enigmatical signs carved on the stonework mean more than adornment, as it is recognised that primitive people of all races have attached the greatest importance to the written sign, and rarely carved anything which was not intended to serve the purpose of chronology. Competent scientific authorities agree that these monuments are more remote in origin than those of Egypt; and if the view of ethnologists that all human races are of one species and one family be established, we may yet find that the earliest civilisation on the globe had its chief centre in America, and that its people were the ancestors, not the descendants, of Asiatic races. One thing, however, is certain: the continent of South America has been the scene of cycles of changes of humanity throughout very long periods, and the theatre of a strange and extensive activity in bygone ages. Bolivia's heritage of some of the most remarkable ruins of antiquity gives that country an especial claim to universal attention.

PARTING.

ALL day we 've been together, and the night
Now draws her dusky mantle o'er the land;
The sun long since has tipped with rosy light
The distant hills, and standing hand-in-hand,
We say 'Good-bye.' For mem'ries of the days
We 've spent together, and the hours when life
Seemed one great purpose, stretched in endless ways
To one eternity; when, amidst the strife
Of every day, we came together, and
You showed me peace—I thank dear God that He Has sent you to me for a moment. May E'er His blessing and His peace be with thee! . . .
Now star-bespangled night has veiled the day,
And dewy darkness hides us as we stand.

AGNES L. HILLMAN.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE LAST THREE MONTHS OF THE WAR IN THE AIR.

By Captain D. R. MACLAREN, D.S.O., M.C. and Bar, D.F.C.

PART I.

I.

EARLY in 1918 there occurred what might truly be called a lull before the storm. Every branch of the service felt it, and none more than the Air Force. It was almost as if an armistice had been declared in the air, for German machines were seldom seen, and when encountered invariably avoided combat. The enemy fighting squadrons (Jagdstäffel) were composed of Albatross and Pfalz scouts, and now and then a Fokker triplane would be seen.

The British squadrons were superior in equipment, as we had the Sopwith Camel, the Sopwith Dolphin, and the S.E.5, all single-seater fighting scouts, better than the German machines in every way. However, even when we met formations of the enemy with conditions favourable for them, they would not attack unless outnumbering us.

So, for some unaccountable reason, the first months of 1918 passed by with the German Air Force living up to the best traditions of the German Navy. An average report in those days read: 'No enemy aircraft seen. Visibility fair. Anti-aircraft fire normal.'

Lack of action is very hard on airmen, and we used up considerable nervous energy trying to decide what ailed the Hun. At times we heard that he lacked material to manufacture machines, at others that he was conserving resources for his big offensive.

Then, one day, Intelligence reported that the great German offensive would be launched on the 21st of March, and his first attack would be at Quéant. We knew that our lull was over at last, and that we should soon meet the Hun at his strongest in the air, as would our armies on the earth. From that time up to his great attack his machines began to appear in ever-increasing numbers.

When it came, the tremendous onslaught shook our whole line and caused the greatest anxiety everywhere; but the airmen were in their glory, and fought from dawn to dusk. If ever there was a storm after a lull, it was the German offensive of March.

The famous Richthofen suddenly made an appearance, supported by his band of desperados known as 'The Circus.' They earned the title both by the colour and by the variety of their machines. We often met this band of Richthofen's, but although they were good fighters, I never saw them give battle elsewhere than on their own side of the line. If one of their machines was hit, the pilot could descend to his own territory. For us a forced descent meant capture by the enemy. This was so constantly the case at that time that out of forty British machines reported missing in a day, perhaps twenty-five could have gained friendly territory in safety had we not had to engage over enemy ground.

In a fight over the Somme, Baron von Richthofen, who was the greatest of German airmen, was shot down while he was attacking one of our artillery machines, and the loss of this very gallant man seemed a signal for the lessening of the intensive air fighting. This gradually resulted in a comparative respite, which was not broken until August, when the Allied offensive took definite form.

It is the period from then until early in November that I want to write about, because several things made it the most dramatic and the most bitter phase of all for the airmen. There was no longer any sign of sportsmanship on the part of the Hun—he knew that the last throw of the dice had come, and that, unless he could hold us in the air, nothing could avert the menace of final victory by our armies.

A new type of German fighting-machine appeared, the Fokker Biplane Scout. It was much the best machine the Huns had ever had, and as they appeared in great numbers we began to have a lively time of it. They patrolled in formations of from fifteen to thirty machines. On bright days they would fly as high as possible, and on dull days one would meet them on the fringe of the mist. After one or two brushes with them, it could be seen that the German flying corps had regained the offensive spirit, and were fighting with a ferocity that they had never equalled in the past. It was their last bid for supremacy, and, provided they were in large numbers, they fought furiously—but always on their own side of the line.

The first Fokker I had seen had shown himself two months previous to this, and we had enjoyed some good sport at the time. He was the leader of the White-Tail Squadron (although his own machine was entirely black), and one day, while flying alone, I spotted him, evidently on the same quest as myself, out for a small and quiet scrap. At ten thousand feet we met, but when I made towards him he turned across my front. I had not seen a Fokker before, so I turned to have a good look at him, climbing at the same time. He seemed enormous in size, and looked very grim in his dull black with white crosses. The colour of his machine was, I suppose, his expression of German psychology.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

When he saw that I was alone he swung away from me, but I put my nose down and started to close up with him. He looked back at me once, and then went straight down; but I followed. When we flattened out of our dive I found I was being fired at from the ground, and also that his speed was superior to mine. I let loose a few rounds from my guns, but, try as I would, I could not get closer to him; so, giving it up, I climbed again. I had not gone far when, to my amazement, he began climbing after me.

Evidently this was a Hun of some kidney!

In a few minutes we were at it again, but when I approached him he would dive towards the ground before a burst could be got in on him; and when I climbed to a few thousand feet, up he came too. After this had happened several times, and each of us had missed the other by inches, I thought I should like to show my appreciation of his sportsmanship by flying alongside and waving. I was on the point of doing this, when the memory of what some of their chaps had done altered my decision; so I went after him again, and this time he flew straight for home and never looked back.

It was the last time I saw a Fokker alone, and, to the best of my knowledge, the last time that a German airman showed that he loved the game and was ready to take on any passing adventurer for the zest of a fight.

II.

My first big encounter with these new people occurred shortly after the battle of Amiens, when our troops held a line running roughly from Bray to Bapaume. Our aerodrome was then at Bertangles, a long distance from the fighting, so that it took twenty minutes to reach our patrol area.

It was a dull morning, with the clouds about four thousand feet from the earth, and the air was very cold. We had passed over Albert and that horribly devastated area east of it, and were making our way towards Bapaume, when I espied several machines in the distance hanging about in the mist. As we drew closer several more appeared, and I made them out to be Fokkers—about twenty in number. Our artillery were putting over a heavy barrage opposite Le Transloy, and the Huns were evidently on the look-out for some poor old British artillery machine that might be observing for the guns.

True enough, there was the old 'Harry Tate' cruising up and down our side, waiting for the Hun to go away, or for some help, so that he could get on with his job.

We were in single flight formation (seven machines), so were outnumbered; but a large formation like theirs is rather clumsy to manœuvre in a mist, and as our machines were smaller, we could keep in close formation without risk of collision.

It was a case of watching for some of the enemy to become isolated, dash in and attack them, and dash out again—tactics, incidentally, which were laid down in that music-hall ditty some ten years ago:

> He walked right in,
> And he turned around,
> And walked right out again, &c.

We climbed into the edge of the mist and waited. Presently a rift in the cloud appeared, and it occurred to me that we might get into this rift, climb a bit, and watch for anything that might cross below us. This was quickly done, and hardly ten seconds had passed before four of the machines emerged from the mist and began to cross the lane.

Then I noticed that they had white tails! This was luck. They belonged to one of the crack Jagdstäffel, and we had certain scores to settle with these gentlemen.

I dived steeply at the leader, and when within twenty yards of him started shooting into his 'shop-windows.' I doubt if he ever knew what happened. There was hardly time to get fifty rounds into him ere I had to 'zoom' to avoid ramming, but when I turned to see what had happened he had begun his fall, the smoke from his engine showing he had been unable to shut it off. My right-hand man had succeeded in sending one of the enemy spinning to the earth, but the remainder had escaped by diving east.

It was with a great feeling of elation that we realised that, small as it was, we had scored our first victory in the Allied push, and that we had accomplished the turning of at least one cog in the great Foch machine. But caution was necessary; we had to get past the cloud, and at any moment we might meet more of the enemy. We had just passed through a thin layer of haze when our suspicions received sudden confirmation.

Five Huns were coming right at us!

Our plan of action had to be decided in a matter of seconds. We could not pass over them, as our heads were against the ceiling; if we turned they would give us a broadside at close range which would hit some one surely; and if we dived—well, that wasn't done. They would be right behind us, shooting all the while, and over German territory. Diving was neither good sportsmanship nor good tactics.

Fritz, however, spared us any further brainfag by deciding for us. His formation quickly spread. The leader opened fire on me, and I let loose a string of bullets, which seemed to be going right into his radiator. One of his shots struck my centre section with a 'click,' and in a fraction of a second I pulled back the stick and swooped up into the clouds; but as I did so he shot by underneath, on his back.

It was a disagreeable situation. I was in the mist, and hardly knew whether I dared emerge above it or not. My compass kept turning round and round, and suddenly I learned from the speed-indicator that the machine was travelling at one hundred and twenty miles an hour. This wouldn't do—we must be diving. I decided to climb, so, gently easing the stick back, I watched the dial. All at once I was almost hurled out of my belt, and the next thing I knew I was spinning—a most uncomfortable sensation, and a very bad exhibition of flying.

Instinctively I shut off the motor, and as the earth appeared below me, straightened out and looked for the others. They were just in front of me, and I could have yelled with delight—when I received a shock. A little way ahead of them a veritable swarm of Huns appeared. This time it was a case not of ethics but of dire necessity. We dived straight for our lines, the Huns doing the same thing, and sending smoke-tracer bullets singing all about us. Luck was with us, however, and no one was hit.

We got safely over our lines, and had started to rise, when we were overjoyed to see a whole squadron of S.E.5's coming down from the north towards the Fokkers. It looked as if there was going to be a battle-royal, when the enemy turned tail and dived east. It must have been a great disappointment to the British squadron commander, for it would have been a splendid fight; but the Hun never relished a scrap unless he was much superior in numbers.

So, after all this ado, we went home, and I made my report.

III.

If I may digress from the actual fighting for a moment or two (and it is only natural that with the end of the war people at home should be a little weary of tales of combat), I want to write of my comrades during that time, when they were on the ground. For a few days we had rain, and several times we took the car into Abbeville and had dinner, or rambled through the streets of Amiens, viewing the ruins caused by German shells a few months before.

At the time I have in mind our troops were making an effort to cross the Somme at Péronne and Brie, and when the mist was not too low we lent them what aid we could by attacking the enemy troops, flying very low and dropping twenty-pound Cooper bombs among them, as well as peppering them with machine-gun bullets. In every case it was a hot reception they gave us, and a great many of our best pilots had been killed or wounded, leaving a feeling of depression which we were unable to shake off.

We received orders to move to Cappy, however, and when finally settled in our new quarters—although they could hardly be termed luxurious—we became more of a happy family than we had been for some time.

Our C.O. was not one who supported the idea that the flying-man must drink and dissipate to enjoy his spare time; in fact, he heartily discouraged such things. He did encourage sport, though, and we used to play every kind of game in our odd leisure hours. In the evening we had an orchestra that was a godsend, composed of a violin, a mandolin, a flute, and, of course, a piano. I shall never forget the hours that orchestra helped to pass.

They were happy days during that dull weather, for, though we knew that not many of us would be alive after the offensive, every one was full out to do his best for a comrade on the ground, as he was ready to do it in the air. They were the most likeable fellows one could meet—unselfish, hospitable, and in good spirits all the time.

There was not one amongst them corresponding in any way to the dissipated waster H. G. Wells depicts as the flying-man in 'Joan and Peter.'

Our 'little big brother of the Air Force,' who sees into the souls of all airmen, has jumped to some hasty conclusions, or, in his hurry to give the truth to the world, has perhaps taken his idea from one squadron only—one that was probably notorious for its 'binging.' I am happy to state that out of more than one hundred squadrons in France there were not more than half-a-dozen that could be placed in that category.

We had a large number of Canadians in the squadron at the time, and our C.O. showed his appreciation of them in many ways. No nationality or national temperament has all the flying faculty, but he felt (as I do) most sincerely that the Canadian has the flying instinct, combined with the fighting spirit, to a very high degree. Let me admit frankly that I may be biassed in this matter. At any rate, we thought we were the best airmen in the world, and that is not a bad cargo to carry with you when you meet the Hun at fifteen thousand feet.

The aerodrome which we were occupying then had been used by the famous Richthofen, and there were numerous evidences that he had been there. One souvenir which I took was a sign warning pedestrians against aerial firing taking place on the aerodrome. It bore Richthofen's signature.

IV.

To meet the German tactics we now began to fly in squadron formation—that is, three flights of five machines each, generally flying one flight above the other, the lowest flight leading. In this way we were better able to cope with the Hun as regards numbers.

One fine, bright morning we took off as a squadron for the first time on this front, and, in conjunction with an S.E. squadron, started towards Roye to see what we could see. We crossed the line at twelve thousand feet with the S.E.5's well above us, covering every manœuvre. We went a good way over the lines, and were swinging up towards Péronne when a large formation of Fokkers became visible, flying towards us from the east. They were slightly above us, and by the way they flew, it looked very much as if they meant business. Right over the top of us they came in good formation, thinking, of course, that there was no one else in the sky but themselves and us. They turned and swooped down on us, but as they did so the S.E.5's were on them.

I had turned to meet them as they attacked us, and they seemed to be in utter confusion. Some of them began to spin, others were doing extraordinary half-rolls, and over to my right one was in flames. Then, quite suddenly, there was a deal of smoke-tracer about, and looking to its source, I got a shock.

It was my friend of the black Fokker making quick flat turns and firing in every direction.

This time I determined that the air wasn't vast enough for both of us, and I gave him a heavy burst. He did not wait, but, up to his old tricks, put his nose down and made straight east. I had just started off after him, when I noticed a white-tailed Fokker to my right, about my own level, and about one hundred yards away. He did not seem to know what was happening, so I opened out, going under him, then pulled up, giving him a good burst from underneath at very short range. He turned over, made one large curve, and burst into flames.

But my grim enemy had managed to get clear away again. He was an undoubted adept at extricating himself from hot corners; but the Fates had in store that we should meet once more, for the third and last time.

None of us had suffered any damage, and we knew that there would be no more Fokkers on that patrol. When we returned home I found that the S.E.5's had shot down three and we had accounted for two.

We again ran into bad weather, but as our army had just smashed through the Hindenburg line, we amused ourselves by going along the German trenches picking up souvenirs. Several of us succeeded in exploring the famous Hindenburg tunnel, a sap several miles in length, thirty feet below the surface, and capable of billeting thousands of men. What a tremendous feat the army performed when it captured that system of defences! During this quiet spell I had managed to persuade one Hun to land behind our lines. (He had been balloon-hunting with some success.) I learned that he had sustained several wounds, but whether the poor beggar lived or not I cannot say.

Knowing that my official record of machines brought down is fifty-seven, many of my friends have asked me if I ever felt any remorse for the men who went down with them. The first time I saw two Germans being carried away from their machines which we had brought down behind our lines, I did feel it very keenly. But the feeling that was uppermost with us was a great love of our own fellows, and we knew well that every Hun who got away might kill one or more of our comrades later on. We had not asked for the war, and we were there for one purpose—to kill the Hun. An officer of high rank once told me that he would never shoot a man descending in a parachute; it wasn't the sporting thing to do. There is much in all of us that agrees with him, but he forgot that a man descending thus holds vital information which he will give to his artillery. Hundreds of our men's lives might go as a result of his knowledge. Fortunately in the air you do not see your opponent's face. It is like shooting a bird, and the personal aspect does not affect you. It was my experience that our bravest air fighters, those who always fought to a finish, were the most courteous to captured airmen, and the most deeply grieved when one of their own men was killed. Those who were at all squeamish about the Hun were usually comparatively indifferent to the death of a comrade.

v.

And now came a tragedy that cast its gloom over every man in the squadron. It meant promotion for me, but that was a mighty small compensation for the sorrow I felt. The incident I refer to left us all determined to fight to the end whenever we were engaged in a scrap.

Several new pilots had been with us for some time, and had now been judged fit to fly over the lines. Our C.O. accordingly expressed his intention of leading them over on their first trip. I, for my part, took two with me, and when we arrived at the lines I remained east of the main formation in order to act as a bait to any Huns that might be tempted to dive on me.

After a time eight Fokkers, who thought we should be easy prey, came swinging down on us, but as they approached we plunged underneath the C.O.'s formation. The Fokkers saw what was up, and drew away immediately—except one who, believing himself more skilful than his fellows, came straight in among us and attacked my right-hand man. He was so close to me that I could see him leaning forward, looking along his sights and shooting wildly. Before I could get my sights on him he turned. My left-hand man crossed behind me and shot this fellow down. It was a quick bit of work, especially as this pilot had been in France only a few weeks.

Our main formation, however, seemed to be very much agitated, and, as I picked up my two partners, the others came and joined us. They seemed to have no leader, and I could not see the C.O.'s machine among them. I knew they had not been attacked, as they had been in sight all the time; so, greatly puzzled, I took them back, and we landed. Then I learned the truth.

Our C.O. had been killed.

He had had a collision with one of the new pilots, and both machines had been hopelessly smashed. There wasn't an officer or a man who hadn't loved him as only men can love a brave and gallant gentleman.

(Continued on page 327.)

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XXI.

PRESENTLY we glided along one side of a square, at the corner of which a gang of workmen were busy mending the pavement. The car slowed down, the driver peering forward to see if the way was clear beyond the knot of labourers, and I saw the outline of a grimy statue in the half-light. I knew where I was. With a hand on the door, I was hesitating whether I should jump out, when, under a lamp-post not half-a-dozen yards away, a welcome and inspiring apparition took shape. Never until that moment had I grasped the true value and significance, the sense of security, embodied in the everyday stolid figure of the London policeman. From helmet to heel, there he stood, for liberty and civilisation, at my service. I could have fallen on his ample neck. I had half-opened the door, when the chauffeur looked round and saw me. To my surprise, he immediately steered to the kerb, where he pulled up beside the constable. In a trice I was outside.

'I want your help, officer,' said I.

He ran a wary eye over me, and, apparently satisfied that I had not been having a 'night out,' asked in a fruity Cockney, 'Wot's the matter, sir?'

'I can't tell you all just now, but I am not going to lose sight of this man,' I replied, pointing to the chauffeur.

The two exchanged glances.

'I think some'ow, sir, there's bin a mistyke,' said the policeman.

'What's the charge?' asked the chauffeur, civilly enough. 'I'm sure I don't know.'

'Mistake! Charge! The charge is serious enough. I have been kidnapped and ill-treated,' I began; 'I'——

'That may be so, sir, but I have only your word for it,' said the chauffeur coolly; and there was not the slightest suggestion of apprehension in his voice or his face. By this time a little knot of people had collected, and although the policeman, by a majestic gesture, indicated that there was nothing which concerned the public, its numbers were increasing.

'I think some'ow, sir, there's bin a mistyke,' again came from the policeman.

'Mistake, my good man! Mistake! Will you'——

'If you don't want me further, I'll trouble you for my fare,' interrupted the imperturbable chauffeur. 'I've been up half the night.'

'Your fare will no doubt be all right. You can apply for it to your employers,' I rejoined, with considerable emphasis on the last word.

'I think some'ow, sir, there's bin a mistyke,' came from the policeman with the inevitability of a Greek chorus.

'Come, sir, I'll drive you home, and you can arrange about the fare then,' said the chauffeur. 'I am pretty sure I can convince you that what the policeman says is right. I think that there has been a mistake. Where do you want to go, sir?' he asked civilly.

The man's aplomb staggered me, but I had no intention of being 'bluffed.' For answer I took my seat beside him, at the same time whipping out my revolver.

'Straight to Scotland Yard, if you please.'

The chauffeur stared curiously at me for a moment, and then looked at the policeman.

'At once,' I ordered. 'And if you try any tricks, you'll rue it.'

His eyes travelled from mine to the revolver and back again. 'Very good, sir! The Yard.—Jump in, officer. Perhaps this is the best plan for everybody;' and without another word he sent the car skimming through the early traffic of London. The streets slid swiftly under us, and soon we reached the ever-open gate of the Yard.

'Come with me,' I said peremptorily as I got out.

'Cert'nly, sir,' said the chauffeur, and led the way. Before the policeman or I could say a word, he had beckoned to a clerk. Then he wrote a few words on a scrap of paper, and, to my astonishment, handed it to him. The clerk disappeared with the message. Almost immediately we were shown into another room, where the inspector-in-charge was sitting at a desk. He took a good look at me, and then addressed himself to the chauffeur.

'Good-morning! Who is this?'

''Fraid I don't know. He demanded to be brought here, and as he was my fare and was extr'ord'nly pressing—he had a revolver—I brought him. Seeing that he came out of No. 9 Duff Avenue, I didn't think twice about obliging him.'

The inspector looked at me, and read mystification in my face.

'I'll tell you the whole story,' I said to him; 'it ought to straighten matters out. You appear to know this chauffeur.'

'I know him very well,' said the inspector. 'But I don't know you. I'll hear both sides—yours first.'

He nodded to the two men, who left the room.

'You may take it that the chauffeur won't leave the building. May I ask you how you came to be, as he says you were, at 9 Duff Avenue? Better give me the bones of your story at once. It will save time, and I have an idea that time may be precious in this affair.' He took a note of my name and address, and I then gave him a rapid summary of my adventures from my entering the restaurant in Soho until my arrival at the Yard. He listened, plainly much interested.

'This is extraordinary! There is not a minute to be lost. Without doubting your word, Mr Forbes, may I ask, is there any one who can vouch for your identity?'

I thought of Tony, who had, I knew, friends in the C.I.D.

'Dozens,' I said; 'but the best one I can think of is Mr Anthony Keene-Leslie, whom perhaps you know.'

'I do, of course. His name is one of the best you could have given us.'

'He has a telephone in his bedroom, and I'll risk wakening him.'

Luckily, Tony was at home. Considerably astonished by my early summons, he promised to come to me with all speed. In the interval I gave the details of my adventure to the inspector, and in an incredibly short time my friend arrived, and with him, to my surprise, the chauffeur.

'Hullo, Neil!—Morning, Mr Ker!' he greeted us. 'I flung on some clothes and did a record sprint. What do you mean by dragging me out of bed at this hour of the morning? What's the game? Have your friends been up to some more tricks?'

The inspector rapidly gave him the heads of my story.

'Well! this beats the band!' said Tony when he had finished. 'You have had a lucky escape. Allow me to introduce you to your sometime chauffeur, my friend Mr Richard Sparke of the C.I.D.'

I began to see daylight. Mr Sparke smiled as we shook hands.

'We took each other for "wrong uns," and no wonder! I thought you were one of the Duff Avenue lot, and you thought the same of me. Perhaps the inspector will clear up the situation.'

'Simple as A B C—when you know,' said Inspector Ker. 'We have had No. 9 Duff Avenue, Cluden Road, Northaneastham, under observation for some time, but the trails had crossed once or twice. We weren't dead-sure about the house, and there wasn't strong enough information on which to apply for a search-warrant. Our men reported that the inmates had a motor-car and a garage of their own, and that sometimes the house was visited by men using a hired car. One of these we traced to a respectable firm of garage-owners in Bloomsbury. We got into touch with them, and they arranged to let us know when the next order for a car came. A 'phone message came from them late last night that a car was ordered to be at the house at two o'clock this morning. One of friend Sparke's specialities is the automobile, and what he doesn't know of motoring and of London and its suburban roads and byways can be written on a postage-stamp. So for the evening he was "John Smith," an experienced chauffeur in the employment of the respectable firm I refer to.—Now then, Sparke!'

The versatile Mr Sparke took up the tale.

'When I got there,' said he, 'I was told that the gentleman would be ready in a few minutes, that he wanted me to drive in a hurry to see a patient—the game being that he was a doctor—and that he would direct me further when we neared London. I waited with the car at No. 9 for some ten minutes. Then my fare—Mr Forbes, it appears; but in the dark I didn't see his face—came out. A person whom I took to be a man-servant showed him into the car, shut the door, and told me to hurry. I set off, and in the end my fare comes out of the car with a revolver, gets a policeman on board, orders me to drive here, and here I am.'

'I agree with Mr Keene-Leslie. You have, indeed, made a lucky escape, Mr Forbes,' said the inspector gravely. 'Your information comes in the nick of time for us. What you say about the curious purring noise at the house interests me immensely. I think that the gang won't be at large very long; but they are wily customers, and we may be too late. However, we'll get a warrant, and then we'll "shake up" No. 9. While we have been talking, I may tell you that all the stations have been rung up, and the house is being watched. But we must lose no time.' He took a look at me. 'Feeling all right? You'll be the better for some breakfast after your "jumpy" night. It is early, but I'll 'phone the "Golden Cross," where I am known. You'll get something to eat, and I'll pick you up there in half-an-hour.'

On the way out I met the policeman. His face was cleft—there is no other word—by a smile.

'I think some'ow, sir, there 's bin a mistyke,' he began.

'So do I,' I said, and, borrowing from Tony, I gave him largesse.

Rapid explanations by me to Tony, questions by him, and my answers made the time speed in the quiet little hotel where we breakfasted.

'Our little week-end trip to the Sussex coast won't come off, Neil,' said Keene-Leslie; 'but it seems we are to have, by way of compensation, a morning "not without incident," as the reporters say. You have been lucky—extraordinarily lucky. I am convinced that The Searchers meant to get the paper out of you at all costs. Starvation and solitary confinement will wear down steel. It will be a tremendous business if we find their half of the paper in the house, but I doubt it. They are much too wary a lot to risk losing their great secret.'

A big car pulled up in half-an-hour to the minute. Sparke was driving, beside him a man in plain clothes; inside were the inspector and the quiet-looking little gentleman with clean-cut features and pale thoughtful face, to whom Tony had introduced me just before we started for Italy. Gentle in voice, with a dreamer's eyes and a scholar's stoop, he would have passed for a detached student of affairs, but his name is a great one in the records of English criminology.

He recognised me at once.

'You have had your chapter of adventure since we met, Mr Forbes, but I hope to close it to-day.'

'Any news, sir?' asked Tony.

'The house has been watched,' said he. 'There is smoke coming from one of the chimneys, but nobody has been seen.'

'Will it be a "hot corner"?'

'A toss up! We have half-a-dozen men near the place, and perhaps our number may rattle 'em when we close in. I am inclined to think that, if they know the house is surrounded, they 'll see the game is up and make the best of it; but—perhaps not! Are you armed?'

Tony nodded.

'And your friend?'

'Yes,' I said. 'I took the liberty of putting "Mr Wakeford's" revolver into my pocket.'

'That's all right, then. I hope we'll be in time.'

(Continued on page 325.)

DIAMONDS AND CARBONADO IN BRAZIL.

By Ashmore Russan.

TRAVELLING in Bahia, Brazil, on the Central Railway, which is the railway to the diamond-fields (or, rather, the diamond rivers and streams) of that state, the writer was once much interested in the ostentatiously displayed wealth of a fellow-passenger, a Brazilian, whose hands were burdened with gems—two or more on each finger, or about twenty in all—which he changed occasionally from a skin wallet carried in his breast-pocket. Though roughly cut and without much fire, they were undoubtedly diamonds, and some of them were quite large. Observing the attention he had attracted, the gentleman suddenly extended his much-ornamented digits and exclaimed in excellent English, 'I am sure you must be thinking I am very vain, sir—that I wear these rings for show! Well, sir, I hope you will pardon me for addressing you, but I can assure you that I am not at all vain, although I certainly do wear diamonds for show. My fingers are my shop-windows, and if you are open to buy a good stone, a genuine Brazilian, I shall be very pleased if you will examine my stock.'

He was a diamond-dealer, a capangueiro, so called from the little bags (capangas), made of cat-skin, which he and his like are never without. What such men do not know about Brazilian diamonds is not worth knowing. The trust they place in possible customers is something to wonder at. Without hesitation, one of them will hand over his bag of gems for examination by a prospective buyer, and immediately turn away his head and carry on a conversation with some adjacent person or persons. It is said that they seldom lose a stone, the explanation of such astonishing immunity being not so much the general honesty—although that is admirable—as the fact that the capangueiro knows every stone in his bag, and could scarcely fail to discover a theft on the spot, or at the first examination of his stock.

It is not generally known that diamonds which, after being cut in Brazil, or even in Europe, are found to be flawed or deficient in fire are sometimes sent back to the district from which they come, to be put right, and of course increased in value. Apparently it is almost a lost art, but a recent traveller in the diamond-fields saw the operation performed by an old gentleman of his acquaintance, who made no secret of his methods—indeed, seemed very pleased to show his skill. The process is called 'burning,' and in Brazil it is carried out as follows. A small crucible, about three inches high and one and a half inches in diameter, is placed on an ordinary blacksmith's hearth, and when it is cherry-red in colour the diamonds are dropped into it with a spoon. Charcoal is then heaped around it, and a blast commenced, and continued until a welding heat has been obtained. This, the first stage, occupies about three minutes. The crucible is removed from the fire, its contents are examined and replaced, and the blast is then continued for a minute and a half longer. Finally, the crucible is again taken from the hearth, and after a tablespoonful of potassium nitrate has been thrown into it, it is well shaken. As soon as the vapour has dispersed, the diamonds are scraped out singly and allowed to fall into a basin of water. When cool, they are taken out, dried, counted, and replaced in their original envelopes. The loss in weight is said to be a trifle over 8 per cent.; the increase in value approaches 100 per cent. Often the stones put into the crucible are flawed, but when they are taken out the flaws have disappeared.

This remarkable, yet apparently simple, operation is carried out at Santa Izabel, where the first diamonds discovered in the State of Bahia were found. The discovery was quite casual. The story goes that a weary traveller went to a brook to quench his thirst and bathe his tired feet. He stumbled into a pocket—a handful of gems in a hole in the rocks. That was many years ago, but men and women are still working in the stream, and occasionally they find a diamond.

In the early days carbonado (or 'carbon,' as it is known in trade) was considered of no value, and when found was generally thrown away. But the employment by miners of diamond-drills (for boring different strata and bringing samples of rock and earth to the surface for examination) changed all that. Carbonado is harder and less apt to fracture than pure diamond; hence its great value nowadays for mounting in the steel heads or crowns of rotary diamond-drills. At the present time gravel which was washed for diamonds nearly a century ago is being rewashed for carbons, which may be described as uncrystallised (or imperfectly crystallised) diamonds, in colour light brown to black, irregular in form, and scarcely distinguishable from ironstone pebbles—except by experts. They are found almost exclusively in Bahia State, and the test generally applied to determine whether a stone is or is not a carbon is to ascertain if it will scratch bottles or crystals. Corundum is the supreme test. If the stone will scratch corundum it is a carbon.

The diamond-bearing gravels are washed in carumbes, or bateas—wooden pans of different shapes and sizes. Having collected a heap of gravel, the men transport it to the nearest stream. If the gravel is taken from the bed of a stream, they pile it up on the bank. Sometimes water is conveyed to the gravel-heap by means of a flume. Generally the men work in a gang, or turma. They stand in a row in the water, each with his pan in front of him. The first man (No. 1) shovels gravel from the heap into No. 2's batea, or carumbe, as the case may be. No. 2 removes the larger stones, shakes and dips in water the remainder, and empties the contents of his pan into that of No. 3, who takes out the next largest pebbles and passes the residue on to No. 4. This man examines the gravel very carefully, and then passes it on to No. 5, the chief of the turma, for final examination. The operations go on like clockwork, each man having a somewhat different action, but all employing the circular, swirling motion, continual shaking, and the occasional dip in the water. The last man takes his time. After any visible diamonds or carbons left in the remaining gravel have been extracted, the fine sands are placed on one side, to be manipulated by the children, even the smallest toddlers assisting.

This final process is called escrevendo, or 'writing' for diamonds. Of course, only the smallest specks, the 'mosquitoes,' have been left. The method is as follows. A handful of the fine sand is placed in a very small batea with about an eggcupful of water; the pan is then rotated until the sands have gathered in the centre, when it is so tilted towards the operator that the water drains away to the lower edge. The water is now sent swirling round the pan, which is handled in such a way that when the small flood reaches a certain point on its upper edge, it descends with a rush to the lower, cutting off a portion of the sand and laying it open for inspection. When the operation is completed, the sand lies in regular lines or tiny ridges on the tilted bottom of the batea, the lines resembling the strokes in a child's copy-book—hence the term escrevendo. Naturally the children love the work, which is very interesting, and sometimes profitable.

Needless to say, a great many diamonds disappear in the course of the various manipulations; that is, they never reach the head of the turma, or the padrón, if the men are working for an employer. In which case, as some one has remarked, 'only the manipulators know where they have gone, and they won't tell.'

JOHN BROWN.

CHAPTER XVI.—THE NEW ARMY OFFICER.

'THE New Army Officer is the finest production of the twentieth century,' said Captain Cheerall at one of his lectures. 'He is as fascinating as, frequently, he is irritating, for he is no lover of conventions. His success has been staggering, particularly to the Germans, and his bravery is the talk of the world. I, of the Old Army, salute the New Crusader; but I am sorry to say a few ancient mandarins don't. We have to destroy this prejudice, or else remove all those who fail to encourage the bright young men who have led our platoons, companies, and regiments to victory.

'The New Officer is an Edison and a Trojan.

'While I am proud of that glorious Old Army which I saw bleeding at Mons and expiring at Ypres, I do feel we must cease to talk of the old and concentrate on the new. The New Army is fighting to-day, and it is most discouraging to the New Army Officer to remind him continually of his temporary rank, his temporary job.

'That word "temporary" ought to be silenced for ever.

'The New Officer has proved that leadership is no monopoly, and that warfare is not so difficult to master. He has exploded the theory that it takes twenty years to make a colonel, and forty to make a general. He has shocked our drill-sergeants and surprised our Napoleons by his ruthless destruction of shams and his nimble seizure of facts. He is the daring, dashing, dauntless Brigadier Gerard.

'He is an optimist, and therefore successful.

'If the New Officer owes a great deal to his predecessor, his predecessor must also acknowledge his debt. The sincerity, the enthusiasm, the intelligence, and the business ability of the new man have been priceless assets in this war. What would this Empire have done without the splendid fellow who chucked his wealth and his pleasures into the dust-heap, and came to us for a job? He was irrepressible! If his chest was small, he bribed men to slip him through. If his heart was diseased, it suddenly became cured. If varicose veins were in his legs, he had them cut out. If he was forty or fifty, he became twenty or thirty. And if he hadn't experience, he always said, "I 'll d—— soon learn."

'He was a blood-thirsty Crusader.

'Now, when he joined we were mournful. We looked at him and sighed. "The correct thing," somehow or other, wasn't in his keeping. He was inclined to call the colonel "Alf" and the sergeant-major "Bill." He didn't know! And, oh dear—his word of command! It was so respectable—so tame! He seemed to apologise to the troops for his presence—yea, his very existence. Yet he was a sticker. He was cursed from dawn till sunset. In those early days he was occasionally insulted and abused. There was a war on, and we regarded him as shell-fodder and not as human. Let us apologise now. We were worried. The Old Army was dying. The Huns were knocking at the gates, and we, with our old conservative ideas, regarded him as a forlorn hope and sometimes as "a wash-out."

'How wrong, how terribly unjust, we were!

'But he always said, "Yes, sir." He always smiled. His trust was embarrassing, and his docility staggering. To us, his masters, jailers, and martinets, he yielded a homage which made us feel like gods. His very willingness made us misjudge him and think him a fool. "No guts" was a term frequently on our lips. We, with the vanity of the old and tried, could not see that he was of our blood, our faith, our schooling, our patriotism, and our pride. Of these virtues we imagined we had the monopoly. What insolence! What fools we were!

'But we were worried about the war.

'In those anxious, awful days we had no rifles, no uniforms, no equipment to spare; no brass bands, no flashing swords or coloured fripperies of rank and standing. Yet this amazing youth was undaunted. He shoved dummy guns into the hands of his platoon, made trenches with fire-shovels and trowels, used live brigadiers for targets, and gave the command, "At the enemy—at four hundred—fire!" The brigadiers woke up and—smiled. The imagination of the New Officer was helpful. He could talk, for he was educated. And he pictured German armies on the move, German hordes at the double, and to meet them roused his civvy-clad platoon to heights of devilry and daring, then charged with his little bamboo cane—to glory.

'By Gad, he always won!

'Even then we doubted him. We somehow felt he wouldn't "pan out." Most excellent for the Boys' Brigade and the like, but for a war—well, we should see! At last the uniforms came, the rifles too, but somebody forgot the ammunition. He said, "Oh, that's the bally War Office again. Let's carry on with these dummy clips." Standing, lying, kneeling, and sitting, he taught the wonders of rapid fire, and how to make a "group" on the square head of the pimple-dotted Boche. Jules Verne wasn't in it! His men made bull's-eyes on the colonel's tummy, and riddled the nether regions of the twenty-stone quartermaster.

'Then we called him a ruddy swanker.

'For all that, he went on. The fellow was clean mad to "get out." We said, "Yes, when we've put you through the mill." And we did! We froze him on the ranges, soaked him on parade, tore his feet on the route march, and almost broke the valves of his heart charging mountains and doubling for miles in heavy marching order. But he stuck it, and when he came in, stood us a drink, and said, "Do send us to the front, sir!"

'We commenced to think he wasn't bad.

'And then he started to think and to do things, for he felt his feet on firmer ground. Red tape he had no use for. For example, he got fed up ending his letters: "I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant, WILLIAM WINKIE." And he introduced this reform: "Yours truly, W. WINKIE."

'We were shocked, of course. The other had been done since the time of Moses. This was a most atrocious outrage against the all-holy conventions. An explanation was immediately demanded—in writing. He replied: "I'm a business man, and there's a war on."

'The old brigadier expired with apoplexy.

'The New Officer's brevity was startling. Instead of replying, "I beg to acknowledge receipt of your," &c., he simply stated, "Received, noted, and filed."

'But he did a more startling thing. He actually dethroned the pen and brought the typewriter into the company office. He also enlisted his shorthand clerk, and purchased a small card-index system with which he created a little bureau, labelled: "Accounts," "Equipment," "Correspondence."

'This had never been done by the best people, for we always thought it very bad form to make the army business-like. If our fathers had sold shirts, beer, or bacon, we never mentioned it. And we had always been most careful to hide away the prompt, precise, methodical methods of our wealthy parents. We worshipped "form" and hated facts. But this fellow day after day continued, quietly but effectively, to cut out all the appalling bluff and nonsense of centuries. We didn't like this—at first. Indeed, the ancient adjutant, trained in the methods of Wellington and the Duke of Cambridge, took seriously ill and—retired.

'The C.O., forced to find a new adjutant, turned in despair to the New Officer.

'"I'll take it on, sir," he said, "but I must have an absolutely free hand."

'"Why?"

'"Well, I'm a business man."

'He was so persuasive about his methods that he was permitted to get his foot inside the orderly-room. Then he shoved his whole personality into it. With a sweep of his pen he returned all the elderly red-tape clerks to duty. In came his shorthand clerks, typewriter, card-index, and books on "System." Followed a bonfire of ancient rubbish, and the erection of neat shelves, methodically arranged and labelled: "Training," "Finance," "Correspondence," "Records," "Blunders," "Results."

'The C.O. was astonished at the peace, smoothness, and efficiency. He was also amused when the new adjutant suggested that he (the C.O.) might dictate all his letters to the shorthand clerk. "Saves time, sir, and will let you get out to see what is going on." The Old Man had a shot at this. He discovered that he need spend only half-an-hour on correspondence instead of three hours.

'Result: he was always on parade, and training improved.

'Secretly we admired all this, but some of us got jealous. We grew petty, and showed it in our memos. But he called us up, and said, "Look here, Tom, Dick, and Harry; I'm not here for my health. I'm here for business. If you don't like my methods you had better move to another battalion."

'And the old C.O. backed him up.

'At last we voiced our true thoughts, and said, "The New Man is an organiser. He can do things. And he does save us a tremendous lot of trouble with the Paymaster, the Command, and the War Office." Having paid this homage, we started to go to him for advice on administration. He gave us heaps.

'But we still wondered how he would "pan out" in the field.

'Then we went out. The New Man was told to entrain the battalion at the station, where a train would be in waiting. When he got there he discovered the R.T.O. had forgotten—the luggage-vans. He asked no questions, but collared two vans on the siding, had them hitched on to the train, loaded up, shoved the troops in, reported "All correct," and we started to move.

'"What the devil do you mean taking those vans?" roared the annoyed R.T.O.

'"You go and learn your business, sonny I'm a railway manager. Good-bye."

'We simply lay back and roared with laughter.

'Crossing the Channel, we of the old school were just a bit worried. We had grown to like the new fellow an awful lot. He was so willing, so decent, so obliging, and so keen. Still, we did think he was not quite the type. His business abilities were admirable. But what about leadership?

'This problem had yet to be solved.

'However, we plugged into the trenches, and he started on his new job. He was "jumpy" a little, and felt at sea. But he was a sticker. Above all, he was cheerful. He kept the men happy. Fought like a devil with the quartermaster about his company's rations, saw to the rum, stole wood for his men's fires, robbed the A.S.C. of coal and coke, made braziers out of biscuit-boxes, and organised concerts under heavy bombardments. He wasn't afraid to grouse, but he never bucked at a job.

'We did feel immensely grateful.

'Next, the great offensive. What a day! The barrage of the enemy was sheer murder; but he leaped over the bags like a fine British gentleman, and kept his eye on the OBJECTIVE. The C.O. was killed, the major was killed, company commanders were wounded, and the New Man found he was alone.

'His hour had come.

'Some weak fool shouted, "Retire!" but the New Man clapped a revolver to the demoralised man's ear and said, "Go on!" He went! The weaker were impressed; the brave were thrilled. Old Army sergeants vowed he was "the goods," and loyally backed him up. And on through hell, through death, and a blood-soaked shambles went the New Crusader with his battalion. The objective was reached, but we had only three hundred men instead of a thousand. There were no bombs, little ammunition, no water, no rations, and the men were absolutely done. All round were the bursting shells, the spluttering Maxims, the choking gas, and the agonies of war. His flanks were in the air, but he extended his thin line, sent back the runners, dug in, and opened fire.

'On came the Germans.

'But the God of all men was on his side. Providence protects the brave. His fame had trickled down the line, and anxious generals vowed he would be supported. Company after company was slaughtered in the attempt. Then up came the Guards—the flower of British chivalry. The Old Crusaders were determined that the New should not be surrounded, jabbed, and crucified. Through that cruel barrage they tramped as if on parade.

'And while they were advancing, the New Man, though weary, wounded, and blood-stained, was fighting a dauntless battle. Three hundred men had dropped to two hundred. His flanks were burst. He was almost surrounded. The bayonets of Potsdam were glittering at his breast, but he cried, "Fight on—fight on! No d—— surrender to these Huns!"

'"Ay, ay, sir," responded his glorious men.

'Just as the mad finale was reached, when the fate of the New Man and his glorious battalion seemed sealed, a cheer burst on the air, and the Guards broke through. The Old and the New joined hands, then fought the Hun with cold steel till he squealed like a pig and —RAN.

'Four Guardsmen carried the New Man down the line.

'And then the world—and the Old Army—woke up. The chivalry of ages was in the New Cavalier. His battered and bleeding form was carried through a guard of honour to the place where the sick are healed. Women sent him flowers; old generals paid him homage; and, like a true Britisher, he inquired, "What's all the fuss about? It wasn't I—it was the MEN."

'But the King gave him the Victoria Cross.

'The Guards presented arms.

'The Old Army cheered.

'And the World said, "Well done!"

'I salute the New Army Officer,' concluded Captain Cheerall.

The school jumped to its feet and almost went mad with cheering.

Why don't we have more lectures like that?

(Continued on page 346.)

WIRELESS MESSAGES.

II.—UN JOUR DE MARCHÉ.*

By Mrs W. F. IRVINE BELL.

I.

CHEZ nous, my usual place at breakfast looks through the balcony door across the estuary to the inner bassin, with its bristling masts and funnels and its background of blue hills, melting mistily into the sky. This morning, however, I moved to the top of the table, so as to enjoy to the full a coup d'œil of the winding harbour, its tidal waters now patened with a myriad silver suns, and the whitely gleaming sand-dunes, whose tall green grasses break the line of purple-shadowed sea and foam-crested breakers. Scattered hither and yon, specks of sails, snowy-white or ruddy-brown in the early sunshine, bespeak a daybreak start for the fishing-grounds, whence are already returning several of the smaller boats which do not venture too far afield. So sharp is the 'crook' in the elbow of the harbour that one little craft, in coquettish dress of black and yellow, tacking back and forth between the jetties and the quays, presently vanishes behind a red-tiled roof, her sails alone reappearing, low set as in a Dutch canal, so that she seems to be gliding inland, as it were, among coal-yards and cranes, trucks, teams, and clustered sheds, which flank the inner basin and hide from view the great white lock-gates.

Through our open windows now blows a fresh breeze, which sets fluttering the delicate fronds of my maidenhair ferns—a breeze laden with a unique but strangely exhilarating mixture of smells—of sea-salt and tar; of fish and roasting coffee; of new cider, this moment flowing in rich brown streams from heavy, hand-turned presses on the quay; last and best, a faint, wooing suggestion of country smells, borne from far by light currents of air which at 'cheerful dawn' have caressed fields and farms beside the river, whose silver thread, darkened under the arches of an ancient bridge, loses itself in the dull green waters at its mouth.

Round and about the balcony dips, sways, and swirls a flock of gulls, drunk surely with the elixir of the morning air—a 'cup' not to be resisted. Impulsively I push back my chair and step out on the ever-enticing balcon, loftily hung above noisy street and crowded pavé. What matter, on such a glorious morn as this, if an overdose of chicory flavour the coffee; if the ration of sugar be meagre, the milk condensé, the bread a mere travesty of a French baker's art? This narrow gallery running the length of our cosy appartement is my high tower whence, unobserved by the man in the street, I can watch the passing show; my box-royal, for an endless entertainment; a private view of wonderful pictures—landscapes and seascapes—surpassing your Academician's craft or kudos. Its long wooden boxes, filled with gay nasturtiums and 'green things growing,' are my garden. And at night! Oh, how convey to 'ither folk' the lure to me of those tranquil hours?—the pageant of 'My Lady Moon,' her silver train trailing on gently moving waters, and her court of attendant stars; or the twinkle-twinkle of red and orange lights bobbing at mast-heads, as the fishing-fleet prepares for a midnight flitting; or the glow-worm gleam of a Japanese lantern swinging on the handle-bars of some belated cyclist, speeding silently up the deserted highway. Going to bed at any hour after dusk is a dreadful business; but if one has a balcony, a window-ledge for a perch, a fur-lined coat (for Dame Night has a chilly breath), and nobody to worry one with sage reminders that 'early to bed, early to rise, makes one healthy, wealthy, and wise' (it doesn't —I've tried both!), then—well, I must confess that often, when the vibrating notes of the clairon sounding an alerte startle from their beds the sleeping inhabitants of our little ville, I myself am still playing the part of astronomer, with wide-open eyes 'dreaming the happy hours away.'

* The first of this series of 'Wireless Messages' appeared in Chambers's Journal for October 1918, with the subtitle 'Les Jetées.'

Lovely night! lovely night!
Some have called thee dark and drear.
But to me—but to me
The day 's not half so dear!

II.

Yet now does good King Sol hold sway. His warm fingers pleasantly tickle the back of my neck, and judging from the steady stream of traffic flowing towards the Place du Casino, there should not (in spite of my late aspersions as to the quality of one's breakfast) be any lack of quantity to fill one's self withal. For this is the jour de marché, sandwiched between several prescribed jours maigres, and as ours is the best market in the district, it affords a grand opportunity for observing all sorts and conditions of mankind, as well as of beast-kind. A quaint combination of both is, this moment, at snail's pace, wending its way thither—a sleek, gray donkey, whose diminutive body, out of all proportion to the enormous ears, is all but lost between the shafts of a low two-wheeled trap of antique build, in which is seated a stout, stolid-faced woman, in the black garb and white coif of a religieuse. Beside her a little girl, in blue cloak and close-fitting hood, devotes her attention to preventing from jolting into the street capacious baskets piled about their feet, presumably to be filled with supplies (and the good Sister, methinks, will drive a shrewd bargain!) for the orphaned inmates of the Asile de Saint Joseph.

Trotting briskly past this equipage, as though to demonstrate that not all his race are akin to the tortoise, comes another donkey, pulling a long-bodied truck, upon which are crowded fresh, cool-looking vegetables—green of cabbage and red of carrot boldly asserting themselves beside blushing apples, mellow, downy quinces, and dusky walnuts. Of this swift chariot the Jehu is a small boy, who, clinging to the reins, cleverly balances himself on bare feet, cracks his whip, and incessantly admonishes his willing steed with a prolonged cry of 'E-e-o!' which, like the Savoyard herder's reiterated 'Ah-ah!' to his homing cattle, would not, I fear, be 'understanded' of British beasts. More than one dog-drawn vehicle passes; even a goat or two go by in harness, for horses are scarce and costly, as one may conclude (and here comes in the law of compensation) by their comparatively well-cared-for appearance, despite a grievous shortage of fodder. The dog-teams, too, I gladly note, are apparently not misused, in one case a crippled old man pushing behind, while his four-footed colleague does the pulling. Dogs are for the most part chained below the cart, and pull against the collar; but there is one fine creature of the Great Dane breed, equipped with smart-looking leather harness, whose glad barks and waving tail advertise a pleasant partnership between himself and the bare-headed girl beside him. Later on I am sure to find him curled up or vigilantly erect upon a heap of sacks near a booth whereon will be displayed all sorts of 'garden sass' (to use an old New England phrase)—parsley, beetroots (ready boiled), shallots, and divers herbs, the cunning use of which our Latin neighbours so well understand. Of the larger, heavier type of vehicle, most conspicuous are the high, two-wheeled vans, with canvas top and plentiful varnished woodwork, which, drawn each by a stout-built stallion or a mare, whose foal, maybe, trots beside her, have started in the wee, sma' hours from a distant village whose attractions—a fine old Abbey church, medieval timbered houses, a river abounding in splendid trout, and cheese of the Camembert sort—appeal according to individual taste. It is, of course, solely with the cheese, piled high in round, match-board boxes, that the market-vans have to do—a fact self-evidenced by an unmistakable whiff which, trailing in their wake, assails my nostrils, and by force of suggestion whirls my thoughts for an instant many a long league westward to a famous salmon-river, up whose swift current, at wane of the season, lumbermen pole their clumsy scows, leaving behind them, upon the sweet, wild air, the oddly incongruous odour of salted cod! Even here and now I can still 'feel the smell' (as our Northern friends say); can see the sapphire and snow of the racing rapids; can hear the sharp, rhythmical 'clink-clink' of iron-shod poles, and the shout of red-shirted half-breeds as they fling into our camp a welcome bag of mails from the far-distant 'settlement.'

III.

But the strident 'E-e-o!' of the donkey-boy, the crack of his whip, and the loud ringing of the auction bell at the fish-market hard by abruptly recall to la belle France my roving spirit; and if that other vision, so unexpectedly evoked by the aroma of a Normandy cheese, brings before my eyes a sudden mist—ah well! —nevertheless must one 'carry on,' and unless I make haste, all the finest of fish, fruit, and flowers, to say nothing of the chance (lamentably rare nowadays) of a plump poulet à bon marché, will be gone. So, tearing myself away from the fascination of the balcony, I go to fetch my petit panier. This panier, by the way, is a thing of joy—not one of your cheap-

Jack, ready-made baskets for sale among brushes and brooms in the huge, plate-glass 'department-stores,' known as Les Galeries, but wrought on purpose for me, not too daintily for workaday use, yet of graceful mould, well woven and strongly bound, by the old vannier, whose low stone cottage and tiny garden-plot are hidden away in a cul de sac of the still unmodernised part of the town. When we paid our first visit there—my man-of-arms and I—the door stood open, affording us a peep at the interior and its furnishings, of which our antique-loving eyes at once took note—solid, rush-bottomed chairs; a tall cabinet, richly carved with weird birds and weirder beasts, black with age, its handles and lock of brass bright with generations of polishing; bowls and bits of china, some doubtless a century old, others decidedly modern, including a jubilee jug of our own Victoria the Good, of blessed, peaceful memory (how, we wonder, did it find its way into this old French peasant's home?); last, but not least alluring, a delightful clock, of the genus 'wag-at-the-wa',' its long index-finger jerking steadily round a tarnished face, gaudily decorated with sun, moon, and stars, while a huge brass pendulum swung back and forth on a slender wire.

Seated on a low stool, the light from a deep-set window falling upon his white hair and beard, was the old basket-maker, quickly and dexterously weaving long, limp osiers that bristled among his fingers and littered the floor. His wife, her kindly, wrinkled face framed in close-fitting cap of white embroidered linen, answered our knock, a look of great surprise and pleasure beaming in her watery blue eyes at sight of a young British officer, spick and span and debonair, who saluted the old couple as smartly as he would royalty itself. 'Monsieur' and 'madame' must come in. The rush-bottomed chairs were pushed forward, and, our errand explained, baskets of divers sorts and sizes were produced for our inspection. Of these we selected one pattern to be remodelled to my fancy, the old woman laughingly explaining that the bottoms were all alike and of her making. The order completed, we must tarry perforce for a little chat—de la guerre, of course; de la guerre. For what else, they ask, is there to speak about in these sad times? Their own family? 'Mon dieu! mais oui, m'sieu!' they reply, tears brimming over. They have seven sons and grandsons—two fell at Verdun, two are prisoners, two are still au front, and one, the youngest, un si beau garçon, is 'missing.' Disparu! How often, alas! does one hear that word—dreaded perhaps more than any other—on the lips of heart-broken mothers and wives of heroic France!

IV.

'Pas grande chose, madame!' quoth Alphonsine, our youthful femme-de-ménage (of name as grandiose as her stature is insignificant), smiling, yet with a critical air regarding my petit panier as I take it down from the shelf and sally forth. Useless for me again to explain to her that its holding capacity is quite commensurate with my purse; so I leave her reiterating, 'Mais il faut manger!' her favourite axiom whenever the subject of war economies comes to the front, the while, with an expression of countenance wherein pride struggles with apology, she contemplates her own overflowing basket. To judge by its contents—best of butter, a dozen eggs, a mammoth cabbage, a huge section of orange-red citrouille (pumpkin), and 'sundries'—Alphonsine's fisherman husband has been doing well with his trawl, for it is easy come, easy go, with the fisher-folk, and the silver harvest which their nets gather in quickly flows out again in a golden stream. So to Alphonsine the philosophy of 'madame' is a perpetual puzzle, and she is never really bien contente in the blue-tiled kitchen except when, on the rare and joyful occasion of Monsieur le Capitaine suddenly arriving for déjeuner, a 'calf tender and good' is as speedily fetched and dressed as was that of Father Abraham for his visiting angels! This morning, however, the boat from —— has arrived without the one passenger who really matters, and pursuing my solitary way through the eager, chattering crowd, I find myself envying a Belgian officer and his wife—he all glorious from head to heel, she in smartest array, clinging to his arm, as they pause before the poissonnerie, and choosing a splendid lobster, give it in charge of a neat young bonne trotting behind them. Lobsters at eight francs a pound! Ahem!

The Belgian's braid and blue are only two of numerous touches of colour which, dotted about, relieve the general sombre tone of the peasant throng. Here is a group of fishermen, the colours of whose jerseys are always a fresh delight and a surprise; for are they conscious, these uncultured sons of the sea, of the lovely tones and harmony of their rough-and-ready clothing; or is it a mere result of circumstance, an 'accident of an accident'? In striking contrast with these neutral tints are the red-tufted bérets of some sailors from the French gunboat in the harbour, and the vivid scarlet cap of a towering specimen of John Bull's military police, an outstanding figure at the cross-roads, where half-a-dozen farmers, in loose black blouses or shaggy coats of undressed leather, gesticulate violently and quarrel amiably until they and their equally loquacious wives, burdened with a week's provisions, shall settle down in café or restaurant to discuss something more substantial than the price of cattle or the duration of the war. Farther down the street a gaily striped umbrella of gargantuan size screens from the sun's too persistent rays oddments of ribbons and laces, whose fragility and rainbow hues are a pleasant offset to heaps of dull leather boots and black sabots, disposed for sale a few yards distant. These and sundry other wares—pottery, old junk (among which sometimes one chances on a real 'find'), cheap toys, even a barrow of the poorest bits of meat—are, however, mere outworks to the marché proper, where, within canvas-covered stalls or suspended on ropes, are all sorts of merchandise, from elaborate silk garments—primrose, violet, and blue—to the humblest flannel shirt or woollen petticoat. Beyond the clothing are open booths, which, closely set together, form long, densely crowded aisles. Here stand in a stolid row, baskets at their feet, venders of butter and eggs, of live poultry, and of huge lop-eared rabbits, so tame and gentle (for they are mostly house-reared) that one inevitably recalls Pope's pathetic lines about the lamb which 'licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.' Lily-white ducks, quacking querulously, the shrill crow of an imprisoned cock, the importunate calls of the stall-holders, cross-fire of question and answer between buyer and seller, high-pitched protests and cries of 'Oh là-là!' over prices demanded and concessions on the part of the demanders, excited parleys between friends who have met (and one meets everybody au marché!), all add their quota to the babel and confusion.

'Chouxfleurs! Chouxfleurs! Vingt sous la pièce!' 'Poireaux! Voulez-vous des poireaux? Trois sous la botte!' 'Voilà des pommes de terre! Bon marché—quinze sous la livre!' 'Fleurs! Des fleurs! Voyez-vous mes jolies fleurs?'

One's head fairly cracks with the noise, and, no less, with the effort at quick mental arithmetic to reduce to the more familiar franc and centime this irritating reckoning in sous. A franc for a cauliflower one knows to be robbery; but when one is offered, 'Un pour vingt sous ou deux à trente-cinq,' it demands lightning calculation rightly to gauge the bargain. Some there are who, instantly 'spotting' a stranger, do the sum for one, and, incidentally, fix the price 'accordin', or make confusion worse confounded by attempting a translation into pennies! One stall there is which is specially popular with the well-to-do, but from which the war-pinched peasant, disappointed, turns away. Upon it, in tempting profusion, boxes of Algerian dates, tangerines glowing in silver foil, creamy yellow bananas, and piles of sugary figs proclaim prosperity and enterprise on the part of two bright-eyed Spanish youths. But dates at four francs a kilo, and tangerines at seventy-five centimes each, are luxuries reserved for 'feast-days,' when I do not sit at the head of the table chez nous; and, moreover, these soft-spoken merchants from the Sunny South unsparingly beat their donkey! It is, therefore, a cold shoulder that I turn upon their winning smiles and broken English, and from another stall I buy brown satin-skinned chestnuts, which will serve both as vegetable and as dessert. But my basket is by this time ower fu' and none too light. One more purchase—irresistible—before I must hasten home, so I shove my way to a favourite booth where autumn flowers in tantalising number and variety—golden chrysanthemums, purple asters, and a few late roses, 'to smell sweet'—speedily whisk from my depleted purse the remaining coins. Thus, fairly laden, I am moving away, when the welcome sound of low, English voices falls upon my ear, and, turning, I see two cheery-faced girls in nurses' dress, eagerly selecting generous bunches of the choicest flowers, while at a short distance stands a great car with the all too well-known red cross on roof and sides. 'Take these too!' I plead, filling their willing hands with my treasures.

THE RED SEAL.

THIS is a story my father used to tell. He died many years ago—a distinguished Scots judge; and, as the events to be related happened when he was a young man, the story is a pretty old one, but may be none the less worth hearing on that account.

When my father was a boy he loved to take great walks through the dales and over the hills of the county he lived in, and was well acquainted even with the folk that dwelt in the most outlying cottages. He had a great friendship, amongst others, with Sandy M'Nab, an elderly shepherd, skilled in his craft, loyal to his master, and loving to his flocks. Many a walk and talk had the man and the lad together; and it was only at times of stress, in the lambing season and the like, that the boy would be sternly bidden to 'whisht' and 'haud his clavers.' One weakness only had Sandy, a not uncommon one in those parts—he loved the mountain dew; and, what is by no means so common with Scotsmen, Sandy's head was weak, so that two or three glasses of the spirit would, in his own phrase, 'mak' him as fu' as a puggy.' Why I tell you of Sandy's little failing you will see anon.

My father in due time, after school and college, entered the profession of his choice, the Scots Bar. Behold him in wig and gown, a full-fledged 'advocate'—surely a better name that than the English 'barrister.' Not that it matters much, for I've a great respect, hereditary perhaps, for the Bar of both countries, the fine work they do, their learning, and the honourable traditions and practice of the profession. In those days it was the custom for young advocates regularly to attend the Circuit Courts. They don't do it so much now, I'm told, for the Circuits are far more frequent, and the number of cases at each is correspondingly fewer. There was rarely a fee to be had for defending an accused person—the advocates for the Crown were, of course, in a happier position—but it gave a youngster a chance to get rid of the fear of the sound of his own voice, and possibly to earn kudos from the judge or amongst his fellows.

In one of his early years, then, at the Bar, my father attended a Circuit Court in all the hope and expectancy of youth. To his joy, he was greeted by Mr M'Phun, an elderly local lawyer, a friend of his family, whose prospective patronage was a thing highly desirable. 'Here's a case for you, my boy,' said the lawyer, 'and a fee with it too. Not that it's a big one; but I may as well give it to you as to an older hand, for I doubt it would be beyond any counsel's power to get an acquittal. Sheep-stealing's the charge. I see it comes from your part of the country, by the way. I fear it will end in the black seal.' In those days, you must know, the punishment for sheep-stealing, as for many other crimes, was death; and the practice was for the foreman (or chancellor, as he was called) of the jury to return the verdict in a sealed cover, the wax used being red if the verdict was for acquittal, black if it was adverse to the accused. That was what M'Phun alluded to, as he handed the papers to my father. It wasn't an encouraging outset; but worse was to follow. The indictment—a terrible rigmarole it was in those days—set out the charge against the accused of having, on a given day, stolen a sheep; and that animal, it seemed, had been at the time in the lawful care and custody of one Alexander M'Nab—none other than the Sandy I was telling you of. But, to the consternation of my father, the man accused was one Thomas Brunton, a young fellow well known to him, who had, indeed, been one of his playfellows and companions in boyhood's days. And now poor Tam was charged with a capital offence, and my father was to defend him for his life!

The more my father studied the precognitions, which are the statements of what the witnesses are prepared to testify on oath, the blacker the thing looked for the accused. The chief witness was plainly old M'Nab. He was to identify Tam positively as having been seen 'prowling about' near the flock, where he had no business to be, under suspicious circumstances, and just about the time when the crime must have been committed. This, it seemed, was the only direct evidence against Brunton; but there was a lot of indirect or circumstantial evidence, which made up an ugly bulk, and certainly appeared sufficient to justify M'Phun's prediction that the case would 'end in the black seal.'

My father did what he could; he interviewed the witnesses, and especially did he interview his old friend the shepherd. Sandy, most conscientious of men, adhered inflexibly to his precognition. He saw Tammas Brunton—ay, he did—and how could he be mistaken, knowing the man as he did?—and he was nigh that very sheep, and must have been the one that took it. Motive, too, was not far to seek. Times had been hard, and food scarce; poor Tam's young wife and her weans had been near to starvation; but there was evidence forthcoming that just at the fatal time they had somehow or other had an ample supply of mutton to eat.

The case, my father ascertained, would be reached on the afternoon of the following day; and that his cup of anxiety might be full, the presiding judge would be old Lord Todlearie, who bore the reputation of a hanging judge. As matter of fact, Todlearie was, I believe, not only a learned man and a good lawyer, but in private life a kindly and considerate person; but he was conscientious, and his conscience seemed generally to inspire him with views adverse to the prisoner.

Well, my father spent an anxious night, and on the morrow, the day of the trial, he conceived a desperate sort of plan, and proceeded to put it in execution. He went again about noon that day to the witnesses' room, where those who were to give evidence for the Crown in the various cases were kept herded together, like droves of sheep, under the surveillance of a few minor officials of the court. My father's robes at once obtained entry for him; and soon he was seen in apparently earnest colloquy with Sandy M'Nab in a secluded corner of the room. But what the attendant officials did not observe was that a small, flat, glass flask changed hands from the younger to the older man. It was well for my father's scheme that this little transaction passed unnoticed.

The sheep-stealing case came on about two o'clock in the afternoon. The Crown was represented by a middle-aged advocate of considerable experience and ability, but somewhat irascible temper. My father, with M'Phun seated near him, intimated, in answer to old Todlearie's question, that he appeared for the defence, and heard the judge ask the clerk of court what 'the youngster's' name might be.

One of the first witnesses called was Alexander M'Nab. The Crown played their trump card early. Old Sandy seemed to mount into the box with some caution, and to have a difficulty in repeating after the judge the solemn words of the oath, by which he swore 'by Almighty God, as he should answer to God at the great Day of Judgment, that he would tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.' He answered the questions put to him in rather a dazed way, to the growing irritation of his irascible questioner. He told of the man whom he had seen slinking about on the day in question. The witness was then directed to look at the prisoner in the dock, and asked point-blank, 'Was that the man you saw?' Now, thanks to his consumption of the contents of that glass flask we wot of, it is probable that Sandy saw not one man but two men in the dock, and that dimly. He gazed dully in the direction indicated, and after a considerable pause made answer, like the conscientious Scot he was, 'I'm no jist sure the noo; I couldna jist say for certain.'

Adroit handling might have saved the situation; but the irritated Crown counsel's handling was not adroit, and the identification of Tammas by the only witness whom the Crown could bring on that point was a failure. My father, of course, left well alone, and had the sense to put no questions to Sandy by way of cross-examination.

The difficulties of the defence were not by any means at an end. There were other points that pressed against the accused: his inducement to steal the sheep; the contemporaneous appearance of mutton in the Brunton ménage, not otherwise to be accounted for; and so forth. But, the initial difficulty overcome, and his opponent's temper seriously upset, my father proceeded in good heart, here and there scoring an unexpected point of minor moment in his cross-examination of the witnesses. No evidence was led for the defence, except one or two witnesses to Tam Brunton's good character; it was long before the days—perhaps luckily in this case—when a prisoner could go into the witness-box on his own behalf. Speeches of counsel followed in due course, and the judge's summing up to the jury was fairly neutral. He was good enough to characterise my father's speech as 'a spirited harangue,' and to allude to his cross-examination as showing 'some skill, perhaps rather of a negative than a positive kind.'

The jury left the court to consider their verdict. Old M'Phun told my father in his kindly way that he had done very well with a case that looked hopeless at the outset, and commented on the great good-fortune that had befallen in that the chief witness had failed positively to identify the prisoner. He knew nothing, honest man, about the flask of whisky, and how judiciously my father had calculated the dose which should sufficiently bemuse and muddle old M'Nab's faculties, without reducing him to a condition of palpable inebriety in the witness-box.

Poor Tammas Brunton leaned over from the dock, looking eagerly from his erstwhile playmate, now the defender of his very life, to the elder lawyer by his side, and questioning them as to the chances of the verdict. My father pressed his hand in silent sympathy, and M'Phun counselled him, in kindly but not very reassuring fashion, to 'keep a stout heart and hope for the best. While there's life, there's hope, my lad.'

At length, after a period of waiting which to the young counsel as well as to the prisoner was becoming almost intolerable, the sound of a bell was heard, and the jurymen, headed by their chancellor, trooped back into the court and resumed their places in the jury-box. The chancellor carried in his hand the envelope containing the fateful verdict. The side of it bearing the seal was visible. Before the clerk of court had time to put his formal question, 'Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon your verdict?' old M'Phun, roused for once from the lethargy of his professional habit, had gripped my father's hand and almost shouted in his ear, 'By God, young man, you've done the trick! It's the red seal.' 'Done the trick' indeed! The honest old fellow little guessed how aptly his phrase was worded. And so Tammas Brunton, poor lad! was discharged from the dock, and joyfully returned to the bosom of his family.

Who shall say whether the verdict was, or was not, a righteous one? Anyway, that is the story of the red seal as I have often heard my father tell it. And he always ended in the same way. I can hear now the sound of his hearty voice and the ring of his jolly laugh. 'Of course, I don't say that what I did as a youngster was quite a proper thing to do, and I couldn't have let dear old M'Phun know beforehand what I was after. I don't know for certain to this hour whether or no Tam Brunton took that sheep. But some things I do know: that he never took another; that I had to be a bit careful before my relations with old Sandy M'Nab were restored to what they had been; that both he and Tam were my very good friends down to their deaths; and that a lot of sound and lucrative work at the Bar began to come my way shortly after, and I believe as a consequence of, that memorable verdict with its red seal.'

THE OLD CHURCH AND THE NEW.

In peaceful hollow on a meadow by the shore,
Scatheless of breeze that blows, and shadowed by the trees,
The old church stands, fashioned in days of yore,
By the water-edge, unstirred save by the rolling seas.
And round it, guarded by the white harled wall,
The graves of folk that long since passed away;
They worshipped there, whene'er they heard its call;
Theirs was the faith of yesterday.

The new church stands on the broad highway,
Breasting the traffic of the busy road,
Exposed to the chances of the stormy day,
And yet recalling men to worship God.
No ancient buried past invests its fane,
Nor legend old, nor altar set in rounded bay,
But yet its faith can scarce be called vain—
The faith of time, the charity that reigns to-day.

Let it reign on, and to the faith of old
Add breadth and tolerance, till, like the morning sun,
It turns the cold gray sea to cloth of gold,
And churches, creeds, and sects are catholic in one.

J. M. H.

Printed and Published by W. & R. Chambers, Limited, London and Edinburgh.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE HEART OF THINGS.

By Henry Leach.

London, Yesterday.

THE deep menace to the world, to life and civilisation, even, as some might say, to hope, arising from this dire plague called Bolshevism, becomes scarcely less as a winter of suspended war passes to a spring of peace, when the natural disposition of the human spirit is to speed forward to a new season of more lovely life, like the trees in the pride of their new foliage, like the birds with their new song, like the streams with the soft murmur of a new tranquillity that has followed upon the turbulence of winter floods. But the threat of Bolshevism, creeping ever nearer to the strongholds set against it, appears in some measure to cramp the lives and the thoughts of peoples, to establish a sense of doubt and anxiety never experienced even during the war itself, except by unreasoning pessimists. Bolshevism, in its wild, fantastic dream of capturing the world, the whole world, for the application of its system of socialist freedom and equality and happiness for man, attained through blood, murder, terror, torture, robbery, injustice, and such misery and suffering as none of the peoples of the world who have borne the cross of the most tragic fate has ever known—Bolshevism has seemed to be at its climax. It could surely move no farther forward. And yet. . . . If it should advance, 'twere better not to contemplate the possible results. The horrors in Russia have increased at the same time that efforts to attract other peoples to the Bolshevist way have intensified. Just as, at the crisis of the war, it was necessary for every man and woman, all lovers of the good of life, of truth and sincerity and progress, to hold fast, and above all to think and think again, to judge and to decide with conviction, and not merely be led like sheep by shepherds who knew too little of their shepherdry and in foolish distractions lost their way, so now it is only necessary for the people to come to real knowledge and calm reason, and to think and judge for themselves upon Bolshevism, in theory and in practice, for this thing to be blown to bits by conviction and contempt. The greatest reinforcement that Bolshevism has gained since its beginning has been the carelessness, even the stupidity, of those 'bourgeois' governing classes, as they call them, in dealing, or neglecting to deal, with this devil's movement. Bolshevists, like all Socialists who are across the middle line, always hold the bourgeoisie in great contempt. They regard them—all the modern statesmen and their supporters, more or less—as being rascals who strive only or mainly for their own class purposes, and through whom humanity will never grasp any progressive ideals, never be delivered from such horrors as war.

* * *

These words, 'bourgeois' and 'bourgeoisie,' oddly and often misapplied, little used and known in Britain, but constantly in speech and in print on the continent of Europe, puzzle our people, who have chiefly known them applied in a different sense from that now attached to them. This is one of the thousand minor things appertaining to Bolshevism in which it would be well, for the sake of their lives and their future, that a little education, a little enlightenment, should be afforded to the masses, who so often err through an absolute and profound ignorance of which evil forces take advantage. In Britain we have been accustomed to apply this French term mainly to a vague, ill-defined class of dull, materialistic persons, somewhat low, it might be, in matters of intellect and taste; people with a certain lack of spiritual refinement, of some occasional grossness in their manners, and even in their habits and ways of domestic life. Some of the master-writers have borne their pens pitilessly on the bourgeois class as thus represented. Flaubert flooded it with his satire. But it is an entirely different meaning that is given to the term in France and Russia, among the Socialists, who do not cease to rail at their bourgeoisie; against whom, indeed, they make no charge of want of mind or taste, or lack of intellectual smartness, rather being convinced that of the last mentioned they possess too much. The bourgeoisie with them—and with the Bolsheviks—is a social and political matter, and not one of the spirit. The bourgeois is one who opposes himself to the worker or the man of the people. He is not exactly and exclusively the middle class, though he is something like it—the centre and the upper parts of that class. He is in a way between the nobility and the people; but in days when the nobility, as such, count for far less than they used to do, the nobility also come into the bourgeoisie. But so too should many of the proletariat, as they would call themselves. In effect one of the proletariat might, indeed, be more bourgeois than one of the nobility. The worker of the proletariat, the good man who in theory toils and toils while the honest sweat drips from his brow, and who then goes home to a meal inadequate through his too small reward, conceives that the hands of all who are not likewise workers are against him. Those who are mainly against him, as he thinks, are the bourgeoisie, a huge class of Machiavellian rascals who have acquired education, money, influence, and the reins of government, which they have taken over from the old race of autocratic kings and nobles, and are now exploiting the world, the State, the proletariat, and all else to their own pecuniary and material advantage. To him these bourgeois seem to be ranging themselves in a compact body against the struggling, sweat-exhausted workers.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

* * *

Most others realise how stupid are these fancies, how utterly wrong, and tending to social calamity; but unfortunately there are on the surface of the things of the bourgeoisie many appearances left unexplained, yet perhaps easily explainable, which support the suggestions made against them. There have been black sheep in the bourgeoisie fold—as in every other—and there are many there still; the bourgeoisie knows of its own weaknesses and failures, but is often afraid to admit them or even to attempt a remedy. Then, on the other hand, the bourgeoisie will not take the trouble to explain the elementary necessities of life and labour to the proletariat as it should; it has a most abnormal capacity for trying to hide the truth on the most important occasions, not, indeed, to cover its own misdeeds (of which there may be none, or at most perhaps a little carelessness), but as the result of an old, stupid habit of secrecy which has become an instinct, and which is one of the main curses of the whole world of life to-day, as it is the curse of every private community from the smallest to the largest. It is a strange human shrinkage from sincerity. When secrecy is utterly abolished sincerity will come uppermost in the world as never previously, and then we may be within hailing distance of the millennium. As, evidently, we are far from that perfect condition now, we must still have secrecy, and therefore, despite the tears of war-suffering, and the determination to abolish secret diplomacy, the Peace Conference itself was established on the basis of a large measure of secrecy. The proletariat held that this was essentially a most typical and flaming bourgeois act. It is clearly unfortunate that in this and other ways the bourgeoisie should so constantly by negligence and inefficiency, rather than by intention, play into the hands of the proletarian agitators, who then mislead their followers. If bureaucracy were not now so triumphant, so costly, and so hideously wasteful; if there were not, as it appears, such an appalling connivance at the tremendous profiteering that went on throughout the war and still continues—the most disgraceful thing of its kind we have ever known, and a serious blot upon the nation's history in its crisis; and if it had not continually seemed that the governing classes, saturated in callousness, played at a mere political game to the neglect of the big interests of life, Bolshevism would have been less of a thing to fear this year. If the statesmen had not settled down to a peace conference in Paris with the complacency of a mothers' meeting, avowing their intention of permitting the proceedings to last until June before signing peace—seven and a half months after the stoppage of war—when every day Russia was plunging from one hell to another worse, as her Bolshevism became bloodier still, and when the danger was increasing hourly of a German collapse through starvation and conversion to Bolshevism, which would ruin everything and perhaps all of us; if, after being assured that this was a war which would end war, we had not now been saddled with conscription again and a mightier army and mightier army costs in full peace than this country had ever known in pre-war times, there would have been fewer weapons in the hands of Bolshevists. Anyhow, we see now what is meant by the bourgeoisie, however wrongly the term may often be applied.

* * *

But it is merely typical of the ignorance upon these questions that is permitted to exist, working much havoc in the minds of people who have suffered greatly and harbour many grievances, that the meaning of Bolshevism has never been explained to those who are rightly warned against it. While the newspapers and the politicians make long statements each day upon the horrors of Bolshevism, and how we should guard against them, there are few persons in the street, or even at the clubs, who can tell you what this Bolshevism really is. The sections of the proletariat think that they themselves know, and unfortunately they do not know. They feel that somehow it is a good thing, a scheme for right and justice, and for the overthrow of tyranny. That was the original ideal behind it all, perhaps, which Lenin and Trotsky began to exploit; but it is not so much that the whole scheme was mistaken as that the leaders hardly meant to pursue the ideal, intending only to wade through blood and human suffering, if necessary, for their own advantage. At the beginning of Bolshevism the politicians and the statesmen said it was nothing. Whatever it was, they murmured, it would soon cure itself and die out; there were many reasons why it should, they fancied. When it continued to exist, and even to advance and strengthen itself, they still ignored it. When it came to menace us and all civilisation, an established movement spreading all over the world, the statesmen declared they had never thought of that, and all they could say afterwards was, 'Dear me! We must stop it.' But they do not stop it. Unfortunately it is a governmental way to hide, to exaggerate, to minimise, and so to shatter confidence. That is why the governmental word is so seldom trusted now. There are among us many controllers, many departments, an infinity of bureaux; but if there were one real and conscientious Department of Truth for the dissemination of it broadcast and complete, upon every subject of importance, the exercise of a veritable propaganda of truth, leaving the onus of knowledge and true judgment upon the people, the result would be safe and sure. This question of Bolshevism, the greatest question in the world as it is at the present time, would be settled. The truth is necessary. What the Bolshevists themselves would claim as the good features of their idea, their scheme, and their practice should be set forth with all the rest. And such stories as that of base Bolshevist marriage laws and the 'nationalisation of women' ought not to be circulated, for when they are proved untrue it is Bolshevism that gains.

* * *

It should be shown how, while there are, of course, many other captains in the movement—fanatics, dreamers, rascals, what not—it is led mainly by two most remarkable persons in Lenin and Trotsky—remarkable indeed because they must be men of intense personality and determination to embark upon such schemes and carry them on thus far, so that it is futile to describe these leaders merely as fools and murderers. We know something of the evil that they do; but it would be interesting and instructive to the people to know how and by what means they do it, and who exactly these people are. Viewed as dispassionately as we can view them, they are surely most interesting persons; romance has gathered about them strangely. They are high among the most dominating personalities in the world to-day. A month ago we considered the case of Lenin, and how in his exile from Russia in Switzerland he organised the Bolshevist movement originally, and put his first Bolshevist paper, the Spark, in circulation. Lenin's has generally been the master-mind. As he was the originator, setting up Bolshevism (a simple adaptation of the Russian word meaning the majority), with its maximum, or Maximalist, programme, in defiance of the more moderate pretensions of the other Socialist section, the Mensheviks (a word which in the same way indicates the minority), so he became and remains the ruthless dictator with an enormous imagination and a determination which is revolting in its unscrupulousness. But Trotsky, a different being, quieter, stealthier, perhaps even craftier, has been near him always as one of the dual directorate. Some have said that Trotsky is a more picturesque personality than Napoleon was—no doubt an exaggeration, but one conveying a suggestion. In every difficulty he has the same policy, which is audacity. It would be hard to imagine any one more ruthless, disregardful of the sufferings of others, more violently determined than Lenin; but some who know say that such is Trotsky.

* * *

One who met Trotsky many times in Petrograd said that some admiration could not be withheld from this strange figure, who had the courage of his opinions and went straight to his objective. At the shameful peace-making with the Germans at Brest-Litovsk, Trotsky exerted his audacity and cunning to a marvellous degree, though they did not succeed. Treating with the German generals, it is said that he managed for a time most adroitly to turn the argument away from the stern world of fact, with Russia helpless and suing for peace, to the ground of principle, on which all men might start as equals and a victory be won with words! Desperate amid such tactics, in which he was no match for this mean-looking, most unmilitary fellow who refused to accept the fact of defeat in arms and would talk of something else on a higher plane, General Hoffmann, for the Germans, rose up in military wrath, with his hand on the hilt of his sword and a clicking of his heels, to remind Trotsky and his colleagues that Germany was victorious and Russia had been vanquished. Although he is only just a middle-aged man, Trotsky has a quarter of a century of high political adventure to his history. His real name is Leon Braunstein; the final 'Trotsky' was tacked on to the too German-looking appellation at a time when it was convenient. He is the son of a chemist, an apothecary. Like so many who turn to political adventure, he was, to begin with, a journalist, member of a profession which offers most promising opportunities of self-expression, exertion of influence, and manufacture of turmoil. In his earliest youth he wrote articles in a Russian newspaper which gained for him some reputation and caused him to be imprisoned for a few months. At twenty he was sent for the first time to Siberia, but escaped and managed to reach Austria. In Vienna he became one of the most active organisers of Socialist clubs. When the 1905 revolution occurred, he returned to his country, was president of the Soldiers' and Workmen's delegates, and his part in that abortive affair led to his being sent to Siberia again. He discovered, to his great satisfaction, that he bore a considerable resemblance to his jailer, and turned the circumstance to his advantage. The jailer's name was Trotsky, and it is enough to say that one fine day the other jailers found their colleague jailed and their Braunstein gone.

It assisted him in his journey to call himself Trotsky, and so he has done ever since, in kindly remembrance, let us imagine, of the man whom, for his escape, he personated. He made his way to Japan, staying there for a time, and then moving back to Switzerland. Afterwards he went to Berlin, and there produced a new Socialist paper. At the beginning of the war he was expelled from Berlin, and proceeded to Paris, where he started another newspaper of a revolutionary character, the Nosche Slovo. In due course, as we remember, Russian troops were brought round to the French western front. Trotsky's paper, the Nosche Slovo, was circulated among those Russian soldiers, and bred serious discontent in them. The writing in it was intensely pacifist; it heaped imprecations upon the war and those who conducted it. So the French Minister of War asked for his expulsion from French territory, and Trotsky now went to Spain.

* * *

The Spaniards found him a curious study. He puzzled them, and they watched him closely, which was natural, considering the circumstances under which he passed the Pyrenees. I have a communication from a friend in Spain, a Spaniard, who came into contact with some who were associated with Trotsky there, and learned much of him and his ways at this period. He appeared first at San Sebastian, and went afterwards to Bilbao, Vigo, and Barcelona. The police did not lose sight of him. Eventually he went to Madrid. To those who watched him he did not appear to be what you might call a vulgar anarchist. There was a certain distinction in his manners; he had a nice way of speaking; he was always extremely polite, with a touch of irony in his words; and some who conversed with him said they were charmed with his culture. Yet he seemed strange in ways. They saw him seated in the corner of cafés, writing, and again writing—for ever writing. He was making notes on Spanish life and manners for articles in yet another newspaper which he proposed to found, this time in America. It was discovered afterwards that the comments printed in America were not complimentary to the Spaniards. Trotsky said that Spain was a land of toreadors and priests, that the people were decadent in all things, that they ate badly, and, worst of all, that their women were coarse. Generally his air was sombre and thoughtful, but sometimes he was discovered in ecstasies of enthusiasm before Spanish monuments. The Spanish authorities felt uneasy about him, and for their better content they put him in prison. They found then that he had few possessions—just a little valise with a spare suit and some clean shirts, a few papers and some money, which he said was to be devoted to starting the new paper when he reached New York, whither he would go. He was soon released, and with his wife, Anatolia—a beautiful woman they said she was—and his two sons, Leon, aged eleven, and Sergius, aged nine, who suddenly appeared as if from nowhere, he sailed for New York. The Spaniards lost interest in him then; that was in November 1916. Twelve months later they heard of this strange man who had been writing the notes in the cafés as Minister of Foreign Affairs in the new Soviet Government in Russia!

* * *

Soon after his arrival in New York, and his establishment in a modest dwelling in a remote suburb, he began to write leading articles in a Russian Socialist newspaper published there, the Novy Mir, receiving twenty dollars a week for doing so. Also, he wrote articles for other newspapers there, particularly a German Socialist daily called the Volkszeitung, which paid him from ten to fifteen dollars. It was ascertained further that he received a matter of some three hundred dollars for twenty-eight lectures that he gave under Socialist auspices during the municipal elections. Life was going fairly smoothly for him then, too smoothly for this adventurer, who was waiting with confidence for something to happen in Russia. It happened. There came the Russian Revolution, and Trotsky prepared to leave the United States. He had made many friends, particularly Ludwig Lore, editor-in-chief of the Volkszeitung, but the Americans were not able to prove that he received any German money. Yet of funds he had plenty when the time for parting came, and the night before he left there was some sort of a social entertainment prepared in his honour at the Harlem River Casino, at which a collection on his behalf yielded two hundred and twenty-six dollars. He gathered about him a dozen Russian Socialists with whom he had become familiar, and booked passages for all of them eastwards for home and revolution. Thus he engaged fifteen second-class berths and one first-class, and paid one thousand three hundred and ninety-four dollars for them. The first-class berth was not for himself; this future man, so soon to be assisting Russia to destruction, so soon to become a terror to the world, was travelling second-class. His ship, the Kristianiafiord, had to sail by way of Halifax, and there the British authorities intervened because of his violent pacifist propaganda, and interned him. It was looking bad for Trotsky then; but Kerensky, leading Russia, petitioned for his release, declaring that Trotsky was necessary to him in his enterprise. Alas! Kerensky. Trotsky was one of the first to cast you down. Going on to Russia, he touched England. A rattling kind of life, this; the adventure craze has been well satisfied. One year slinking along the calles of Madrid, huddling away in corners of cafés and scribbling his criticisms about those slow-moving people near him whom he so much despised, then for a brief spell adding to his experiences by imprisonment in a Spanish jail and pacifist propagandism in the States, and next, ere a year was out, a chief controller of 'Holy Russia' in her new and bloodiest régime, creating a gigantic upheaval, seizing the nation's money and goods, dealing out death most lavishly, casting the Czar and his family and the Grand Dukes into prisons more comfortless than any he had occupied, being cause, direct or indirect, of their subsequent murder, sending Bolshevist agents all over the world to preach the new and terrifying gospel of salvation through blood and ruin, making civilisation shudder, this little politely-spoken man, who was moved along, a fugitive, from capital to capital, has indeed made his own place in history. It is this adventurer who is making the peoples restless. It might do malcontents some good to know more of him. Strange it seems how one after the other these forerunners of anarchy passed through English hands. We noticed before that when Bolshevism was struggling to its birth, and, fearful of meeting elsewhere, Russians came to London for a conference, Lenin was with them. Trotsky we could have kept, and would have done so, perhaps, but for misguided Kerensky. And Karl Marx, the German, first preacher of Maximalism, whose theories Lenin and Trotsky studied and in their own manner improved upon, lies buried in a plain grave in Highgate Cemetery.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XXI.—continued.

IT was about a quarter past four and a clear morning, with no traffic in the streets beyond a few early market-carts, when Sparke let out the car and we raced north-eastward through the quiet city. In half-an-hour or so we drew up at the corner of a road in a district of villas and prim gardens, outwardly a most unlikely retreat for 'wanted' men. We got out, and a man, who seemed to appear suddenly from nowhere, after exchanging a word or two with the inspector, took charge of the car. We walked up a highly-respectable-looking road, lined with houses standing in their own grounds, of the type which one associates with prosperous retired city men.

The last house on the left was more pretentious than its neighbours, in style of building and in surroundings. It stood in a half-moon of ground filled with well-grown trees, fifty yards or so from the road, and enclosed by a high wall. An iron gateway with a big brass figure 9 marked the entrance to the grounds. As we neared this gateway a drowsy-looking milkman was seen coming in our direction, and as he passed he said in a low voice to the inspector, 'Nothing further, sir,' and went on his way.

'So far, so good,' said the inspector. 'No one has been spotted. Some of our men are at the back, and here are the others.' He nodded towards three plain-clothes men converging on us, and I noticed a policeman in the distance at the end of the road. 'The place looks quite quiet from the outside, but it may be a live shell to tackle. Look out, and keep beside me.'

A peep through the gate showed a gravelled avenue, circling a clump of rhododendrons, the shuttered windows of a large house, and five steps leading to the front-door. Sparke went at once to the gate and tried it. It was locked; but one of the men promptly produced a light bunch of keys, and in a few seconds we were in the grounds. Here the party split into two.

Sparke and I approached the house quickly and quietly by the path on the right. A tiny feather of smoke came from one chimney, but there was no other sign of life. Two of the men placed themselves by the windows on each side of the door, and Sparke pressed the button of the bell. The shrill note died away, but there was no reply. Three times this was repeated. Not a sound came from the house. At a word from the inspector one of the men went round to the back, where two others were posted, and returned with the information that no reply had been given to the ringing of the bell there.

'Come along, then! We have no time to waste. Have a try,' said he to the man with the keys, who bent to the lock. After a long minute he stood up and whispered, 'All right.'

'Stand back and look out,' the inspector said.

With revolvers ready, we took places on either side, clear of the door. The inspector turned the handle gently, and then suddenly flung the door wide and jumped back. I listened (my heart, I confess, was beating uncomfortably), but neither voice nor footstep sounded. With a nod to us to follow, the inspector entered, followed by the rest of us, and we found ourselves in the hall. With a shiver I recognised the alcove, the telephone, and the marble statuette in the corner.

'Flown, I'm afraid! See!' said the inspector, looking round the hall.

On the carpet was an old packing-box and a litter of papers, pieces of string, straw, and some articles of men's clothing thrown down anyhow. A chair which had been knocked over lay as it had fallen. The whole scene told us plainly of an extremity of haste.

While we were looking one of the men came from the back with the news that the garage was empty.

The inspector shook his head. 'They have cleared, I think; but they can't be far away.

We'll have a look at the room where you "knocked out" the leader,' said he, and I led the way along the corridor. At the door of the room we halted and listened intently, but the same ominous silence met us.

'Nobody inside, I should say, for the key is here,' said Sparke, as he unlocked and threw open the door. We peered cautiously in. The room was empty. The light was switched on, revealing it to be in the same state as when I had last seen it, except for a dark stain on the floor where I had left my captor lying unconscious; of Wakeford himself there was no other trace. The shutters were still barred and padlocked. Back we went to the hall, and having divided into two parties, searched all the rooms on the ground-floor, but found nobody. Upstairs we went. The rooms there were scantily furnished and uncarpeted, except one of the bedrooms, which looked comfortable and attractive. It was probably Benedetto's. Again we drew blank. All the upstairs rooms and the attics were empty.

A tap came to the door while we were searching one of the attics, and one of our men came in. 'Nobody in the rooms or the cellars in the basement,' said he; 'but we are puzzled about the smoke from the chimney. We can't find a fire anywhere.'

Downstairs, we explored the kitchen and the accommodation rooms, pantries, soulleries, and so forth; but, like the other rooms we had visited, they were empty, and no fire was burning in them.

'Better take the bearings once more of the chimney where the smoke is coming from,' said the inspector.

We retraced our steps and went out to the grounds. The tiny curl of smoke came from one of the chimneys at the back. It was clear that a fire was burning somewhere inside the sinister house. We returned, and for half-an-hour searched every nook and corner thoroughly, with no result.

In the basement I had lagged behind the others in a flagged passage, and was looking about me, completely puzzled, when I thought I heard a slight sound. It seemed to me to be near at hand, and I cannot describe it better than by saying that I fancied it to be the faint mewing of a cat. I stood quite still and listened. A minute passed, and I had almost concluded that my nerves had played me a trick, when the sound reached me again, but where it came from—below, above me, in front, or behind—I had not the vaguest idea. A shout summoned the others, and I told them what I had heard.

The passage in which we were standing was stone-walled and strongly built, with no door breaking its masonry. The inspector examined the stonework, tapped it all over with an iron-shod walking-stick, and tested the plaster in the interstices. The wall was genuine, solid work. No chink or crevice appeared in the hard cement.

There remained the floor. The two Scotland Yard men peered over the stone flags, scrutinising each one carefully. Suddenly the inspector went down on his knees at the end of the passage, and putting his ear close to the flagstone, listened intently. Then he stood up, and having motioned us to keep where we were, he walked slowly down the corridor, tapping each flagstone with the stick as he went. The last one rang hollow. A triumphant 'Ah!' came from him, and his face relaxed in a grim smile. He again struck the flagstone, and afterwards the stone next to it. The difference was marked. One gave a dull, solid thud, the other a ring that hummed and died away, almost metallic in its effect. As we stood listening to its sound trailing into silence, the cry which I had heard reached me again, this time in a high note, broken off abruptly. There was now no doubt. It came from below, and it was the voice of some creature in extremity. Sparke and the inspector bent over the hollow flagstone. Sparke brushed the stone with a handkerchief, and then ran his electric torch round the edges. A tiny circular depression, full of dust, and not much bigger than a threepenny-piece, was revealed. He whipped out and applied a knife, whereupon the stone moved a little. The handy man with the keys produced a chisel, and in a couple of minutes the flagstone opened up as easily as a trap-door.

'Now,' said the inspector, 'we'll see what we shall see!'

He flashed the electric torch into the opening, disclosing the steps of a rough wooden ladder leading down into the gloom. Then he lowered himself into the dark hole, and we followed. As I reached the last rung of the ladder the voice sounded once more, close at hand, and in pitiful entreaty. We found ourselves in a cramped, narrow passage about six feet long, having a door on the left. This proved to be locked, but it was a flimsy affair, and two vigorous kicks sent it nearly off its hinges. The room which we entered was pitch-dark, except for the dying embers of the tell-tale fire. Sparke flashed the electric torch, and in the gloom I saw a figure lying on a couch at the opposite side of the room. The inspector stepped forward and bent over him, the man staring up without saying a word. I shrank from the sight. I have never seen such horrible shaking fear in a human face. He was young, but woefully wasted, and of a ghastly pallor—the mere shadow of a man—and his big dark eyes, full of terror, burned in their hollows with an unnatural and shocking brightness.

'Whoever he is, the poor devil is pretty far gone,' said the inspector, and at the words the man half-rose on one elbow, and fell back in a dead faint.

(Continued on page 343.)

THE LAST THREE MONTHS OF THE WAR IN THE AIR.

PART II.

VI.

MORE, perhaps, in the case of the air than of any other branch of the service, an article of this nature must be of isolated value, except in so far as the experiences of one squadron may be taken as typical of the entire Air Force during the last three months' fighting. Moreover, if an airman writes of his experiences he is forced to indulge in many personal references, which are apt to give the effect of bombast; but air fighting is an intensely personal thing, and it is not possible to apportion to others the credit they richly deserve.

For instance, the fast-travelling Allied offensive suddenly became of less interest to me than the immediate task of running a squadron, for I succeeded the C.O. who was killed. The day after his death we received orders to move to Athies at dawn, which pleased us all, as it would help us to forget some of the sad events of the previous weeks, and in fresh surroundings I should have a chance of putting into practice some ideas I had always cherished.

Our new aerodrome had also formerly been used by the Huns, and the officers' quarters had been built by them as well. The quarters were warm and comfortable, and although somewhat garishly calcimined within, were preferable to tents.

A week or so passed, during which time I was kept busy learning how to run a squadron and changing things according to my plans. The weather seldom made flying possible, but I had several targets put up against a bank, and a Vickers machine mounted on a tripod, so that the pilots could get as much practice as possible. I also kept them well supplied with pistol ammunition, and they spent most of their time competing with each other for stakes.

I think it is generally conceded that good shooting in aerial warfare plays a much greater part than freak flying. At least, I have always been convinced of this fact. A pilot, by extraordinary freak flying, may be able to place himself in an excellent position to shoot down an enemy, but if he cannot hit him when he does get there, what is his advantage? He may be able to get away when he is in a tight position, but it is much safer to bring the other chap down instead.

The Canadians seemed to take a very keen interest in the shooting, and not only became most proficient, but showed themselves very ingenious in some of their schemes for the improvement of sighting. One man, I remember, made a large kite which he flew at one thousand feet, a good-sized flag being attached thereto, with a black cross painted on it. When he got this thing to the required height, he would go up in his machine and fire at the flag until all his ammunition was gone. Then he would land, wind in his kite, and examine the flag. He was an extraordinarily good shot, and I have seen a flag torn to ribbons after he had been shooting at it. Of course, the country around us was not thickly settled, so no one cared much where the bullets eventually landed. We were more or less in rest, doing very few patrols; but when we were considered to be in shape once more, we began to hunt the Hun in the last phase of the war.

VII.

It was a dull day when we recommenced work, and as we approached the lines we found Bohain and many villages to eastward on fire. Why the Huns set fire to these pretty little places I have never been able to figure out, unless from pure vandalism. As we were directly over Bohain a huge mine exploded, sending up showers of burning embers, earth, and dust; and as we followed the railway line towards Busigny, another large mine went up. It all made a very picturesque scene, and I dropped lower to get a better view of it, when I noticed a German balloon below, unusually close to the line. We went down at him, one behind the other. When he filled my sights I let fire, and a white parachute appeared below. As the last of us passed there was a small flame, then a huge blaze, and a lot of black smoke. One more 'Drachen' destroyed!

Meanwhile their 'Archies' were paying us the most complimentary attention. They had a nasty bark (they always did when one was trying to get back to one's own territory), and were throwing little balls of phosphorus, eight in a row. However, we returned without mishap.

One afternoon, after several days of bad weather, we were detailed to do a low bombing show on the road east of Le Cateau. Reports had been received that this road was congested with retreating German troops, and it was up to us to destroy them. By that time the Allied offensive was developing so furiously that the Hun was staggering like a man in the ring who knows that if he cannot get a rest he must go under to his opponent's anvil blows. The British policy of 'sweep the Hun from the air' we had now to apply to terra firma. We were to do our best to complete the disorganisation of the Boches as they retreated.

On a scout machine is fitted a small bomb-rack, at the bottom of the fuselage, between the struts of the undercarriage, and for jobs of this character this rack carries four twenty-pound Cooper bombs, or 'man-killers,' which can be released by pulling a flexible wire when the machine is over the target. Being very fast and easy to manœuvre, scout machines, carrying such bombs, can drop down on troops in a road, let fall their eggs, open fire with their guns, and cause a great deal of damage in a few minutes.

One can spot troops on the move, drop down close to the ground a mile or so away from them, then fly over fields fringed with trees, and come right on top of them before they even know you are in the vicinity.

This afternoon we spotted the enemy on the road quickly enough—there were hundreds of them. Getting well east of them, we dropped down below the tops of the trees and came towards them, skimming the surface of the fields. When we were almost on them I rose up over the trees and flew along the road, the others stringing out behind me in single file. It is hardly possible to miss a target at that height, and as we dropped our bombs we turned and swept the road with machine-gun fire. As our guns fired at the rate of eleven hundred and fifty rounds a minute, it can be easily realised what confusion resulted among the Germans. They stampeded in all directions, but we could see every move, and followed them wherever they went. It was a weird sight: a wagon lying dismantled in one spot, with its horses killed—a lorry, without its occupants, standing stolidly in the road—a group of men huddling in a ditch—men and horses wildly running everywhere.

It is impossible to state how many were killed. What my squadron was doing, others were doing all along the line; and I am convinced that these raids on the roads were a tremendous factor in bringing the Prussian bully to his knees.

When, however, a few Germans managed to keep their heads, especially if there were machine-guns with them, it was a very dangerous pursuit, and many a good chap went West in these last stage raids.

VIII.

The next day I met the black Hun again.

The clouds were very high, and there was little wind, so, climbing to sixteen thousand feet, we approached the lines opposite St Quentin. In this light it is easier to spot enemy aircraft than on clear days, and we soon perceived several Fokkers, slightly below us, who were attacking a British two-seater. This was a De Havilland Liberty 9, and he was putting up a splendid fight. The Huns seemed afraid to approach him too closely, probably hoping to force him to the ground on their side of the line.

They did not see us until we began to fire, and then they tried to climb towards the east. When I got close to the leader I saw that his machine was all black.

It was my psychological German of the dark Fokker.

This time I had him. He was still shooting at the two-seater when he filled my sights, and I let loose a burst into him. Down he went, turning and twisting from side to side, so that it seemed certain he was hit. Following him down to make sure he was not tricking me again, I saw him crash close to the bank of the river Oise, his black planes and fuselage a grim wreck of matchwood.

In the meantime one of our 'Camels' had fought cleverly, and a Fokker burst into flames, going down to its end. The rest of them got away, and we drew off in close formation to avoid a straggler being caught.

Again there was bad weather; and when, after a few days of restive idleness, we took to the air again, there were very few Huns to encounter. We managed to make an armour-plated two-seater land on our side of the line, and witnessed the sight of the German observer jumping from his cockpit and trying to set fire to his machine without giving his pilot, who was wounded, a chance to get out. However, the fire died out very quickly.

IX.

Shortly after this we had one more real battle in the air, and it proved to be my last.

Fifteen of us left the aerodrome one fine afternoon, flying east of Le Nouvion, when eight Fokkers came at us from out of the sun. After a brisk scrap, I managed to send the leader down in flames, when the rest of the Fokkers dived. As they did so, one of my chaps, by a smart bit of work, shot down a bright-yellow Fokker. It was fine manœuvring and quick thinking.

Although tempted to follow them, I was afraid it was part of a plan, and that something was above us. Looking round to determine our plan of action, I saw about twenty Fokkers circling about, preparing to attack us. We were caught. There was nothing for it but to use every subterfuge we knew, and trust to luck for some opening.

Picking up our formation, we turned and dived westwards towards our lines. Our middle flight was well above and west of me, so that the Huns would have to attack the lower flight first. Without any hesitation, three of them swooped down on my rear man, but as they came close I made a stall turn and flew towards them. One of them turned across my front, and I put a burst into him, but apparently without doing any vital damage, for he dived east, evidently unhurt. One of my fellows had succeeded in getting on a Fokker's tail, and as I watched them the Hun turned over quickly and went down, spinning. The remaining Hun of the three began to shoot from behind, his bullets striking my top plane; but one of my rear men gave him a burst, and he disappeared, although his machine was still under control.

Meanwhile the remainder of the enemy formation, in coming down to aid the first three, had been splendidly attacked by our two top flights, and one of their number had gone down in flames.

Suddenly the whole enemy formation turned to the east, and flew on; but as we turned south they flew parallel with us for a while. We tried the north next, with the same result. Coming up towards Le Cateau, they followed us a short distance, and then dived for the east.

And that was the last time I saw the Hun in the air.

General Macdonnell, of the First Canadian Division, used to say that it is the pin-pricks in life that hurt. I believe him for one, because a few days later I was ingloriously disabled by an accident to my leg while wrestling in the mess.

It was mighty hard luck, and I missed the last few days of the war as a result. On the day I was to go away the Hun shelled the aerodrome early in the morning, but was good enough to desist during breakfast.

It was a very hard tug to leave the squadron, and I felt wretched as I climbed into the car after breakfast. There were a few last words to be said to the flight commanders, a few last good-byes, and then the old, wonderful wish, 'Good-bye and good luck.' As the car drew away, the fellows—the best in the world—gave me a cheer, and the Hun speeded the parting guest by dropping a few odd shells on the aerodrome.

Whether all this is interesting or not I cannot say; but if through these isolated and fragmentary accounts some idea can be gathered of how the British airmen fought during the last three months, perhaps the effort is not entirely valueless.

The two things that stand out most clearly in my memory of that time are the chase of the black Fokker, and the farewell from the men it had been my privilege to lead.

Neither of these things shall I ever forget.

THE END.

'THE FASHIONER OF THE GODS.'

By S. H. Reason.

I.

'WHY, Ram Singh, is it thou in reality?' said I; and there was a mist before my eyes and a lump in my throat as I beheld his well-loved, classic, bronze features. Then: 'Ohè, ever wert thou one to stand on ceremony!' I added with an embarrassed laugh, as he salaamed respectfully. Yet I thought I caught the flush of pleasure through the bronze.

After we had embraced in the manner of those other dear days, we coldly shook hands occidental-wise. Ram Singh spat on the ground contemptuously at sight of the gray-clad sentinel outside our prison camp; and, he leading, we stepped gingerly through the quagmire of mud and filth into his dug-out. The other occupants arose, salaaming in silence, save the Gurkha, who saluted smartly, clicking his heels as he did so. In the gloom I made out the forms of a Punjabi of the —th Infantry, another bearded Sikh of the regiment of Ram Singh, a coal-black Madrasi, and—I gasped in sheer amazement, for at the far end of the room was a genuflecting figure in some incongruous yellow robe of sorts, the cut of which seemed strangely familiar; while every now and then came in deeply musical bass the 'Om, Mane, Padne, Hum,' invocation to Buddha, the Lord of Life and Death—to a small, squat, replica of Buddha, gazing eternally through the ages with that rapt look of meditation and the peaceful composure of the happy dead, even as all other Buddhas do in all other Buddhist shrines where his votaries worship.

I was about to withdraw temporarily at sight of the worshipper, when my guide stopped me. I turned round. 'Come, Huzoor; he has finished.' His eyes were shining. 'Come and see the handiwork of thy servant;' and Ram Singh led me to a niche in the wall of the dug-out. 'Dost see?' he said slyly, as he drew them out one by one. And, lo! there was a horribly real, wooden replica of Shiva, 'the destroyer,' whose many swords in his many hands were scarlet-tinted; an incarnated wooden Krishna of god-like mien and statuesque pose; a carved figure of Confucius, even to the pigtail; Vishnu, with a voluptuous smile on her evilly beautiful face, and a partly kneeling, partly prostrate, group of worshipping lovers, among whom I recognised some khaki-clad British Tommies; a few more remarkably good Buddhas; and a funeral pyre. The last mentioned was a particularly good specimen of carving. In the foreground surged part of a turbulent river in which a half-burnt corpse was depicted as being carried round in the vortex of an eddy. The pyre and its occupant were terribly realistic: tinted flames; the partly charred and half-subsided corpse; the few poorly clad, grieving relatives. All looked so real that one expected to hear their cries in miniature, to perceive the crackle and sizzle of the flames, to smell the sickening, soul-paralysing stench of burning dead.

I had heart to say nothing of the glaring incongruities in the khaki-clad lovers of Vishnu, or the pigtail of Confucius, or of the liberties he had taken in the details of Indian mythology, for I was away back in the cycle of years. There were the hundred and one alluring, intoxicating scents of the East in my nostrils. There was a gay, mad riot of colour in my mind's eye, in which tropic suns, many-coloured multitudes, vast rivers, and snow-clad peaks all mixed themselves wildly together in heterogeneous medley. There was the musical tinkle-tinkle in many keys of a thousand and one wind-kissed Buddhist monastery fairy bells in my ears.

'O proselyte,' said I, coming suddenly back to earth as the harshly discordant blare of a Prussian bugle broke in on our hearing, and shaking my finger in admonition, 'and what of the wrath of Krishna? Or, stay, was it not Vishnu?'

The Sikh's tone was grieved. 'Nay, thou jestest, O sahib. But thou hast not seen the other gods.' And so saying, he lit a lamp, a thing of ordinary string floating in a tin of sardine-oil.

His accents became almost a reverent chant. 'There be many half-gods, sahib, as thou truly knowest who hast sojourned in Hind, and hast travelled the dusty byways in search of Truth. There be they who swear by Krishna'—he glanced at the other Sikh. 'There be the followers of Kala of bloody memory. Buddha and Mahomet were also truly great men, and in the eyes of some, gods.'

Now, all this was in the vernacular, and between-whiles he was searching in the niche that had contained the carven gods, a perplexed look gradually growing on his keen-cut features.

Then suddenly to the Madrasi: 'O thou black pig of no caste, whose mothers, back to the fourth generation, were daughters of she-asses, and whose father was a camel, what hast thou done unto The Gods?'

The Madrasi was trembling with some hidden emotion. 'O Ram Singh, we feared to tell thee because of thy wrath, but—but'——

The Sikh's eyes blazed sudden fires of fury. With a bound he was at the other side of the dug-out. 'But what, pig? Speak before I choke thee! Dost hear? Speak!'

Said the Madrasi presently, 'The fat pig of a Feldwebel, he with the shaven head that thou knowest of, even he came here this morning and threw the great King and Ranee and the great Lord Keetcheener down into the dust and trampled on them. Is it not so, O my brothers?' And he turned to the others for confirmation, with the Sikh's hand still making him wince. And they answered shamefacedly, 'It is even as the Madrasi hath spoken, O Ram Singh.'

The Sikh spun the Madrasi round so that he sank, a huddled, ignominious heap, to the ground. Then he turned to the others. 'Dogs! pigs all of you!' he shouted; 'have ye taken the salt and the pay of the British Raj for this, that the first fat, thrice-accursed German swine who insults your King and Ranee and your Lord Keetcheener should be allowed to go free?'

'Nay, it is not so,' said the Gurkha, limping truculently forward. 'I and thy brother Sikh, who, as thou knowest, are both wounded, were working at the time.'

The sallow Punjabi, his arm in a sling, interrupted at this stage. 'Listen, O Huzoor and Ram Singh, and judge if we were to blame. The Feldwebel of the shaven head, on whom be a thousand curses, came searching again in here with four of his soldiers. He it was who threw the work of thy hands, thy Lord Keetcheener and the great King and Ranee, into the dust, and scattered the pieces outside; the others'—indicating the half-gods—'he passed by. We be wounded, as thou seest, O Huzoor; also were there many armed men on the outside, or assuredly should we have had a say in the matter. Peradventure, had the Lord Mahomet been there, he would have averted the evil eye.' This daringly, for he was the only Mohammedan present. Then, gathering courage: 'And what more wouldst thou have had us do?'

'Thou shalt see, dog of a Punjabi!' replied the Sikh tersely. His voice rose in mad anger. 'They've starved thee; they've beaten thee; they've tortured thee! Aié, thy blood is like unto the wells from which the camels drink, and which they befoul. Thou hast asked what more we would have had thee do. Again I say, I will show thee, and shortly; and if I keep not my word, may Krishna, Shiva, Buddha, and every other god do the same unto me that, I assure thee, I will do unto that fat German pig and thee. I have spoken.'

II.

A week later, by a stroke of good luck, and after evading several bayonet-prods and kicks, I managed to visit Ram Singh again. He salaamed as I entered, mud-stained, dishevelled, a week's growth on my chin. The dug-out was empty save for us two.

'O Forbes sahib, the hour draws nigh. See, two of the other gods are already finished.' He pointed exultantly at two new three-feet-high images of the King and the Queen. The likeness was really remarkable—that of the King, arrayed as for the Durbar, grasping his orb and sceptre; the Queen with a wondrous smile lighting up her features.

'Splendid, O Singh!' I exclaimed. Then I started as I noticed the work he had in hand; for it was the third god, 'Keetcheener.' There was a wreath of laurels around his head, and at his feet sat a tiny Buddha, a Confucius, a Krishna, a voluptuous-eyed Vishnu, a Kala, a Shiva, 'the destroyer,' and many other deities of mythology, obscure to my untrained eye and intellect. 'Why, this is art, of a verity!' said I, and could say no more, for I was spell-bound as I watched his rapidly moving hand and the deft whittle of his knife.

Yet my heart was heavy as I gazed on the beloved, stern features of the Third God. For that very morning we had heard of his lamented and ill-timed death, to the accompaniment of many kicks and curses and bayonet-prods, with evil jests to the effect that the doom of the accursed Engländer was sealed, now that he was no more.

But we who knew him and loved him—including Ram Singh, one-time horse-thief, Buddhist priest, soldier of the grandest Empire the world has ever seen, and now Fashioner of Gods—knew also that his name and fame would live long after the memory of most of the other gods had faded into the dust of countless ages.

So I had only smiled at their evil jests en route, though sadly and unbelievingly withal, as befitted a soldier of the British Empire.

Then I braced myself to the ordeal and spoke: 'Hast heard the news, O Ram Singh—that he is now no more?' pointing to the central figure of the Third God.

He looked up suddenly, catching the direction of my glance. His face slowly turned ashen under the bronze. 'Nay, surely this is an evil subject to jest on.' He peered fearfully up at me. Then I told him all.

He moaned and groaned as he listened, giving vent to the 'Aiè, Aiè,' so peculiarly expressive of the sorrow of the East, and rocking himself from side to side in a paroxysm of grief. And finally, at the close of my recital, he abased himself on the ground before the carved figure of the Third God.

All at once he rose, tall, erect, commanding, his eyes flashing fire, his face upturned towards heaven. His voice rose to a scream. 'Ohè, Great God Keetcheener! Ohè, my dear Lord, do not fear; thy death shall not go unpunished. To-night—yea, this very night—shall there be others with thee in thy wanderings. Ohè, do not grieve, dear Lord and Master.' His voice gradually sank to a sobbing whisper.

Then he remembered he was a creature of the Orient, grew calmer, and sat down, recommencing almost immediately his labour of love. Occasionally he looked up at me. And it occurred to me he was formulating some scheme or other.

'Thou art wounded in the foot and the thigh, O sahib, and so art unable to go on a long march.'

I agreed sorrowfully.

I rose to go, and this time the Sikh embraced me. 'Look thou on the barbed-wire posts nearest here when the first winds of dawn begin to whisper.' He chuckled. 'Go thou now, Forbes sahib, and the gods be with thee till we meet again! And forget not—rise early.'

III.

I rose early. It was almost dark, but a faint ruby glow shone in the east, betokening dawn. I looked at the barbed-wire posts, and saw four ungainly blotches that looked uncommonly like —I rubbed my eyes—I looked again. Yes, there was no mistaking the configuration of those unsightly knobs, and the ground at the foot of the poles seemed darker.

The head of the Feldwebel was one of the blotches. The head of the fiend who had commanded the camp was another. The other two were the heads of the Punjabi and the Madrasi respectively—the heads of the men who did not avenge the insult to the Three Gods. A sentry came running up, cursing horribly. A round went off. A second sentry came—a third. Pandemonium reigned.

The authorities tried hard to find the culprits, and failed, for Ram Singh and his compatriot had fled, taking their three gods with them. The authorities also discovered a note pinned to the decapitated bodies of the Punjabi and the Madrasi. Incidentally this note found its way to Berlin, to be interpreted by a broken-hearted old man who had learned certain languages of the East in anticipation of that glorious day when Deutschland should control the destinies of the major portion of the Orient. It ran: 'O German Pig who hast the translation of this, Read:—These two are sent to accompany the One and Only War Lord in his wanderings, him whom ye so treacherously slew at sea. They go voluntarily as his bodyguard, having asked this of us, his servants, as a last favour.

'Ram Singh, havildar, —th Pioneers.
'Ram Dass, naik, do.'

In this manner did the 'Fashioner of the Gods' pass out of my life for a space.

THE MONTH: SCIENCE AND ARTS.

A HOT BATH FROM THE COPPER.

IN some small houses, although a bath is fitted, there is no boiler at the back of the kitchen-range, acting in conjunction with a hot-water cistern and the necessary piping, for heating the water. As a matter of fact, this arrangement is costly to install, and is sometimes inefficient in operation. Proof of the latter contention is afforded by the fact that some householders heat the water for the bath in the copper, in preference to lighting a fire in the kitchen-range, the former operation taking half-an-hour or thereabouts, whereas to get a hot bath by means of the kitchen fire from complete cold occupies a considerable time. A copper is a very efficient appliance for heating water, and advantage has been taken of this fact to devise a simple bath-heating system in which the water is heated in the copper and forced up to the bath, even if it is situated on the floor above, by the pressure of the water service. The main portion of the apparatus consists of an ordinary copper with the usual furnace and flue, and a closed hot-water cistern mounted on the wall above it. From the cistern two pipes lead down into the copper and dip an inch or two below the water-level. One of these pipes opens at its upper end into the bottom of the cistern, but the other passes right up to the top of the cistern. We will assume for the moment that both cistern and copper are full of water, the copper having been filled in the ordinary way by the turning of a tap. One might suppose that the water would drain out of the cistern, but this it cannot do without leaving a vacuum, as no air can get in. When a fire is lighted under the copper the water inside rapidly becomes heated, and rises up the pipe leading to the top of the cistern, while a downward flow begins in the other pipe, and a brisk circulation is set up. In a very short time the water in both cistern and copper becomes hot, and is ready for forcing up into the bath. This is done by a simple arrangement of cocks, which allows the down pipe to be connected with the water service, while the up pipe (the one going to the top of the cistern) is connected to the bath-tap. On the tap being opened, hot water flows into the bath, and cold water comes in from the water service to take its place. Compared with the work needed to install a boiler in a kitchen-range and to fix the necessary piping, the arrangement is very easily carried out, while there is no danger of an explosion in frosty weather. The ordinary functions of the copper are in no way interfered with, the pipes coming in close to one side, and only involving notches in the lid to accommodate them. The apparatus, which is known as the 'Non-Pressure Hot-Water Supply System,' has been invented and patented by Mr George Bailey.

HUGE CHANNEL FERRY SCHEME.

The cross-Channel train-ferry steamers used during the war and described in these notes for last month are small craft compared with the colossal ferry-boats suggested by Sir John Pilter, Honorary President of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, and M. de Cordemoy. Estimating that an average daily traffic between France and England of four thousand tons may be expected, they say that a train-ferry steamer capable of dealing with this tonnage, assuming two crossings each way per day, would have a length of six hundred feet, a breadth of eighty-five feet, and a gross tonnage of twenty-five thousand tons, and would require a depth of water of twenty-nine and a half feet to float it. The goods-trucks and the passenger-coaches would be accommodated on two decks, one above the other, and would be hauled on board by winches and cables. To enable the ferry-boat to take up a position so that its rails shall exactly meet those on the hinged bridges on the shore, stockades of piles are to be built at the terminal ports converging towards the landing-stages, and these will fit the stern of the boat. This device, it may be noted, has long been in use for the ferries across New York harbour. Passenger-trains would be timed to arrive ten minutes before the departure of the boat, this period being deemed sufficient for embarkation. The goods-trains would, of course, be already on board. The voyage of ninety minutes or so being over, the passenger-train would be run on shore and despatched on its way in the course of twenty minutes, leaving the goods traffic to be dealt with more leisurely. 'While the outer port at Dover could receive a boat with a draught of twenty-nine and a half feet at any state of the tide,' says The Times, 'the French coast has no port offering the same facilities.' A suitable site for a deep-water port is to be found, however, just south of Cape Gris Nez, at a point only twenty-three miles distant from the English coast. It is estimated that the necessary accommodation could be constructed on this site in four years at a cost of three million pounds. In the meantime the originators of the scheme suggest the possibility of running the ferry to suit the tides.

THE WORLD'S BIGGEST LOG RAFT.

Those who have read that inimitable boys' book, Huckleberry Finn, by Mark Twain, will remember the huge log rafts encountered by the hero and the nigger Jim during their voyage down the Mississippi. Those floating masses of timber would, however, look insignificant by the side of the colossal log ship recently towed from Haparanda, at the north of the Gulf of Bothnia, to Copenhagen, a distance of close upon a thousand miles. This vessel (it can hardly be called a raft) was built with a V-shaped bow, and measured three hundred and eighty-seven feet in length and fifty-five in width, while the depth was twenty-six and a half feet, of which ten feet projected above the water. It was held together by numerous big steel-wire ropes, and took six months to build. The crew of seven men were accommodated in a deckhouse aft.

A NEW FORM OF STRETCHER.

The transfer of a severely injured person from a stretcher to a hospital bed is often accompanied by pain and shock which may have serious consequences, and it is surprising that only recently has a stretcher been devised which can be laid on the bed and pulled out from under the patient without seriously disturbing him. The stretcher referred to is divided down the middle, and each edge of the canvas is provided with broad loops of the same material. When the two halves of the stretcher are brought together the two sets of loops fit into each other, thus forming a tunnel, as it were, from one end to the other. A thin steel rod is pushed in at each end of the tunnel until the two rods meet and hold each other in check, when they are secured in position by means of canvas straps passing over their outer ends. To enable the stretcher to be placed in position on the bed, the handles, which in their normal position would not allow of this, are made to fold up. The stretcher containing the patient having been deposited on the bed, the steel rods are drawn out, and the canvas is pulled from under him at each side. According to the Scientific American, this stretcher was invented by Mr M. V. Hubbard, an ambulance-driver in the fire department of San José, California.

MEDITERRANEAN TO PERSIAN GULF BY CANAL.

The project originated by a Belgian engineer, M. Gustave Defosse, to construct a ship-canal nearly a thousand miles in length between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf dwarfs into insignificance all the canals chemes contemplated in this country, important though these are. Reference to the map, however, shows that the idea is not so far-fetched as might be thought at first, owing to the nearness of the upper Euphrates to the Mediterranean seaboard. This project was set on foot long before the war, surveys being made between 1901 and 1912, and the recent turn of events in favour of the Allies has brought it within the realm of practical politics. According to a description given in The Times Engineering Supplement, the canal is to have a width of three hundred and twenty-eight feet at the surface and two hundred and thirty feet at the bottom, while the depth will be thirty-two feet nine inches. Starting at the mouth of the Orontes at Suediah (the Seleucia of the Acts of the Apostles), the canal is to follow that river to Lake Abiad, whence a channel would be cut to Aleppo, and from that city to Khalat Balis, on the Euphrates, a total distance of one hundred and forty-nine miles from Suediah. At this point the surface of the Euphrates is ninety-eight and a half feet above sea-level, which gives a rise of less than eight inches to the mile; while to Fao, the Persian Gulf terminal of the canal, a distance of eight hundred and twenty miles, the fall would be under one and a half inches to the mile. Under these conditions locks are not considered necessary, but M. Defosse proposes to keep up the water-level by regulating dams of special design which will not interfere with navigation. One of these dams is to be placed between Suediah and Khalat Balis, and four are to be built between Khalat Balis and Fao. Both the Orontes and the Euphrates will, of course, be straightened and deepened. The upper parts of the two rivers and some of their larger tributaries are to be dammed to provide reserve water for the canal and for irrigation, while water-power for generating electricity is to be developed where practicable. A dam, for instance, across the Euphrates at Khalat Balis is estimated to provide forty thousand horse-power, a further thirty thousand being derivable from the Orontes and two other rivers. In addition to employing the electric-power for irrigation works and for lighting, it is proposed to use it for hauling vessels along the canal. Bagdad being on the Tigris and nearly thirty miles from the Euphrates, it is proposed to construct a branch canal to the Lake of El-Khor, which would be made into the port for the city, water communication being also provided with the Tigris. The scheme includes quays at the terminals for the largest ships, and similar accommodation along the canal to Antioch, and at other places. In fact, M. Defosse expects the section from Basra to Fao to become one huge port. Jetties two and a half miles long are to protect the entrance, and the river is to be deepened to forty feet up to Fao. The cost of the canal and other works is estimated at sixty-four million pounds, and M. Defosse calculates that the work could be completed in seven years. A yearly revenue of eight million pounds is expected, without reckoning on any returns from irrigation.

NON-INFLAMMABLE GAS FOR AIRSHIPS.

An important development brought about by the war was the production of helium at a cost which permitted of its use in balloons and airships, for which purpose it has the important advantage over hydrogen, the gas commonly used, of being non-inflammable. Even for commercial flying in peace-time an airship filled with hydrogen would be subject to considerable risks from fire, while during war it would now be practically at the mercy of the first enemy aeroplane that came along. Before the armistice was signed plans had been prepared for a fleet of airships to be filled with helium, and this gas was already being used in American kite balloons. The only drawback to helium, apart from its cost, is its reduced lifting-power as compared with hydrogen, but the difference is only about 7½ per cent., and this disadvantage is far more than counterbalanced by its non-inflammability. At one time helium cost more than three hundred pounds per cubic foot, but in the near future the Americans expect to produce it at a cost comparatively small. Helium is found in the natural gases of the south-western portion of the United States to the extent of at least 1 per cent. 'When America declared war upon Germany,' says a writer in the Scientific American, 'the British Air Board called the attention of the American Government to the fact that one of the important contributions that country could make toward winning the war would be the industrial production of helium.' An experimental station was at once put in hand by the American Bureau of Mines and the Aircraft Board, while two companies engaged in the production of liquid air were induced to lay down plant for producing helium. These three plants have been in operation for some time, and huge works are now being built at a cost of over four hundred thousand pounds by the Navy Department for providing helium for naval airships. There is not the least doubt that the production of helium on a commercial scale will give a great impetus to the development of the airship, as the elimination of the fire risk will allow of the machinery and the propeller-shaft being mounted on the centre line, and this will prove a great advantage. A central propeller at the tail of the vessel tends only to drive the vessel forward, whereas propellers in cars below the body have a tendency to tip up the nose of the ship, and as this effect has to be corrected by the rudders, a considerable loss of speed is incurred.

A BRIQUETTE-MAKER FOR THE HOME.

Most of us are familiar with fuel in the form of briquettes made from coal-dust and slack, with the addition of tar or some similar binding material. Briquettes are usually manufactured by machinery, the mixture being pressed into moulds. A simple hand device, known as the 'Wildfire' Briquette-Maker, has now been placed on the market, which enables any householder to make his or her own briquettes from the dust and small coal left over in the cellar, or from slack bought for the purpose at a comparatively low price. The tools comprise (1) a four-sided mould open at the top and the bottom, and rather larger at the bottom than at the top; (2) a movable bottom which fits loosely in the mould; and (3) a rammer, consisting of a square weight fitting easily into the mould and provided with a wooden handle. The coal is first riddled in a sieve with half-inch holes, the stuff which passes through being used for the briquettes, the larger coal being burnt in the ordinary way. A mixture is now made of two parts of pitch to one of Portland cement, the former being crushed until it will pass through a sieve with one-eighth-inch holes. This preparation is then thoroughly mixed with the coal in the proportion of one part of the mixture to six of coal. An easy way of measuring the quantities is to use an ordinary household bucket, which holds two and a half gallons, six full buckets of small coal weighing approximately one hundredweight. For this quantity one bucket of the mixture is required, or twelve pounds of pitch and six pounds of cement. Add water, a little at a time, through the rose of a watering-can, and again thoroughly mix, taking care that the water reaches every particle of dust. The stuff should be damp only, but on no account sloppy. If the coal is damp to start with, it may not require any added water. To make the briquettes, put the movable bottom of the mould on a level floor with the flat side uppermost, and place the mould over it. Then, using a garden trowel, fill the box loosely to within two or three inches of the top, and form the briquette with a few good short strokes with the rammer. To extract the briquette, lift the mould containing it off the movable bottom and place it on the floor, when a gentle pressure with the rammer will cause the briquette to fall, and the mould can be lifted off. Briquettes varying in thickness from one to four inches can be made according to the quantity of the mixture put into the mould. They should be allowed twelve hours to set, after which they can be stacked, being ready for use in forty-eight hours. Briquettes can also be made with tar as a binder, and cinders or coke-dust can be utilised with a proportion of coal. When estimating the cost users should remember that pitch and tar have high heat values, so that the extra twelve pounds to the hundredweight are practically equal to so much additional coal. The makers of the apparatus claim that one hundredweight of slack can be made into seventy briquettes (three to the cubic foot) in ninety minutes.

A MINE-SWEEPER FOR EVERY SHIP.

A device that saved us from much greater privations during the war than we actually suffered was the 'paravane,' which was used to protect Allied ships from enemy mines. Paravanes are somewhat similar in shape to torpedoes, and, like them, they are made to travel under water. Two paravanes were towed from the bow of every ship, one on each side. The towing-cables were attached to the stem of the vessel as deep down under water as possible. Fins were fitted to paravanes, which, in conjunction with the way the towing-cables were made fast, caused them to take up a position well away to the side of the ship and about twenty feet under water. Any one who has towed a boat along a river or a canal from a tow-path will know that by fixing the tow-rope at a certain point on the bow, the boat can be made to take up a position nearly abreast of the person towing. Paravanes are towed on this principle, their fins having a similar effect to that of the boat's keel. Mines are anchored to the bottom of the sea by wire cables, and they float about five to fifteen feet below the surface according to the state of the tide. When a ship comes along fitted with paravanes and one of the towing-cables catches the mooring-wire of a mine, the wire scrapes along the cable until it reaches the paravane, where it is severed by a powerful cutting device, and the mine bobs up to the surface to be sunk by gunfire. In the later paravanes the cutting device consisted of big shears, which were opened and shut automatically by a wire cable which was hauled in and let go continuously by a winch on the deck of the ship. Of course, it was always possible that a mine would be struck by the stem of the vessel, but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it was caught by the paravanes. Even if it did strike the stem and explode, the damage was not nearly so serious as if it had hit the side farther aft, and vessels of which only the bow was blown in generally managed to reach a place of safety. The ships both of the navy and of the merchant service were fitted with paravanes, which accounts for the small amount of damage wrought by German mines, considering the large number that were laid.

Correspondents who wish fuller information regarding new inventions, publications, &c. mentioned here, addresses will be furnished, when possible, provided a stamped and addressed envelope or post-card be sent to the Editor, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.

THE CLOSING OF OUR HOSPITAL.

By 'STAFF NURSE,' Author of Scottie and Some Others.

They have learned great faith and little fear, and a high heart in distress,
And how to suffer each sodden year of heaped-up weariness. KIPLING.

SEPTEMBER 1914! A vision rises before us of many nurses, camouflaged in dust-caps and overalls and surrounded on all sides by packing-cases, working with the break-neck enthusiasm associated with these early days of war. The clink-clank of hammers on iron is heard as beds are fixed up for the patients, who, we already feel in our hearts, will deserve from us our very best.

There are no fixed hours of work yet—just from dawn to dark, to get things ship-shape and ourselves in readiness for our first batch of wounded. Then comes the midnight call on the telephone—a code message—and matron and dispenser puzzle the message out in the small hours; and, lo! before our awe has had time to give place to ardour, our wounded are with us—for better or for worse.

. . . . . .

November 1918! A new vision arises—a happier one, perhaps; and yet there is always sadness when one closes a book in which one has read much gallant history, and our hospital is to be closed this week.

Four years and more since we hammered our beds into place; and now, as we come to pack them up and put them away, they are no longer merely beds—they have been homes, some for a very long time, some for a sadly short time, yet all homes, and welcomed eagerly as such by our men back from the battle. In each ward as we work round we have visions—grave visions and gay visions—for we have found in the hearts of our patients a gospel of cheerful endurance, their royal road to laughter through tears.

In Ward 1, hopping around on his crutches, goes Paddy O'Rafferty, the boy whose imagination led him astray from the paths of truth, but never to any man's hurt. Paddy's heart was just full of irresponsible nonsense, which could be caught up and tossed aside when necessity bade Paddy fight. If his tongue frequently wandered, Paddy would always tell you his heart was in the 'right place,' and in an undertone he would add, 'in my boots often.'

In Ward 2 we have a different vision, a sterner and a finer one, perhaps, for here we see 'Scottie,' resolute and restless, counting his days wasted that were spent with us, and living only to be 'out and at them again.' Many men have gone back as a duty cheerfully; many have said they went back gladly, so as to cheer their people here; but Scottie lived the longing and breathed it in every breath he drew, almost to his own undoing. Scottie—yes, a character in a thousand he was, with a niceness of feeling and judgment that kings have often lacked. In his ward was a lad, one, like many others, who years before had quarrelled with his home folks and gone completely out of their lives. In a newspaper his sister saw his name in our list of wounded, and wrote telling the boy his mother had died, but that she and her father still lived in the old home, and would welcome him with open arms. Scottie was told all about it, and Scottie wrote for his comrade, saying he would come to the old home as soon as possible. At last the day came when the boy was able to travel north, but with the day came a sad telegram: 'Father died suddenly last night.' To Scottie once more the cry of despair went out as, hard-eyed, the poor boy sat holding the message before him, while Scottie, with a strong arm round his shoulders, gave him the comfort of a brave heart, and, with a thoughtfulness which endeared him to us all, drew screens round the bed, that the boy might be alone with his grief. Just a strong, quiet man was our Scottie, and an outsider might never have noticed him; but to every man in the ward Scottie was guide, philosopher, and friend. I believe he would have sold his soul to help a pal, and the price Scottie set on his soul was no mean one.

Memories in Ward 3 are fewer, because Ward 3 is a small ward; but one bed stands out, for into it, early in the war, was carried a very ill and very pale little lad. There seemed to be only two things left him to say, and they were 'Yes' and always 'Thank you.' A warrior, and a faithful one, at sixteen, yet still a boy in strength, he seemed just so tired and glad to rest. He had enlisted from a very poor home in August 1914—of how poor a home his wasted frame was evidence. Not hard to enlist from such a home, you might think; but towards the end the boy talked always of his home as though it had been an earthly Paradise, and when he left us to join the ranks of the greatest army of all, he fell asleep with his hand held fast in the thin, toil-worn hand of the mother of that home.

Ward 4 had many memories, but out of them all perhaps stands forth 'The Bullet King,' sardonically so called from his joy in displaying to visitors the bullets which had played hide-and-seek to some purpose in his anatomy. Before the war he had been a navvy, and so his knowledge of what was de rigueur in the army was limited, and he knew not that 'never in the life' must a soldier boast of his bullets. Wounded badly in the back, he had to lie on his face, and in this position (perhaps fortunately) was oblivious of the blighting sarcasms hurled at his head by more silent sufferers.

In Ward 5, a ward radiant with sunshine on green lawns, many cheery warriors have made their home, but I honestly think the cheeriest of all was a Jock in his early twenties with his sight affected. While with us he could see and take his share in the enjoyment of our beautiful surroundings; but in a month he would be blind—totally blind—and he laughed it off. 'I 've seen a lot, I have,' he would say, 'and I have a good memory, but I 've sent for my best girl, or I might forget what she is like when she 's my wife!'

In Ward 6 we all remember our dear theological student, a scholar who forsook all and joined the R.A.M.C. Not strong at any time, he was unfortunately plunged straight into an enteric epidemic. For weeks he worked day and night ungrudgingly, and with the minimum of sleep. But nature struck, and the student fell ill—seriously ill—never again, poor boy! completely to recover his mental balance. He was so gentle and so good that one wished more care had been taken to get him sleep during his hard labours, for it was heart-rending to see him all through the night sitting bolt-upright to keep sleep away, always reiterating, 'A soldier on duty must not sleep.'

Ward 7 we shall always associate with the 'Three Graces,' so called from their propensity for getting into disgrace. Scottish, English, and Welsh respectively, they carried gaily the characteristics of their countries, and where one excelled in inspiration, the other two were pre-eminent in fervour and determination; and so their innocent plots were always successfully carried through, resulting usually in an increased popularity.

In Ward 8 there was my right-hand man, badly wounded in the face, and so a long time with us. He is a very pleasant memory—Lance-Corporal C——; and as batman to the theatre Sister he surely excelled all others, and invented duties for himself that no other batman would have recognised. Many scores of times I had to bless him for timely help in a rush of duties, and my gallant hussar was certainly the most intelligent probationer to whom I ever showed the ropes.

But here is Ward 9, 'Right o' the Line,' and it brings such a throng of blessed memories that I am almost overwhelmed. Gallant gunners, champion prize-fighters, gay Guardsmen and costers, here 's to you all—my own men—and may I meet you again sometime, somewhere.

Ward 10 and the 'Napoo Room,' and we 're round them all! In Ward 10 an amusing man once solemnly handed me my gold watch, which I had carelessly left lying about, with the solemn reminder, 'We are not all gentlemen here, Sister!' The 'Napoo Room' was, of course, the operating theatre, but I am thankful to say no one ever napooed in my theatre. The soldiers' only objection to our appearance there was the ghostly white effect of our overalls, and so with the aid of permanganate of potash we dyed ourselves a pale khaki, which they found less reminiscent of angels' wings! But now, alas, the 'Napoo Room' is napoo! Its doors are shut, and we all descend to the front-door, the scene of so many departures of recovered and grateful Tommies. There we see the vision of our tall, dignified matron, beloved by all, personally seeing off her soldiers, and handing out the 'fag indispensable.'

Our visions are ended. Corridors are empty, and wards bare after their years of healing. Surely, when very soon the voices of little children once more echo within these walls, their days will be hallowed by the memories of the good and the great and the gallant men who have been succoured there.

And as the doors close on the nurses who have been privileged to serve these fine men, they have but one feeling, that, like the people of old who walked in darkness, they have seen a great light.

 TO CONTRIBUTORS.

1*st*. All communications should be addressed to 'The Editor, Chambers's Journal, 339 High Street, Edinburgh.'

2*nd*. For its return in case of ineligibility, postage-stamps should accompany every manuscript.

3*rd*. To secure their safe return if ineligible, ALL MANUSCRIPTS, whether accompanied by a letter of advice or otherwise, should have the writer's Name and Address written upon them IN FULL.

4*th*. Poetical contributions should invariably be accompanied by a stamped and directed envelope.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

CHRISTINE LONAVET.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR.

By ANDREW W. ARNOLD, Author of The Attack on the Farm, The Colonel's Murillo, Pepita, &c.

PART I.

I.

THEY must have been very nice old ladies, those demoiselles Adèle and Marie Dariac, who owned the pretty Villa Rosa at St Jean de la Ruelle, on the high-road from Artenay to Orléans, which we Mobiles of the 3rd Division, under General Barry of the 15th Corps, were ordered to hold at any cost against the advancing Prussians on the 10th October. Everything within the house was in such perfect order, including the wine-cellar, as we afterwards found out—and the Prussians, too, for the matter of that—when we had time to investigate. Upstairs in the dainty bedrooms were pretty, if effeminate, pictures of real and imaginary saints, ivory prayer-books, &c.; but, for all that, every bed was quickly cleared of its mattress, and the green outside shutters were closed, and broken where it suited us to get our chassepots through.

'I am told, Sergeant Pradelle, that you are a good shot,' said Lieutenant Bosly to me. He was but a blanc-bec, this young fellow, and had joined us only three days before at Tours.

'Yes, mon lieutenant,' I replied. 'I think I may say so. I won a silver horn at an international Concours de Tir at Bâle after I had done my service.'

'Well, you choose your own place, and tell me the range, and I'll tell the men, as you really know more about it than I do.'

At that moment Captain Courmont came in, and being satisfied, hurried off, saying he would see to the men in the garden behind the walls on the road. Under General Motterouge we French had been as badly surprised that morning at Artenay as ever we were at Wissembourg or Beaumont. In the fields in front and along the road, singly and in groups, wounded and unwounded men were hastening panic-stricken to Orléans, but as yet we saw no signs of the enemy. We had not long to wait, however, for soon, in a black mass, they came over the crest of the hill on our left. I reckoned they were quite eight hundred metres from us. Many of the poor lads that composed these newly formed battalions of ours had not gone through any musketry course, but from beneath us, and also from some other villas on our right, they opened fire at once.

'Allez, sergeant, what are you waiting for? What is the use of our having a better gun if we don't use it?' cried the lieutenant.

'It's a perfect waste of ammunition at that range, mon lieutenant,' I replied.

But just then Captain Courmont entered and swore at my commander, so we began at once. As I had felt sure, our fire did not make the slightest difference. It was soon evident that these particular Germans—they were Bavarians—had no intention of attacking us. Orléans was their objective, and they made for the suburb that faced them. With his glasses fixed to his eyes, the lieutenant was standing beside me.

'You see that officer on a brown horse?' I said. 'I reckon he is five hundred metres off. You watch.'

At the third shot I hit him.

'Bravo!' he cried. 'Now, mes enfants, alter your sights to five hundred, and fire slow.'

Inexperienced though they were, the effect of their fire was now more apparent, and, delighted at this, Bosly went down to those below us, telling me he would be back in a minute.

He had hardly gone when a battery away to the left opened on us. At first the shells went whistling overhead; then they fell between us and their own men. But, alas! they quickly got the range, as we soon had reason to know, for a shell came hurtling through the roof, and burst with a deafening noise in the next room.

'Save yourselves!' shouted the lieutenant from the bottom of the stairs. 'They are coming up in the rear.'

In a moment there was a rush for the stairs, and as we went down them I saw at the back, beyond a field, and on the other side of the railway that runs from Orléans to Patay, a regiment making towards the station. The sight of it induced those who had got down first to turn into the road, and I was following, when a shell burst right in the middle of them. Luckily I was protected by the corner of the house, and, along with the lieutenant, a fellow named Lannart, another called Malet, and one or two others, I got to the end of the garden. Whichever way we turned, it appeared to us we were doomed, and getting behind a summer-house, we waited breathlessly. It was growing dark, and darkness seemed the only thing that could save us. It was then, for the first time, that I found out about the wine-cellar.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

'Try some of this,' said Lannart, taking a bottle of cognac from his pocket. 'What's more, I found a new case of English biscuits.' Apart from myself, every one seemed provided with either wine or brandy.

I had always liked Lannart. Like myself, he came from Champagne. I had known him from a boy, and we had done our service together in a regiment at Strasbourg. Great was our joy when, quite unexpectedly, we found ourselves together in the same regiment at Bordeaux, for we had both been abroad when the war broke out. He was a merry, good-hearted fellow, and a perfect little Hercules, but from a military point of view was greatly handicapped through being very short-sighted.

Malet was of an entirely different type, being very tall and rather knock-kneed, with a fine black beard, rosy cheeks, and regular features; very affable and agreeable, but au fond a perfect idiot. His father had a great drapery-store in Bordeaux, and among the young ladies employed there Malet fils was considered a regular Adonis. He had never done his service, and had evaded being called up as long as he could. Every one, of course, knew of the Magasin Malet, for the walls of the city were placarded with the merits of Malet's goods, so naturally at first he was always being chaffed. Requests showered in upon him for better boots and socks, and even for articles not usually sold to soldiers, in exchange for the wretched cotton socks and brown-paper boots served out to us.

II.

It was difficult for me to analyse my thoughts as some eight of us crouched there behind that summer-house. It was the first time I had been under fire, and I was filled at the outset with a sense of burning shame. Better, I thought, to go out at any price than to remain hidden there. But this idea gave way to a realisation of the absurdity of the whole situation. We had had nothing to eat for hours—we were told we should have something at Orléans; thus, on empty stomachs brandy was far more potent. Already two men were lying like logs on the ground, half-hidden by some blackberry-bushes. The shells that kept bursting, mostly overhead, but sometimes even in the garden, were nothing to them. Then the shelling ceased, and we heard footsteps advancing at the double along the road.

'The rats are not in this hole,' I heard a voice exclaim. 'Vorwärts!'

The tramping seemed never to end, but the firing ahead of them showed at least that some were making a better resistance than we had done. Then we heard the clatter of cavalry—and what is more, they halted.

'Dismount! Stand by your horses!'

The colour left the rosy cheeks of Malet; a look of dismay came into the vacant face of the lieutenant. Luckily the trumpet sounded, and the cavalrymen departed as quickly as they had come. However, twilight was fast closing in. In an hour, I reckoned, we could get out of the trap we were in; but then a battery of artillery came tearing along, with a jingle and a jangle as they passed down the road. There was, as I noted, a field to the left of the house, but on one side there was a thick belt of trees, close to the end of the garden.

'Sergeant,' said Lieutenant Bosly in rather a thick voice, 'I will go and reconnoitre a little.'

'Oui, mon lieutenant,' I answered, as he climbed somewhat unsteadily over the wall.

He had not been gone long when again we heard infantry approaching. They halted, and a sergeant, a corporal, and twenty-four men were told off to pass the night in the very villa itself.

'Now, you fellows,' I whispered, 'be ready. I have had enough of this skulking. If there is still light for them to see us, we will blaze into them and bolt.'

It got darker and darker, but the Bavarians (as we afterwards found them to be) were too busy at first indoors to come out. Suddenly Lannart nudged me.

'This way, Uhlmann,' cried one; 'there's a summer-house, they say, down here. Give me the lantern.'

'Why can't we burn their chairs and tables?'

'Because the hauptmann said we were not to; that's why.'

'Fix your bayonets,' I whispered sharply. 'Nothing but l'arme blanche, mind now, if they come.—Lannart, you keep close to me.'

Nearer and nearer came the footsteps. Ready to plunge our bright weapons into them, we stood breathlessly as we heard the Bavarians approach.

'Here we are! Ach, das ist gut. Why, there's a table that's nice and dry. Smash up those seats. What with all the wine and a good fire, we'll have a nice evening.'

Stamping about inside the summer-house within a metre of us we heard the brutes demolishing the seats.

'Donnerwetter!' suddenly exclaimed one; 'the handle of this axe is broken.'

'Well, we have got enough, anyway,' said the other. 'So come on;' and away they went.

'Now, you fellows,' I said, 'I am off, and those who can must follow me.'

Two, I believe, were left behind; some others may have got over the wall; but I only know for certain that Lannart and Malet were close to me.

'Not too fast,' I said, for I knew we were not far from the railway, and I remembered there was a cutting. Soon we came to it, and once across, we got into some fields, where I had seen the Germans from the house. Ere long we reached what we took to be the end of the great forest of Orléans, that stretches from Patay to Beaune-la-Rolande. A cold sleety rain was now falling fast, and the wind was getting up, but at any rate we were free. After a time, however, as we wandered on and on, we began to realise we were not much better off than we had been before. But at last we came to a road, and, drenched to the skin, we determined to follow it, as we knew we must sooner or later come to some dwelling—which we did. This was a deserted cottage. The wretched owners had left no food behind, but we had enough wine, cognac, and biscuits for the night, and some tobacco; and as we dried our clothes before a blazing fire little we cared for the howling storm without, for we were warm and snug.

III.

We had meant to start betimes, but the sun must have risen long ere we awoke. Setting off again, we got into the woods as soon as we could for fear of meeting any Germans.

The rain and sleet had vanished, but it was still cloudy. The sun, alas! was no guide, and I longed for a compass. After a time we found a cottage, but there was no one in it save an old bedridden man and a little child; and it was not till the afternoon that we learned from a native we had been going north—the worst direction we could have taken. We were close to Gémigny, which was occupied by Bavarians. He told us to be very careful, as they had patrols of dragoons everywhere. On leaving I decided to make straight for Bacoon, and then try to reach the forest of Marchenoir, which was about seven leagues from us. Soon the country became more open, the sky cleared, and, invigorated by some milk we got at another cottage, our spirits rose.

We had left a wood behind us, and were making for another, when I suddenly saw a couple of cock-pheasants fighting—a common enough sight in the spring, but never before in all my life had I seen anything of the kind in October. No gamecocks ever fought more gamely. True, one was evidently getting the worst of it, but for all that it ran and half-flew, and then turned again and with claws in the air went at the other. So intent were the two birds on killing each other that they paid no attention to us; in fact, they had come so near, as we stood watching, that they were not more than fifty metres from us.

'It would be a grand thing, sergeant,' said Lannart, 'if we could shoot them; we should then have some supper to-night.'

'It's impossible with a single bullet,' I answered; 'but, parbleu! there's nothing to lose, and I will try.'

It was a rash, silly thing to do, but I yielded to the temptation, and everything that followed was the result of that shot. The pair were dancing round one another, and as a matter of fact I don't think I hit the one I aimed at; but, to the delight of all, I did actually hit and kill one of the birds. Eagerly we rushed forward, when all at once we found there was a regular bog in the middle of the field, fed from a tiny stream in the centre. However, we went squelching through it, intent on our quest. We had secured the bird, when suddenly we saw coming out of the back of the wood we had left some cavalry, whom, from their sky-blue uniforms and mutton-chop brass helmets, we knew to be Bavarian dragoons, without a doubt attracted by the report of my chassepot.

In a moment I saw that, laden as we were with our knapsacks, it was very unlikely we could reach the wood in front of us. I reckoned they were but two hundred and fifty metres from us, and there were only about a dozen of them; so, puffed up with vanity at the way I had hit the pheasant, I determined to make a stand. 'You keep by me, Lannart,' I sang out.

'Trust me for that,' he answered; and Malet, to his credit, remained.

'You two are not to fire; you pass me your guns.'

As soon as they saw us the dragoons had set up a shout; and now, changing from double file to fours, they galloped straight for us. With the first shot I hit the fine chestnut horse of their leader full in the chest. The poor beast came down, throwing its rider far over its head. My second shot wounded a horse in the second rank, which got the bit in its mouth and went off at a tangent, upsetting some others. I fancy I missed with the third, but the fourth shot was the best of all, for I saw a man throw up his arms. This had a quieting effect on the rest of them, and they swerved round a trifle and relaxed their pace.

'Now we will run for it a little,' I said. 'I want to draw them on into that bog, and then we can pick them off.'

Perhaps ashamed of retreating before three, they got over their hesitation and came for us once more. They were not more than one hundred metres away now as I stood waiting for them, ready to fire. It had been no easy task for us to get over the morass, and no sooner were their great heavy horses in it than the Germans were in difficulties.

'Come on, you schweinhunde!' I shouted in delight; and Malet and Lannart, carried away by excitement, blazed away at the Germans, whose only thought now was to get back. But, unfortunately, one who had lost his horse did what they all ought to have done in the first place—knelt down and fired at me. At such a range he could hardly miss, though their needle-carbine was a poor weapon. I felt the sting in my leg, beneath the calf, but for all that I pressed cartridge after cartridge into my good rifle until the remnant gained the wood on foot. Then I sank to the ground, my boot full of blood.

In their delight Lannart and Malet were dancing about, almost embracing each other, till they saw me, and then the good fellows were quite taken aback. Quickly they did what they could. I had some lint, and with a handkerchief they tied up the wound.

'Now get on my back,' said Lannart, 'and quickly, too. There may be others coming.'

From the wood the Germans tried a few shots at us. Lannart waved his hands and made a ceremonious bow in their direction, and then hoisted me on his broad back. But I was strong and heavily built, and even he could not carry me very far, so with my arms round their necks they supported me to the wood in front.

IV.

We had hardly got into the wood when a small, dapper, old gentleman with a very white moustache, wearing the riband of the Legion of Honour, came up with a game-bag on his back.

'Bravo indeed, mon enfant! I was watching those two pheasants fighting, and I saw that shot of yours. Ma foi! that was a wonderful shot. I saw the whole affair.'

'Then, sir,' I replied, 'you must give these two credit also.'

'Of course,' he said, 'they did their duty, sergeant. I have sent my grandson to catch that horse that bolted and threw its rider. Mind you, that's your horse.'

'Mine!'

'Yes, of course it is. Ah, here he comes! Now we will put you on it. If it were not that my wife is ill, I should take you up to the château; as it is, I will take you to one who rents some of my land—Monsieur Lonavet. —Jean,' he added to the lad, 'make a short cut to La Ferme des Tourelles and tell monsieur we are coming. If he is out, tell Mademoiselle Christine.'

I mounted the horse from the right side, and we all set off, the gentleman—he was General Count de Valacourt—talking volubly of what he had seen all the time.

The farm, with its four little towers, one at each corner, from which it took its name, was soon in sight, and entering under a finely carved archway, we found ourselves in a quadrangle. It was a quaint, huge building, and in the Middle Ages had probably had a moat round it.

'Well, M. Lonavet,' said the count to a tall, thin, handsome man between fifty and sixty, who came forward, followed by a shaggy sheep-dog, 'I have brought you a patriot whom I should have been proud to have myself as a guest in the ordinary way;' and he went on to eulogise me so much that I felt quite uncomfortable, especially as we were joined at that moment by one of the most beautiful girls I had ever seen in my life. 'Ah, mademoiselle,' he continued in a chaffing tone, 'here's a lad for you. He's worthy of your bright eyes. Holy Virgin! you should have seen him bring those devils down! It was the best day's work I have seen done for a long time.'

'Yes, monsieur,' said her father in a dubious voice; 'but it may be a very expensive one for both of us. The Germans will say they are francs-tireurs, and levy ten thousand francs or more on the district.'

'How can they say that, with their uniform?'

'Are those savages in the habit of sticking at lies? But have no fear—I will do my duty towards him, and through him to my country.'

'Yes; and I will send you down wine and grapes,' said the open-handed old noble. 'I will come myself to-morrow, and we shall get Dr Bonnat as soon as we can.'

It was not long before Christine, helped by her sister Julie, who was nearly as pretty as she was, got hot water, bandages, &c. As they took the boot off, the bullet rolled on to the floor. 'There!' laughed the girl, looking up, for she was on her knees, and I was admiring the thick black tresses, and the finely formed white neck; 'you had better keep that; it will bring you luck.'

'It has brought me that already by bringing me here.'

'Anyway, you deserve it,' said Julie

(Continued on page 363.)

IN NORTH GREENLAND.

UPERNIVIK, the most northerly of the Danish colonies on the west coast of Greenland, is situated somewhat farther north than the most northern point of Norway. Beyond it lies Melville Bay, the coasts of which are sheeted over with the 'inland ice' which here discharges into the sea. To the north of this huge sheet of ice-filled water the land forms a peninsula, the coasts of which are pierced by two great fjords, Wolstenholme Sound and Inglefield Gulf. This peninsula, which is in about the same latitude as Spitsbergen, and covers an area nearly as large as that of Denmark, is the home of the polar Eskimos, and swarms with Arctic life. Auks, gulls, terns, and eider ducks breed on the rocks and the low islands; the sea is full of walrus, beluga, seals, and narwhals; and the polar bear is a frequent visitor. In prehistoric times the coasts of north-west Greenland, Grant's Land, and Ellesmere Land were peopled by tribes of Eskimo; traces of their habitations are to be found in many places at the present day. Of this ancient people there now remains only a small community of some two hundred individuals at Cape York, the most northern place of human residence on the earth. Cut off on all sides from the outer world, they lost not only connection therewith, but all direct knowledge thereof. The coasts of Wolstenholme Sound, of Inglefield Gulf, and of Ellesmere Land, the cliffs in the northern part of Melville Bay, and the icebergs of the Arctic Sea constituted their horizon; and what lay beyond interested them but little. Within this circumscribed area the polar Eskimos lived a life similar to that of the Stone Age. When John Ross discovered them in 1818, he found in use among these 'Arctic Highlanders' rough knives of meteoric iron with bone handles. The iron, it appeared later, they obtained from an aerolite in the neighbourhood of Cape York. In 1894 Peary found this aerolite with the assistance of one Eskimo, and two years later conveyed it to America.

In 1860 the tribe received an unexpected addition to their number in the form of fourteen strange Eskimos from the Baffin Bay region, who taught them, amongst other things, the use of the bow and arrow, how to hunt reindeer and catch salmon, and kayak-making.

During the period 1891–1909 Peary made seven expeditions to these regions, and an entire change was effected in the life of the polar Eskimos, inasmuch as they continued to receive plentiful supplies of modern weapons and of fishing-gear. For them at last the Stone Age had come to an end. But at the same time they lost, in a measure, their former unlimited freedom, as in the course of a few years they became dependent on European and American products. The Danish traveller Knud Rasmussen, who, with Mylius-Erichsen, passed the winter of 1903–4 among them, saw the danger which threatened their existence; and after paying another visit to these parts in 1907–8, and forming the mission station Nordstjernen at Cape York in 1909, he founded the station of Thule on Wolstenholme Sound. The object of the latter—which was managed by Peter Freuchen, for many years Knud Rasmussen's travelling companion—was to supply the Eskimos with weapons and provisions, and to assist or initiate scientific exploration.

In 1912 the first Thule expedition, which consisted of Rasmussen, Freuchen, and two Eskimos, was despatched for the purpose of investigating and charting the region round the so-called Peary Channel. It was carried out with wonderful speed and energy, and exceptionally valuable scientific results were obtained. Amongst these was the discovery of traces of former Eskimo dwellings on Independence Fjord, a huge inlet, and not a channel, as was previously supposed, which runs westwards between Peary Land and Mylius-Erichsen's Land. This discovery, which affects one of the most interesting questions connected with Arctic exploration, that of the Eskimo migrations, rendered desirable an examination of the great north-west Greenland fjords, and was the main cause of the second Thule expedition, news regarding the carrying out of which in 1917 was first brought to Copenhagen in May 1918—communication between north Greenland and the outer world being impossible during the winter months.

It was originally intended that this expedition should be despatched in 1916, but on his way from Denmark in the spring of that year Knud Rasmussen met with so many delays that he did not reach Thule until the 16th of June. With his usual energy, however, he determined to make the attempt. Between fifteen and twenty sleighs and over two hundred dogs were got together, and everything was ready for a start, when a heavy gale and snowstorm set in. This weather lasted for nearly a fortnight, and the season being then too far advanced, the journey had to be given up for that year.

The summer, however, was utilised in another fashion, and amongst the results obtained was a topographic map of the three-hundred-mile-long coast of Melville Bay, between Holms Island and Cape York. A complete investigation, too, was made of the remains of the old Eskimo habitations—some fifty in number—in that region; but so greatly was this work interfered with by snow and ice that the excavations had to be carried out with the help of warm water!

Before the winter of 1916–17 set in with full severity a large number of similar ruins between Cape York and Etah (a considerable distance to the north of Thule) were also visited, and an exhaustive report upon them and their adjuncts has been brought home.

In 1917 the main expedition to the great fjords of north-west Greenland was at length undertaken. The following is a summarised account thereof as furnished by the leader, Knud Rasmussen, on his return to Copenhagen last May, together with the geologist Lange Koch and the polar Eskimo, Ajago. The expedition was conducted in Eskimo fashion; that is to say, the members and their four-footed companions were dependent to a great extent for food on the wild animals shot on the way.

A start was effected on 6th April 1917 with six sleighs and seventy-two dogs, and it was soon discovered that the areas previously supposed to be land were in reality portions of the inland ice. The musk oxen, therefore, which had been reckoned upon did not exist. In about a month Sherard Osborn Fjord was reached; and in May, June, and July the charting of the great inlets was carried out. The work was attended by much suffering and privation, the men being frequently for many hours together up to their knees in ice-cold water, while all the time famine was following closely upon their heels. The farthest point reached was to the north of De Long Fjord. Only at a few places were musk oxen fallen in with, and those shot, when stripped of their thick coats, were found to be so thin that they proved quite insufficient for the requirements of the party. A large number of the dogs had, therefore, to be sacrificed.

Up to the middle of June progress was rendered very difficult by the deep snow, and ere long there remained only thirteen dogs—all in a very exhausted condition. These also would have had to be killed, but some seal were fortunately found, and the situation was saved for the time being.

Not until the first week in July did the snow begin to melt, and then the thaw set in with such completeness that travelling became more difficult than ever. In order to keep the collections of specimens, botanical and otherwise, above the water, scaffoldings of ski had to be made on the top of the sleighs. At one place there were a great many seal, but, to the bitter disappointment of the party, all those shot sank to the bottom at once. On 1st July the first fatality occurred. When out shooting hares, the Eskimo, Hendrik Olsen, disappeared, and his body was never recovered, in spite of diligent search. Dr Wulff, the Swedish botanist, and Koch were the last who spoke with him, and he was then very tired and sleepy. One of the theories as to the cause of his death—which, of course, had a most depressing effect upon his comrades—was that wolves, of which there were a good many in the neighbourhood, had attacked him when asleep, and devoured him.

After some twelve days in camp, during which the weather was extremely bad, and no animals or birds of any kind were shot, the return journey of about two hundred and seventy miles from St George's Fjord across the inland ice was commenced on 5th August. On the 21st the last scraps of food were eaten, and of the dogs there remained only five. It rained incessantly, all the streams were in flood, and the nights were very cold. On the 24th snow-free land was reached at Cape Agassiz, roughly one hundred and forty miles to the north of Etah, all being then in a state of extreme exhaustion, and hardly able to stand upright. That day the last dog was eaten; and as Dr Wulff's state had become extremely serious, it was determined that Rasmussen and Ajago should proceed with all speed to Etah and fetch assistance, whilst the others made their way by easy stages to a large lake known to the Eskimos, shooting whatever they came across. 'On the 25th,' said Rasmussen, 'we started, and when we had covered nearly one hundred miles we fell in with a reindeer-hunter, who helped us; on the 30th we reached Etah, and immediately despatched six sleighs with an abundant supply of provisions. Unfortunately they reached our comrades too late to save Dr Wulff. We got to Etah literally with our last remnants of strength; for the preceding seventy hours we had been incessantly at work.

'Soon after we left them our companions had some success in hunting, and travelled slowly forward at the rate of five or six kilometres a day; but the hardships of the journey had told severely on Dr Wulff, and he became weaker and weaker. On the inland ice he had shown himself to be a good walker, but constant wading in the ice-cold water had affected him very badly; moreover, he could not retain any food. Several times he expressed a wish to give up the struggle, but Koch and the Eskimos did their best to encourage him and keep him going.' Then, on the 29th of August, a foggy day, after an unsuccessful hunt, came the end, which was an eminently sad one. The poor fellow urged his companions to leave him to die in peace, in order to save their own lives and the results of the expedition; and, melancholy to relate, this had to be done—there was no alternative. Exhausted, starving, and with their clothes in rags, the others struggled on, and on 4th September they met the relief sleighs from Etah.

Two parties were sent to search for Dr Wulff. One of these, for some reason which does not appear, had to return. The other found the place where he had been left, but failed to discover any trace of the body. His last letter to Rasmussen explains the position. It was to the following effect: 'The constant hunger and fatigues of the summer, and the almost complete want of food of the last days, have now reduced my physical powers to such a degree that I am quite unable to follow Koch and the Eskimos any farther. As their being saved depends upon their reaching as quickly as possible a better hunting region, I should only be a hindrance to them. With perfect tranquillity of mind, therefore, I say farewell, and thank you for good comradeship on the expedition. I hope that you will save yourself and the results.' Dr Wulff also dictated a letter to his father and daughter, as also a statement with regard to the botanical observations made by him during the latter part of the journey.

Such is the story of the last Danish Arctic expedition; and although the hardships and the privations endured pretty nearly throughout it by the little party caused the death under tragic circumstances of two of its members, its main objects have been successfully carried out. The coast of north-west Greenland between 81° and 83° N. lat., including the great inlets St George's Fjord, Sherard Osborne Fjord, Nordenskiöld Inlet, and De Long Fjord, has been investigated and charted; and it has been proved that in their migration from the west to the east coast the Eskimos did not travel round the north of Greenland. No tent rings, fireplaces, or other traces of their presence were found there. Other considerable scientific results were also obtained, and valuable geological and botanical collections have been brought home.

THE SEARCHERS.

By JOHN FOSTER, Author of The Bright Eyes of Danger, &c.

CHAPTER XXII.

A FLASK was produced, and some brandy poured down the unconscious man's throat. He took so long to recover that I thought he was dead, but at last he opened his eyes and followed the movements of the men who were examining the room. There was little furnishing beyond the couch, a chair, and a deal table, on which were a dirty plate and a couple of empty fiascos. One corner of the room was curtained off. The inspector went behind the curtain, and in a minute or two flung it back and pointed exultantly at something.

'A good morning's work, after all! This explains the queer purring noise you heard during the night. It was from the dynamo of this neat little electrotyping-machine. This room has turned out Heaven knows how many "little pictures," most skilfully forged notes of two of the principal Italian banks. We have had more trouble over these fellows than any "crooks" I remember for years. We'll see what this chap has to say, but I wish we had arrived an hour sooner. I've missed the chance of my life.' He sighed. 'What a haul we might have had!'

Criminal or no, the man on the couch roused my pity. There was tragedy and hopelessness in his young eyes, and his face, despite its emaciation, showed remarkably clever lines. He began to tremble when the inspector went back to him.

'You will come to no harm,' said the officer reassuringly, and despatched one of the men for the nearest doctor.

The man shook his head. 'Nossignore,' he whispered with difficulty. 'Troppo tardi! Too late! A priest, per l'amore di Dio, but no doctor! Send for a priest. Quickly, I beg you.'

'But you will get better, never fear.' It was a kind lie, for the marks of death were on the poor wretch. 'You were afraid when we came in.'

'Madonna! Si! But save me from Guidotti. . . . È un diavolo. . . . You will protect me? You are English?'

The words were gasped out between dry sobs, and his thin hand caught mine convulsively.

'We are the police.'

A look of intense relief appeared on his face. 'I will tell you all—everything. I keep nothing back. I swear it by the Blessed Virgin. You wish to know about . . . il quadretti?' He nodded towards the printing plant in the corner of the room.

'Yes, yes,' said the inspector, sitting down beside him. '"The little pictures." I understand.'

'If I tell you everything—if I live a little longer—will you take me away from here—away from these men?'

Readily promised protection, he began his unhappy story. His broken English need not be reproduced. His voice was weak and his story was frequently interrupted by fits of coughing, but its main points were clear.

His name was Luigi Conti. He had been an engraver in Naples. His work was esteemed there, and he had received very good pay, and was happy until, as it chanced, he became interested in a development of Lessano's process for copper etching. At this he toiled day and night, scarcely giving himself time for meals.

His eyes failed him. The doctor ordered him to rest. He was in despair, but what could he do? Per Cristo! he had a wife and two little children. To be poor was bad, but to lose one's eyes—he could not face that. It was a long time before he was allowed to work for two hours a day. By that time his pockets were empty, and his employers, who had previously exploited his skill, refused to give him employment. Full of revenge, he went to the Camorra.

'You know the Camorra? It is all-powerful, and often does justice to the poor. The law and the police fear it, but I know now that the great ones to whom I went did not concern themselves about my employers. They were of the Camorra, it is true; but those who bribed me were I Frugatori—"The Searchers." It was I whom they wanted. They knew my skill in engraving, for I had told them my story, and they gave me money and the promise of more.'

Between his fits of breathlessness he unfolded his little tragedy: how the meshes gradually closed on him, and how in the end, after the promise of as much money for a month's work as he could make all his life at his craft, he joined 'The Searchers,' and helped them to make 'the little pictures.' The work would be light, a few hours a day, and it would not injure his eyes, so they assured him.

'I came—maledizione!—to London with them about six months ago. By night I was taken to this house, and I have not been out more than half-a-dozen times since. I did the finer work on the little pictures, and Domenico Fiatro, a printer, did the rest. Buon cuore . . . Domenico . . . a good heart . . . ma . . . a mechanic merely. At first I took a pride in the work—a pleasure in my skill—but soon I became very ill, and for a time could not rise. I made many thousands of the bank-notes, and they made much money out of them. Yet they made me work to the last moment.'

'Who are "they"? Describe them.'

'Guidotti and Benedetto are the leaders.'

'What are they like?'

'Benedetto was once a priest, but was unfrocked—un prete spretato; a great broad man, clean-shaven, and with a deep voice . . . profondissimo!'

My friend of the Naples train, beyond a doubt. I listened eagerly for his next words.

'Guidotti is the leader. Benedetto is afraid of him. He is tall and slight—è molto gran' signore—and has a pointed black beard, but sometimes he is clean-shaven. Then there are Berni and Nazzano, two men who could drive the car; and there was also Antonio Salvi. Poor Antonio! Guidotti is half an Englishman, but has lived in Italy a great deal. You know our saying—"Un Inglese italianizzato è il diavolo incarnato!" ("An Englishman Italianised is the Devil Incarnate!")? Then there was the Englishman Royce, he of the red hair. He was kind to me. Royce broke away from them, and soon afterwards Salvi also disappeared. Guidotti and Benedetto have been trying to hunt Royce down ever since, for he has something belonging to them, although I do not know what it is. They very nearly caught him in Edinburgh. It was well for him that they did not. They would have'—he shuddered, and told us of a nameless medieval torture—'they would have killed him by inches. At the time when they nearly captured Royce, they killed poor Antonio. He was found stabbed to death somewhere in Edinburgh.'

Tony and I exchanged looks. The red-haired impostor 'M'Nair,' the man whom I took into my rooms on the night of the fog, was none other than Royce, of 'The Searchers.' The murdered Italian whom I had seen in the police mortuary in Edinburgh had been his accomplice.

'If they come back here they will kill me too,' said Conti.

'The house is empty, and we shall leave the police in charge. Do you know where Benedetto and the others hide in London?' asked the inspector.

'Corpo di Cristo! I do not know, and I never did know, where 'The Searchers' hide. I have never been in any house in England except this. Early this morning Guidotti and Benedetto came down in a great hurry and looked at me. They stood in the passage and talked, and I heard Guidotti curse, and say that it would be better to finish me, as I was nearly dead already; but Benedetto would not agree. He is not cruel at heart, old Benedetto. In the end they came in and stamped out the fire, and told me that they were going away; that if I kept quiet I should not be discovered; and that they would come back for me. But I knew that I had not long to live, and that they had left me here to die. I managed to rise and put some faggots on the fire. But for that I should have died like a rat in a hole.'

'You spoke of "The Searchers."'

'Si! Si! "The Searchers" are very old—hundreds of years old. Long ago they began to search for something. For a long time they gave it up, but their oath is still to search for something lost; and although they joined the Camorra, they still keep the name of "The Searchers," and have their own rules, and a terrible punishment for any traditore.'

Conti was growing rapidly worse. Soon he was past speech, and the doctor arrived just in time to see the poor wretch die.

Two of the men were put in charge, and we motored back to London, confident that the gang would soon be tracked down. Keene-Leslie and I kept in constant touch with the police. Twice Scotland Yard thought it was on a hot scent, but in the end had to admit defeat. The gang had gone to ground.

I waited for ten days in London, and then returned to Edinburgh and the quiet of my quarters in Jura Street. But the roar of London sounded in my ears for days; more than once I dreamed of No. 9 Duff Avenue; and my eyes often scanned the crowds for the lithe figure of the leader of 'The Searchers,' and Benedetto, his competent lieutenant.

(Continued on page 359.)

INHERITED HABIT A FACTOR IN PLANT-LIFE.

THOUGH the awakening of earth to the call of spring has been a theme upon which artists and poets of all ages have loved to dwell, science has failed to penetrate the mystery which governs the return of activity to vegetable and animal life. True, it has told us that the quickening of vegetation at this season is due to the increasing violet in the actinic light of the sun; that it is these unseen rays which cause the sap to throb, the bud to unfold, the seed to move in the wintry earth. But is that always sufficient to account for the infinite diversity which we observe in these things? If it were indeed the motive force which we call the spring, one might suppose that the deciduous trees, the crusty old oaks and beeches, which have been planted along the Mediterranean would forget their Northern natures and begin to break into leaf when the first breath of spring touched the olives and flushed the almond with pink. But they remain, and have for generations remained, stolidly indifferent to so early an awakening. Things of habit, old-fashioned conservatives every one, they believe that 'the swallow knows her time of coming,' and deem it prudent to wait. And, to reverse the picture, what of those same almond-trees in this country? They have been grown here for over three hundred years, yet they still cling to their old custom and blossom at a season genial enough in their own land, but here so early that the fertility of the bloom is almost invariably destroyed by frost. Their relative, the apricot, will do the same thing. The reason why dessert pears, also natives of southern Europe, are so often unprofitable with us is that they still persist in blossoming at that time of year in which their ancestors blossomed. They, too, have not yet learned the lesson, and it is probable they never will. Creatures of habit, they obdurately remain faithful to their native traditions.

It is not spring sunshine which bids the Christmas rose open its white corolla to the gray skies of December. No threat of frost can retard the snowdrop; nor can we force it with artificial heat, or other contrivance, to depart from its natal season. It does not ask the sun; our real spring it hardly knows. But, in obedience to some mysterious influence within it, the little bulb awakens from its torpor when all the world is gray, and falls asleep with a complacent indifference to those violet rays just when they are beginning to become most potent. Our native holly sheds its leaves in spring, flowers in summer, and ripens its seed in winter. The ivy blossoms in November, and its harvest-time is March or April. Many another evergreen is equally unorthodox in habits, taking no notice whatsoever of the more conventional time-table.

Even more curious is the behaviour of certain aquatic things. Many water-lilies, for example, disappear to their muddy depths before the temperature of the water has fallen to winter level. Yet if you lift one of these roots in the very early year, long before there is a sign of spring in the country-side, you will find that it is already making fresh growth. Can it be that they have heard the far-off call of the season, and are preparing for their upward journey? This hardly seems a satisfactory explanation, for there are species which, even when growing in the uniformly heated water of a greenhouse, invariably die down in autumn and come up again in spring, whilst other plants in the same house will do precisely the reverse.

Hence it would seem that the alchemy of the returning sun is not enough to explain the manifestations of life as revealed by periods of rest and activity. If spring-time is, in its most general significance, the hour of nativity, the cradle of youth, it is also the season of life's lowest ebb. Heat, which is considered to be the generative influence in so many of the natural phenomena we see about us, has little to do with the awakening of vegetation in the earlier months, for the earth is usually colder just before the vernal equinox than at any other season. Indeed, it would appear that to many forms of life, some examples of which have been mentioned, a low temperature is essential not only to successful embryonic development, but to growth and to existence itself.

In the far North the vernal awakening is spontaneous and universal. The great miracle is unfolded before one's eyes, and, to the sound of groaning ice and rushing rivers, the dead white land in a few days becomes a garden of tender verdure. With no less suddenness does vegetation come to the burning face of certain deserts which border the tropics. That death-like silence which broods over the bondage of the snows is not more silent than that voiceless suffering which haunts the sad dominions of the sun.

But let the rain descend from that 'hot heaven' which sheds its 'iron pain on the empty land,' and in a few hours the tawny wilderness will be glad with the green tidings of life and promise. The response is immediate and unanimous. There is no room for doubt. Incredulity, if there be any, is swept into the joyous pageant which looks not back as it moves on into high summer.

But with us, in our latitudes, it is different. We lie between the Polar North and the Torrid Zone, and, like a half-way house, seem to have gathered about us a flora which might be comparable to a band of pilgrims on the road of Nature. Some of these wayfarers have stayed with us, adapted themselves to our conditions, and become naturalised. Others, remembering the habits of their ancestors, doggedly refuse to have anything to do with our seasons. Their ears, as we have seen, are deaf to the heralds of our springs. To a few the summers in which we rejoice are a winter of torpor. Thus many mosses and lichens, relics of a prehistoric age, shrink from the sun rather than rejoice in his strength. Our spring has no message for them, unless it be one of warning. Things of habit, they still seem to cherish a memory of their ancient, icy world. They shrink from our summer's warmth, come to activity in autumn, and are gladdened by the cold grip of winter. Hence it is that they are never so prosperous, never so happy, as when they are facing their motherland, the Frozen North.

In the crypts of the mountains and on the face of the plain are preserved memories of ages which have vanished. On the ice-worn rocks the banished winter left imprinted a map of his retreat before the arrows of the sun; and we can read in these things a wonderful tale of the evolution of life on this planet. Then can we not also read in the manifold revelations of plant habit to-day some broken sentences of that same story, and, by piecing these together, cast a little light upon the mysteries which the seasons bring? Cannot the secret of the snowdrop's faith, the meaning of the water-lily's ways, and the lichen's ancient story be interpreted by a closer application of geology and climatical history to the problems of life as they appear to us in these days?

JOHN BROWN.

CONFESSIONS OF A NEW ARMY CADET.

By R. W. CAMPBELL, Author of Private Spud Tamson; Dorothy, V.A.D.; Snooker Tam; &c.

CHAPTER XVII.—STEADY OLD ADELA.

'LEAVE, boys; leave!' shouted Beefy one night, rushing in with battalion orders in his hand.

'When is it?' Ginger asked.

'Next week.'

'How long do we get, Beefy?' I inquired.

'Four days, my boys—four priceless days of priceless fun. Cheero!' he concluded, throwing his cap in the air.

This was excellent news. Leave is our greatest joy in the army. At once we commenced to plan out days of fun and nights of glory. All were rather secret about their arrangements. They were scheming out time-tables in which not one lady but many were involved. Nobby, however, confided to me that he was going off to see rather a pretty widow. She was good fun and had lots of brass. (Nobby was after the brass.) Beefy whispered that he had a wonderful woman in Cambridge, and another in Bath. He was going to see both. Tosher, thoroughly practical, decided to investigate the claims of Scottish girls, and see whether a Scottish wife would be a sound investment for his dollars and his affections. Even Billy, the padre, was after a girl—a V.A.D. commandant, slightly over the popular age, but 'a fine woman—a fine woman,' as Billy confidentially remarked. Ginger announced that he was going to have a quiet holiday at the Sweetville Hotel. I said nothing, but thought of—the barmaid.

My own arrangements were not decided. Like that of every soldier, my visiting list was rather heavy, and in my address-book were many names of pre-war charmers and war charmers. To see them all was quite impossible. Four days did not allow of that. Like a sub-editor, I had to 'cut down,' and eventually arrived at a very brief, yet interesting, programme. Having learnt something about organisation at the school, I knew how essential it was that there should be no hitch. So I sent off the following telegrams:

'Mrs Brown, Rustic Manor, Berks.—Getting short leave, but want to go to London to see tailors. Hope you don't mind.—JOHN.'

'Miss Charming, Cheer-'em-up Revue, Tiddlewinks Theatre, London.—Getting leave. See you Thursday. Will arrange joy-ride and supper at Ciro's. Wire if all right.—JOHN.'

'Miss Plunger, Rowdeene, Brighton.—Getting leave. What about a taxi-ride to Town and seeing the shows? Let me know.—JOHN.'

'Madame Petite, Bright Villa, Hampstead.—Calling Saturday. Hope Jeanne is at home.—JOHN.'

'Miss Sprightly, Manor House, Sleepville.—Getting leave. Come up to Town on Sunday. Bring closed car. Cheero!—JOHN.'

'Adela Gordon, The Grange, Sweetville.—Getting leave, but want go home to see mater, also tailor, on important business.—JOHN.'

The Replies.

'John Brown.—It's all right, dear boy. Love.—MOTHER.'

'John Brown.—Sorry, old boy, can't be done. Am running a staff-captain just now.—CHARMING.'

'John Brown.—Have joined the W.A.A.C.'s. Must be in bed by nine. Almost engaged to flying-man. Sorry.—PLUNGER.'

'John Brown.—Regret not at home Saturday. Jeanne now in a convent.—PETITE.'

'John Brown.—Quite impossible. Recently married army chaplain.—NO LONGER SPRIGHTLY.'

'John Brown.—Terribly disappointed. Longing to see you. Never mind the tailor. Do try and come. Love.—ADELA.'

These replies came in one by one, and each was like a BOMB. Truly, the war had upset things, and khaki provided a terrific opposition. I was mad, I may tell you. Like the others, I had invested in a first-class sleeping-berth on the London express, and had arranged for a royal luncheon with the boys en route. Now the whole scheme had fizzled out. Of course, I could have gone to see the dear old mater, but as I had told her such a 'whopper,' that would have been rather embarrassing. Wasn't it rotten bad luck? Molly Charming running a staff-captain; Phyllis Plunger in the W.A.A.C.'s.; Jeanne, of wonderful memory, in a convent; and Gladys Sprightly actually linked to an army chaplain. I did feel offended. Of course, there was Adela—steady old Adela. She was only five miles away, and she was dying to see me. But I didn't want to go, for the very plain reason that she wanted me to come. Whether you agree or not, that is the attitude of the average man. When the Blue Bird of Happiness is in his hand, he does not want it. His eyes look away and afar. Man always desires to chase the unknown, to court the uncertain, and fritter away his time and his manhood pursuing the bubbles and the maddening mirage.

'You look glum, John,' remarked Beefy that night.

'Yes. My scheme has fizzled out.'

'You're a silly ass.'

'Why?'

'Hang it all! you wire women, asking to see them. That isn't the plan. You don't understand the dear girls.'

'Well, old Bluebeard, what would you do?'

'I simply wire: "Coming to see you. Meet me at So-and-so—certain." That's all! They turn up all right. It's an order. Women love to be ordered about. When you start to say "please," they think you're a bally old fool. I'm getting fed up trying to educate you,' concluded Beefy, going off.

On this subject Beefy was an authority.

However, I decided to go and see Adela. When all the boys had left I jumped on my bike, and in a short time was sitting in the lovely old garden. It was a charming day. High in the heavens the sun shone gloriously. The earth was a panorama of pastoral beauty, and above The Grange garden birds and bees went blithely on their way. Everything was restful. Everything seemed clean. And I thought it a much better atmosphere than the fug of a London lounge or the sooty surroundings of Oxford Street. And yet there was a longing for the lights that glitter and the women who understand. I was only a boy, and just human. My virtues and vices were not entirely formed. One day I could with ease have become a parson. Next, I wanted—'to risk it.' Heredity tells. I had the blood of parsons, soldiers, and dreamers in my veins. In my soul God and the Devil were always struggling for victory. I was the mere tool of moods and passions which had been handed on.

We are all like that.

Then I looked at Adela. She was reclining in an Oriental hammock reading a book, and between-times picking up a chocolate. She looked calm and restful, without nerves, and with a suggestion of decision in her pose. Adela was not so fetching as a ballet-girl, or so charming as one of those creatures of Mayfair. London women are very hard to beat in the little things which captivate and enthral. Their experience is gained in a cosmopolitan world. They talk with the intellectuals and dance with the fools. And they can charm both.

Adela was of the soil, the fresh, clean-smelling earth, which breeds health and strength, and few illusions. She had no tricks, no little bag with a puff for her nose, no dainty fads or frills to enhance her complexion or form. Plain skirt, plain blouse, neat stockings, and well-cut shoes. And yet she was well dressed. The girl of taste is not a bag of glad rags. But the real charm of Adela lay in her magnificent physique, and in her personality.

Adela was different.

No man can define a woman's personality. It is as baffling as it is alluring. And what I wondered about was this: Adela knew me, yet I didn't know Adela. A man is an open book even to a schoolgirl. She can find him out in ten minutes, but you will never find a girl out in a thousand years. A man hates this. It is rather an insult to his intellect, but it is a woman's secret and her strength. She knows it, and she uses it, sometimes in a very cruel way, as history proves. Still, it is a gift of nature with which Providence has endowed the sex which for centuries has been in chain

Adela was young. Yet she was 'old.'

'Johnnie,' she said, putting down her book and looking at me, 'why didn't you go to the tailor?'

I had been waiting for that question, so promptly pulled the telegrams out of my pocket, and said, 'That's why,' as I put them in her hand. It was a brutal thing to do, but it was a fair thing. The dons had always insisted on my speaking the truth. Not a bad rule, but quite a rotten scheme with the average girl.

Insincerity has always been popular.

Her brows contracted as she read each reply, and I noted her breast heaving with suspense. She read them over about a dozen times, then, folding them up, handed them back with the remark, 'I thought so!'

'Why did you?'

'You are all the same.'

'But aren't girls good at the game?'

'Yes—some are. Others are different—at least, a few are.'

'You are posing, Adela.'

'No, Johnnie! I like you, but I can do without you. I haven't much admiration for that sort of thing.'

'If I hadn't shown them to you, you wouldn't have known.'

'Oh yes, I should. I know you. You are quite a nice boy, but, like all nice boys, you've been spoiled. Girls have thrown themselves at you, and you think you may go on like that to the end of the chapter. Nevertheless, I'm rather interested in you.'

'But, Adela, if, as you say, you expected this, why were you so pressing in your invitation? Why did you want to be "one of the crowd"?'

'The maternal instinct.'

'But you are competing with them.'

'Not at all, old boy; I'm doing salvage-work. I'm giving you a breath of fresh air in this beautiful garden, then afternoon tea; next, a game of golf; in the evening a stroll over the Downs, with just a kiss or two, without messing you up with rouge or powder. If, after that, you feel you want the dolls of Bond Street, you must go; for then I'll know you're a decadent, hopelessly neurotic, and bound to end up—a fool.'

'Where did you learn all this, Adela?' I said, getting interested.

'It's an instinct, and, of course, I use my eyes. We girls have been to school, you know.'

'The war has made you think, I suppose?'

'The war, Johnnie, is messing things up. Women are making themselves cheap. They mean well. They want the boys to have a good time, but both are getting burnt in the process. You have learnt too much in France.'

'But we knew these things before the war, Adela.'

'The war, Johnnie, has made them fashionable—that's the difference. Shell-fire makes you boys neurotic. Your nerves want soothing. But you all go the wrong way about it. It's fresh air and porridge you need, not giggling Jennies, who degrade your manhood.'

'But, hang it all, Adela! if we're beating a brute like the Boche, we can't be hopelessly decadent. You read things in the papers. You've got too much time to think. If you saw the soul of the army, you'd know we are at least "not bad."'

'Perhaps. But why don't you all stick to your games?'

'We try, but you women upset the balance. All the trouble in this world is due either to wine or to women. You're sent to try us, and sometimes you smash us. Despite that, Adela, you are all very charming. And, to be short, if you hadn't been decent, I shouldn't have come to-day. Let's have tea.'

'Right, you old darling,' she whispered into my ear as she tumbled out of the hammock. Then she set out a dainty table, the maid brought the tea, and, under the arms of some old, waving chestnut-trees, we munched a refreshing snack. We didn't talk much. I was enjoying the scenery, and the presence of Adela; while Her Royal Highness was no doubt wondering what extraordinary creatures we fellows are.

'Now, Johnnie, I think we'll cut the golf, and go over the Downs instead.'

'Any old thing for a quiet life,' I said, rising.

She got her stick, called her favourite dogs, and away we went across the sweet-smelling fields, where the bees hummed in the clover, and the larks sang high overhead. The air was stimulating, the surrounding country beautiful, while the presence of Adela added the final touch to a rustic dream. It was sporting. It was healthy. It was clean. The spirit of romance was there, and the poetic side of my nature was roused to its heights. I certainly did feel that the green vales of the Old Land and the real girls of the Old Land were indeed our best possessions. Somehow the whole thing appeared to me as a sort of moral lesson, as well as a silent sermon on patriotism.

I became more proud of my country.

I felt decent with Adela.

And so we ambled along, drinking in the joys of nature, and chatting of many things. It wasn't the smart talk of Mayfair, in which I was an expert. It was just straight, frank, none-of-your-nonsense kind of converse, in which we looked at things with our eyes, and not through rose-coloured glasses. And you can talk about many things, once barred, without loss of self-respect. After all, education has spread. And if education can bring a man and a woman together on an equal plane, our country must benefit. A man wants a girl for a chum, a confidante, a lifelong companion, and not as a serf, a housekeeper, and just—A COOK.

Yes, that was a memorable day in my life, and it was near the turning-point. The school, with all its deficiencies, was making its mark; while Adela was working hard, although I didn't notice it at the time. From the dear old commandant, too, I had gained the spirit of tolerance and the milk of human kindness. Captain Cheerall had also stirred me to probe and analyse the human soul; while my comrades had given me the joys of friendship and the value of understanding.

John Brown was beginning to be—A MAN.

After the walk we had dinner with the family. The mother was a delightful old lady, full of good-nature and shrewd common-sense. The father was equally pleasant; but Winnie, the sister, was down in the depths. She was thinking of Beefy—dear, kind-hearted, devil-may-care old Beefy.

Women always love the daring Don Juans.

'Let me help you,' said Adela, as I took my coat from the stand about half-past ten.

'Thanks, old girl.'

She lifted it on, then took my arm down the drive. When we got to the gate, she remarked, Johnnie, I want you to do something.'

'What, Adela?'

'Give me those telegrams.

'With pleasure,' I said, handing them over. 'But what are you going to do with them?'

'Burn them,' she answered, striking a match and lighting them there and then. As the last telegram flickered out she kissed me good-night and said, 'Do try and be a sensible boy, John Brown.'

Next day I bought the engagement-ring.

(Continued on page 378.)

THE LAND OF CURIOUS SMELLS.

IT has been said with a considerable amount of truth that what is fragrance to one person is often abomination to another. Human tastes differ in regard to food. What is esteemed by the whole population in one country is often thought disagreeable or repulsive in another. It is largely a question of habit and bringing up. Occasionally we find individual exceptions to a general rule. Probably none of our readers has ever met with any person who did not appreciate the smell of a rose. Yet it is recorded that Cardinal Oliviero Caraffa, who died at Rome in 1511 at the good old age of eighty-one, had an invincible repugnance to the smell of a rose, and would not remain in any room where one was kept. Just as there are certain odours which the majority of people enjoy, so there are certain smells which most people dislike.

Of bad smells some are produced naturally, whilst others can be brought about artificially. It is not of fetid and dangerous concocted smells (such as German chemists fiendishly introduced into modern warfare) that we propose to treat in this article, but of purely natural stenches. Burma, a land in which smells abound, grows a large number of trees and plants unknown in the rest of the Indian Empire (although some parts of India have a very similar climate), which in many cases yield fruit objectionable in taste and smell to Europeans, yet highly appreciated by Burmans.

First and foremost is the durian, which is largely cultivated in Sumatra, Java, Celebes, the Philippines, the Malay Peninsula, Burma, and Siam. Alfred Russell Wallace says it is worth a trip to the East merely to eat the durian, and in the 'sixties such a trip was not the easy matter it has since become, for then there was no overland route, and to go East one had to voyage round the Cape of Good Hope. Wallace describes the durian as tasting like an almond-flavoured custard, intermingled with wafts of cream-cheese, onion-sauce, sherry, and other incongruities. The smell of the durian when not fresh has been compared to that of rotten onions or putrid animal matter. If one is brought into a room the whole house will smell of it for many hours afterwards, and anybody who has partaken of it can be recognised at once as having done so if he goes to another house. The tree is a very handsome one, attaining a height of seventy to eighty feet, and by some is said to bear a resemblance to the elm. The fruit is spherical, about the size of a coco-nut, and has a hard external shell with strong tubercles terminating in sharp points. Durians will not grow north of Tenasserim in Burma, and even there do not thrive well if planted at any great distance from the sea. The durian is, however, only one of numerous curiously smelling productions of Burma which will not grow in India. There is, besides, the danien fruit, a species of nut, of which the Burmese are immoderately fond, and to which they attribute marked digestive and medicinal qualities. To Europeans it smells even more offensively, and longer, than the durian. A person who has eaten danien at dinner can be distinguished from others wherever he goes for at least forty-eight hours afterwards; and the stalls in the markets where it is sold can be smelt at a distance of at least fifty feet. To be as popular as it is this peculiar fruit must surely possess some of the digestive properties claimed for it. Why it should not grow in India we have never heard explained. Then there is the ywéyo, another Burma-grown fruit with an objectionable smell, which is highly valued as medicine for most women's complaints. We have heard that it grows in Java, though not in India. It is as a rule used only for medicinal purposes, and not, like the other two, as a habitual and agreeable food.

Garlic and onions are more popular in Spain and Italy than in more northern countries. There they form the relishes of common, everyday life. Burmans would seem to require more powerful condiments, and though they use both onions and garlic as food, they also partake of asafœtida, which possesses an odour somewhat similar to garlic, but stronger, more fetid, and generally more disagreeable to European noses. It would seem as if there were a sort of human instinct guiding national tastes blindly to plants and substances capable of yielding to the body similar chemical compounds. Garlic-smelling compounds are extensively diffused throughout the vegetable kingdom of the whole world, supplying in a greater or less degree the peculiar taste for those compounds of sulphur and allyl which universally prevails amongst mankind.

Offensive smells from decaying matter or the decomposition of animal and vegetable substances exist in all countries—in some worse than in others. Burma has the 'odorous' distinction of growing plants which stink naturally to a greater extent than most other localities can boast, and may, therefore, be truly described as a land of curious smells.

A BAPTISM OF FIRE.

TO say that the events of New Year's Day, 1905, have been burned into the memories of myself and my children is no mere figure of speech. The bush-fires in New South Wales which marked the beginning of the year 1905 will certainly never be forgotten by those who were unfortunate enough to experience their effects.

Wishing to avoid, so far as possible, the great heat which usually prevails in Sydney about Christmas, we had rented a summer residence near Bowral, a health-resort about eighty miles from the city, on the Southern Line.

The house we had taken was some distance from the village, and stood alone, upon an eminence overlooking the picturesque valley of the Wingecaribee, which, when I first saw it in the early spring, was, though narrow, a beautiful stream winding away between forest walls of eucalypti. Consequently I was somewhat disappointed, on taking possession of Mark Lodge, to find that, as is usual with Australian rivers in summer, it had shrunk to a mere sandy bed containing a rather widely separated succession of water-holes.

Mark Lodge was a roomy, old-fashioned place, built long ago by some Sydney magnate, but now advertised as 'To be let furnished for the season.' It was of wood, with wide, shady verandas, and was surrounded by a large, unkempt garden, the lower end merging into an orchard, in which, to the great delight of the children, were to be found a few plums, pears, &c. The abundant spring rains coming after the late terrible drought had produced a considerable amount of herbage, which was in a very dry condition. In front of the house was what the owner called a lawn. But a lawn in Australia is very different from the close, smooth, emerald turf of England; it is much more like a stubble-field. This lawn and the orchard were knee-deep in withered grass. All around us stretched the forest, clothing the surrounding hills with various kinds of eucalypti, giant white-stemmed gums—their last year's bark still hanging in long, dry strips from trunk and branches—green bosky apple-trees, and blue peppermints.

The foliage of the gums differs greatly from that of the trees of Europe, being hard and leathery, and during hot weather highly inflammable.

We settled in our new abode just before Christmas. The weather was delightfully cool, and the children, though a little afraid of snakes, roamed gaily through the bush, the only drawback being the sharp-pointed grass-seeds, which, attaching themselves to our stockings and clothes, were a great source of discomfort.

My husband, who had arranged to spend part of the holidays with a bachelor friend who was managing a station in Riverina, left us on 27th December—a Tuesday. Our household then consisted of myself, four children (the youngest a baby under two years old), a housemaid, and our dear old Chinaman cook, Ah Sin.

Ah Sin had come to us sixteen years before, when our home was on a Queensland station, and was a most attached and faithful servant. Like most of the Chinese, he was very fond of children, and in the exigencies of domestic service in Australia had often acted as nurse. Once only had he left us for a twelve months' trip to China, his place during his absence being occupied by a friend and countryman of his own, whom he had carefully trained in the performance of his duties for three weeks beforehand. Jemmy did well, but we all regretted Ah Sin; and when, contrary to our expectations (for we had serious misgivings as to ever seeing him again), Ah Sin returned, loaded with Chinese 'pleasants'—silk, fans, queer ivory images, and tea of exquisite flavour—we rejoiced greatly.

The early part of Christmas week passed pleasantly enough, but Friday was extremely hot. On Saturday the thermometer in the hall, at 8 A.M., marked ninety-four degrees, and rose steadily, till at four in the afternoon it recorded one hundred and five degrees. The morning paper, which was brought to us from Bowral by a lad on horseback, contained an announcement by the Government meteorologist of a great heat-wave which was passing over New South Wales, while bush-fires were reported in various parts of the state. Night brought little or no relief—the heated air never seemed to cool; and by noon on Sunday, New Year's Day, the temperature inside the house had risen to one hundred and ten degrees. The atmosphere was thick and stifling; while a coppery haze, through which the sun shone like a great fiery ball, shut out the hills and the intervening landscape. The wind blew in hot blasts as if from a furnace, bringing with it a suffocating odour of burning bush. Loud cracks came from the furniture; the flies, usually so troublesome, dropped dead from the ceiling; magpies, soldier-birds, and quail, tame and gasping, took refuge in the veranda, and even in the hall, from the excessive heat outside. Panting and exhausted, the girls and I lay upon the drawing-room floor, the little ones meantime splashing about in the bath, though the water, drawn from an iron tank, was unpleasantly warm. In the hall, suspended between the two doors, was a large canvas water-bag, whose contents, owing to the rapid evaporation, were deliciously cool, and in some degree alleviated our sufferings.

Ah Sin had prepared lunch as usual, but, except for a little tinned fruit, no one was inclined to eat anything.

The wind by this time had risen to a gale, and borne upon its wings came a strange, roaring sound, mingled with the bellowing of cattle. Presently the Chinaman called us to see a hare, the fur partly burned from its back, which had run into the kitchen. 'Flier welly nea now, lady—too muchee glass. Wet bag good—plenty bucket. Come see.' Following him into the back-veranda, I found that he had collected and filled a number of kerosene-tins and pails, while soaking in a tub were several bags. On returning through the hall I stood for a moment at the front-door, and saw below us, at the distance of about a mile, a huge wall of fire coming roaring on, the flames leaping higher than the tallest gum-trees—literally flying along in the air. As it swept along the hillside, first one great eucalyptus, then another, caught and blazed; while fiery pieces of burning bark, leaves, and branches, borne ahead by the gale, ignited the long grass far in front of the main fire. In a few minutes the conflagration was close to the house. The heat, the noise, and the smoke were most awful. A piece of burning bark carried from a blazing tree about two hundred yards off set alight the grass in the yard. We all ran with wet bags to try to beat it out, when we saw smoke issuing from the top of the veranda, followed by a flickering tongue of flame. Then suddenly a kind of fiery whirlwind sprang up round the place, obliging us to fly for our lives. I snatched up my baby, protecting him as well as I could with the wet bag I held. Ah Sin carried Freddy (four), who, like baby, was naked from the bath, seized a bucket, and calling to us to follow, started down the hillside for a water-hole in the creek. The grass on all sides of us was alight, but the wind having momentarily lulled, we got ahead of the fire. Urged by Ah Sin, we took a short cut through a paddock, though in order to do so we had to get over a barbed-wire fence, while a similar barrier intervened between us and the creek. The wind now blew in hurricane gusts behind us, driving forward huge volumes of smoke. Blinded and half-suffocated, we hurried on, scrambled over the last fence as best we could, and, torn and bleeding, rushed down the bank and over the hot mud into the water. The wind veered for a moment, blowing the smoke on one side, and showed us our now blazing home, and, to my intense horror, my little daughter Mary, a child of nine, hanging, caught by her frock, in the wire fence, close to a blazing eucalyptus. Never shall I forget the agony of that moment. I thrust baby into the arms of our maid and strove to get back to Mary, but my feet stuck in the surface-baked mud, and I fell heavily forward. As I rose again I saw the frock give way and the child rush down the bank. The water-hole in which we were, though large, was not very deep, and the water was really hot. The place was surrounded by eucalypti, some in leaf, others merely dry ring-barked skeletons. The heat was so intense that the very air seemed fire. Fortunately both Alice and I had retained our bags, and with them we sheltered ourselves a little, while Ah Sin threw buckets of water over us. Crouching down in the shallow water with the two little ones in front of him, the devoted Ah Sin screened them with his body from the furnace blasts and fiery showers. His shirt had been burnt from his back, and I saw the blistered flesh.

Near us quantities of fish, after churning and splashing in the water, died from the heat and floated belly upwards. On every side, through the maddening roar of the fire, we could hear the bleating of sheep and the bellowing of cattle; while two hares, a rabbit, and several snakes took refuge in the water beside us. Night drew on, but there seemed no diminution in the fierce heat. The whirlwind gusts appeared to have spent themselves, but on all sides blazed the fire. As the night wore on the scene became one of terrible grandeur. Under the influence of the high wind, the scattered fires on the hillsides joined their forces into great crescents of flame, with columns of moving lurid smoke-clouds, through which at intervals shot rocket showers of sparks, like a great display of fireworks, as some forest giant, burnt through at the base, came crashing down. In huge tiger leaps, from tree-top to tree-top, sprang the flames, their crackling sounding almost like demon laughter. The undulating country all round looked like a sea of fire, and little Freddy, clinging beside me, said in an awe-struck tone, 'Mummy, has God set all the earth alight?'

The red glare of the fire falling upon the pool showed me the ghastly faces of the children and the faithful Chinaman as they crouched in the shallow water. Ah Sin held baby in his arms, and kept bathing his head. The child was very quiet, only occasionally uttering a little, weak cry.

By this time the grass fire had passed us. We got out of the water and sat down upon the sand in the bed of the creek, on each side of which the scrub and the eucalypti were still burning; while the blackened grass merely smouldered, now and then bursting into flame as a fiercer blast played upon it.

Blackened and blinded by smoke, exhausted by heat and want of food, our skin smarting from the burns inflicted by the falling showers of fire, when morning came we were in a pitiable condition. Ah Sin was evidently badly burnt; his kindly yellow face was swollen and unrecognisable, yet he continued to hold and tend baby. The road was not far off, but to reach it we should have to pass over the smouldering paddock we had crossed in our mad rush for the creek, and all the children, with the exception of Mary, were barefoot. Trees were falling and crackling all round; the road was a mere bush-track, and would be more dangerous than the river-bed. A little lower down on the opposite side some scorched willows which had partially escaped the fire overhung another water-hole, to which we made our way, to find it already occupied by some half-burned sheep, whose cries of pain, half-moan, half-bleat, were an aggravation to our misery. The weary day wore on. Though the fire was in great measure spent, the heat was almost insufferable, and the air was heavy with smoke and the pungent scent of the burning eucalypti. I thought of trying to making our way along the river-bed to Bowral, and we had actually started, when the sudden fall of a large burnt tree, which rolled down the bank close beside us, drove us back to the shelter of the willows. Here we lay, faint and gasping, until about noon, when we were discovered by a posse of men, who, armed with wet bags, had been fighting the fire all night round some of the neighbouring farms. Mark Lodge, they told us, had been entirely consumed, and it was feared we had all perished. Willing hands carried the poor children and assisted us to reach a house in the neighbourhood, which, though right in the track of the flames, had been spared through a capricious change of the wind. Here we received the kindest care and attention, and in a few days we were able to go back to our city home. Ah Sin, after a few days in hospital, returned to us, and we all felt that to his devotion we owed our escape from a terrible death.

THE THREEPENNY-BIT.

WE'VE a funny name—Penny! When I was quite wee
Daddy says we were 'He, She, and It!'
And the three of us make—now you never will guess!—
Why, a real, live Threepenny-bit!
And my pet-name is Tuppenny! Isn't it queer?
But it shows what a lot I am worth!
Daddy oftentimes says, when he kisses me hard,
I'm the sweetest wee thing on this earth.
But he says just the same when he kisses mum hard!
We spend lots of time kissing, each day—
Daddy says it's 'some job' making up for lost time,
After being such ages away!
He was pris'ner in Germany more than four years,
But at last they have let him go free.
Oh, it's lovely to have him safe home once again;
We're as happy as happy can be!
He's the same darling dad, yet he's not just the same,
He's so thin, and his face is all lines.
Once I heard him tell mum it was 'hell upon earth'
In those terrible Germany mines!
Then he walks with a limp—you would think he was lame!
It looks worse when he's trying to run;
But I asked him what made him go hobbling like that,
And he said it was 'only for fun'!
And the cuff of one sleeve is tucked into the coat,
And the sleeve's just as flat as can be.
I suppose that his arm must he hiding inside—
Only where? That's the puzzle to me!
When I asked him to tell me what made it so thin,
He said, 'Oh, it got shrunk in the wash!'
Then I looked at him hard, and I wanted to say
(But it's rude, mummy says), 'That's all bosh!'
Woollen 'combies,' I know, often shrink in the wash,
But I don't believe arms ever shrink.
Mine get longer, in spite of two washings each day!
Was he having me on, do you think?
Ev'ry night, in the old days, he frolicked with me,
Just before I went off to my bed.
It was grand when he held me so high in his arms
That I touched the white roof with my head!
But he says that that game is a thing of the past,
Though I'm still but a mere feather-weight;
So I sit on his knee, and we cuddle, instead,
And I stay up, oh, ever so late!
Still, his having just only one arm that is strong
Is a pity for mummy and me,
For he used to hug both at the very same time,
And he can't do that now, don't you see!
But my darling mum smiles, tho' her eyes shine with tears,
And she says that 'things might have been worse,'
And that 'nothing else very much matters, so long
As the Threepenny-bit's whole in the purse!'

J. K. TURTON.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

THE WAY HOME.

By PATRICK MACGILL, Author of The Great Push, &c.

PART I.

I.

THE shed, dilapidated and falling to pieces, stood in a field near the little village of A——. Holes gaped in its walls near the ground and higher up, under the drooping eaves. Through these openings the cold winds of winter were blowing, filling the apartment with an icy chill. The roof bore a covering of snow, and all round the gloomy habitation the feet of many men had trampled the wet, soggy ground until it spread out a bleak and dismal waste, ugly and forbidding. What uses the shed was put to in times of peace it was impossible to say, but at present it served as a compound for British prisoners, the ill-clad and ill-fed men who worked for their captors behind the hostile lines.

It was now night, with heavy clouds riding across the moon and showers of snow falling on the cold country-side. Outside the shed a sentry, his rifle on his shoulder, his coat buttoned up to the chin, was walking back and forward, his boots crunching the snow. Inside the big, gloomy interior of the building thirty men were lying on a damp floor, littered with rotting straw, their shivering bodies crumpled up in queer distorted attitudes, their overcoats covering them, their mufflers—such as had mufflers—tied round their heads.

All were dressed in sodden clothes, which they had worn at work, and which, without change, they had worn, sleeping and waking, for many days.

From time to time a man moved restlessly in his sleep, muttering incoherent words and opening his eyes. For a moment he would stare vacantly at the dark roof of the building, then moan as if oppressed with pain, and fall asleep again.

Inside the shed, when the moon shone for a moment, dark shadows could be seen lurking in every corner and playing on the smooth, blank walls of the sleeping place. An empty box stood on the earthen floor. A rat, slinking along on velvet pads, nosed the box in passing, then vanished into a corner and became part of the darkness. Next could be heard rats nibbling and gnawing on all sides, afterwards squealing and scurrying, then gnawing and nibbling again.

Suddenly the man nearest the door turned round on his back, muttered something unintelligible, stretched his arms out over his head, yawned, and shivered. The cold air that swept in under the flimsy door blew against his body, chilling him to the bone. He stretched out his arms a second time, yawned again, and looked at his mate, then with a noiseless movement reached out his hand and touched him on the shoulder.

The man shrank, as if avoiding a blow, then opened his eyes and looked round. 'Wot's up, Micky?' he asked softly.

'Whisht, Bill!' said the man addressed as Micky, in a solemn whisper.

He groaned as one does who turns in a restless sleep, and drew close to the newly wakened soldier. Bill also drew nearer, for prison life has its own secret procedure, and presently a pair of hairy lips were resting on a listening ear.

'Mind that tub-gutted rip that had charge iv us the day at work, Bill?' Micky inquired.

'Should think I do! The bloke as 'it me with the butt o' 'is 'ipe?'

'That's him,' Micky drawled in a whisper. 'Want to have a bit iv yer own back, Bill?'

'Not 'arf! And I will 'ave it out o' 'im 'fore long. Ye'll see me draw it across 'im one day'——

'Aisy, aisy now!' whispered the Irishman. 'It's him that's on sentry-go outside the door in the darkness.'

'Hope the cold 'll freeze the eyes out o' 'im, the'——

'Aisy, Bill; aisy. I'm thinkin' that we can make a dash for it and get clean away back to our own lines. It's only eight miles. If we get up and out o' the door—let me have one grip iv his throttle. And the clouds are gettin' thick over the moon, this very minit. Are ye game, Bill?'

'Game for anything that'll take us away from 'ere,' said Bill, sitting up and wiping the mulch from his face and hair. The Irishman also got up and proceeded to work himself gradually into the folds of his overcoat. The rest of the occupants of the shed were asleep, and snoring heavily. Outside could be heard the crunch of the sentry's boots in the snow as he plodded vigorously back and forward in the effort to keep himself warm.

 [All Rights Reserved.]

II.

Bill, with his coat on, was standing upright.

'Ready?' Micky inquired in a whisper, tightening a muffler round his throat.

'Right-o!' came the whispered reply.

There was a moment's hesitation. The two men listened. Nothing could be heard but the snores of the sleepers and the sweep of the wind outside. The conspirators walked straight and cautiously towards the door, Micky leading.

It was the Irishman who lifted the hasp of the door, pulled it back softly, and looked out at the back of the sentry, who was now standing still, stiff as a post, his hands in the pockets of his coat, and the snow falling round him in soft white flakes, like confetti on a wedding-party. Micky, with a low snarl, reached out both his hands and gripped the German by the throat. With a superhuman movement he began to shake the man's head and big, solid body, growling like a dog as he did so. He experienced a savage delight in seeing the rifle fall to the snow, the sleeves of the man's coat swinging aimlessly in the air as if they contained no arms, and his legs bending under him. The sentry's cap fell off, and dropped to the ground. Micky, intoxicated with his own prowess and the demoralisation of the foe, was filled with a burning feeling of revenge and reprisals. The brute that kicked the men under his charge, that used the bayonet to prick the defenceless prisoners! With a feeling of wild, savage joy he sank his fingers into the man's throat, strangling him, and even keeping the same savage hold on his victim when he fell limp to the ground. It was a case in which half-measures were of no use. One screech and the whole camp would be roused; and if that happened, and if the two soldiers were caught escaping, the kultured horror of Germany would take them in hand. The sentry had to be choked to death, and with that end in view the Irishman still hung on to him, tightening the grip on his neck. When released at last, the German dropped in the snow without a moan, and lay stiff as a log where he had fallen.

'We'll hook it now like hell,' Micky whispered to his mate. 'Across the fields and past the church—the one we passed comin' back from our work the day.'

III.

The two sped stealthily away, stepping softly on the snow. Away in front, spreading out towards the firing-line, the white land on which the snow was falling lay silent and forbidding. On their left a lone spinney bulked large, and was filled with strange noises, neighing, and the tramping of hoofs. Here were the horse-lines of a Boche battalion, and stretching back from the spinney were several big corrugated iron sheds in which the provender for the horses was stored. The course which the two men took ran by these, and just as they were passing one of the outermost sheds Micky seized the arm of his mate and came to a halt.

'The moon 'll be out in a minit,' he whispered. 'It 's clearin'.'

'Well, wot of it?' asked Bill. 'It 's up ter us ter git out o' it.'

'Course it is, and all that,' was Micky's reply. 'But we 'd better stick in the shed till the next shower comes. We 'd be seen out on the field here, as there 's no cover; so we 'd better get into shelter.'

The two stole quietly into the shed and took up their position in a corner near the door, their backs against a huddle of hay-bales, their eyes fixed on the field outside, which was now in a measure lighted up by a full moon shining through a rift in the clouds. The spinney near at hand looked mysterious in the moonlight, the branches white with the burden of snow which they carried, the trunks of the trees wrapped in impenetrable shadows. Micky, an Irishman steeped in the superstition of his race, saw in it the dwelling-place of fell spirits, unearthly forms lacking substance, that changed their location without movement. Anything might happen to men near such a place, and Micky, with his susceptible imagination, felt a thrill of fear run through his body. He uttered a gasp as something touched him suddenly on the arm.

'Where 's your lighter?' whispered Bill.

'Man alive! ye 're not goin' to light a fag, are ye?' Micky inquired.

'Catch me such a fool!' said Bill in an aggrieved tone. 'Give me the lighter and see.'

Micky handed it to the man—the little wick-and-tinder contrivance which his wife had sent out to him from Ireland. Bill took it and thrust it under a bale of hay.

'Is it goin' ter snow again, Micky?' he asked.

'It 's gettin' dark,' was the reply. 'Get ready to move.'

'Just a minute, ole bloke, and we 'll 'ave a bit o' our own back.'

As he spoke there was a creak as the little wheel of the lighter grated on the tinder. No flash was to be seen, for Bill's hands were deep in the centre of the bale.

'Is it lit?' asked Mick in a hoarse voice.

'It is,' said Bill. 'Give me your knife, and I 'll nick the top off the wick, and leave it 'ere.'

A knife changed hands in the darkness. Bill cut the wick in two, leaving the lighted end in the hay.

'Now we 'll grease,' he said, standing upright and looking at the dark clouds running across the face of the sky, steeping the world below in impenetrable gloom.

IV.

The two hurried away, Micky leading, the Cockney following in the rear, holding his head down against the storm as he ran. Fifteen minutes took them clear of the neighbouring village, and here, in a field, they stood for a moment and looked back. In the short time that had elapsed since their departure the lighted wick left in the shed had done its work, and a roaring fire was now making considerable headway. A great column of black smoke, shot with red streamers, was rising from the building and circling into the heavens. Somebody was shouting; a dog barked angrily; and even the escaped men could hear the roaring of the flames gutting the shed. The night was again clear, and a full moon drifting across the heavens lit the country for miles around.

Micky and Bill surveyed the scene in silence for a moment, then resumed their journey through the snow, panting from their exertions. The Cockney still held the knife and the lighter in his hand, but presently he passed them to the Irishman.

'Put them in yer pocket,' he said, 'and see and don't lose them. I've a fag or two on me, when we've time to smoke 'em.'

Micky did as he was told, tightened his coat-collar around his throat, and resumed his way.

'It'll take us all night to cross,' he remarked, gripping hold of a jagged edge of rock and drawing himself out of a hole into which he had stumbled. 'We'll make our own lines 'fore dawn, and maybe we'll get a bit iv rooty when we get there. Gi' me yer hand.'

He dragged the Cockney over the hole and across a stone dike, cutting his fingers on a rock as he did so. Bill's forelock fluttered about his temple, and several strands of hair entered his eyes. He brushed these back and tightened the cap on his head, pulling it well down over his brow. His breath came in short, heavy pants, and beads of sweat stood out on his cheeks and forehead.

'Tired, matey?' asked Micky, a show of feeling in his voice.

'Blime! It was a race!' answered the Cockney. 'Now we'll get on.'

They plodded forward, stepping boldly over bank and boulder. They fell into drains and crawled out again, encountered dikes and stumbled over them. Far up in the air above their heads a lonely bird shrieked loudly; behind, the fire burned fiercely, lighting up the face of the fields with its glare. The two men breasted the summit of the hill together, to be met by a fierce wind that blew in their faces and drove dark masses of cloud across the moon.

The desolate country stretched before them, level to the horizon. To spend the whole night tramping across it was indeed a cheerless prospect. Bill looked round him and shuddered.

'But it's not so far, after all,' said the Irishman, interpreting Bill's involuntary tremor. 'Besides, we've legged it along the road in this direction already this mornin'.'

'You know the way, even in the dark?' asked the Cockney. He was now looking listlessly back at the shed and the flames showing red against the sky. Perched on the hillock, it seemed to him that the fire was ever so far away. 'Is there any danger of us gettin' lost?' he asked.

'No danger,' answered Micky, his voice betraying sudden impatience and annoyance. He paused for a moment as if going to give expression to some disturbing thought; then he buttoned his coat and cried, 'Come on, matey. What are ye standin' there lookin' at?'

They set off across the fields, the Irishman stepping out briskly, and Bill dragging his feet with an effort, as if he had become tired already. Micky could hear him breathing heavily as he walked, and this, for some reason or another, annoyed him.

'If ye begin like that,' he shouted over his shoulder, 'how are ye goin' to finish up?'

There was no answer. A sharp wind swept along the ground, making mournful music; up in the air the lone bird was still shrieking eerily. In the clear belts of sky between the clouds millions of stars, scattered broadcast, shone like sparks on polished steel.

V.

The field was soft and spongy, as if the snow which fell a moment ago was thawing, and at each step the travellers sank to their ankles. Waste as a spread of waters, the white desert land stretched out in front, with nothing to break its monotonous surface save three stumps of fir that stood up, gaunt as spectres, in the distance. Micky stopped when he got close to the dead trees, drew his pipe from his pocket, filled it with thick black tobacco, struck a spark on the wick, and lit his pipe, holding his lighter in the curve of his hand. For a few moments he smoked in silence, sending great wreaths of smoke into the air; then he handed the pipe to his companion.

'That looks bad,' he said, gazing at the dark clouds which were rapidly covering the heavens. 'It'll be a regular storm.'

'Only a shower,' said the Cockney, pulling at the pipe. A strange note of kindness had crept into his voice, and he stared anxiously at the sky. 'Isn't those bloomin' clouds gatherin' quick?' he went on. 'It'll be on us in a minute. How far is it to our lines?'

'Seven miles; maybe more,' answered Micky. 'I'm not sure.'

'Not sure,' Bill repeated, then became silent.

Micky could see the spark of his pipe, as the wind caught it, lighting up his companion's face, and he wondered vaguely why Bill and he had been such good friends for the last seven months. The two of them had been mates all that time, marching together from place to place, sharing the warmth of the same bed, even when that was nothing better than the wet floor of a basement behind the German lines. He had met Bill for the first time in a prisoners' compound. That was seven months ago, and ever since the two had been the best of friends.

'Funny bucko, Bill,' he muttered. 'But he's a grand mate.'

'What are ye sayin'?' the Cockney asked, handing back the pipe.

'It's time that we were off,' Micky replied. 'It's a good long walk from now till the creak of dawn.'

He stuck the pipe in his mouth and took a step forward. A heavy gust of wind rose and struck him across the face, sending the sparks flying from his pipe. This was followed by a sharp and sudden shower of fine frozen snow, and his clothes were white in an instant. A cold air swept up under his sleeves and down his spine, chilling him to the bone. He turned round and spoke to his mate.

'It's on again,' he said.

'Blast it!' said Bill, coming abreast.

'It'll maybe be only a shower,' Micky remarked, looking at the white slanting lines of falling snow. 'It's like love at first sight; it came too sudden to last long. Anyway, it put my smoke to one side,' he added, putting his pipe in his pocket.

'It's cold enough for anything,' observed Bill. 'Freeze the ears off a brass mule, it would.'

'Never seen a brass mule,' said Micky. 'Have ye?'

The Cockney tried to speak, but as he opened his mouth a swift gust of wind caught the breath from his very lips and carried his voice away.

Micky, now deep in difficulties of his own, paid no heed to his mate, for he had stepped into a morass and sunk to the waist. All that Bill could see of his friend was the trunk of his body and two arms waving helplessly over the snow. He stepped forward to help, but immediately sank to his knees in the quagmire.

'Keep out of it, Bill,' Micky shouted, ploughing through the slush and snow towards the Cockney. 'Where the hell are you goin' to?' he roared. 'Wasn't it enough for one of us to get in, and not two? I never saw such a one as ye are,' he concluded in a tone of resentment.

Having delivered himself of these heated words, he caught hold of Bill by the arm, and the two of them reached terra firma together.

'Ye're wet, Micky,' said the Cockney.

'Glory be! but it looks like it,' was the answer. 'It's cold in that hole. Talk about freezin' the ears off a mule! We'll get foundered in this damned place, be the look iv it. Safe in a bog with heels cocked up we'll be by mornin'.'

He shook himself, and looked round in vain for the trees which he had left just a moment before; the falling snow had hidden them from his eyes. He raised an indefinite finger and pointed in front.

'We'll go that way,' he said. 'We'll run a bit, and it'll keep us warm.'

Bill, without replying, followed him across the stretch of snow, the tails of his great-coat fluttering in the wind as he ran. The youngster's boots let in water, which squirted through his toes at every move. Adding to his discomfort was a nail, piercing through the sole of one boot and jagging at his foot. Now and again both men stepped into quagmires, out of which they could only crawl with great difficulty. They ran for a full twenty minutes, and both were perspiring when they came to a halt.

'We'll get across all right,' Micky roared, indifferent to the noise made by his voice. 'It'll fair in a wee while, and the night'll be a fine one yet. Anyhow, I'm all in a glister of sweat.'

'Same 'ere, ole man!' Bill answered in a hoarse voice. 'Ye know the way, Micky?' he inquired anxiously, after drawing his breath a little.

'Course I do,' Micky answered, clutching the boy's arm and setting off again, but moving more slowly this time. The Irishman seemed to be in a very good humour now, and whistled a tune. His wet trousers were already frozen stiff, and rattled like boards against his legs. Rime hung from his eyebrows and moustache; and even on Bill's forehead little lumps of ice began to take the place of beads of sweat.

VI.

Suddenly a cry, plaintive and mournful, came down the wind and reached the ears of the two men, then died away into the distance. Two pairs of eyes sought each other, and two hands gripped one another nervously. A gust of wind swept round the men, whirling the snow up into the air; then the cry, more plaintive, but louder and nearer, reached them again.

'What will that be at all?' asked the Irishman in a whisper. Bill could feel his mate's lips framing the words against his ear.

'Blime! I don't know,' he answered. 'Maybe it's the Devil.'

He laughed as he spoke, and urged Micky forward. The wind seemed to be changing. At one time it blew hard in their faces, chilling the tip of Bill's nose, and blowing the lapel of Micky's coat up against his chin. Again it swept from behind, carrying the snow against the men's necks and ears, and sweeping the frosty flakes up under the Cockney's trousers, chilling his whole body.

Afterwards came a lull in the storm, and the moon appeared straight overhead.

'What did I say?' cried Micky. 'Told ye it would fair. Knew it was too strong to last.'

Again the strange cry, now very near at hand, reached the two listeners. In vain their eyes sought out something that might be responsible for it. Nothing was to be seen but the long-drawn drifts ploughed by the wind on the surface of the snow.

'What's that?' Bill asked all at once, pointing a long, crooked finger in front of him.

'What?' asked Micky, following the line of the Cockney's arm with his eyes.

'That,' said Bill, still panting; 'the snow as 'as made itself up into big lumps and is comin' across to us.'

The storm had died down; the moon, its light reflected from a million crystals of snow, gave the night the clearness of day. Micky stared at the point indicated by his mate's outstretched finger, and saw something that made his heart leap into his mouth. The snow, rolled up into large balls, was moving towards the two lilliputian specks that represented humanity on that limitless field of white. These white balls were moving, coming towards the two men without any visible means of propulsion.

'Wot's 'appenin' now?' gasped Bill.

Just as he spoke the same plaintive cry that had haunted them before was borne to their ears again. Micky, on hearing it, clapped his hands against his thighs and emitted an oath. 'Goats!' he yelled; 'bloomin' old goats—and them lost just like our own two selves! I think I'll light my pipe,' he added. 'A little smoke 'll clear the air, and it's gettin' black as black overhead again.'

A dark cloud, flying before the wind, swept up the sky and wiped out the moon as a picture in chalk is wiped from a slate. The snow, again falling in long, wavering streaks, struck sharply against the two men. The goats, now very near at hand, could be heard bleating. Micky, trying to light the pipe, his back to the gale, was cursing. The lighter, glowing for a moment before it went out, showed his firm face and the outstanding bristles on his jaw. 'A fine mess this we've got into!' he cried, putting his unlighted pipe back in his pocket. 'I hope a million Jerrys get burned along with the shed, the rips iv perdition! I'm cold—cold to the bone. And, Bill, are ye cold too? Damn it, old chum! I'm more sorry for you than for myself.'

'Never mind me,' said Bill, making a brave attempt to laugh. 'Lead on, and I'll follow you! We'll be out o't all right 'fore mornin'.'

'If I could only get that pipe lit,' said Micky, biting a bit from the end of his tobacco-plug, 'it wouldn't be so bad.'

(Continued on page 380.)

LITERARY METAMORPHOSES.

By Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS, Bart.

THE metamorphosis here referred to is that of sex, by which I don't mean the mere assumption, for literary purposes, of a man's name by a woman—as was done by George Eliot and George Sand; or the reverse, as was done upon one occasion by Prosper Mérimée. For though it is true that Madame Sand was fond of disporting herself in male attire, and that Mérimée published a portrait of himself disguised as a woman as frontispiece to the so-called plays of 'Clara Gazul,' yet in neither case was the literary product affected by the travesty. What I intend to refer to here are the much more interesting cases in which whole books, or parts of them, have been deliberately written in character, by men as women or by women as men—as was done, among many others, by Scott, Dickens, and Anne Brontë. The device is, after all, but an extension of the dramatic element which forms part of all works of fiction; yet, from its exacting nature and the unremitting watchfulness which it demands, it amounts to a tour de force, admitting of various degrees of success in the performance. Thus, when Wilkie Collins, speaking as Madame Pratolungo, observes, when the threat of a shower has to be faced, 'I had nothing on that would spoil,' most male readers will feel, I think, that the author scores a point. But when Sir Herbert Maxwell makes the heroine of The Letter of the Law, in telling her own story, quote repeatedly from the classics, and, worse still, quote correctly, the same authorities will hold that he becomes liable to a forfeit. Of course, it is easy enough for the man-pro-tem. to assume swashbuckler airs, or for the woman-for-the-time-being to invite a crony to a hair-brushing and exchange of confidences. Both must remember, however, that a single incongruous detail will suffice to dispel the illusion thus created. On the whole, it is wonderful how seldom the skilled masquerader is caught tripping.

The change of sex as an expedient in story-telling is as old as the novel itself, or at least as the modern manifestation of that literary form, for it was resorted to by Defoe in his History of Moll Flanders (1722). In that realistic, though rather unedifying, record of a career which, beginning in Newgate and ending in the odour of sanctity, graduated in various disreputable callings by the way, Defoe has a virago as his heroine, and hence evades many of the difficulties inherent in his experiment. For the virago, as the name implies, is a woman unsexed. In the invention of adventures, and the verve and the cynical irony with which his 'altera ego' recounts them, Defoe's work is quite up to his own remarkable standard; whilst the artful introduction of occasional earnestness serves to disarm the charge of profligacy. If you bear in mind her antecedents and her opportunities, poor Moll is doubtless life-like enough. But how different in flavour are the delicious letters addressed by Julia Mannering to her quondam schoolfellow and present associate in an 'eternal friendship'! And if these letters are good in themselves, not less so is the art by which Scott makes them contribute to the telling of his story. The period of Guy Mannering is the eighteenth century, but the type of young lady here depicted long survived the date (1815) of its publication. The creature of an age of sensibility, combined with restricted freedom, she is flighty and romantic beyond anything to be found at the present day, and will thrill and flutter with the best of them. But for all her airs and graces as a spoilt child, you don't catch Julia making a fool of herself. Scott's success in the metamorphosis makes one wish he had essayed it oftener than he did.

Where Miss Mannering is petulant and sprightly, as befits an only daughter and an heiress, Esther Summerson, through whose lips Dickens tells the best part of the story of Bleak House, is subdued, unselfish, gentle, and, above all, lovable. I have known a good critic to take exception to her mannerism of setting the household keys a-jingling in her basket at significant moments in the tale. But, for myself, she is the finest product of all sexual transmigrations among novelists—a true pearl of sweet girlhood, and well worthy not merely of the love, but of the self-sacrifice of John Jarndyce. Sheridan Lefanu has a sound artistic reason for assuming a feminine nature when narrating the history of Uncle Silas. Lefanu was before all things a master of thrills, and by choosing a high-strung girl to describe the scenes of terror of his masterpiece as experiences of her own, he greatly enhances their effect. Yet, unless I am mistaken, there are one or two occasions when his disguise is forgotten, and a pair of trousers peeps for a moment below the petticoat. Once more, in making choice of his vivacious Frenchwoman to recount the vicissitudes of Poor Miss Finch (1872), Wilkie Collins was well-advised, for the advanced opinions and the antecedent trials of the ex-President's widow had to a great extent emancipated her from the prejudices of sex; whence her creator has less difficulty in identifying himself with her views. Unlike Scott and Dickens, Collins and Lefanu had essayed to write whole books in the character of women. The late William Sharp went further still, for, beginning in the earlier 'nineties of last century, he put forth a series of volumes purporting to be the work of 'Fiona Macleod,' the imaginative scion of an ancient Highland family, who had devoted herself to studying primitive life in the Hebrides, and to collecting its traditions. The true authorship of these works was kept secret from all but a few, and was not made known to the world until Sharp's death in December 1905. From this arose some quaint complications, for I remember Sharp's telling me that his publishers had forwarded him a letter, written by a young curate or minister, who had fallen in love with Miss Macleod after reading her books, and who wrote to offer her marriage. The proposal was courteously declined. But the imbroglio did not end there, for there came a second letter not long afterwards—this time from the young man's widowed mother, beseeching Miss Macleod to have pity on her only son, whose infatuation had reached such a pitch that he was threatened with decline. Here was a nice predicament for one who was nothing if not humane! But here, also, was an irrefutable tribute to his success in imparting a feminine tone to Pharais and the other works of the series.

Whilst Fiona Macleod was still pouring forth her quasi-Celtic stories and poems, the British public was further intrigued and mystified by the publication of An Englishwoman's Love-Letters, which claimed at the time (1900) to be genuine documents, though they are now acknowledged to be the work of Mr Laurence Housman. They tell the story of a woman's love for a man, slightly younger than herself, who is her neighbour in the country—a love which is returned and prospers, until, in consequence of a revelation made to him, the young man repudiates it. It is made clear that no blame attaches to the girl, and the most obvious solution of the mystery seemed to be that lover and loved one had been discovered to be children of one father—a guess to which the embittered character of the young man's mother lends a measure of support. Hopeless separation does not, however, end the letters, which, though no longer despatched, are continued up to the day of the writer's death from a broken heart. Their tone is at first somewhat too literary, but as they proceed they gain in spontaneity, until they become almost as harrowing as those of Marianna Alcoforado, the famous Portuguese nun, by which they may perhaps have been suggested. To take another instance, Mr H. O. Sturgis has published, under the title All that was Possible, the pathetic confession of an actress who has lost her character, in the conventional sense of the phrase, whilst retaining all that is tender and refined in womanhood, and who is doomed to suffer both for what she has lost and what she has preserved. Among the sexual metamorphoses of literature this is one of the most remarkable. Again, besides the readable novel already referred to, Sir Herbert Maxwell first published his interesting Passages in the Life of Sir Lucian Elphin as the work of 'Amy Trevanion,' the hero's sister. In this case, however, by claiming to draw upon her brother's diaries, the soi-disant authoress does much to gloss over the difficulties of her task. And certainly, where a man writes as a woman, the author who reveals his true identity on the title-page handicaps his chance of getting his impersonation accepted.

My conclusion is that, though no man has ever yet contrived to write an essentially feminine book—such as, for instance, Villette, or the more recent Dangerous Age of Karin Michaëlis—and though the best men's portraits of women, from Shakespeare to Hardy and Meredith, have been drawn from the outside, yet many male writers have succeeded in writing credibly as women, and that this device for giving variety and verisimilitude to a narrative has justified itself. Why is it, then, I should like to ask, that women authors have shown themselves on the whole so shy of writing as men? A man has as a rule less of essential reserve than a woman, his life is open and uncloistered, and he prefers to express himself by means of deeds and downright speech. Ought he not, then, to be the easier of the two to simulate? The evidence, so far as I know it, is opposed to this conclusion. It is true that Anne Brontë, whose talent has been unjustly overshadowed by those of her more famous sisters, chose to relate the story of The Tenant of Wildfell Hall in the person of Gilbert Markham, a sturdy young farmer, and that she acquitted herself quite passably in this rather trying ordeal. Later on Miss Blanche Willis Howard took the man's part in A Fellowe and His Wife, a story told in the form of correspondence between husband and wife—the wife's letters being contributed by William Sharp, who thus acquired practice for his later and more ambitious essays in feminine fiction. To the mere critic this division of labour looks like a gratuitous courting of difficulties, but the creative talent recognises no rules except its own. Lastly, 'Michael Fairless' impersonated a man when writing The Roadmender—that fine record of a lofty mind which bends to humble toil, and finds in itself support and consolation. So far as it goes, the book is convincing enough. But the type of man delineated is a very uncommon one.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XXIII.

JUNE drew near. May had been as capricious as a pretty woman, but the sun had now come North. Summer was in the air; steady sunshine bathed the gray battlements of the Castle and the roofs of the Old Town, and the green heart of Edinburgh was starred with vivid flowers. Even the statues and the ugliest band-stand in Europe could not spoil the prospect.

It was the last Monday in May—a 'blank day' in the Courts. I had been for a six hours' tramp over the Pentlands; and now, in the afternoon, I was making my way along Princes Street, duly impressed by the procession of the comely daughters of Edinburgh in honour of The Summer Frock. I had received a note from Keene-Leslie, from a fishing hotel in Rossshire with an unpronounceable Gaelic name. It ran thus: 'I am here for a week, away from hot pavements. I wish you would hurry up Stronach, the fishing-tackle dealer at the West End, about some trout-flies I ordered. Like a good chap, see that I get them soon, or I am undone. Weather obliging; trout the reverse.

'I have some most interesting information concerning the Duff Avenue gang. I shall look you up in Edinburgh on my way South in about a week.'

I was now sauntering westward to execute his commission.

It is doubtless one of the advantages of a 'single-street' town that you are pretty sure of meeting some of your acquaintances in its main artery. But it has its drawbacks. You may stumble across the last man or woman you wish to see. Soon I had bitter cause for murmuring the sacrilegious rendering by a jocund modern of our national bard's couplet:

> 'O, wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us
> To see oor freens afore they see us!'

I beheld, about twenty yards away, coming towards me, the figure of an acquaintance known as 'The Rasp,' an ominous subtitle handsomely earned by the possession of a voice like the tearing of calico and a well-nigh perfect genius for saying the things one does not wish to hear. His stories are either 'chestnuts' or pointless. He purveys good news about people whom you dislike, and evil tidings of your friends. He never quarrels with anybody, and has no friends. He means well. Curse him and his breed! Most people have a bête noire, and 'The Rasp' is mine.

In the succinct American, he 'saw me coming.' Escape except by instant and undignified flight was impossible. He had marked me for his own, and bore down upon me like the Assyrian wolf. First he inquired about my health, and, before I could reply, mentioned kindly that he thought I was getting too stout. I am only twelve-stun'-three. I felt inclined to break him over my knee, but men of his type never see the murder in their victim's eyes. He went on to spoil a good story in the telling of it, making it a cause for tears instead of joy; and when I did not laugh, he tactfully suggested that, 'of course, it wants a bit of seeing.'

Then he told me of the engagement of a pretty girl whom I know (and who waltzes divinely) to a little bounder with Whitehall spectacles and a stutter. He pointed out a man who was passing, and informed me in a reverential whisper that he owned three Rolls-Royces! 'An awfully rich chap,' he said. He said this twice. He also told me he didn't like the colour of my waistcoat.

'I must be off,' I ventured; 'I'm—I'm rather in a hurry.'

'You didn't look like it when I met you,' he remarked.

'No,' I said, goaded into savage reprisals; 'I wasn't, but I am now.'

The shaft glanced harmlessly off his rhinoceros hide.

'Well,' he said, 'I have nothing to do, so I'll stroll along with you.' The complacent ass then took my arm; and feeling like a chapter in Foxe's Book of Martyrs, I swallowed an imprecation and bowed to Destiny.

But mark the law of compensation in all things. Had I not met him I should not have heard so promptly about a telephone message to me at the club. When we were passing it he said, 'By the way, I forgot to tell you. I happened to hear the porter telling some one over the 'phone that you weren't in the club.'

'Thanks. Good-bye,' I said firmly, and dived into the hall. There I found a message (probably my landlady had sent it from a telephone-call office) that a telegram awaited me at my rooms.

I hastened to Jura Street. The little drab envelope's contents ran: 'Burglary at The Bield. Colonel in grave danger.' I sent off a telegram to Tony in Ross-shire, asking him to meet me with all speed at The Bield, and caught the night train for the North, a prey to the blackest forebodings.

The long night journey to The Bield frayed my nerves. Haunted by disquiet, I could not sleep, and as it was too dark to read, I spent the hours in dismal wakefulness, hoping against hope that my fears would not be justified. But the more I thought, the deeper grew my anxiety. There I sat alone in my ill-lit compartment, wide-eyed and depressed, the train's monotonous rumble spinning a gloomy undernote to my thoughts. The slow hours passed. With the first deep flush of the dawn came the promise of a fine day. The mounting sun filled the heavens with splendour. By the time we reached the summit the hills were clear of shadows; Loch Garry gleamed like a silver shield; a fairer morning never welcomed me to my 'ain countrie.' But with it came one of the bitterest moments of my life. Dr Hall was on the platform of the little station in the Glen, and my first glance at his pale, grave face told me the truth. My uncle was dead.

'Two hours ago, peacefully in his sleep,' the doctor told me in reply to the question in my eyes. 'I sat up all night with him; and I have a strange story to tell you—the strangest I have known in my experience.'

'Not foul play?'

'Not in the sense of murder. Your uncle died of heart-failure after a great shock, and might have been found dead yesterday morning but for the accident of old Janet having been wakened by the wind slamming a door near her room. She rose to shut it, and when going back to her room, looked out of a window, and saw a light burning in the colonel's sanctum. There she found him, face downwards on the floor, unable to speak or move, and obviously desperately ill. At once she sent for me. Luckily, I had just come in from a night visit to a shepherd's house down the Glen, and I was at The Bield in ten minutes. But you must hasten. I have my car here. The police authorities will return in an hour, and the sooner you are at the house the better. I'll give you the main facts as we go.'

We hurried to the car, and as we skimmed along the doctor continued: 'A couple of hours after I reached the house the colonel rallied, and I was able to patch his story together. The central fact is that a man answering to the description of the prowler of whom the colonel told us entered his room at midnight and terrorised him. Your uncle's story was so startling that I telephoned the police authorities at once, and also took the precaution of locking up his room and leaving things exactly as they were, untouched. The police motored to The Bield, and on their arrival about five o'clock in the morning approved of what I had done. The colonel was then very low, and I advised that his evidence should be taken. The inspector telephoned to the Crown officials, who came in the early forenoon and took the colonel's sworn statement. It is unsigned, as he was too weak to lift a hand; but it was, of course, given before witnesses, and I understand that is all that is necessary. I got Dr Robertson from Castleton—the best man I know—to come yesterday afternoon, but when he arrived he could do nothing except agree with my treatment and my view of the case. There was little hope from the beginning, I am deeply sorry to say. . . . I'm about done up. I have only had an hour or so of sleep for the last forty-eight hours.'

The road to The Bield brought a rush of memories; beyond a few conventional words of thanks to the doctor, I was unable to speak. Soon the car glided up the avenue. Angus was at the door, and the old man's eyes filled as I took his big, rough hand and passed from the radiant morning into the silent house. The doctor came with me into the hall, where he gave me the copy of my uncle's statement.

'You will perhaps wish to be alone,' he said, 'and I can be of little use just now.'

'You are in want of sleep, doctor,' I said; and, indeed, his face had all the signs of a tired man's. 'Will you rest here?'

'Many thanks. I must return to the surgery. I'll soon fall asleep, I assure you; but I must be at home, as I have one or two cases which I am anxious about, and I have no assistant. I'll come up as soon as I can. By that time you will have thought over the statement, and I am anxious to hear your views on the subject. But it seems clear to me that the watcher laid his devilish plans too well.'

The colonel's deathbed statement or 'deposition,' as it is called, amazed me. Given in presence of the Sheriff-Substitute, the Procurator-Fiscal, and the Clerk of Court for the County, it was dated at The Bield and signed by those officials in presence of the 'deponent.' Here it is:

'I am Colonel Ewan Forbes of Glen Ciuin. On the evening of Sunday last I finished dinner about 8.15, and afterwards went to my smoking-room. There I sat reading until nine o'clock, when Dr Hall, who is my medical man, called. His visit was not a professional one, but was in response to an invitation to come and smoke a cigar with me. He sat with me for over an hour, and left about 10.30. Immediately afterwards my housekeeper, Janet Blair, having locked up the house, came with the keys. This was at her usual hour. I resumed my reading, but became a little drowsy. I cannot say that I fell asleep. The next thing I remember is that the door of my room was suddenly opened and a man came in and instantly covered me with a revolver. I could neither speak nor move, but I was quite conscious of what happened. The man closed the door, and having locked it, came into the middle of the room, still covering me with the revolver. He was over medium height, with a dark pointed beard, wore a slouch-hat, and was dressed in rough brown tweeds. He did not speak—at least, I heard nothing—but keeping in the shadow behind the lamp, he stood watching me for a little. I tried to get up from my chair and to shout for help, but I felt very weak and giddy, and could neither utter a word nor lift a finger. He then rifled my pockets, and having found my keys, went straight to the dummy row of books which masks the little safe where I keep a number of private papers. He slid the imitation books aside, and having opened the safe with my key, took out all the papers from inside it and put them in his pocket. This done, he began to search the safe a second time. While he was doing this I must have swooned. I remember nothing more.

'I am sure that the man who came into the room is the same person whom I saw thrice near The Bield, the last time outside the window of my room late at night. My nephew, Neil Forbes, and Dr Hall know the particulars of my having seen this person before. I told them about it. The man is a complete stranger to me.' (Here follows a note by the witnesses that the deponent was unable, through bodily weakness, to say more or to sign his statement. They then signed as witnesses to the correctness of the deposition.)

I read the extraordinary statement over and over again. It was clear enough—too clear in its story of well-nigh incredible daring and cunning. I rebuilt the scene: the old man alone, the stealthy entrance, my uncle's sudden heart-failure, and the cool scoundrel hunting for the paper. The paper! Had 'The Searcher' got it? I had counselled my uncle to secrete it, and the little masked safe was in all likelihood the place he would have chosen as its hiding-place.

(Continued on page 372.)

A SIDELIGHT ON THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.

By VLADIMIR POLIAKOFF.

WHEN the Revolution came, the great mass of the Russian Army went over readily to its side, or at least did not oppose its progress. This is all the more curious because the ordinary Russian soldier was, politically, absolutely uneducated, and at the beginning of the Revolution no powerful currents of opinion favourable to the new ideas existed in the army.

My personal experience of three years at the front, and also a careful investigation of the facts, lead me to the conclusion that the phenomenon was due to a deep-rooted dissatisfaction with the material conditions of life, and to a general 'Bolshevism.'

When one studies the facts, it is astonishing to find how the Tsar's Government itself created a state of things in the army propitious to any revolutionary uprising. We went into the war in 1914 united by the one patriotic desire—to beat the German aggressors. Yet, I must insist, the Government, and especially the High Command, never really tried to maintain and develop this feeling on truly broad national lines. As the war dragged on, month after month, nothing was done on a large scale to keep the soldier informed and interested in its aims. Thus it happened that by 1917 the majority of the combatants had lost any genuine understanding of what they were fighting for.

The troops fought, and often fought well; they obeyed orders—but not for a great idea. The army, having thus lost interest in the great issues of the war, became easily accessible to any mutinous appeal addressed to the materialistic elemental senses of the mass. This mass of combatants under compulsion could not be securely kept in hand, because of the growing estrangement between officers and men.

From the beginning the Government and the High Command were mortally afraid of the revolutionary bogy. The fear (absolutely unfounded) was always present that revolutionary elements would appear in the army, and use it as an instrument against the existing régime. Much valuable time of the staffs was occupied in the preparation of lists of so-called 'suspects' and the detection of revolutionary propaganda as yet non-existent.

By heaping favours upon the officers it was hoped that a strong militaristic caste would be created, able to put down revolutionary activities in the ranks. All real favours were reserved for the officers—augmentation of pay, supplements for the high cost of living, bonuses, preferential treatment on railways, &c.

The preferential treatment on the railways accorded to officers was a permanent source of dissatisfaction in the army. Distances in Russia being enormous and terms of leave comparatively short, every day unnecessarily lost on the journey was bitterly resented. Whilst officers on the railways were accorded all facilities, the ordinary soldier was treated as a sort of criminal. He was allowed to use only the slower trains, was often put under guard, and (worst of all) forbidden to enter the refreshment-rooms, being restricted to the canteens (not always provided), where sometimes only hot water was to be obtained.

The officer home on leave enjoyed every reasonable privilege. The common soldier home for a couple of weeks, after a year or even two years of campaigning, was confined in every direction. He could not visit the better theatres and music-halls. Restaurants, and even inns, were often closed against him. He was not allowed into the fashionable gardens and parks. Sometimes the best street in the town was declared taboo or the use of the tramway-cars was restricted.

All these restrictions, little things by themselves, and many of them ridiculous, acted upon the men's tempers and made them more approachable to the agitator. The revolutionary leaders in Petrograd, for example, as one of their chief arguments for goading the garrison into rebellion, cited the shameful way in which soldiers were prohibited by the commandant from using the electric cars.

Next in importance comes the drink question. When the war started, Russia by imperial ukase was ordered to go 'dry.' Therefore the rank and file in the army never saw alcohol except in the flasks of the Germans they defeated. For men used to alcoholic drinks to be deprived of them is very hard. But for health or patriotic reasons, the decree, if equally applied to all, could be borne. It is easy to imagine the disgust of a soldier deprived of a lifelong habit on seeing his commanders allowed to use the forbidden drink.

Another cause for complaint was the eternal feminine question. Quite justly, soldiers' wives and sweethearts were not allowed to approach anywhere near the front line. This was right; but the troops saw that this rule did not apply to commanding officers or even subalterns, who were visited by their female relatives. Indeed, officers of high rank sometimes had their families staying with them. In the towns immediately behind the front the officers were afforded the chance of snatching a few bright moments. It must be admitted that the battalions of gay young ladies there were sometimes too numerous. On the other hand, the conduct of the soldier was severely controlled, and his occasions for a 'spree' were but few.

Soldiers on active service in the first years of the war were absolutely forbidden to marry, and later to get the necessary permits was extraordinarily difficult. This was a very great grievance indeed, among the men of better class especially, when they saw how easy this step was made for officers.

And so officers and men gradually drifted more and more apart. The unity of feeling which had existed at the beginning of the war disappeared. For reasons often paltry, but all the same real, the mass of the army began to feel itself separated from the commanding caste, and through comparing its own position with the privileges of the officers was brought to see in them not leaders, but oppressors and profiteers.

There were many other reasons for this besides those already mentioned. For example, there seemed to be two measures in the dispensation of military justice. The men were much more harshly treated than the officers. The latter often received lenient sentences for crimes the penalty for which in the case of a soldier was death or long imprisonment. It seemed as if the High Command was afraid to disaffect officers by a severe application of the law. The disciplinary powers of the officers over the men were increasing all the time, and there was practically no way in which a man could obtain redress for a sentence, however unjust.

The treatment of the wounded and the sick was also organised on class lines. The advantages afforded to officers in hospital and during transport were too glaringly apparent. In the base camps, in the reserve battalions, and generally behind the front the men were left to themselves, and not looked after from the moral point of view at all. They were just for endless weeks and months penned up in barracks, often without physical exercise and drill, wasting their time smoking cigarettes and playing cards.

The numerous intellectuals included in the army on mobilisation were looked upon with suspicion. If they were not Jews they could get a commission and join the officers' caste; otherwise they remained suspects till the end. The Jews had the privilege of being allowed to shed their blood without the possibility of being promoted. At the same time, the intellectuals were exploited in every possible way by the officers. Such a state of things was also favourable to the spread of dissatisfaction, and gave the revolutionary cause its best agitators.

Decorations for service in the field and on the staffs were showered on the officers, whilst the men had to wait long for their hard-won ribbon of St George.

I remember the splendid dash and daring of the army of 1914, its irresistible élan. I hear yet the tramp of those splendid battalions. Where are my comrades? The Tsar's High Command destroyed the best of them in bloody sacrifices uselessly, on the Carpathians, in Poland, and on many a field. The rest were demoralised by a stupid policy, divided into classes, and betrayed into the hands of professional agitators.

What I have said about the estrangement between officers and men is the bitter truth, and explains the success of the worst sides of the Revolution.

CHRISTINE LONAVET.

PART II.

V.

THE following morning, soon after Lannart and Malet, much to their regret, had left us (our host had made up his mind that the Germans would quickly pay us a visit, and was very nervous and uneasy till they had gone), the good count brought the doctor in his own carriage. The wound was not really a serious one, but he said it would be about a month before I was fit for service.

Ah, those were very happy days for me that followed! I saw little of the family during the day, except at the midday meal; but the evenings more than made up for this, for then we all sat round the blazing fire. While the girls brought out their knitting, their father and I smoked and chatted, and Bobo the sheep-dog, who, since all his charges had been sold, had become quite one of the family, slept soundly on the rug before us.

'We have taken the liberty,' said my host one night, 'of using your horse in the plough;' and after a few remarks about its age, &c., he asked me if I would take four hundred francs for it.

'I am glad you find it useful,' I replied. 'The count tells me that it must have been a very fine horse once, as it is branded with the N. and the imperial crown.'

Lonavet was surprised at my knowing this, and seemed anything but pleased. Still, I did not want him to think I did not know its value.

'I won't take four hundred francs,' I declared.

'You won't?' he said.

'No,' I answered. 'You have been very kind to me, I have given you a lot of trouble, and I beg that you accept the horse as a gift.'

For a moment he looked upon me almost as a fool, ere he grasped my hand and thanked me. 'But, ma foi! you must be rich,' he added.

'Well, not exactly,' I answered; 'but I am not poor. I will tell you how I am situated.'

'Yes, let us hear,' said my host, rising to throw another log on the fire, whose flickering flames lighted up the long, huge kitchen, which, I should say, judging from its groined roof and fine oak panelling, had originally been a guard-room. The fluttering light—for we had but one brass candlestick—in the semi-darkness made the room seem larger than ever.

'Very well,' I replied; and so, with the two girls opposite, their elbows on the table and their bright eyes fixed upon me, I commenced.

'Well, you know, my father has a large farm in Champagne, and he had two brothers, Étienne and Louis. Étienne is my god-father; he is a large timber-merchant at Bourmont, on the borders of Lorraine. As he has only two daughters, at sixteen I went to learn his business, so that when I was old enough I could take it over, in order to keep it in the family, for it was a fine business, and we had as many as twenty horses. Among other things, at this period I learned German. I don't say I speak it well; but taking my uncle's advice, and smoking a pipe near a pig-sty, I certainly got the correct accent. Then I went to serve my two years in the army. I had been back from the army three years, and my uncle said I should soon be a partner, when last May we heard that Uncle Louis had died at Martinique, and left to his two brothers for their children over half a million francs. As there were four of us and Uncle Étienne had his two daughters, that meant that we should have nearly one hundred thousand francs apiece. But though it made us rich, I can truly say that we young folks were really sorry to hear of Uncle Louis's death. He had been very wild when he was young; but he was clever, and, moreover, very kind-hearted. He had no children of his own; his wife was dead; and when he came over, as he did every four years, he thought he could not do enough for us. As neither my father nor my uncle could go, and my elder brother was going to be married, I went out to Martinique and saw his partner, M. Mardelet. This gentleman's only son had turned out badly, and M. Mardelet took a liking to me, and proposed that I should put the money that had been left me into the business, and that I should stay there; but, of course, I told him I could arrange nothing till I got home. Though the war broke out in July, there being no direct cable, we only learnt of it from a ship arriving a fortnight later. I could not get a ship back for some time, and I did not arrive at Bordeaux till the middle of September. When they knew that I had been a corporal in my old regiment they made me a sergeant, and sent me into Tours with some conscripts.

'But where is the money?' asked M. Lonavet.

'Safe in the bank at Bordeaux.'

Satisfied with that, he sat thinking. He had known nothing about me up to that time, so, though courteous and polite (as his nature was), the patron had been reticent and reserved. But a change came over him from that date, and nothing could exceed his cordiality. He told me openly he had made a lot of money by the war, and that he hoped to make still more, as they had had a fine harvest, and he had the grain hidden away, and expected to get yet higher prices. He even told Christine that as soon as ever I could go about a little, she should take me to see where the cows, and also my horse—'l'Empereur,' as they called him—were concealed. The change in his manner put me in the very highest spirits, the beauty and the common-sense of Christine having quite won my heart. She was always in my thoughts, for I had never seen her equal. Of course, her father had seen that from the beginning, but then he did not know my circumstances. Now that he knew everything, I hoped that, if she would consent to marry me, he would not object.

The farm, situated as it was between Von der Tann's Bavarians and the Forest of Marchenoir, where we were forming our new armies in the west, was then in a fairly safe position, but at any time it might be the centre of a skirmish or a battle. It was a strongly built place, and whichever side held it, it would probably be shelled and burnt before it was taken—as, alas! it was a few weeks later. This thought would sometimes come to the minds of all of us, and cause our merry laughter to cease.

It often fretted me to think that when all were so busy I was a mere drone, and I suggested that I could do some churning.

'Well, if it pleases you, you shall do it to-morrow when I bring the milk back,' said Christine.

So at eight the next morning I found myself in the great dairy.

'It's a very fine dairy,' I said. 'You have had it all whitewashed.'

'Yes,' she answered, lowering her voice. 'We have two cellars. There is one crammed full of corn, barley, and oats right under us. We had this bricked up; but, of course, the new brickwork would have shown, so we had to whiten the whole. Often as they have been in here, the German hogs have never dreamt of what is beneath.'

At that moment she was emptying a pail of milk into the churn, and the bright eyes of the splendid girl, who stood there with her sleeves turned up, showing her plump arms, sparkled with merriment as she thought of how, for once, her hated foes had come off second best.

'Grâce à Dieu, we have not had them lately. They are too busy down Orléans way, so perhaps they will leave us alone.'

They had brought a chair in for me, and placing it by the churn, I began to turn the handle.

'Yes, sergeant,' she said approvingly, 'that will come soon;' and away she went.

It was cold in the dairy, and I made the thing spin with a vengeance.

'Mon Dieu!' she said when she came back and looked inside, 'you have worked hard. You know,' she continued in a softer tone, 'it is really very, very kind of you.'

'Bah! I would do a precious sight more than that for your beaux yeux, because'——

What I might have said there and then Heaven only knows, she looked so pretty; but at that moment there was a clatter in the great courtyard.

'Ô Ciel!' she exclaimed, turning a trifle paler as she looked out of the window. 'These brutes are coming again! See! there are only a few now, but I know what it is. Quel malheur, father is out!'

They were Bavarian Uhlans in dark-green uniforms, with light-blue and white pennons to their lances.

'I will come with you,' I said; and she called to the old servant Élise to keep the churn going.

Hobbling beside her, I went out.

'This,' said the sergeant, holding out a paper, 'is to tell you, monsieur et madame'—a term which brought the roses to Christine's cheeks—'that you are to get ready to receive two hundred men and horses.'

'My father,' she said, 'who owns this farm, is out. You may search where you like, but you will find no fodder for the horses, as everything has been taken by those who have been here before.'

'Well, you must explain that to Colonel Von Misthausen,' replied the sergeant.

As it happened, they had their own fodder with them.

VI.

Ever since Bazeilles, when they shot women and threw babies out of the windows, the Bavarians had had a very bad name. But the discipline of this particular regiment was strict, and not a word was said by the Uhlans that could be objected to, even before their officers arrived.

The men of the regiment were distributed for the night among various farms and houses, but the colonel and the superior officers were quartered on Lonavet, and the two girls had to wait on them. I could not bear to see them doing this work without trying to help, so I hobbled about and did what I could. Little did those Germans think, as they spoke in their hog-like gutturals in the most open manner about their movements and the war generally, that I understood what they said. One major was complaining to the colonel about his horse having gone lame. He put it down to the roads, and wondered if they were all as bad.

'Well, Schwobe knows more about that,' replied his chief. And then Schwobe told them that the roads were normally very good indeed; only, the artillery had cut them up. He went on to say that he had been all over the district the year before in a gig, under the guise of a commercial traveller for an imaginary firm of wine-merchants of Coblenz, named Meyer. This and many another horrible tale of deceit I heard, and such was my anger that I left the great kitchen for a time, as the laughter that greeted each story of systematic spying drove me wild. I could not have imagined that such cold-blooded treachery could exist.

The next morning, soon after the Germans had taken their departure, the old count arrived in his brougham to see me, bringing with him some more game and grapes. I told him what I had heard. He was astonished that I knew German. He was as furious as I had been at first at what I had learnt, not so much at the deception practised, as that was, he said, a ruse de guerre, but at the simplicity of his countrymen in not seeing through it. Usually he stopped and chatted quietly for some time, but now he became restless and excited about the information I was able to give him as to the strength of some of their forces and the routes they were following. When he was leaving he patted me on the back, and told Julie, who happened to be present, that I was a wonderful fellow; that he must be off, as he thought good use might be made of what I had told him. As for me, I heartily wished afterwards that I had held my tongue.

Every day I was getting stronger; and when Christine asked me one afternoon whether I should like to go with her and see where the cows and my horse were hidden, I gladly consented.

Christine had naturally a very beautiful and sympathetic disposition, a rare quality either in men or in women, but all the more extraordinary in one so young and strong as she was.

'It is not more than two kilometres, but if you get tired you must take my arm.'

'Oh, well, in that case I shall soon find I am tired,' I replied slyly.

'Oh no, you won't,' she retorted merrily, with a toss of her head. 'I know what you can do. If I thought it was too far, I should not let you go. But I am glad you are coming,' she continued, 'as we must sell the cows, and a man is calling to see father this afternoon. You will be able to help me to bring two of them back as soon as it is dark enough. We are obliged to sell them, now that the snow is coming. You cannot hide footsteps in the snow. Apart from the Germans, there are francs-tireurs about, and one fine day we might find the whole lot gone.'

The place where we were going had been a monastery before the Revolution, but when this was totally destroyed the grounds were turned into a wood. The immense cellars remained, however, and it was in them that, at the first coming of the invader, the surrounding peasants and farmers had hidden their sheep and cattle.

Christine had given me a stick and a lantern to carry, and we lighted the latter. The steps descending to the cellars had a sort of broad gangway.

'We have four cows left,' she said, 'and these two,' pointing to a couple of white Charolais animals, 'are the ones I want. Prenez garde. Rosette is a bit ombrageuse with strangers; so I will take her, and you take Fifine.'

We soon got halters on the two cows, but we had no end of trouble with Rosette. Christine was tugging as hard as she could, and we had got half-way up the gangway, when we heard voices up above, and the clatter of hoofs.

'Sainte Vierge,' exclaimed the girl, 'if they are Prussians we are fairly caught!'

But we were quickly reassured.

'Is that you, Mademoiselle Lonavet?' said a voice.

'Yes,' she answered.

'Well, I have seen your father. I have come from M. le Comte. You have a horse down there, and I want to see it.'

Looking up in the dusk, we saw a young lieutenant of the Chasseurs, with Jean, the count's grandson, on his pony. We got the cows up, gave them some hay, and then we all went down again.

'That is where the bullet struck it,' said Christine, holding the lantern to the horse's shoulder; 'and there is the crown and the N. It is a fine horse, and has a nice temper.'

He was a handsome young fellow, this chasseur, and he looked at the horse, and he looked at the girl, and as the light from the lantern fell on her beautiful face I saw the gleam of admiration in his eyes.

'Vous êtes bonne vendeuse, mademoiselle,' he said undecidedly. 'Your father wants fifteen hundred francs; that's a lot for a half-starved twelve-year old.'

'Is that all?' said Christine. 'I never thought he would part with it in these times under two thousand francs.'

'Why not say three thousand francs?' he replied with a laugh.

'Ah, but he's a beautiful horse!' continued Christine. 'I shall be sorry to part with him;' and as she spoke she began stroking the animal's forehead and kissing his velvety nose.

'Oh, what waste of kisses!' I said.

'Yes; is he not lucky?' remarked the lieutenant.

'Is he?' said Christine merrily. 'Well, that's my affair.'

'Look here,' said the chasseur; 'I will come in the daylight to-morrow, tell your father, at eight.'

'As you please,' replied Christine; and mounting the steps, he disappeared.

We got the cows home, and the purchaser, who was waiting for them, took them away in the dark, after the two girls had kissed the placid Fifine, whom they did not like parting with. I don't know what price the cows went for, but Lonavet was highly pleased with the transaction, and then began talking about the horse.

'Take twelve hundred and fifty francs for it, father,' said Christine, 'while you can get it. Any day the Germans'——

While she was speaking there was a knock, and the lieutenant came in. 'Ah, bon soir, M. Lonavet,' he said. 'When I got to the château I found I must start early to-morrow; so look here,' he continued, putting a bundle of notes on the table; 'I will give you one thousand francs for that old rosse. You know I have not really examined it, and I do not much care whether I get the beast or not.'

But Lonavet would not take the offer, for he saw the eager look in the young fellow's eyes.

'What do you say, mademoiselle?' asked the lieutenant, appealing to Christine.

'Oh monsieur, c'est votre affaire et non pas la mienne.'

'Eh bien,' said the chasseur, 'this offer is the last: twelve hundred and fifty francs, and a kiss from mademoiselle to seal the bargain.'

'Well, you can give me one,' laughed Christine; 'but I don't say I will return it.'

There was a dubious smile on the face of her father; but he saw the notes before him, and the sight was too much for him. Anyway, he had got the steed for nothing.

'Done,' said Lonavet; 'and I'll go with you.'

The kiss was given—and returned by the blushing Christine.

'Merci mille fois, mademoiselle,' said the gallant chasseur with a satisfied smile. 'Whatever the horse turns out to be, that kiss will always be the best part of the transaction.'

Now, though I had never received such a favour as that, I did not feel angry or jealous; for somehow—I don't know why—I felt that Christine thought as much of me as she did of him.

'Well, father's done a fine day's work,' said Julie to me when we were alone, her sister having disappeared.

'Yes; and so has the lieutenant,' I replied, 'with that kiss.'

'Oh, don't you mind; you will get one too before you've done, if you only have the pluck.'

The words filled me with hope, and as I thought of them I forgot the war and all the misery around me.

(Continued on page 376.)

ROMANCES OF MISSING HEIRS.

By JOHN G. ROWE.

EARLY in February 1917 Mr Justice Coleridge, in the Probate Court, dismissed a claim of declaration, under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, that George Beresford, a gardener, was the lawful issue of the fifth Marquess of Waterford by his first wife, and therefore entitled to the peerage, which is now held by the seventh marquess, a youth of eighteen. The claimant to the peerage, who was originally known as Tooth, had taken the name of Beresford. Lord Beresford is a great-uncle of the present marquess.

On 2nd April the same year the Probate Court gave leave to presume the death of the Honourable Francis Patrick Clements, who was a son of the late Earl of Leitrim, and heir to his elder brother, the present earl. It was stated that Mr Clements was formerly an officer in the navy, but resigned his commission owing to lung trouble. It was in 1907, when he was twenty-two years of age, that he suddenly disappeared whilst staying in London. 'According to the Police Gazette, he had been working as a stoker on a vessel bound for New York. He left the ship on its arrival in the United States, and has never been heard of since.'

Strangely enough, in the same year, I believe, as Mr Clements thus vanished from human ken—that is, 1907—the Dublin Probate Court heard a remarkable romance of another Irish heir. On that occasion a Mr Robert Leeson Porter applied for letters of administration over the estate of his late father, Richard Burton Porter, of Belleview, County Cork. The story, as related in court, was that, some twenty-seven years before, the applicant, Leeson Porter, left Ireland for the United States. In 1888 he was arrested in North Carolina in mistake for another man named Scott Parton. Parton was 'wanted' for murder, and it was of this terrible crime that Leeson Porter found himself accused. Several persons swore that he was Parton, and it is even stated that 'photographs of the two men were identical.' The consequence was that Porter was kept in jail for a long time. It would seem that eventually the real culprit, Parton, was laid by the heels, and Porter's innocence vindicated, although my authority does not say so. On being released, however, the luckless Porter temporarily lost his senses. 'Subsequently he heard that he was being sought as the missing heir to his father's estate, and came to Ireland.' The newspaper cutting before me states that 'the judge granted the order for administration, subject to advertisements being published in the United States to see if any other claimant could be found.'

My commonplace-book contains records of another real-life romance, connected this time with a missing heiress, about the year 1902, as well as I can calculate, for, unfortunately, I didn't date the cutting at the time. Beginning, 'A telegram from Butte, Montana (says the Standard correspondent at New York), tells the story of a genuine romance,' the cutting goes on to narrate that a Mr John Anderson, a Swede, had for years been looking for his cousin, a young woman, who was wanted as the heiress to a fortune in the custody of the Swedish courts. Her parents had emigrated to the States, and been murdered in a foray by Cree Indians. Their daughter disappeared at the time. Mr John Anderson went out to the Wild West in search of her, and made exhaustive inquiries as to her fate. He was talking with some Crees one day, when he noticed a white-haired squaw, called 'Sarah Bigcloud.' The account before me says 'white-haired,' but I should imagine it is a slip for 'a white squaw with fair hair.' Anderson questioned the woman, and learned that she knew nothing about her early life except that her parents had been white, and had been killed by the Indians. She had been brought up by the tribe, and had married an Indian, who had recently been killed by a snowslide. She produced a ring with an inscription, which she was unable to read: 'To Mathilda, from Papa and Mamma, 1885.' Mathilda was the name of Anderson's missing cousin, and 1885 was the year of the parents' murder. 'After Anderson has put the facts to legal proof,' the account before me concludes, 'the couple will return to claim the inheritance.'

In August 1904 a Burton-on-Trent cabman, with one leg, Benjamin Tyrrell by name, claimed to be the heir to the extinct Tyrrell baronetcy and the Thornton Hall estate at Crakemarsh Hall. Several Burton-on-Trent lawyers considered the case, and thought 'that he had a genuine claim to the baronetcy, but said that he could not obtain the estate owing to the Real Property Limitation Act of 1874, which declares that the possession of real property for twelve years without acknowledgment of title to any person gives the possessor an absolute title, and an action to turn such possessor out cannot be sustained.' It was, therefore, alleged that all the satisfaction Tyrrell, the cabman claimant, was likely to gain if he pushed his claims to the furthest legal extremity, would be 'a penniless baronetcy.' What the upshot of the matter was I have not been able to learn: I saw nothing further about it.

A Manchester evening newspaper, about 1903 or 1904, published in its 'agony column' the following advertisement: 'Notice to lady and gentleman who fifty-one years ago lost their child, a little girl, with light-blue eyes, light flaxen hair, and fair skin, in Eccles, near Manchester. Any one wishing for further particulars, apply to R. Shaw, 52 Harold Street, New Clee, Grimsby.' A newspaper reporter apparently interviewed Mr Shaw, who told 'a curious and romantic story.' His dead wife was the little girl referred to in the advertisement. He had married her thirty-six years before, and she had died the previous March, aged fifty-three. When he first met her she was living with an old lady in Hull, whom she called 'Granny.' 'The old lady was a widow, and appeared to have plenty of money.' The two young people married 'on the sly,' as the old lady was antagonistic. His wife then told him that 'she could remember playing in a beautiful garden in front of a big house with stone steps. Suddenly a dark lady leaned over the wall and pressed some sweets upon her. Then a handkerchief was placed over her mouth, and the next thing she remembered was being in a train with 'Granny' (Mrs Payne).

'Granny,' it appears, relented towards Mr and Mrs Shaw, and eventually came to live with them, though she still frequently expressed her disapproval of the match. 'She should not have thrown herself away on a labourer,' she is alleged to have said, 'when she could have had a lord.' Once, when she thought she was going to die, 'Granny' called Mrs Shaw to her, and said, 'Maggie, I have deceived you all my life. Your father was a very wealthy man living in Eccles, near the racecourse. You may find the house, because there is a very peculiar tree in front of it. There was a woman in love with your father, but he rejected her for your mother. The woman scorned was also wealthy. She stole you while your parents were at the races, and she gave me nine hundred pounds to take you away and bring you up here in Hull.'

Mrs Shaw took no action in the matter, as she did not wish to get 'Granny' into trouble. She believed her maiden name was 'Dent' or 'Dennis,' and she told of a visit that she once made with 'Granny' to Manchester to see a lady, who at the sight of her nearly fainted, and, turning to 'Granny,' asked, 'What have you brought her here for?' 'I promised you I would, and I have kept my word,' 'Granny' replied. Such was the extraordinary story published in the newspapers at the time when Mr Shaw inserted his advertisement—which he did, he explained, in the hope of finding some clue that would establish the parentage of the woman he had made his wife. But whether he was successful I do not know. I include the strange tale in my list for what it may be worth in the reader's opinion.

But the missing-heir romance par excellence is the famous Tichborne case. Who has not heard of it? It was the great sensation of the year 1871. The Tichbornes were a very old English Roman Catholic family. They had a fine house and estates three miles from Alresford, in Hampshire, and the property was worth twenty-four thousand pounds a year. Sir James Tichborne had two sons—the elder of whom was Roger Charles Tichborne—by his wife, a French lady. Roger spent the early part of his youth in France, and in 1845, when he was sixteen years of age, he was sent to Stonyhurst, the well-known Jesuit college. There he particularly shone in Euclid. Two years later he joined the military school at Sandhurst, and was much laughed at for mixing up French with English in conversation. In 1849 he was a subaltern in the Carabineers, at that time stationed at Portobello Barracks in Dublin. On a holiday visit home in 1850 he met and fell in love with his cousin, a Miss Kate Doughty; but the young lady's father, as well as his own, opposed the match, and, in a pet, Roger sold out of the army and decided to travel. He went to Havre, and set sail thence, in 1853, on board a sailing-vessel for Valparaiso. In South America he led an adventurous life, and ultimately made his way to Rio de Janeiro, where, in April 1854, he embarked in the sailing-ship Bella for New York. In July 1854 his family received word that the Bella had foundered at sea with all on board.

Lady Tichborne clung to the fond hope that her son was still alive, and advertised widely for him; and in 1866 a letter was received from Wagga-Wagga, New South Wales, Australia, the writer of which stated that he was Sir Roger, and asked for funds to pay his passage home. This man ultimately came to England, and Lady Tichborne, then in her dotage, acknowledged him to be her son. He explained that he had been picked up and taken to Melbourne, where he assumed the name of Thomas Castro, and married a Roman Catholic woman named Mary Anne Bryant.

The heir-at-law to the Tichborne baronetcy and estates was a boy at school at the time—Henry Alfred Joseph Tichborne, the son of Roger's younger brother. This boy's guardians denounced the Australian claimant as an impostor, whose real name was Arthur Orton, the son of a butcher of High Street, Wapping, London. When he left England in 1853 Roger Tichborne was a painfully thin young man; the 'Claimant' was a positive 'mountain of flesh,' a hole being cut in the table at which he sat in court to accommodate his obesity. A trial in the Common Pleas followed, and was 'unexampled for continuous duration,' lasting one hundred and eighty-eight days.

Charles Russell, afterwards Lord Russell of Killowen, Lord Chief-Justice of England, 1894–1900, fought the case for the boy heir-at-law; and the late Dr Edward Vaughan Kenealy, the ex-M.P. for Stoke-on-Trent, pleaded the cause of the 'Claimant,' who was completely bowled out in cross-examination. He did not know his alleged mother's Christian names, nor could he speak a word of French, although Roger Tichborne knew more French than English; he could not remember the names of any of the fathers at Stonyhurst, and believed the Asses' Bridge (the humorous name generally given to the 5th Proposition in the first book of Euclid) was a bridge near Stonyhurst. 'The lost Sir Roger was proved to be tattooed in a very remarkable manner, while the "Claimant" was not.'

The jury stopped the case, and Lord Chief-Justice Bovill committed the 'Claimant' for perjury. He was duly tried for this crime in 1873, and sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude. Released on ticket-of-leave in 1884, Orton died in poverty and obscurity in 1898.

SUMMER.

SWEET, who will walk with me? Will you,
While skies are blue?
Wilt wander with me, hand-in-hand,
In Summerland?
The hawthorns trail a milky way—
Young April's fled—the world's at May,
With song of birds, and scent of hay,
And skies of blue.

Sweet, who will walk with me? Ah! say,
When skies are gray,
Wilt clasp a lover's maimèd hands? . . .
Then desert lands
Shall blossom as the veriest bower,
A rainbow ride above each shower,
A sunbeam glint through every hour
Of every day.

For Love shall walk—a pioneer—
Before us, dear;
With fairy lantern lit and trimmed,
And over-brimmed
With magic oil. Ah! in thine eyes
His limpid light reflected lies;
And Life is Summer, be the skies
Storm-cast or clear.

LILIAN HOLMES.

Printed and Published by W. & R. CHAMBERS, LIMITED, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

Chambers's Journal
SEVENTH SERIES

A RECALCITRANT CHIEF.

By C. G. NURSE.

I.

IT was nearly noon on a hot-weather day at Aden, and I was seated under the punkah in the anteroom of the native infantry mess after a late breakfast. My outdoor duties, begun before sunrise, had been followed by a couple of hours' office-work, including some mess accounts; and as the newspapers, now nearly a week old, had ceased to interest me, I had been passing the time in trying to calculate my prospects of promotion by looking over a copy of the Indian monthly army list. Owing to a plethora of senior officers, these did not appear to be particularly rosy, but 'hope springs eternal,' and in any case there were enough discomforts in the present to discourage undue worrying over ultimate possibilities. Having finished my second cheroot, I was contemplating a temporary retirement to my quarters for my usual siesta, when a figure, sun-helmet in hand, appeared in the doorway. It proved to be the adjutant; and after pausing for a moment to allow his eyes to become accustomed to the subdued light of the room, which was in strong contrast to the glare outside, he approached my chair and said, 'You have to report at the general's house with the C.O. at 4 P.M. to-day—white uniform, with sword—and the C.O. wishes you to get a bazaar conveyance and call for him at 3.15.'

'What's the trouble now?' I inquired.

'I haven't the least idea; but the C.O. has just had an urgent letter from the Staff Office.'

'All right. I'll call for him at 3.15.'

In the tropics, especially during the hot weather, official business is as a rule transacted in the morning, and my midday rest was somewhat disturbed owing to uncertainty as to why I had been sent for at an unusual hour. I was not conscious of any recent dereliction of duty, but my last interview with the general had not been, so far as I was concerned, altogether a pleasant one. I had, in military parlance, been severely 'told off' for having accompanied one of the tribes of the Aden Hinterland on the warpath against a neighbouring tribe. My part in the business had been merely that of an interested spectator, and I had taken no actual hand in the fighting. But the British Government always maintains an attitude of strict neutrality in all intertribal dissensions, and the general's view that the mere presence of a British officer with one of the tribes might cause misapprehension was probably a sound one.

On the way to Steamer Point I tried unsuccessfully to 'pump' the colonel as to the reason why we had been sent for, but he disclaimed all knowledge on the point. The heat was oppressive, and the light cover of the four-wheeled conveyance, built of American hickory-wood, in which we were seated seemed to focus the sun's rays rather than mitigate their power. The road between the crater and the general's residence is entirely devoid of shade, and it was with no little relief that we descended in the porch of Government House. We were shown into the private office, where we found the general, who is also political resident, and his first assistant, seated at a table on which were spread various maps and plans. The chief staff-officer of the district was also present; and shortly after our arrival the captain of a cruiser then in harbour and the commander of the Indian Marine ship C—— were announced. I began to feel convinced that there was something unusual in the air, and awaited with a good deal of curiosity the solution of the question why I, a junior officer, had been included in what was evidently to be a kind of conference or council.

Presently the general opened the meeting by saying: 'Gentlemen, you may be aware that we have treaty relations with most of the chiefs in this part of Arabia. A certain sultan, whose territory touches the coast between here and the Persian Gulf, has recently been disregarding his treaty obligations, and it is the intention of Government to give him a lesson.'

The general then pointed out the situation on the map, and explained that it was proposed to send a small force by sea, with orders to land at night, and attempt to surround the village in which the recalcitrant sultan* was reported to have his headquarters. If the sultan could be captured, he was to be brought to Aden, with a view to impressing him with the power of Government, and in order to persuade him that

* The term does not imply any very exalted rank, as all petty chiefs in south Arabia call themselves 'sultan.'

 [All Rights Reserved.]

treaties could not be considered mere 'scraps of paper.'

Turning to me, the general said, 'You know Arabic, and appear to have a liking for adventure; so I have selected you to command the small force to be employed, which will consist of a hundred men of your own regiment, and a few sappers and miners. The latter may be required, as it may be necessary to blow up the fort in the village where the sultan usually resides. Colonel W—— will allow you to pick your own men, as I want to have a thoroughly reliable force, though the matter is to be carried through, if possible, without firing a shot.'

Further details were then arranged, and I was informed that an Arab assistant to the resident, who knew the sultan personally, would be sent with me, lest the Arabs might substitute some underling for the man who was wanted. My party were to proceed to their destination in a troopship of the Royal Indian Marine, and as the appearance of a man-of-war would probably cause a general stampede into the interior on the part of the Arabs, it was arranged that H.M.S. —— should appear, ready for action, at noon, after I had effected a landing.

II.

The next few days were spent in selecting my men, and in seeing to details of equipment. I took the men chiefly from my own double company, and included the subahdar major, a stout old veteran of about fifty, who was thoroughly reliable, if not so nimble as he had been in the days of his youth. Secrecy had to be maintained regarding our destination, and I let it be supposed that we were to embark for the Somali coast, which was frequently the scene of tribal disturbances.

When the day of our departure came I was suffering from fever, with a temperature of over 100 degrees, but I said nothing about it, lest some one else should be sent in my place. A first independent command, on what was virtually active service, is a chance no young officer would care to miss. As soon as I had seen my men comfortably settled on board ship, I took a big dose of quinine and turned in. Next day my temperature was normal, though I still felt a bit shaky as the result of the fever. The weather was fine and the sea smooth, so that my men did not suffer from sea-sickness—which was a great relief to me, as the average sepoy is worse than a lady-passenger when the sea is at all rough.

Our orders were to keep well out at sea till after dark, and then to approach our destination warily, in order that the Arabs might have no inkling of our arrival. At about 10 P.M., when the Arabian coastline became visible, having given orders for my men to be ready to fall in at a moment's notice, I joined the commander on the bridge. We kept along the coast, at a distance of a few miles, trying to make out from the chart the promontory that was our landmark. About 1 A.M. the commander became convinced that we must have passed it, and we consequently put about and steamed westward, keeping closer to the shore. At last we sighted our destination, a rocky hill, on the east side of which was a small bay, affording in fair weather a landing-place out of view of the village, which was situated on the west of the hill. We anchored in the bay, and carefully scanned the point where it had been arranged for me to land, only to find that the whole coastline was covered with surf, as there was a strong breeze from the south-east.

'Quite impossible to land you there at night under present conditions,' said the commander. 'Your whole party would probably be swamped. I'm afraid we shall have to put to sea again, and wait for a more favourable opportunity.'

'But what about H.M.S. ——?' I inquired. 'Can you be sure of intercepting her? If she arrives before I have landed my little lot, it will upset the whole apple-cart.'

'We can try to intercept her; but, of course, we shall have to get out of sight of land, and there is just a chance that we might miss her.'

I thereupon suggested to Commander B—— that we should attempt a landing on the western side, which would be under the lee of the promontory.

'I could send a steam-pinnace there, towing a couple of boats,' said the commander; 'but, of course, they would not contain your whole party.'

'How many men would they accommodate?' I inquired.

'About thirty; perhaps thirty-five.'

I had to decide rapidly, as we were already several hours later than had been intended; so I said, 'Very well, I will take thirty men, or as many as we can pack into the steam-pinnace and two boats, and you must do your best to land the rest later on. If, after daylight, you find you can land them on the eastern side, please do so; otherwise, send them where the first party lands.'

The boats were at once lowered, and I managed to pack in them about thirty-five men, taking my place in the pinnace with the R.I.M. officer who was in charge. I had carefully studied on the map the position of the village which it was my object to surround, and when we passed it, just about the 'false dawn,' I could distinguish no lights, so I hoped that the inhabitants were unaware of our arrival.

III.

Dawn was breaking as I landed my party about a mile beyond the village, and I at once sent back the boats to the ship, and proceeded to draw a cordon across the neck of the promontory, a distance of nearly a mile. The officer of the R.I.M. who had brought me ashore had landed with me, eager for some excitement, and as he spoke Hindustani, he took charge of part of the line for me while I disposed of the rest of the party. By the time I had placed my men it was daylight, and I could see figures running about beside the village, which was about half a mile from my nearest picket.

I scanned the ground carefully with my field-glasses, and a more inhospitable-looking corner of the earth I had never seen. Behind the village rose a rocky hill, and in rear of my line of pickets more rocks; all the rest of the ground was covered with sand, with some stunted thorn-bushes. There was no cultivated ground within sight, but a couple of small boats lying on the beach near the village suggested that sea-fishing and the landing of a few goods for transport to the interior might afford the inhabitants a scanty means of livelihood.

Presently a couple of Arabs appeared, carrying matchlocks with lighted fuses, and asked who we were, and what was our business. I replied that our business was to carry out the orders of the Sirkal,* and they therefore returned to the village not much the wiser. I ascertained from them, however, that the first intimation they had had of our arrival had been the appearance, on their return journey, of the boats in which we had come ashore. I hoped, accordingly, that the sultan might still be in the village. As the number of men at my disposal was barely enough to hold the neck of the promontory, I determined to await the arrival of the rest of the party before advancing towards the village. The breeze, which had been blowing since the previous evening, had by this time died down, and the sun's power was making itself felt. Taking advantage of the scanty shade afforded by a thorn-bush, I sat down on a rock in rear of one of my pickets, field-glasses in hand, uncertain from which direction my reinforcements might arrive. The mirage, which was increasing every minute, soon began to render distant objects indistinct, and after a time, owing to its effects, I could no longer see the Arab village. An interlude was afforded by the arrival of a naik and three men from the picket on my left, bringing with them a couple of Arabs.

'Do dushman pukra' ('Two of the enemy captured'), reported the naik.

'What were they doing?' I inquired.

'They were trying to pass through our line.'

'All right. Leave them in charge of No. 1 picket, and go back to your own party.'

The two prisoners, both elderly Arabs, were evidently very much frightened; but I soon reassured them, and they squatted down resignedly in rear of the picket.

After a time I caught sight of what appeared to be a body of men advancing in my direction over some rocky ground to the eastward, but before I could clearly distinguish them they disappeared into the mirage. Then I heard a challenge from the picket on my left, the tramp of armed men over the rocks, and a few minutes later my reinforcements appeared, headed by the portly figure of the subahdar major, who duly reported 'all present,' and stated, with evident satisfaction, that, in spite of a difficult landing, 'not a cartridge had got wet.'

IV.

I was now in a position to round up the village; so, leaving my pickets where they were, I advanced with the rest of the party. The village consisted of about forty huts, with a small, two-storeyed stone tower. I found the Arabs in a great state of excitement. Most of them were armed with matchlocks, and a few had rifles of a more or less obsolete type; but they made no show of resistance, and lined up for inspection when ordered. The Arab assistant-resident failed to find the sultan among them, and all the men I questioned disclaimed any knowledge of his whereabouts. I therefore selected a couple of the older men, and sent them into the village with orders to bring out all the women and children before I commenced a house-to-house search. The women showed great signs of alarm, many of them weeping, and some had to be forcibly dragged from the huts.

I rather expected to find that the sultan had taken refuge in his tower, but this was drawn blank; and I now ordered my men to search the huts. The sepoys entered into the work con amore; and after a short time a havildar (sergeant) appeared, dragging by the scruff of the neck an Arab of about thirty, whom he had found hiding under a heap of forage in one of the huts. He was dressed in the usual Arab kilt, and appeared to be terrified. There was nothing to distinguish him from the other inhabitants of the village, and I was rather surprised when the Arab assistant-resident recognised him as the recalcitrant sultan who had been the cause of all the trouble. He protested strongly against his liberty being interfered with, but I placed him under a guard, and awaited the arrival of the cruiser, now nearly due.

H.M.S. —— arrived at the appointed time, and the captain expressed his disappointment that his services were not required, as he would have welcomed the opportunity to send a landing-party, which would have been a pleasant change for his men after constant board-ship routine. Major A——, the first assistant-resident, landed with the captain, and some of the Arab akils (elders) approached him, and asked that the Sirkal might deal gently with their chief, and that at any rate his life might be spared. They seemed much relieved when Major A—— assured them on this point, and explained that had the sultan duly recognised his treaty obligations, he might have cut all their throats had he pleased, and Government would not have interfered. But treaties must be observed, and if they would escape trouble in the future, they must keep their chief up to the mark in that respect.

* Sirkal = Government; the Arabic rendering of the Hindustani word Sirkar.

A couple of hours later my party re-embarked on the Indian Marine ship C——, and I was able to get a bath and a square meal, of both of which I was in urgent need. Our prisoner maintained a surly and defiant attitude, which was not improved by the playful gestures of some of the sepoys, who kept drawing their hands across their throats as a hint of the probable fate that was awaiting him. I soon, however, stopped their jesting, and after a time the sultan began to lose his terror-stricken appearance, and assumed an attitude of resignation. He even went so far as to have a few words' conversation with me when he found that I could speak Arabic.

The return journey to Aden was uneventful, and in due course I handed over my prisoner to the political authorities, and made my way to Government House to report progress. The general expressed his satisfaction that the object of the expedition had been accomplished without the expenditure of a single cartridge, and I returned to my quarters to write my report, and resume the usual monotonous round of regimental routine.

V.

Some three or four months later I was passing a coffee-shop in the bazaar, where a number of natives were seated at small round tables sipping coffee and playing dominoes. An Arab near me rose from his seat and made me a profound salaam. I answered his salute, and was about to pass on, when it suddenly flashed upon my mind that his face was familiar to me, and I recognised my former prisoner. The hang-dog expression on his countenance had entirely disappeared; he looked well nourished, and was dressed like a better-class Arab of the towns. I inquired how fortune had treated him, and he replied, 'Janàb [Your honour], I have eaten the bread of affliction, and drunk the water of solitude; but now I am a free man, and return to my own country after a few days.'

'May you have long life! You have doubtless learned many things since you arrived here.'

'Sahib, I was an ignorant Bedu* [nomad] when I thought to oppose the will of the Sirkal. La yanfah al hadar min al kadr [There is no escaping fate]. I have now seen the power of the Sirkal, the ships, and the guns in the forts. I came here a prisoner, but I return an ally of the Ingliz [English].'

'Take care to prove faithful to your allegiance,' I said. 'Fi amàn Allah' (literally, 'In the protection of God'—the exact equivalent of our 'Good-bye'). 'Forget not that the arm of the Sirkal is long!'

'I am not likely to forget it. Farewell, sahib! May your path be prosperous!'

He evidently bore me no ill-will for the share I had taken in his conversion.

THE SEARCHERS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MUCH perturbed by the thought, I was making a pretence of breakfasting, when the sound of voices from the hall reached me, and the Chief Constable—an old friend of the colonel, whom I had known since my boyhood—was announced.

'An inexplicable business,' said he, after greetings and condolence. 'All we have found out is that there are certain footprints which make it clear that the man came out of the wood at its nearest point to the house, and after crossing the lawn to the north of the Laird's Room, went to the toolhouse. His footprints are not distinct on the lawn; but in a flower-plot near his exit from the wood, and on the black mould between the lawn and the toolhouse, they are plain. From the toolhouse he took a short ladder, which he carried to the gunroom window, and by its aid got admittance to the house. Angus's statement shows that when he examined the window after the colonel was carried to bed, it was closed, but the catch was unfastened. The burglar either had an accomplice inside, or he had contrived somehow or other to gain access to the house beforehand, and had tampered with it himself. Once in the gunroom, and the rest was easy. He had only to slip a few yards along the corridor to reach the door of the Laird's Room. Having entered, he rifled the safe and the colonel's pockets and decamped, leaving the ladder lying on the path below the gunroom window, where it still is. Then he appears to have crossed the path to the lawn again and made off, keeping to the grass, for the only other distinct footprints are a considerable distance away, near the entrance to the avenue. They lead through the lodge gate to the middle of the public road. There we lose sight of them on the hard beaten surface. But they are the footprints of the same man, either running or walking cautiously on tiptoe. There is no doubt that the footprints are the same as those discovered after the mysterious visits which were reported to me some time ago by Colonel Forbes. I posted a couple of my men to prevent the prints from being obliterated.'

* The singular form of the word 'Bedouin.'

We went out by the front-door, where an inspector and a subordinate were waiting. The eastern wing, shaped like an L, is bordered by a path which runs between the wall of the house and a lawn dotted with flower-plots. The Chief led the way, keeping to the lawn, and pointed out that there were no footprints on the path. Round the corner of the path we reached the short horizontal branch of the L close to the gunroom. Near it is an open space of the same character as the pathway, with no grass on its surface of ordinary black mould. It lies between the end of the lawn and some outhouses, and here the footprints told us their owner's movements as though we had been looking at him. They were unmistakably new, and their track formed the sides of a triangle, its apex at the toolhouse door, its base a line between a point near the corner of the lawn and a spot below the gunroom window.

The inspector silently handed me a lens, and I bent over the footprints. The markings were distinct, even without the lens's aid. The first print which I examined was that of a left foot, a broad sole with large nail-marks round the edges; but when I turned my attention to the right foot, sure enough, there was the plain imprint of a triangular patch in the centre. It was clear to demonstration that, as the Chief had said, the footprints were those of 'the prowler'—the man whom the colonel had seen earlier in the year; that he had walked across the open space to the toolhouse, then to the gunroom window, through which he climbed, and, his dark work done, had left by the window and crossed the pathway, to find himself again on the lawn.

'Now come this way,' said the Chief. Between the edge of the wood and the north-east corner of the house he halted, and pointed to a little flower-plot. On its soft surface, the toe pointing towards the house, was the deep mark of the man's right foot with the triangular patch. It was obvious that he had come from the wood, and in the darkness had blundered into the flower-bed.

Still keeping to the grass, we now retraced our steps and walked towards the lodge gate. About a dozen yards from the lodge were more prints, but of the toes only, as if the man had been running quietly or walking on tiptoe. They led from the grass border through the gate to the middle of the road. There, as the Chief had told me, the hard beaten surface had not retained an impression.

'My men found no further trace of them, although they have searched all round. Even the footprints in the village about a mile away have been examined, but with no result. I confess that I am puzzled,' the Chief confided to me as we went back to the house. 'Yet the main facts are simple. The man knew The Bield and the whereabouts of the hidden safe. He must have seen the light in the room, and known that the colonel had not gone to bed. I believe that he wanted to get the key of the safe, and was ready to murder its owner if he resisted, but found his job simplified by the colonel's collapse. He is no ordinary criminal. He has been seen thrice, and each time he disappeared mysteriously. Now he coolly turns up with his plans matured, ready for action. He makes no attempt to loot, and I imagine there is nothing valuable enough in the house to induce a cracksman to take a special interest in it. What motive, then, had he? Do you know?'

'I think I do,' I answered, and gave him an outline of my adventures in Italy and London. 'He is one of "The Searchers," and his motive is to steal a certain paper. "The Searchers" will stick at nothing. They are hand-in-glove with the Camorra, and, like it, they are a very old organisation. They are few in number, but highly versatile, for they include among their operations anything from company swindling and "flash" note manufacture to plain murder.'

'The Camorra! I have heard of the blackguardly society, although I have not had the pleasure of meeting it professionally. But I know that it has a long arm. In one case it hustled a marked man up and down the world for five years, and got him in the end. He was knifed at Montevideo. But about this paper you referred to—has the man got it?'

'That I cannot tell. The colonel may have hidden it. I have not had time to search, but I will do so this afternoon.'

We went to the Laird's Room, which was locked, and had been left (as the doctor had told me) exactly as it was when the colonel was found. The blind was up; a magazine lay on the floor, beside it the stump of a cigar; a tumbler, with about a table-spoonful of whisky-and-soda, and a half-empty siphon stood on the table.

'Nothing further can be done meanwhile, except to continue our investigations. The man's description has been circulated,' said the Chief with a dissatisfied frown on his handsome face. 'All the roads and stations are being carefully watched. We found no trace of any motor-car having been either seen or heard on the night of the burglary. We have taken casts of the footprints, of course; but the scoundrel has disappeared as suddenly as if he had been whisked away in an aeroplane.'

The statements of the household had been taken, but no suspicion of the crime or of complicity in it attached to its members. The colonel's bachelor establishment did not demand a large number of servants. The domestics were a cook-housekeeper and two maids, who slept in The Bield, and a stable-boy who did odd jobs in the house, and came every day from the village. The outside staff were Angus the lodge-keeper, a gamekeeper, an under-keeper, and two stalkers. Angus occupied the lodge. Duncan Ross, the first keeper, a married man, lived in a cottage about half a mile away; Hector Matheson, the second keeper, a bachelor, in a bothy convenient for his beat near the western march of the estate. The two stalkers, Rob Macbain and Finlay Mackenzie, were also single men; they shared a bothy three miles away, at the edge of the forest beyond the moor. There was usually a chauffeur employed at The Bield, but no suitable successor had been found to the last one, who had died about a month before, and the colonel had been driving the car himself, a man from the village doing the cleaning and the running repairs.

In brief, old Janet's evidence was that she had been awakened by the noise of a door banging in the wind, that she got up to shut it, and then noticed a light shining from the colonel's room. Surprised (as the hour was late), she put on a wrapper and went to the Laird's Room. There she found the colonel lying on his face on the floor, breathing heavily and unable to speak. She ran to the dining-room for some brandy, roused the maids, and sent one of them for Angus. When he arrived, with her help he carried her master to his bedroom.

The two maids concurred. They came downstairs when Janet roused them, and had seen the colonel lying on the floor before he was carried to his room.

Angus's statement tallied with those of the others. The colonel was quite helpless when he carried him to bed, and never spoke to him. The doctor had been summoned at once, and arrived shortly afterwards. His evidence bore out that of the servants.

Dr Robertson of Castleton, who had been sent for by Dr Hall, agreed with his colleague's treatment and opinion.

None of the outside servants—the keepers and the stalkers—had heard about the affair until next morning, nor had any of them been near The Bield on the evening of the burglary.

(Continued on page 387.)

OLD SOHO SQUARE.

By A. Francis Steuart.

UNLESS one goes, like Tom Pinch, direct to Islington (where there is Cloudesley Square), we are told that there is only one 'perfect square' in all London, and that is the ancient and dignified square designed by Gregory King (1648–1712), herald, genealogist, engraver, statistician, and called at first 'King's Square,' a name ousted by the more popular title, 'Soho Square,' by which it is known to this day. It is the one open space of any considerable size that has always existed in the crowded foreign quarter of London called Soho (perhaps after an old hunting-cry, 'So Hoe!' used when the neighbourhood was still waste land). From the reign of King Charles II., Soho—before Covent Garden took its place—was the locality where the nobles of the Court who had not flitted to the new St James's district (which still commemorates the Jermyns, Clevelands, Arlingtons, &c., whom one sees in the pages of Gramont) did love to congregate.

The first 'great man' to build there was the king's reputed son, James, Duke of Monmouth, who acquired the whole of the south side of the square, and had a house—Monmouth House—erected on the site, after the designs, it is said, of Sir Christopher Wren; although a letter of 1683 says that 'One Mr Ford, a joynor, ye Ds Survayor . . . is ye sole architect of this house.' Poor Monmouth occupied the house for only a very short time when he was reconciled to the king in 1683; after that, disgrace, 'kingship,' flight, and execution filled up his cup of sorrow.

The house (teste J. T. Smith, who saw it demolished at the end of the eighteenth century) was as brave as oak staircases, ironwork gates, Grinling Gibbons carvings, and the Duke of Monmouth's arms could make it. Sold in 1693, it was in later times the residence of the French ambassador, the Comte de Guerchy. Here he found a most defiant subordinate in that curious personage Le Chevalier D'Eon, his secretary, who lived part of his life as a man, part of her life as a woman, and played a remarkable rôle in Louis XV.'s secret diplomacy, le secret du roi.

But long before the French ambassador's day Monmouth House had passed into other hands. It was bought by Lord Bateman. He it was whom George I. refused to create a Knight of the Bath, saying he 'could not make him a gentleman;' he made him instead an Irish peer in 1725. Lady Bateman was a granddaughter of the great Duchess of Marlborough, Pope's 'Atossa,' and had unluckily fallen under her displeasure. The result was that the duchess caused Lady Bateman's portrait to be hung before her in her room with the face blackened over, and on the frame these words were inscribed: 'She is much blacker within.'

A shoal of nobles occupied Soho in the eighteenth century. They included the Admiral Lord Berkeley, who offered to kidnap the Prince of Wales, to oblige his father, George I.; Lord Byron; the Earl of Carlisle, who, as we shall see, owned two houses there, one on the east and the other on the west side of the square; Lord Leicester, the savage father-in-law of Lady Mary Coke; Lord Peterborough, that brilliant meteor of his time, who travelled all over Europe at express speed, 'who would neither live nor die like other mortals,' and who had 'seen more kings and postillions than any man in Europe.' In addition to these and many others, no fewer than four ambassadors lived in Soho Square, no doubt helping to make Soho as foreign as it is, and giving it a feeling of 'extra-territoriality.'

Of the second Carlisle House, on the east side of the square, the banqueting-hall, very much altered, made in 1792 the nucleus of the existing Roman Catholic Church of St Patrick. One learns much of this mansion after the family of Howard left it. It fell into the clutches of a very remarkable adventuress, Mrs Cornelys, who designed to amuse all fashionable London, and for some time was successful in so doing.

Theresa Cornelys was a child of the stage, daughter of a Genoese actor named Imer. She was born at Venice in 1723, and soon became celebrated as a beauty and an actress. To be an actress at this period was not far from being an adventuress, and Theresa conjoined the two careers. Elle brillait at the Court of Baireuth, then with various vicissitudes in the Netherlands, Paris, Holland, and London, singing sometimes under her husband's name Pompeati, sometimes under that of Trenti. When, after overcoming many pecuniary adversities, she was starting afresh in London, she took the name of a Dutch lover, Cornelys.

Mrs Cornelys seems to have seized the great idea that the bon ton of London is easily bored and desires to be amused, and she acted accordingly. She first purchased (1760) the enormous house in Soho Square, and then proceeded to adapt it for entertaining the 'smart set.' Gaining the ear of some gay spirits (at the head of whom was Miss Chudleigh, the maid of honour), who called themselves 'The Society,' she gave subscription assemblies and balls which 'at first scandalised, but soon drew in both righteous and ungodly,' says Horace Walpole. Then she built on additions, 'and made her house a fairy palace for balls, concerts, and masquerades.' These met with much opposition from the 'unco guid,' and madame was threatened with the Alien Act. Still she persevered, and lavished enormous credit on her undertakings. Nothing daunted her—vast expense, the visits of awkward old friends like the Chevalier Casanova de Seingalt, prosecutions for keeping an 'irregular house,' or opposition from theatres and operas, the rivals of her 'musical evenings.' For a long time she kept her head high and above water. Royal patrons attended her routs (not, we may be sure, honest King George III. and Queen Charlotte), and we read that at one of her masquerades in 1770 a lady dressed as a sultana wore thirty thousand pounds' worth of jewels. Although encompassed with a sea of money difficulties, and in the Gazette in 1772, we learn from that agreeable young roué, William Hickey, that she was still courageously seeking fresh fields in 1780. He says: 'In the early part of the winter a new species of evening's amusement became quite the rage under the name of "The Promenade." Mrs Cornelys's truly magnificent suite of apartments upon the principal floor were opened every Sunday night at seven o'clock for the reception of company. So much did it take that the first people of the kingdom attended it, as did also the whole beauty of the metropolis from the Duchess of Devonshire down to the little milliner's apprentice from Cranbourn Alley. The crowd from eight to twelve was immense. When in town I never failed attending at it.' The ticket for this entertainment, which included tea, coffee, capillaire, orgeat, and lemonade, cost three shillings. The next year seems to have been Mrs Cornelys's last in any degree of splendour. Then scientific lectures were tried in place of promenades, but (naturally) did not draw so well; concerts were sporadically given; but the property had lapsed into the hands of that 'weary word' Chancery, until it was pulled down in 1788. Mrs Cornelys flitted from hotel to prison. In 1795 she emerged to attempt to sell asses' milk at Knightsbridge in a suite of rooms which she (always remembering her former patrons' tastes) had fitted up for 'breakfasts.' This new scheme did not succeed, and she was forced, by the pertinacity of her creditors, to seek an asylum within the rules of the Fleet prison; and there she died on 19th August 1797, aged seventy-four.

Another house in the square—also devoted to entertainments, but of a different calibre and less well omened—was the 'White House,' which was the happy hunting-ground of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Queensberry ('Old Q'), and Lord Hertford. The bizarre (but beautiful) decorations of the house, some of which resembled the Cabinet d'Enfer of Montmartre, probably gave rise to Thackeray's description of les petits appartements of Lord Steyne: 'One, sir, fitted up all in ivory and white satin, another in ebony and black velvet; there is a little banqueting-room taken from Sallust's house at Pompeii, and painted by Cosway; a little private kitchen, in which every saucepan was silver, and all the spits were gold.' Of the bygone banquets one need not speak, and about the 'White House' orgies one had best be silent.

Other great names dignified 'the Square.' The great Puritan Cromwell's daughter, Lady Fauconberg, led there an 'emancipated' career (that is, she went to plays) after the 'Restoration.' Sir Cloudesley Shovel, the ill-fated admiral, lay in state there before his body was buried in 'the Abbey.' John Evelyn, the diarist, took houses there, and the wily Bishop of Salisbury (Burnet) lived near by. The Venetian Minister and the Spanish Minister (Ripperda) may still have wraiths there, if residents leave such things. Sir Joseph Banks, the traveller, gave fresh lustre to the square, and was so well known that when Captain Cook's Tahitian Omai was lost at any time in London, his cry was, 'Sir Joseph Banks. Take me to Sir Joseph Banks.'

All these notabilities are mere shades, but with them a lover of history populates the square. They are no more extant than the statue of Charles II., which formerly decorated its centre, but has long since disappeared. It was by Caius Gabriel Cibber, and the base had emblematical figures of the Thames, the Trent, the Humber, and the Severn, a great quantity of whose waters has flowed under the bridges since it was erected.

Nowadays Soho Square is a bright spot again, full of sunshine, and a centre of business. No longer a residence of courtiers, it has yet, like the rest of Soho, ceased to be terra incognita. Gone are the days of W. S. Gilbert's 'Policeman Peter,' the wag who got hopelessly lost in Soho:

> For weeks he trod his self-made beats
> Through Newport, Gerrard, Bear,
> Greek, Rupert, Frith, Dean, Poland Streets,
> And into Golden Square.

No, Soho is now a well-known place. No longer must we go to Dickens and Thackeray to learn about it. But we can still go to them to add to our pleasure in Soho, to find that Ralph Nickleby lived in Golden Square, and Doctor Manette not far from the square we have been describing. Is it not something to remember, too, that Becky Sharp's father had lodgings just out of our square in Greek Street, and lived, during his peripatetic life, so long in one street which runs into Soho Square that he could get from his pupils the sobriquet of 'Sharp of Frith Street'?

CHRISTINE LONAVET.

PART III.

VII.

WHEN Lonavet returned that evening he was in the most affable mood. The knowledge that he had sold his horse and his cows naturally put him in good spirits, and when his daughters had gone upstairs and we sat smoking, he told me that if I wanted to marry Christine, I might. This filled me with such delight, I could hardly speak at first. I thanked him again and again, and when I went to bed I could not sleep. Why one so pretty and so clever should marry me I could not make out. However, that was her affair. Then the idea of her being unwilling to marry me came into my head, and this seemed so horrible that I tossed about more than ever, till the cocks that were hidden in the roof began to crow.

So I got up. Alas! early as I was, Christine had already gone, and before she came back the count's brougham drove up. His man brought a note for me, asking me to go to the château at once. I would rather have stayed, but as the fine old soldier had been so kind to me, I went.

The general soon came to business. 'You are not quite fit for service yet, my boy,' he said; 'but I know you want to serve your country, and I will tell you how you can do it, with your knowledge of German. You are the only man for leagues that I know of in these parts who understands a word of it. My late major-domo, Guillaume Loissier, married my cuisinière. Both he and she had saved up money, and I lent him some more. He has now nearly paid me in full. He took the Lion d'Or at Artenay, which is not three leagues from here, on the high-road from Paris to Orléans. From its strategical importance, the Germans have made it a sort of permanent headquarters. Well, I want you to go to the Lion d'Or as a waiter. I will give you a note to Loissier. You will learn a rare lot there, and my grandson will ride over every day on his pony, or my man will come in a cart. They will take back a packet of coffee or anything to keep up appearances. Do you see? Do you follow me?'

'Oh yes, mon général,' I replied, with some hesitation, for love pulled me one way, and duty to my country another. 'You mean, I should be a spy.'

'Well, of course, you can call it that if you like. I should say un vrai patriote. How could you do your country a higher service? You have brains in your head. I don't want to flatter you, but I know that you have courage also. I will move heaven and earth to get you the Médaille Militaire for settling those devils the other day; and, mon Dieu! if you will only do this, I will try—only, of course, it depends on what you find out—I will try to get you the Cross of the Legion of Honour.'

Well, though I did not much like the idea, I knew it would be for only a very short time, so I consented; and it was agreed I should go the next day, and that his grandson should take a note in advance to Loissier at once.

It appeared that during my absence a man, having heard Lonavet had sold two cows, had come to him and offered to buy the other two, and

Christine and her father had gone off with him to see them. When I came back, therefore, Julie was alone, and I told her what had taken place at the château, and why, on the next day, I was going to leave them for a short time. Julie had the same fine, clearly-cut features as her sister, but she was much fairer, and had wonderfully translucent hazel eyes, and these now opened wide with astonishment. 'You are going! You are going!' she exclaimed. 'Oh, mon Dieu! vous verrez, il y aura du tapage. Oh yes, there will,' she continued impetuously, as I in my turn looked at her in astonishment. 'When Christine hears of this, there will be the very deuce of a row.'

'I don't understand,' I answered.

'Well, there they are—they have come back—I can hear them—you will see,' she said, running off.

I had not to wait long ere Christine came hurrying in with an anxious face.

'What's this, Étienne?' This was the first time she had ever called me by my Christian name, and I could have kissed her for it. 'What's this about your going to Artenay and turning spy? I never heard of such a thing! C'est abominable!' she continued, her eyes flashing with anger. 'I will see the count. I will tell him what I think.' She spoke with such vehemence and at such a rate, all the time pacing up and down, that I was quite taken aback.

'Listen,' I said. 'Don't you see, I am serving my country till I am quite well? Moreover, I am going to have the Médaille Militaire; and if only I succeed in this business, very likely I shall get the Legion of Honour.'

'Honour!' she exclaimed scornfully; 'for spying? Sacré bleu, to talk of honour for that dirty work!'

'Well, but it's risky—very risky,' I answered.

'I know that,' she answered. 'That's the wicked part of it. You will be shot sur-le-champ.'

'It does not follow I shall be caught; but if I am, what then, eh?'

'What then?' she exclaimed suddenly, standing still for a moment with her hand to her forehead as she gazed upwards with a heaving breast. 'What then?' she repeated, stamping her sabot on the tiles. 'Then what about me? Holy Virgin, are you blind? Am I nothing? Because,' she continued with a blush—'because'——

In a flash I saw it all, though for a moment I was dumbfounded by my good fortune. 'I am not blind, ma chérie. I love you—I love you!' I cried, springing up and throwing my arms round her and smothering her with kisses—kisses she returned as warmly, as I drew her to a chair, where she sat on my knees and then buried her head on my breast.

'But listen to me, Christine,' I said softly.

'I will,' she answered, looking up lovingly. 'I am happy now.'

'I must go. I have given my word. What would the count say, and what would he think? I cannot break my word, even for you. But I am getting strong, and I am not going to be there a day longer than need be. You see that, don't you?' But ere she could answer she heard her father's footstep, and sprang up.

'You told me, monsieur,' I said, 'I might marry Christine, and she has consented.'

'I am very pleased,' answered Lonavet, taking my hand. 'But what's this I hear about your leaving us to-morrow?'

I told him, and he was as furious as his daughter had been.

'I will see the count, too,' he said. 'It's no business of his. C'est abominable—abominable!'

VIII.

'We have sold those cows,' said Christine that evening as I sat by her with my arm round her supple waist. 'There is little to do here now. I will go to the Lion d'Or, too.'

'You!' said her father, aghast.

'I know Loissier. I know he wants help. I'll go as fille de chambre or something. I can stay at Henri's.'

Her brother Henri had a large tannery at Artenay, in which her father had a fair amount of money. Henri, when the war broke out, had joined his regiment; but the Government soon found that they must have leather, and the young fellow, who had married his partner's daughter, was recalled. It would have been necessary otherwise to close the business, as his father-in-law was very ill. This idea of Christine's, therefore, was not so strange; and, in any case, her father knew that if she got an idea in her head, nothing that he or anybody else said would get it out.

Early the next morning I started, after many a fond adieu from Christine, who said it would not be very long before she followed me. The worthy innkeeper welcomed me warmly, but the count had evidently not told him the real reason of my coming. He was a short, bustling, bald-headed little man, and in normal times was quite capable of managing a quiet country inn; but he was of a highly nervous disposition. He made mountains out of molehills. The coming and going of the hated Germans, the va-et-vient all day and half the night, almost sent him off his head. His wife, too, what with five young children, and having to cook for those brutes, was sorely worried, as the maids had fled in alarm as soon as ever the Germans came into the district. Fresh officers for the most part coming and leaving every day, my appearance as a waiter caused no comment. In fact, as they guzzled and stuffed, holding their knives half-way down the blade, eating chicken with their fingers, cleaning their teeth with the drumstick, golloping their soup so that you could hear them across the road, they cared little who waited on them, so long as they got enough. I nearly got into trouble on the first day, though, when one captain, who was fortunately just leaving, overheard me saying to Loissier in a low voice that he ought to provide a trough for them. Turning savagely on the poor man, the captain said he would have me arrested; and so he might, only the bugles were sounding. This was a lesson, and I tried to become an automaton.

If my arrival was unnoticed, it was quite otherwise when Christine appeared. Looks of admiration followed her everywhere. Even the scornful way she set the plates down, sending the soup right and left, could not prevent that; but though I loved to have her near me, the insolent looks of the younger officers made me so angry that I told her I would remain even a shorter time than I had intended. I kept my ears open, especially after the wine had gone round, and, for one thing, I learnt that some ten thousand men had been taken from Von der Tann's command for the occupation of Chartres and Châteaudun. But it was one evening about the end of October when I made my chief coup.

The meal had lasted some hours, but the senior officers, who slept in the hotel, were still smoking and calling for beer and wine, when a major in a Jäger regiment came in.

'Hullo, Schwipesbrücke!' exclaimed an old Bavarian colonel. 'Why, I heard you were done for at Sedan.'

'So I was nearly, but I am all right now. We suffered badly.'

'Not worse than we did. I tell you, I have barely half my regiment left. Those drafts from München have never come yet; and I assure you,' continued the colonel almost in a whisper, 'it is a good thing those French do not know how very few our numbers really are.' Thereupon he gave particulars of some of the other regiments.

'Bah!' said the other. 'After all, what does it matter with these half-starved sheep? We can manage them all right.'

Every day the count's grandson or the trusty old coachman came over to the tannery, and I sent accounts in writing of all that I reckoned would be useful. But that phrase about its being lucky that we had no idea how small their numbers really were I considered so important that I feared to trust the message to any one, as it might be intercepted, and I told young Jean to get his grandfather to come himself. This the latter did. Christine kept out of his way, as it appeared she had actually gone up to the château the day after I left, and, to use the old count's words, she had been a regular 'devil in petticoats.' He was so impressed with what I told him that he promised to get me promoted when I left, which I told him would be very soon.

